The Manipuris have different mythological ballads that tell about the origin, descent and other relevant stories concerning them. The legends about Koubru, Atiya Guru, Shidaba, Konthoujam Lairembi, Panthoibi, Yumjaoleima, Khoriphaba and Thangjing, etc., are still sung to the accompaniment of a musical instrument called pena. This is an instrument used by Manipuri minstrels and bards. Played by hand it produces a sonorous and lilting sound. The origin of this instrument is also mythical with different versions. The instrument plays such an important role in this type of ballad singing that later on any kind of folk music with this instrument has been known by the name of Pena-Ishei. During the hey-day of royal power in Manipur, a separate institution of pena came into existence and pena became an indispensable instrument in the 'lai haraoba' festival of the different sylvan deities of Manipur. The pena music is confined to only indigenous and local themes of mythological and legendary nature, never straying in the field of ballads adopted from other sources. The ballad of Konthoujam Lairembi is a good example of mythological ballad in Manipuri. Among different versions which vary in small details, the following is one. Chingphuron Nahuinu, a daughter of Haorok Konthoujam clan was liked by Soraren, the god of the sky. An oracle cautioned her parents not to make her go out from home in search of vegetables in the field and not to show her because Soraren promised to take her to the abode of the gods on the fifth day. Soraren descended on earth riding his two-headed elephant on the appointed day and the marriage ceremony was celebrated after which she was taken away by him. In return, Soraren promised to bestow immortality and prosperity to the Haorok Konthoujams. A long time passed, the parents of Chingphuron Nahuinu longed to see their daughter and the message was sent through a dog they kept. Soraren warned his consort not to visit her parents because she may be polluted in the visit by taking human food, etc. The dog through whom the message was sent died suddenly and the Haorok Konthoujams cremated the dog ceremonially since they have not been granted immortality and prosperity by Soraren. Chingphuron Nahuinu found an opportunity in this and requested her husband to let her visit her parents, who were mourning for some deceased relative. Soraren who knew the whole intrigue warned her not to be misled and on her insistence allowed her to visit her parents on condition that she should not take food and wine offered by her parents. She promised to observe everything. With the help of a golden ladder she descended on earth and shared pleasantries with her parents and relatives who persuaded her to share food and drink prepared by them. She initially refused it but her parents assured her that they would put seven layers of clothes above her one after the other so that the screen so made may prevent her from being seen taking food, by her husband. She yielded. Soraren who could see everything was furious. He spat on her food. He said that she would not be allowed to enter his house since she broke her promise. She felt sorry for the mistake and continued to stay in her parent's home. A long time passed and Soraren knew of the repentance of his consort and ultimately took her back to his abode through a strong storm. The Haorok Konthoujams venerated her by installing an image in her paternal place.

This and other such mythological ballads about sylvan deities in the villages of Manipur are still sung by bards to the accompaniment of pena.

The historical ballad is a tradition in Manipuri in which the ingenuity and imagination of ballad singers could be distinctly seen. Besides the pena tradition of ballad song, Manipuri ballad had another style of singing known as Khongjom parba, in which the singer would use in place of the pena a percussion ensemble called dholok. As is evident from the name, this style must have been popular after the heroic battle the Manipuris fought against the British in 1891 in which they lost. Dhobi Leinou started singing episodes of this tragic battle to the accompaniment of some makeshift instrument to mark the time. It subsequently became very popular. In the battle of 1891 at Khongjom, many brave Manipuris fought valiantly against odds and such heroes like Paona Brajabasi, Heirang Kongja, Chinglen Sana , etc. died in the battle and Bir Tikendrajit, Thangal General, etc. were hanged subsequently for complicity. The episodes of this battle are sung by ballad singers of Manipur in the evenings for days together in the presence of packed audience. Following this style, episodes and incidents from the history of Manipur are chosen by ballad singers who sing them beautifully. Some instances of historical ballads in Manipuri now popular are episodes from the life of Charairongba, incidents from the life of Garibniwaj, taming a rogue elephant by Bhagyachandra, the death of Gambhir Singh, episodes of the meeting of Chandrakriti Maharaj with the viceroy of India, known locally as Jila Durbar. Such historical ballads are many.

Perhaps the best Manipuri ballads are on the flora and fauna. These ballads are sung in both the pena and the Khongjom parba style. While presenting a longish historical or mythological ballad to the audience, the expert singers would always ramble into anecdotes and episodes which are connected with the origin, growth, naming, features and social utilities of many orchids that are found in the forests of Manipur. This ballad about orchids and flowers is commonly known as Leiron. The ballad on Kombirei a kind of Iris that flowers in summer and grows only at the marshy place of Lamphel, the ballad on the different orchids like Melei Leisana Nungjumpan, Kwaklei, Yerumlei, Khongommelei and a host of other orchids are good examples of this tradition. Two moving and tragic ballads on the fauna of Manipur are a ballad on a couple of cranes and a ballad on Moirangsha, a tame, very sensible elephant of the royal palace killed under tragic circumstances. In the ballad of the crane couple, a story is narrated how a he-crane was caught in the net of a hunter, who ignored the warnings of his mate. When left all alone, the she-crane wailed and wept in moving human terms. A distinctive characteristic of this type of ballad is a kind of humanization and transference of human emotions to animate and inanimate objects of nature who are made to behave like human beings.

In the category of ballad of epic origin we may put ballads from the different incarnations of Moirang known as Moirang Shayon culminating in the story of Khamba and Thoibi which is considered as a national epic of the Manipuris and ballad songs from the Ramayana and the Mahabharata. The ballads of Moirang Shayon are sung in the style of both pena and Khongjom parba; this style is also known as Moirang parba. The epic ballad cycle of the incarnations of Moirang which is nine in number according to some and only seven according to others is a grand majestic saga of the eternal triangle in which generations after generations would find reflections of the various hopes, ideals and aspirations of each age. The story of Khamba and Thoibi, the last cycle in the incarnations is most popular. Manipuris would consider Thoibi, the princess and heroine of the story, an embodiment of ideal girlhood, and Khamba, the orphan and hero of the story an embodiment of ideal man. This ballad has been improved and made long through successive generations by addition of relevant episodes, and incidents by bards. Incidents and episodes from the Ramayana and the Mahabharata are sung in ballad style by singers in the style of Khongjam parba with dholok and the characters present in the episodes are invariably modified to look like characters in the Manipuri social life.

Among the tribals of Manipur also there are so many ballad songs which can stir the folks to different levels of emotion.

I.R.B.S.

BALLAD (Marathi) which is called 'Powada' was not a written poem till the end of 19th century. Ballads were handed down orally by the Gondhalis, the class of balladists, from generation to generation. It is the most irregular of all rhythmic compositions. It is nearly allied to the Pada. In the Pada the first line or lines are repeated at the end of each stanza or couplet, under the name of Dhruvapada or chorus. Each distich ending in two strokes is divided into two lines generally of unequal length. The Powada is much the same, the principal difference in the latter being the frequent alliterations and the excessive gingle of the rhymes. Sometimes, not content with making all the lines in a long stanza rhyme with each other, parts of the lines are also broken into rhyming fragments. In such case the metre is called 'Katibandha', 'Kadaka', or 'Katav'. But the versification is often very crude, and the authors not unfrequently slur over or omit words essential both to the syntax and the metre of their verse.

Probably in their earlier origin the lyrical, condensed and dramatic ballads were associated with dance and music and they depicted half mythical romantic themes and tales of wonder. They disappeared and a new class of historical ballads emerged. This ballad was either like a chronicle in character or commemorative of a famous historical incident or event. The oldest of the ballads available today is 'Death of Afzal Khan'. It was composed by Agindas and was sung in the presence of Shivaji and his mother Jijabai.

The second important ballad available is 'The death of Tanaji Malusare', written by one Tulsidas of Pune. The eighteenth century may be called the golden age of balladry, where longer ballads of every kind were composed and presented before the audience of warriors. Sometimes in these ballads mere rhythmical account of the historical incidents were presented. It depended for its effect rather on the clever presentation of details than the cumulative dramatic climax. This variety is of considerable antiquity and popular even today. The battle of Panipat (1761) forms the major theme in many ballads.

Pimpalgaonkar Shivram, Rama Satwai, Ranaraya were major minstrels during the Peshawa regime. Madhavsut, Lahiri Mukunda, Khandu Santu, Janardan, Ram Joshi, Prabhakar, Honajibala, Sanganbhau flourished at the end of the 17th century. Henry Arbuthnot Ackworth along with Shaligram was instrumental in collecting Marathi ballads. He published them in the collections in 1891 and 1894 respectively. Y.N. Kelkar has taken great pains in collecting a large number of ballads which he has published in three parts.

With the rise of modern forms of amusement, it was feared that this form would wane but during the freedom struggle of India, from 1890 to 1947 it emerged with a new vigour. Many Shahirs (Balladists) wrote ballads during this time. The poets like V.D. Savarkar and Govind wrote Powadas in praise of historical heroes and the mother land. They were proscribed by the British Government. In the Gandhian Era also Shahir Khadilkar, Naniwadekar and G.D. Madgulkar composed Powadas which were sung all over Maharashtra.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Ackworth & Shaligram (ed.), Marathi Ballads, Bombay, 1891., Y.N. Kelkar. Aithihasik Powada, part 1,2,3, Poona (1928, 1944 and 1969).

J.B.K.

BALLAD (Oriya) may be traced back to the ancient 'bolis' (narration). These 'bolis' were composed in a single rhythm, in simple language, to narrate some particular important incidents from puranic literature. These 'bolis' were meant to be sung and the yogis, that is, the wandering mendicants of Orissa, used to sing these 'bolis' while begging for alms. Some of the important 'bolis' are mentioned below.

(1) Dasa boli: It was composed by Nrisingh Bhramaravara in ten verses, and it narrated events from Krishna's birth to Kamsa's death; (2) Akrura boli: It was composed by Govind Das, and it narrated Akrura's arrival to fetch Krishna and the death of Kamsa; (3) Kacha boli: It was composed by Mahadeva Das, who portrayed Krishna's disguises as a bangle-seller; (4) Visikesana boli: It was composed by Kesava Das, and narrated the story of Karna offering meals to Vishnu with the flesh of his son Visikesan and Visikesan's subsequent return to life; (5) Mukuta boli: It was composed by an anonymous poet and narrated the conversation between Mukuta, the queen of Bengal, and prince Govinda, her son and the queen's insistent desire to make her son a yogi.

Apart from these there were other ballads or bolis which were composed in the past to teach religious ethics to the students. Such ballads following the pattern of Sanskrit texts like the Hitopadesha and Panchatantra, where animals were taken as principal characters, were Karkata Boli (The narration of the Crab), Hamsa—Hamsuli boli (The narration of the Swans), Srigala boli (The narration of the Jackal), Mriguni Stuti (The Prayer of the Deer), etc.

So far as the theme is concerned, many of the ballads in Oriya were religious, that is, they narrated and described religious events or such events and accounts that had religious motivations or directions. Such a ballad, and quite a popular one, was Deulatola (Building of the Temple), which was about Lord Jagannath and His temple at Puri and was probably composed in the 18th century. Some trace the source of the poem to the Mahabharata of Sarala Das or Nilambar Das as probable writers. Though the authorship is uncertain and it is partly borrowed from the Puranas, the poem is popular and interesting. It has two main sequences. The first deals with the love of Vidyapati and Lalita, Vidyapati being the person deputed by King Indradyumna to search for the Lord in the forest, and Lalita being the daughter of the Sabar-King who had kept and worshipped the Lord in the forest. The second sequence deals with the quarrel between the King Indradyumna, who had really built the temple, and Galamadhab, the imposter king who claimed to have built the temple. The most important part of the poem is the way it depicts the cultural union of the Aryans with the non-Aryans through the worship of the Lord, and establishes the ideals of love and humanism. Other ballads having religious content are Brata Kathas and Osa Kahanis which are usually sung by virgins, married ladies and widowed women, either individually or collectively, with a view to bring good to themselves or to other members of the family on the occasions of ritual worships inside the family. The stories are about the gods and the poems sing the gods' glory who are expected to bless the devotees and punish the unfaithful. Sometimes the gods are described with all human weaknesses. Thus Jagannath in the Dhanamanika Osa, Surya in the Rabinarayana Brata and Sadasiva in the Lokanath Brata, have been punished for their mistakes. In a way these poems give a good insight into Orissa's rich cultural heritage.

The story of jealousy and quarrel in rich and established families can be seen as themes of many ballads like Sadhaba Jhia, Santosima Brata Katha, etc. Even here there are religious implications and the divine blessings are invoked to protect the helpless heroes or heroines and guide them to get back their fortune.

Gatha Govinda Chandra is another popular religious ballad sung in the whole of Eastern India. The poet Yasobanta Das (16th century) has given a complete shape to various earlier folk-songs. The ballad has two parts. The first part relates to Govindachandra and the second part to the harrassment of childless Mukuta Devi. The traditional ballads describe the life of Mukuta in the harem in a very touching way.

If the ballad is taken only as a poetic form, many comparatively recent writers will be found to have written ballads on various themes.

At the advent of the new era, the poet Govinda Rath (1848–1918) with an intention of teaching ethics to the students through short stories, wrote a number of ballads which were collected together in a book entitled Nitiratnasara (The Substance of Ethical Gems, 1882). Prataparudradeva and Tini bandhu (Three Friends) by Radhanath Ray (1848–1908) and Balaram Singh by Gangadhar Mehar (1862–1924), are also considered as ballads depicting folk-legends.

Fakirmohan Senapati (1848–1918) was, in fact, the pioneer in the field of modern Oriya ballads. He composed the ballads such as, Tarabai, Josephine and Venisamhar in 1908. In his poetry collection Abasara Basare (In the Wake of Leisure, 1908), ten more ballads were included. Fakirmohan has displayed a lot of competence in composing ballads on historical and mythological themes as well as on real incidents. He adopted old rhythms and wrote in simple language.

Nandakisore Bala (1875–1928), the poet and novelist, also wrote good ballads. They were collected in his poetical volume Prabhata Sangita (Songs of Dawn) and present lively pictures of puranic episodes like those of Ekalabya, Yayati, Gautama, etc.

Chintamani Mohanty (1867–1944), a prolific poet, wrote ballads in blank verse which were included in his book Pritilekha (1918). He was an idealistic poet and the ballads usually conveyed solemn thoughts on human life. Buddhadevanka Upadesa (The Advice of Buddhadev) by Padmacharan Patnaik (1885–1956) was also a well-known ballad.

The famous lyricist and poet Krishnamohan Patnaik (1877–1940), with the aim of uplifting the moral ideals among women, prepared a ballad collection Bharata Bandana', mostly on mythological women like Saivya, Savitri, Damayanti, Sita, Draupadi, Sakuntala, Padmavati, etc. These are beautiful examples of ballads in simple language. Tulsi by Brajamohan Panda is also a ballad of this type.

In the second decade of this century Godavarish Mishra (1886–1956) earned fame by composing ballads in melodious haunting rhyme. Alekhika (The Portraits, 1923) was his first published ballad-collection. It was a collection of ten ballads from popular Oriya legends. The elucidation of the past glory of Orissa or the heroism of persons from legends, folk tales, puranas or history has been the sole aim of these ballads. Similarly his other books Kisalaya (The Bud, 1922) and Vitayan (1953) include many ballads. The novel presentation of the stories in each ballad made them very popular. Structurally they had a quick tempo, had elements of suspense and drama, and though their moods were at times melancholic, the endings were often pleasant. The poems conveyed strong emotions in a musical setting and colloquial language. Kalijai is one of his finest ballads that depicts the loss of life of a young girl in a storm in the lake Chilka as she was being taken by her father to her husband's house. The poem's melodious structure as well as its strong emotional pathos have made it extremely popular throughout Orissa.

Pandit Mishra's popularity as a ballad writer inspired many other contemporary poets to write ballads. As a result Godavarish Mohapatra (1898–1965), Kalindicharan Panigrahi (b. 1909), Baikunthanath Patnaik (1904–1979), Mayadhar Mansingh (1905–1973), and Krishnachandra Tripathy (b. 1911), all well known poets, have composed ballads at different times. Gandharir Asirvad (The blessings of Gandhari) by Kalindicharan Panigrahi, Kanta Kacha and Rengun Chithi by Mayadhar Mansingh and Ahuti by Krishnachandra Tripathy are some such ballads.

Radhamohan Godanayak (b. 1911) has probably become most famous among the contemporary poets as a ballad writer. He has popularised ballads as an important branch of Oriya poetry by composing more than fifty ballads. Some of these, like Visva Jivan Pathe, Veernari Sukhadei, Visarjana, Prabhavatir Avijan, Manikanchanayoga, Pranara Parasa, etc. are ballads based on Indian history. His ballad collection Pashupakshira Kavya (The Poetry of Animals and Birds, 1959) has several ballads composed on the legends from the lives of different animals and birds, taken from mythological, historical as well as realistic sources. Some such are Jatayu, Sarameya, Sakuntara Dana, Kapotadampati, Golapa o Bulbul, Chitragriba, Saktidhar, Hamsa-duta, Pasuraja, etc. His collection Dhusara Bhumika (Gray Prelude, 1966) has two ballads i.e. 'Bibi Khatuna o Silpa' and 'Satya o Sakti'. Another collection Samukara Swapna (The Dreams of a Shell, 1961) has the ballads Sriya Chandaluni, Valmiki, Sramanara Atithi Charcha, Guhaka, Ekalavya, Ananda o Prakriti, etc. The ballads Matangini Devi, Subas o Guniyan, Ama Lakhi Luga Chi, Taapoi, Jagannath Das, Durgavati, etc. are collected in Kaishorika (The Adolescent). The dramatic presentation of the story in a powerful, moving language, and with natural expression of emotions, makes Gadanayak eminently successful as a ballad-poet.

The poet Baikunthanath Patnaik also wrote some ballads on the historical stories and legends of the Buddhist period. Ambapallira Utkantha, Buddha-vandana, Mohanirvana, Nirvana-ananda, Buddha o Rahula, Parinirvana, Kissa Gautami are note-worthy ballads composed between 1931 and 1936.

Kunjabihari Das (b. 1914) is another distinguished name in the field of Oriya ballads. He has composed a good number of ballads glorifying the glamorous past of Orissa as well as India. The ballads such as Lanka-vijaya, Manasa-tirtha, Senapati Vishnusarma, Mandir Nagar, Bidrohi Mangal Singh, Vira Janais, Buddhanka Asirva, etc. are collected in Kunjabihari Sanchayan, Part II, (1960) under the title Navamallika. His Virasri (Kunjabihari Sanchayan, Part III, 1963) is also a ballad collection, in which 'Sarala Das', and 'Chandrachora Rayguru' are very powerful and popular ballads.

Vidyutprabha Devi (1929–1977) also composed more than fifty ballads, which are collected in Khadyotika (The Glow-worm) composed between 1945 and 1957. Besides, some of her other ballads have also been included in the Gatha Sanchayan, published in 1957. Banchhanidhi Das (b. 1923) has composed a number of ballads based on tales and legends about the glorious past of Orissa, which are collected in Ama Badadeula (Our great Temple, 1953) and Ama Konarka (Our Konarka, 1959).

There are many other ballads too which have not been listed here. Ballad-writing, though not as important as composing lyrical, personal poems, continues to be an important and popular branch in contemporary Oriya poetry.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Janakiballav Mohanty, Nabayugara Kavi Kavyadhara., Narendranath Mishra, Oriya Sahitya Bhasha—Eka Adhyayana.

A.P.

BALLAD (Punjabi) is a narrative form which was very popular during the mediaeval period. The ballads are sung by wandering minstrels, 'Bhat' and 'Mirasi', to the accompanying melody which enhances its emotional impact.

'Bhat' and 'Mirasi' have played a vital role in their creation, preservation and narration. The authorship of most of these ballads is unknown as during their long process of transmission, many new additions and transformations have been made, and hence these are considered as folk ballads.

Most of the Punjabi ballads narrate a single incident sharply focusing it in simple but vigorous language. Such ballads generally are related to interesting and absorbing incidents from some romantic legends, such as Hir Ranjha, Sassi Punnhu, Sohini Mahival, Mirza Sahiban, etc. and are popular among the masses, as these present their feelings of love and sacrifice. Some long ballads present series of incidents as these are either remnants of some old popular 'Swang' (a type of folk drama) or distorted portions of 'Swang'.

Among the heroic ballads the best known are those of Raja Rasalu. These relate some of his adventurous feats. Some of these ballads are now lost. Rasalu, son of King Salwan and brother of Puran Bhagat, is the most prominent folk-hero around whom a cycle of fascinating ballads of Hodi, Sirsukh, Sirkap, Anup dai, etc., have been developed. Only remnants of these cyclic ballads are now available. The other popular folk heroes of mediaeval period are Tunda Asraja, Dulha Bhatti, Jagga Daku, etc., whose life incidents have been narrated by minstrels again and again. These heroes have been eulogized.

The third popular category of ballads are spiritual in nature and induce the feeling of devotion and sacrifice. Some of these narrate mystical incidents to glorify some Pir, Bhagat or Saint, such as Baba Farid, Puran Bhagat and Guru Nanak Dev and such others.

Heroic ballad is generally known as Var which has both folk and literary tradition. Long romantic ballads have been developed into 'Kissas'. The ballads, relating to the incidents of Sikh guru's life are known as 'Parsang' and those ballads which glorify a martyr, such as Baba Deep Singh and Mati Das are called 'Shahidi' among the Sikhs and 'Shadi' if it is related to a Muhammdan such as Gazi.

S.S.W.B.

BALLAD (Sindhi). The ballads are sung by bards mainly on two subjects, viz. valour and romance. These have been transmitted by professional minstrels from one generation to another through oral tradition. Ballads may be short in length to be sung within a period of two three hours or these may be so long that a group of narrators take three or more consecutive nights for singing a single legend, holding the large assemblies of the village folk in rapt attention. Sindhi ballads are not composed according to particular metres. The main feature of ballads is rhyming lines and rhythm which create melody in their singing.

The earliest Sindhi ballads containing the sentiment of valour and heroism is the legent of Dodo-Chanesar. It has its origin in the Sumra period of the History of Sindh (1050-1350). The ballad has time and again been sung artistically by bards all over Sindh, west Rajasthan and Kutch (Gujarat) in its different versions and with additions and alterations, to glorify the heroes according to the taste of the time and assemblies of listeners. The earliest version that has come to notice in the written records is a brief account of Dodo-Chanesar in prose given in Taareekh Tahiri (a Persian work on history of Sindh written in 1621). Another older version of the legend in the written form is recorded by Munshi Udharam Thanvardas Mirchandani (1833-1883) after listening to the performances of some bards. It is in prose form containing many verses which were current in oral tradition. The book was published by him in 1881. All other versions of the legend in ballad form have been preserved by bards orally, who belong to the present century.

The legend as preserved in oral ballads and prose narratives is an important source of information for socio-political and cultural study of Sindh during the period from 12th to 14th centuries.

Another heroic ballad of Sumara period is a tale of a fisherman Moriro who fought with a crocodile and finally killed it to take revenge on the death of his six brothes devoured by the creature near Karachi.

The fights and forays between opposing parties, the battles between rival tribes and the wars between ruling chiefs and sardars which took place in Sindh during the period from the 16th century to the 19th century have gained popularity among masses in the region. A number of war-ballads known in Sindhi as Jangnama have been composed and sung by the minstrels. A collection of such small ballads has been published by Sindhi Adabi Board, Hyderabad Sindh in 1984, under its Sindhi Folklore and Literature project. The generosity of kings and chieftains especially of the tribe who ruled in Sindh from 1350 to 1520, has become a popular theme for ballads. It has given rise to the composition of a good number of ballads. The liberality of King Rai Diach who severed his head and gave it to Bijal a minstrel, is one of the popular ballads imbibed with valour, generosity and love for music.

The Sindhi folk literature contains a good number of the legends depicting immortal love of characters belonging to Sindh and some countries of the middle-east. Bards have narrated them in prose as well as in the form of ballads. Sassi-Punhu, Mumal-Rano, Umar-Marui, Lila-Chanesar, Suhini-Mehar are very popular ballads of romance based upon the incidents which took place in Sindh during the rule of Sumra chieftains (1050-1350). While the love-ballad of a fisher girl Nuri and Kim Jam Tamachi belongs to the period of Sammas in Sindh (1350-1520).

Many legends from Perso-Arabic literature gained popularity in Sindh during the medieval period. These were sung by folk poets and minstrels in the form of ballads. Yusuf-Zulekha, Shirin-Farhad and Laila-Majnu are some of the popular ballads sung in Sindh which have their origin in the literature of Middle-East countries.

The earliest religious legend which gained popularity among the Hindu masses is about Uderolal. He is considered to be an incarnation of God Varuna (God of Waters) born in Sindh in 950. He took birth in order to spare local Hindus of the tyranny of a petty Muslim chief Mirkh Shah of Thatta. The legend has been preserved through oral tradition. It has been recorded in prose as well as in the ballad form only during the fag end of the last century.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Nabi Bux Khan Baloch (ed), Dodo Chanesaru (in two volumes), Sindhi Adabi Board, Hyderabad Sindh, 1976-77., Nabi Bux Khan Baloch, Jangnama, Sindhi Adabi Board, Hyderabad Sindh, 1984.,Mashahoor Sindhi Qissa (Volumes published under folklore and Literature Project), Sindhi Adabi Board, Hyderabad.

M.K.J.

BALLAD (Tamil) Ballad is an age-old form of telling a popular story in verse to a large number of people. For more than four centuries, a large number of ballads were sung, with the accompaniment of certain instruments at times, in the nooks and corners of Tamilnadu.

Ammanai, Katai, Pattu, Malai, Cantai and Tutu are some of the names given to ballads in Tamil.

Tamil abounds in ballads. We can now list more than two hundred ballads and more than five hundred are yet to see the light of the day.

The ballads owe their life to the oral tradition. In spite of the length, many ballads have stood the test of time and have come down to us.

They are composed in the 'talicai' metre or 'vencenturai' in couplets; each line has four feet. Different types of viruttam, chintu, kanni and kummippattu have also been used in the ballads.

All popular legends and stories from itihasam, kappiyam, puranam and folklore were retold in the language of the masses for them to enjoy. They were composed by the folk writers in a simple and straightforward style and mostly in a dramatic pattern. If the original story lacked anything dramatic, the folk writer without hesitation twisted and turned the original for the benefit of the masses, to present them with a moving and also entertaining ballad. Most of the popular ballads are tragedies.

The authorship of the ballads is not known. However, some of the ballads like Alli Arasani Malai are attributed to one Pulavar Pukazhenti. This Pukazhenti is not a contemporary of poet Kamban; he is just a legendary figure on whom the ballads are foisted.

The ballads in Tamil attracted certain publishers and a good number of them have come into print. According to M.Arunachalam, the printing of these ballads had five phases in its history. The first is the period of cheap editions, in newsprint paper or other inferior papers; there was no editing, no proof-reading. The second phase saw the ballads being printed on good paper and well bound as those of Bhavanandam Pillai; some others printed the ballads in large types for easy reading of the masses and they were low-priced. The third phase saw the publication of Ramappaiyan Ammanai by S. Vaiyapuri Pillai of the University of Madras. This is a carefully edited text with an English introduction. In the fourth phase, ballads were published by the Madras Govt. Oriental Mss. Library and the Thanjavur Saraswati Mahal Library. In the fifth phase, we have ballads publlished by the Madurai Kamaraj-university with introductions and notes.

The ballads can be classified under five categories as follows:

a) Romantic ballads b) Ballads based on literature c) Historical ballads d) Social ballads and e) Modern ballads a)Romantic ballads: Alli Araani Malai, Pulantiran Kalavu Malai, Pancha Pandavar Vanavasam, Aravelli-Kuravalli Katai and Abhimanyu Suntari are some of the romantic ballads in Tamil. They are popular among the villagers even today.

Alli Arachani Malai which depicts the love affair of Alli with Arjuna seems to be the oldest among the Tamil ballads. This ballad is long and runs to more than 5000 lines in the 'ammanai' pattern. A close study of this and some other ballads will throw some light on the composition of the plot and construction of the Tamil ballad.

The first part of the above story is simply romantic without any believable incident. Indra granted rain to Chola country and left the Pandiya kingdom in severe drought. By the grace of Lord Siva it too got rain. The River Vaigai was in floods. People helped in closing up the breaches in the bunds. Lord Siva, who worked on behalf of an old woman, slept and was caned by the King. This portion from the Puranic story of Manickavachakar is used here in the ballad from the beginning. The Pandiya king who went for penance in the forest was blessed with a daughter Alli, who later became the Queen of the Pandiya country.

The second part of the story tells about the love of Arjuna for Alli. Alli had women all around her and she hated men altogether. However Arjuna once saw her, when she went for hunting and was infatuated with her. Krishna comes as a 'Kuratti' (fortune teller) and tells the fortunes of Arjuna. Alli was cruel and gave a number of punishments one after another, but Arjuna overcame all. Later Arjuna came in disguise and tied the sacred thread of mangalyam around her neck when she was sleeping. She could not remove it. Then there was a war between Alli on the one side and the Pandavas on the other. Everybody including Krishna ran away. At last Sahadeva captured her and she accepted Arjuna as her husband.

Except for the names, the story has nothing to do with the Mahabharata. Alli is a new creation of the folk ballad.The author has cleverly included the Pandiya story from the Tiruvilaiyadal Puranam in the first part. Though the second part has names such as Krishna, Arjuna, Bhima and others, no such incidents as in the ballad can be seen in the Mahabharata. Krishna comes as a lady fortune teller and reads the palm of Arjuna, which also is an innovation of the author. The punishments which Arjuna undergoes are numerous and they are also the inventions of the folk poet. The part that says that Alli despised all men and was ruling the country only with ladies is completely new. The tying of mangalyam when she was asleep is another new episode. The drinking of the boiling oil, which was brought to trace the culprit who tied the mangalyam by Bhima, is to be seen in no other work. The war of Alli on Pandavas is another imaginative invention of the poet. Finally the story ends with the capture of Alli and her marriage with Arjuna, who till then was not in the scene.

The ballad is highly romantic and the poet deserves all praise for the numerous new scenes which he has created.

Pulantiran Kalavu, Pancha Pandava Vanavasam, Ahimanyu Suntari and Pavalakkodi, are some of the romantic ballads which have picked the characters from the Mahabharata but the incidents in them are new, and that caters to the needs of the village folk.

In ballads like this, the poet always hides himself. The characters reveal themselves by their dialogues. Repetition of words and incidents, which is the hallmark of folk literature, is there in all these ballads.

b) Ballads based on literature: Mahabharata Ammanai,Karna Maharajan chantai, Ponnuruvi Masakkai, Nalachakravarthi Ammani, Aricchantiran Kummi are on the story of the Mahabharata. Kusa Lava and Kuyil Ramayanam are based on the Ramayana story.

Kovalan Katai and*Kannagi Valakkurai* (Ceylon) are ballads based on Silappatikaram, the Tamil epic. Kovalan Katai is not an adaptation, but a distortion and an ugly parody of the epic.

This story in 3300 lines is totally different in plot and in the delineation of the characters. Kannagi is not the gentle wife of the Silappatikaram; and Madhavi (here Madhaki) is a prostitute well versed in the profession; the whole of Vanchikkandam is omittend in the ballad; the incidents are framed to entertain the uneducated villagers.

The story of Siruttondar, which forms a part of Periya Puranam is retold as Siruttonar Katai. There are many other such ballads which retell the epic or purana stories transforming them to suit the tastes of the villagers.

Markandeyar Ammani, Manickavachakar Ammanai, Minatchi Digvijaya Ammanai, Valli Ammal Katai etc. belong to this category.

The heroic qualities of many warriors and chieftains have attracted the folks in villages from time immemorial; their lives have been depicted in a large number of ballads.

Kattabomman of Panchalankurichi stands foremost among them. Virapandiya Kattabomman Kataippadal or Kattabomman Charittirak in 7410 lines has been published by the Madurai University with an elaborate introduction by N. Vanamamalai.Kattabomman Kuttu is another publication by the same university. Both these works and some more are on Kottavomman who fought against white imperialism and refused to pay the annual tribute to the English men of the East India Company. He had by his side Diwan Tanapati and his brother Kumarasasami alias omaiturai. While Bomman and Tanapati were captured by the teacherous act of the Tontaiman of Putukkottai and were hanged at Kayattaru, Omaiturai escaped and rebuilt the fallen fort. When it was attacked he again left the palace and was given shelter by the Marutu brothers of Sivaganga. Later he was also caught and hanged.

The work in Kummi form is interesting to read with all the qualities of a ballad.

Sivagangai Kummi and Sivagangai Ammanai are the two ballads on the Marutu brothers of Sivagangai.

Tesingu Rajan Katai, which is in 3800 lines, depicts the struggle of Tej Singh of Senji against the Delhi Sultan. He had a good friend in Mehboob Khan, a Muslim. After winning the battle, Tej Singh kills himself since he did not want to live after the death of his best friend in the battle field.

The most popular of all the historical ballads in Tamilnadu is the story of Tesingu Rajan Katai. The story, the style, the diction, the incidents, the rhythm, the imagination, the emotions and the techniques make the ballad all the more interesting. The story of the valiant king was told in such a fitting manner that it aroused the feeling of valour among the villagers and also pity for the king.

Khan Sahib Chantai is another ballad worth mentioning. A Hindu by birth, Yusuf Khan alias Khan Sahib was a Muslim convert. He married Masha, a Harijan girl with Portuguese blood. This ballad in 3400 lines tells the story of Khan Sahib in a simple style. It is in 'nonti-chintu' metre.

Ramappayyan Ammanai is one of the earliest of ballads in Tamil. This is composed in 2500 lines, and tells the heroic story of Ramappayyan, a commander of Tirumalai Nayak of Madurai in the 17th century, who subdued the Setupati, ruler of Ramnad.

Aivar Rajakkal Katai is another beautiful ballad in 4000 lines. This is the story of Kulasekara Pandiyan who fights against the Kannatiyan of the Kannada country, and finally dies. War and love are the twin themes which are popularised in this ballad. The daughter of the Kannatiyan fell in love with the Pandiyan, who refused to marry her because she belonged to a lower caste. However when at the end the Pandiyan stabbed himself and died, she too threw herself on the pyre and died.

The beauty of the verse and the poetic feeling evoked by the ballads may be seen in the way in which love, heroism and social constraints impinge on one another in the narration. Examples may be given from Tesingu Rajan Katai of such poetic harmonisation. These ballads, whatever their themes and modes of narration, not only reflect the cherished social ideals of the time, but also represent the existence of a parallel literary culture, although more secular in nature, running, by and large, in consonance with the general literary trends of the day. And in the process, they acquired a distinct rhythmic quality and poetic beauty of their own.

d) Social ballads: Of the social ballads, Nallatangal Katai is the most popular, Nallatampi gives his sister, Nallatanga, in marriage to Kasirajan because of drought in the country she left her husband and came to her brother's house, after a few years, with all her children. But she was sent away from the house of her brother by his wife, Muli Alankari. Because of her distress, she threw all her seven children into a well and in the end she herself jumped into it. Nallatangal Katai is one of the touching ballads, which was very much liked by the people. It was read in a ballad form, performed in Villuppattu and enacted as a Terukkuttu.

Muttuppattan Katai, Kattavarayan Katai, Matur-aiviran Katai, and Chutalamatan Katai are some of the popular ballads even now recited in the remote villages of Tamilnadu.

Muttuppattan Katai is a tragedy which tells the pitiable story of a Brahmin who married the two daughters of a cobbler of low birth. But Kattavarayan Katai turns the table; here Kattavarayan, a pariah by birth, is loved by a Brahmin girl, Arya Mala. The love is not successful; Kattavarayan is punished and is put to death. Both these stories have to be studied against the social background, particularly of the caste system.

If the historical ballads are breath-taking, the social ballads are heart-breaking.

e) Modern ballads: Kuyil Pattu of Subramanya Bharati, Gandhi Mahan Katai of Kottamankalam Subbu, Sivakami Charitam of P. Sundaram Pillai and Nanchil Nattu Marumakkal Vali Manmiyam of Desika Vinayagam Pillai are some of the modern ballads. They differ from the other types of ballads in many ways. The form, content, style, language and techniques are quite different from those of traditional ballads.

The ballads in Tamil are many in number with all the ingredients and characteristics of an oral traditional poetry. The puranic ballads portrayed devotion and preached certain teachings or morals; the literary ballads narrated stories from epics in a different and touching manner; the social ballads brought out the habits and customs of the people. In short, the ballads in Tamil present a world of heroic warriors, pious devotees and socially conscious lovers, who had a niche in the hearts of millions of villagers.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : M. Arunachalam, Ballad Poetry, Gandhi Vidyalayam, Tiruccirrampalam, Thanjavur, 1976)., N Vanamamalai-Studies in Tamil Folk Literature (N.C.B.H. Madras,1969).

R.K.

BALLAD (Telugu) Ballad, a form of Anibadha folk literature, has enriched the Telugu folklore very greatly. It is believed that there were ballads in Telugu even in the Pre-Nannaya period. There are evidences to show that Palanadi Virakathas (Ballads of Palanadu) gained popularity in the latter half of the 13th century.

Ballads in Telugu are sung by the mendicant minstrels who are known as Pambalavaru, Vira Vidyavanthulu, Kommulavaru, Pitchikuntlavaru, Saradakandru, Viramustulu, Jangamulu, Dasarulu, Bhagavathulu, Suddula Gollalu, Gangireddulavaru, Budabukkalavaru, Chindu Madigal, Jamukulavaru, etc. The language is generally colloquial, natural, simple and sweet, full of proverbs and idioms. We find a harmonious blend of literature and music in these ballads which were composed with simple metres like Khandagati, Manjari Dwipada and Dwipada following the rule of Yati and Prasa. Mostly Virarasa dominates in Telugu ballads.

Several scholars have attempted the classification of ballads. Tangirala Subba Rao divided the folk poetry into two broad classes viz. Janapada geetalu (Folk songs) and Viragathalu (Ballads). The popular or traditional ballads are subdivided into Katha Chakramulu (Ballad cycles), Veeragathalu (Ballads) and Laghu Viragathalu (small ballads). The literary ballads are found in the form of Dwipada Kavyas. Apart from these ballads, there are imitations such as Burrakathalu, Jamukulakathalu and Suddulakathalu.

The ballad cycles were further divided into Saktikatha chakramu (Ballad cycles of the incarnations of Adi Sakti), Palanati Virakatha chakramu (Ballad cycles of Palanadu) and Katamaraju katha chakramu (Ballad cycles of Katama Raju). Shakti Katha chakramu comprises narrative poems like Yallamma katha, Ankamma katha and Poleramma katha. The ballad cycles of Palanadu which were composed on the historical incidents that occurred in Palanadu area (Guntur District) date back to the 12th century A.D. A good deal of research is centred round this cycle and it appears that there are about 25 narrative poems in it which are sung by Veera Vidyavanthulu or Palanativaru with the accompainment of Pambajodu (twin drum) for 'Tal' and Thiti (bag-pipe) for 'Sruti'.

In the ballad cycles of Kathamaraju, there are about 32 narrative poems depicting mostly the heroic deeds of the rulers of the Nellore area for three generations starting from Avula Valaraju and ending with Katama Raju with such a coherence as to give it the appearance of an epic. These ballad cycles are mostly sung by Kommulavaru and at times Suddula Gollalu also sing these songs.

The 'Viragathalu' can be broadly divided into Bobbili Varusakathalu, Padamulu and Jangamakathalu. The widely known narrative songs under these categories are Bobbili Katha, Desingu Rajukatha, Kambhoja Rajukatha, Mugguru Maratheelakatha, Balanagammakatha, Sarvayi Papadukathe, Lakshmana Murtcha, Lakshmanakatha, Ganga Vivahamu, Dharmangada Charitra, Sarada Ramayanamu, Sarada Sarangadhara, Siriyala Maharaju Charitra, Nijalinga Chikkayya Katha, Devayani Charitra, and so on.

Some examples of smaller ballads are: Gurrala Gopi Reddy Pata, Budda Vengala Reddy Pata, Ediga Ramanna Pata and Dharmapuram Narasimham Pata.

Ballad cycles are very lengthy and are sung for months together; ballads may take two or three nights whereas the smaller ballads many not take more than an hour or two.

Interestingly, it was C.P. Brown who collected the Telugu ballads first in 1842.

The yeoman service rendered in the field of research on ballads by eminent scholars like Veturi Prabhakara Sastri, Mallampalli Somasekhara Sarma, Sripada Gopala Krishna Murti, Hari Adiseshu, B. Rama Raju, Nayani Krishna Kumari and others is commendable. The Andhra Pradesh Sangeeta Nataka Academy on the eve of World Telugu Conference (1975) published a book on ballads written by Tangirala Subba Rao. Laudable efforts are made by the All India Radio stations in Andhra Pradesh to keep alive the cultural heritage of Andhras through ballads. Several enthusiastic researchers are burning midnight oil to get more authentic, comprehensive and latest information.

In spite of this, ballads are on the decline in modern times on account of the growth of civilisation, ban on Jataras (Shakti worship) and cock fights, and lack of interest on the part of writers. It has been very recently realised that it is time for the literary institutions and Universities to take steps to print and preserve these ballads, which are the treasures of Andhra culture.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : B. Ramaraju, Telugu Janapada Geya Sahityamu (Hyderabad); G.S. Mohan, Janapada Vignana Vyasavali (Malayanuru, 1981); Hari Adiseshuvu, Janapada Geya Vagmaya Parichayam; Nedunuri Gangadharam, Janapada Geya Vagmaya Vyasavali; R.V.S. Sundaram, Janapada Sahitya Swarupam; Tangirala Subba Rao, Janpada Sahityamu Veeragathalu (A.P. Sangita Nataka Academy, Hyderabad, 1975).

R.S.R.

BALLAL, VYASA RAO (Kannada; b. 1923) was born at Udipi. He is the son of Nidamburu Ramdas and Kalyanibai. Ballal is an accomplished novelist and story-writer from Bombay. He had his primary education in Udipi after which he went to Bombay and came in close contact with Bombay life. His emotive novel Anurakta ('Women in Love', 1953–2–1958) was awarded the Mysore Government prize. His collection of short stories entitled Manjari (1975) is a remarkable work and was awarded the Karnatak State Sahitya Akademi Award. Another collection of short stories is titled Sampigeya Hu (1958). Besides Anurakta he has brought out two more novels entitled Vatsalyapatha (The path of Affection) and Uttaravana (The Aftermath) and a book of verses viz. Herjantagan. He is a serious but sedate writer who creates suspense only through straight narration of episodes without recourse to devices of style and sentence manipulations. The episodes themselves are remarkably complex, bringing out a human clash of wills and suffering. The setting chosen is generally Bombay, but sometimes he is given to describing his rural or moffusil memories. Most of his characters belong to the salaried white-collar class. Bâllal is an idealist given to philosophical musings which have found a place in a collection entitled Badukina Adarsa (The Goal of life). But his idealism makes him an objective observer of city life, its stresses, strains, clash of wills and feelings of rootlessness.

S.M.P.

BALRAJ KOMAL (Urdu; b. 1928) was born at Sialkot (now in Pakistan). He is, at present, Deputy Educatior Officer in Delhi Administration.

A major poet with personal conscience and commitment, Komal has five collections of poetry, namely, Meri Nazmein (My poems) 1954, Rishta-e-Dil (The Relationship of the Heart), 1963, Safar Mudam Safar (Ever at Travel), 1969 and Nizhad-e-Sang (Born of Rock) 1975. Besides the Anjuman-e-Taraqqi-e-Urdu (Hind) published an Intikhab, a selection of his poems, in 1971 and Parindon Bhara Asmaan (A Heavenful of Birds) in 1984. Besides poetry, he has published a collection of his short stories Ankhen aur Paon (The Eyes and the Feet) in 1981. Many of his critical writings on modern poetry and fiction, are also available for reading in numerous literary journals some of his works have also appeared in Hindi & English.

Komal belongs to the generation of the old-time new poets immediately noted and loved for their individual poetic stance and experience of life in post-independence literary era. But, unlike his most fellow-newtimers, he features, both in person and poetry, contemporary suffering with quiet assurance. He is more at home in his poetry when the effort of the short story writer in him combines with that of the poet and he thus creates narratives at once poetic and fictional. Such of his poems as Akeli, Akheri Bus, Ambulance, Night Train and Saba ke Hath Peele Ho Gaye as also many of his prose poems, illustrate the point. He was given the Sahitya Akademi Award on Prindon Bhara Asmaan.(Poetry) in 1985.

J.P.

BALUTEN (Marathi) by Dagdu Maruti Pawar alias Daya Pawar is an autobiography by a Dalit writer. Dalit Literature rose on the horizon of Marathi with short stories and poetry and is chiefly autobiographical. The first autobiography to attract the attention of readers and critics was Daya Pawar's Baluten. Daya Pawar has poetic talent and being a good student of literature knows well the qualities of good literary style. He wanted his autobiography to be different from the accepted norms of the literary form. Although the experiences in the autobiography had to be personal yet the author wanted to be objective and representative in effect. Hence the choice of the title which symbolises the rural untouchable community in general. The author appears to be in two minds about this approach and hence he has endowed the paternity of this narration to one Dagdu Maruti Pawar. However in the heat of these outpourings he soon forgets this objective stance. However this does not vitiate the texture of the experiences. The genuineness of the experiences of an untouchable struggling for a peaceful existence, mentally tormented but incapable of retaliation in word and deed have attracted the readers to the book. It was praised all around though some of the critics deprecated the frank exposition of the facts. The book soon ran into its second edition. It was translated into Hindi and received equally high praise. In the epilogue to the second edition the author attempts to answer the critics. But he does not justify his approach nor defend his narration. He leaves the judgement to the future generation. An autobiography normally is written to make a man a hero. This autobiography is different. It has created the first anti-hero in Marathi literature.

S.S.R.

BALWANT, BAWA (Punjabi; b. 1915) is an eminent Punjabi poet; parental name Mangal Sen, then Balwant Rai, afterwards the present nom de plume. He learnt traditional 'Mahajani' script and got training to be a Munim (shop accountant). He had no regular education; his father taught him Persian, Urdu and Hindi. For livelihood, he did petty jobs. He launched his poetic career by composing patriotic poems in Urdu 'Sher-e-Hind' (Lion of India, 1930-32); and was received as the first serious, intellectual and conscious Punjabi poet with his first poetic venture Mahan-Nach (The Cosmic dance, 1941). His Sugandh Samir (The Fragrant Wind, 1959) was adjudged the best poetic achievement of the year (1959) by the language Deptt. of Punjab Government. He is altogether a different 'voice' for his fresh lyrical patterns and chiselled poetic diction. In spite of all the frustractions of life, his verse reverberates optimism. His main works are as follows: 1. Amar Geet (Immortal Songs 1942), Jwala Mukhi (The Volcano, 1943), Bandargah (The Harbour, 1951), Kav Sagar (Ocean of poetry, 1954, edited anthology), Kis Kis Tarhan de Nach (How many Forms of Dances, 1957) and unpublished biographical-sketches of some of the artists of India and some of the forgotten Punjabi-Urdu poets.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Gurcharan Singh, Bawa Balwant di Kav Kala (The poetic art of Bawa Balwant Delhi, 1965)

S.S.So.

BALYAKALASAKHI (Malayalam) is a celebrated Malayalam novel by Vaikom Muhammad Bashir, one of the founding fathers of the modern Malayalam novel. 'It is an intensely human vignette of lower middle class Muslim life', the first serious literary work to depict this section of Kerala society.

Majid is the son of a rich timber merchant, an uneducated short-tempered bully of a man. Suhra is the daughter of a petty arecanut trader, a poor but loving man. Majid is nine and Suhra seven when the story begins. They are neighbours, they go to the same school and study in the same class, but become family friends only after playing on each other tricks characteristic of their immature age. Their friendship develops into love when Suhra, good at her studies, helps him, though with poor results, to come up. Then there comes the times for circumcision for the boy and ear-piercing for the girl, ceremonies tenderly described in the novel. Soon the boy goes to the town school but she is too poor to do so. As if to aggravate her dire distress, her father dies. Majid's father can help her only after helping the 67 nephews both from his wife's side and his own.

Suhra, now a girl of sixteen lives on, looking after her mother and younger sisters. One day Majid falls ill, and while nursing him, she bends low to feel his forehead. They kiss each other and realize that they are in love.

One day Majid, expelled by his infuriated father, leaves his home. Wandering for about seven years and mingling with all kinds of people, he sees the essential oneness of humanity. Everything on the home front has turned topsy-turvy by the time he returns home. His father is a pauper now. Suhra has been married off as the second wife of a butcher. Majid yearns to have a glimpse of Suhra, (who is still his beloved) when she is sent home by her husband who does not want her any more. On hearing about Majid's return she comes to see him and pours out her tale of woe and conveys her decision not to go back. They once more relive their childhood in recollection.

Majid resolves to marry Suhra. His mother is not against him but she would rather have his sisters married first. This means money. Majid sets off again, now to make money. He finds a job and works hard but is crippled in an accident. He dreams of Suhra and talks of her. But even this happiness he is not destined to enjoy for long. A letter from home brings the news of Suhra's death. His thoughts rush back to the last parting scene with his sisters standing behind the door, father leaning against the wall, Suhra sobbing in the garden. The novel ends on this note.

One may call Balyakalasakhi an extended short story rather than a novel in view of the limited canvas (only about 80 pages), the subdued manner in which the intensity of emotions is built up and the suggestiveness of the short, simple sentences. But one must remember that it depicts the life story of the hero and the heroine covering a span of twenty years. Structurally the novel reaches its climax in the ninth chapter. The remaining three chapters work out an anti-climax. The vision of life emerging from this work also suits a novel more than a short story.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Krishna Chaitanya, A History of Malayalam Literature (Madras, 1971).

S. Ve.

BAMULAHAZA HOSHIAR (Punjabi). Narendrapal Singh's Bamulahaza Hoshiar has the unique distinction of being the most controversial novel in the annals of Punjabi fiction. The novel has been charged with obscenity, cheap sensationalism, sacrilegious violation of religious susceptibilities of a particular community and plagiarism too. On the other hand it has been extolled as a sensitive, poignant depiction of the existentialist enigma of man, of his sense of inner void and outer purposelessness.

The extremity of such reactions is also due to the fact that having been conceived by its author as a futuristic fantasy, thus being 'ab initio ' free from the constraints of realism, verisimilitude and probability, this work does not fit into the pre-conceived conventional notions about the novel-form as a genre of literature.

Narendrapal Singh, rejecting the old patterns and motifs, is primarily concerned with the individual pitted against the forces of modern techno-industrial civilization which tends to negate his individuality. With Narendrapal Singh the stress passes on from 'System' to 'Civilisation' the futuristic intimations of which are symbolically presented in Bamulahaza Hoshiar in a deliberately chosen shocking manner leading to so much controversy which became accentuated when after winning the Sahitya Akademi Award for 1976, it was banned by the then administration in Punjab, for being obscene and liable to hurt religious feelings of one community.

The main scene of the novel opens up at the Kennedy International Airport where thousands of passengers and visitors got stranded due to heavy snow-fall that blocked all air and ground traffic. The hero of the novel, Avtar Singh who had gone to the airport to receive his beloved Moria, an American Peace Corps Volunteer, on her return from India, is also one of the trapped persons in the terminal buildings. The situation at the airport worsens with the collapse of the services and amenities and the disappearance of the eatables into black market. Vested political interests give a new dimension to the tragedy, when the Mayor of New York with an eye on the next Presidential election joins the fray. The crisis brings under sharp focus the inherent weakness of our technological civilization. The breakdown of the arrangements at the airport, in a sense, symbolizes the collapse of the value-system. The resultant situation of 'Valuelessness' is presented through lurid scenes of homo-sexuality, and mass-sexuality, enacted at the airport where a girl opens a sex-shop. In his effort to find a way out Avtar Singh dies by accidently falling on the snow-covered pipe of a fire-hydrant outside the terminal building. There is no exit or escape from the situation in which man finds himself caught up today.

The lopsidedness of our materialistic civilization, as the author seems to perceive it, is symbolically presented in the form of facial distortion that the victims of a new disease happens to develop, alongwith some other symptoms like blank looks and paralysis of mental faculties. With the disease spreading far and wide, the scene moves on to India which offers the cure out of its 'Bur' tree hailed as the saviour. That the author does not attempt to present the so-called 'Spiritualist' East as an answer to the 'Materialist ' West is clear from the fact that Moria is disillusioned by hypocrisy and superstition in the native land of her lover. The novel tends to give an impression that the author visualises a return to nature (symbolized by the 'Bur' tree) as a cure and corrective to the lopsided materialism of modern civilization. If this is what Narendrapal Singh has in mind, then, he is providing only a regressive solution to that thrust of the future which the novel presents in a fantasy-form. Perhaps the author has no pre-conceived solution or notion, leaving his fantasy free to follow a course dictated by its own logic of illogicality.

J.S.A.

BANA (Sanskrit; 7th century A.D.) Bana was a powerful prose writer. His dates are fixed as he was a contemporary of Shri Harshavardhana, King of Kanauj (604-647 A.D.). An autobiographical account has been given by Bana himself, slightly in his Kadambari and quite extensively at the beginning of his Harshacharita. With a legendary touch Bana traces his ancestry to the family of Vatsa, the cousin of Sarasvata, the son of Goddess Sarasvati and Dadhicha. Vatsa lived in Pritikuta, a place on the river Shona or Hiranyabahu. A descendant of this family, one Kubera, became very famous on account of the honours he received from Gupta kings. One of the four sons of Kubera, namely, Pashupata was the great grand father of Bana: Pashupata's son Arthapati had eleven sons; one of them Chitrabhanu was the father of Bana. Bana's mother was Rajadevi.

The Vatsyayana family enjoyed the favours of both Lakshmi and Sarasvati and was renowned for learning and wealth. The ancestral mansion used to be filled with fragrant smoke rising from sacrificial fires; and the sound of Vedic recitations reverberated through its halls. In this family mansion even the parrots in cages knew the correct pronunciation of Vedic mantras, and would correct the erring pupils in their daily lessons and recitations. Bana grew up in such an intellectually and materially rich domestic atmosphere, imbibing the knowledge of all Shastras, arts and lores. Unfortunately he lost his mother when he was a child; and his father who nurtured him carefully also passed away when Bana was fourteen. His uncles and cousins were very kind to him. But this personal loss or the adventurous spirit of unbriddled youth or an irresistible curiosity to see the world implanted a wanderlust in Bana's heart. He left his home and set on a wandering tour of Northern India. He gathered around him a multi-cultured band of youngsters which included actors and dancers, musicians, professional bards and readers, poets and writers, jugglers and snake-charmer, poison-doctors, gamblers, betel-leaf carriers, magicians, men of different professions and religious creeds, and even women. Such careless wandering in a dubious bohemian company was bound to set several tongues wagging. And though Bana was received back home with affection, wonder and curiosity by his relatives a cloud of baseless scandal hung over his head.

Bana in his wanderings had contracted the friendship of Krishna, cousin-brother of Emperor Harshavardhana of Kanauj. Word came from him that the Emperor wished to see Bana and Krishna had already prepared some background for the interview. Encouraged by his relatives Bana left home, choosing an auspicious day, to meet the emperor. The meeting took place at Manitara on the bank of Ajiravati. Bana faced the king with trepidation in his heart; the king showed him first scant courtesy and called him 'a great libertine' (bhujanga). To this baseless charge Bana gave a spirited reply. It did not take a long time for Bana to win the admiration, affection and patronage of Harsha, who was himself a poet-dramatist, a lover of arts and a broad-minded humanitarian as well.

Like his unusual career, Bana's contribution to Sanskrit literature is unique. The father of an ornate florid style, Bana created a new genre of prose romances by writing a historical tale, the biography of his patron king, under the title Harshacharita and a romantic imaginative novel, Kadambari. In this literary form, known in theory as Katha and Akhyayika, Bana had predecessors and imitators, but not equals exactly. Bana also wrote a devotional poem of hundred verses, Chandishataka, which glorifies the spouse of Shiva, Ambika. The play Parvatiparinaya, sometimes attributed to him, is really by a later writer Vamana Bhatta Bana of the 15th century. A.D. But fragments of a play, based on the Mahabharata and resembling the theme of Venisamhara called Mukutataditaka, have been recently discovered in literary quotations and they suggest Bana's probable attempt at dramatic writing.

The tributes Bana has paid to old Sanskrit and Prakrit poets at the beginning of his Harshacharita show his deep acquaintance with the wide and varied range of the literature of ancient India. Bana seems to be thoroughly ingrained in the traditional shastras, although he does not parade his technical knowledge in his writing. He is a master of the puranic-historical tradition, is learned in the mythology as embodied in old epics and puranas, and uses all this equipment to enrich his rather difficult but dazzling literary prose style. Western scholars have compared Bana's writing to a luxurious jungle which does not offer easy access and a passage through which is felt to be fraught with unexpected dangers in the form of recondite allusions and abstruse puns. It must however be remembered that Bana was creating a new style of prose-writing, applying all the rhetorical devices of Kavya to the writing of prose. Using oxymoron, paranomasia, alliteration and sound-effects of rhyme, poetic fancy and hyperboie, punning, use of mythology and emphasis by rhetorical exclusion, Bana was playing with language, but at the same time he was widening the horizons of its meaning and its literary and cultural associations. It is an extraordinary style of writing which only the grammatical and semantic richness of Sanskrit could make possible.

The main qualities in Bana's writing which stand out are:-

1. his unfailing power of observation of men and things, and his deep involvement in the affairs of man,
2. the universal appeal of his treatment of love and
3. his art of storytelling evolved from a prevalent folk-form into a wellknit literary form, wherein the petals of the story seem to open one by one not in a chronological order but in an aesthetic pattern.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.B. Keith: History of Classical Sanskrit Literature, Oxford, 1928; C. Kunhan Raja: Survey of Sanskrit Literature, Bharatiya Vidya Bhavan, Bombay, 1963; Dasgupta and De, History of Indian Literature, Classical period, Vol. I, Calcutta University, 1947; K. Krishnamoorthy: Bana, Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi, 1976.

G.K.B.

BANABHATTA KI ATMAKATHA (Hindi; b. 1907 d. 1979) is Hazariprasad Dwivedi's first novel. Set as it is, like his later novels, against a historical background, the novel is a fictional autobiography of the famous Sanskrit poet-novelist, Banabhatta, who was a court poet to the poet-king Harshvardhana of the 7th century.

The novel, which is divided into twenty 'Uchhavasas' (Chapters), opens with a quaint fictional preface by one Vyomkesha Shastri who avers that he received the manuscript from an English woman Miss Catherine (Didi), who shortly afterwards left for her homeland along with her pet cats. The manuscript, he claims, was unfinished and, to the end of the novel, this fictional narrator adds a little note by Miss Catherine which hints that it was not an autobiography of Banabhatta, but a symbolic representation of her own life. The novel thus acquires a very interesting double frame work where the self of the author enters the fictional microcosm in several guises, as Didi, as Vyomkesha, the narrator and as the hero Bana himself. The narration thus acquires an intimacy of tone and also an ironical framework which is rare in a historical novel, and which connects it effortlessly to basic concepts and questions of our age.

Banabhatta, the hero, is the archetypal aesthete. Adventurous, sensitive, gregarious and a lover of beauty, during his peregrination Bana meets Nipunika, an actress, and falls in love with her. They separate after a quarrel and Bana becomes a wanderer again. After several years, he meets Nipunika once again at Sthanvishvar, and with her help, rescues one Bhattini (Chandradidhiti) the daughter of king Tuvar Milind, who had been forcefully confined in the harem of the king of Sthanvishvar. A series of incidents follows which includes strange encounters with 'tantriks' (Mahamaya, Aghor-Bhairav, Virativajra), clashes with the soldiers of the Abhir overlord, the acceptance of Bana as the poet of the court and the encounter between Rajyashree and Bhattini. At this point, Nipunika dies after acting in a play, and the heart-broken Bana, having arranged a meeting between Bhattini and her father, takes leave of her to go to Purushpur on royal business. The story ends abruptly at this point, and Vyomkesha Shastri takes over, bringing the reader back into our century with Miss Catherine's moving letter about human life and emotions being the same all the world over, and the need for compassion and love in a world torn by war and greed.

Hazariprasad Dwivedi has made an excellent use of the available material about the historical figure of Bana (Bana's own Kadambari and Harshacharita) and the language of the novel follows Bana's ornate and mellifluous style closely. The technique of having a number of narrators, describing incidents and people from different points of view, is also from Kadambari.

To all this Hazariprasad Dwivedi has added his inimitable puckish humour and deep erudition, which makes it a highly complex historical tale, a delightful and profoundly moving human document, which highlights the question of our age against a timeless tale of a great writer in search of truth.

M.P.

BANGARVADI (Marathi) by Vyankatesh Madgulkar is a beautiful novelette ruling the reader's mind since its publication in 1955. In Marathi, a trend of depicting rural life came into vogue in post-independence era. Madgulkar proved through his imaginative writings that the depiction of rural scene can be of literary significance, Bangarvadi which is known as his best work is a milestone in this modern trend.

Bangarvadi is a story of the experience of a primary school teacher in Bangarvadi, a very backward and small shepherds' village in the then State of Oundha. In this stinking village poverty is the age-old ruler, and still the people here are human and humane. They are good as well as bad; they have dignity, affection and decency, as well as jealousy, hatred, enemity and deception; they are governed by primitive impulses; their life is intense and social.

One day a primary school teacher who narrates the whole story, enters the village, and within a span of a year gets involved intensely in the affairs of the local residents. Because of his transfer to another village he leaves this village and the novelette ends. The author has recreated the life of the locality, its total atmosphere and environment with its dry, unfertile pasture grounds and thorny 'babhula' trees and 'bajari' crop, the people living there with faith and superstitions, their likes and dislikes, greed and generosity, attachment and detachment with insight. They lead their lives with unprotesting acceptance of poverty and sufferings. The teacher experiences all this very closely. As the teacher arrives in the village, people treat him as a stranger with suspicion and doubt, the walls gradually fall down and he is accepted as a friend, philosopher and guide. In a totally illiterate Bangarvadi, he attempts hard to convert backward students into lovers of letters. He does it patiently, through desperate experiences. The climax of the story is the building of a gymnasium through the collective efforts of the people at the inspiration of the teacher. The king attends the inaugural function and praises his subjects for their constructive work. But then, a misfortune awaits Bangarvadi in the form of a horrible famine. Days pass without a single drop of water. They have no other option but to migrate to some safer place in search of bread and water. Sheer survival is their problem now. In a very restraint style and without being sentimental or emotional, Madgulkar has described the horrible impact of the famine on the village life.

Madgulkar's lively characterisation is yet another feature of this novelette. There is Karabhari, the headman of the village, with his generous support for the teacher. He is a moving spirit behind everything that happens in the village. This is an important character next to the teacher. Apart from this, there is faithful and innocent Ayabu harnessing his wife with an ox to the plough and then serving her with affection at home; there is Anji, Karabhari's grand daughter, who asks the teacher to get her 'choli' (blouse) stitched from the city; Ananda a petty thief who steals money, yet after a couple of days confesses his guilt. There is Dadu Balatya who forewarns the teacher to behave properly when he has not even entered the village, Kakuba, who does not leave the village inspite of the sufferings of famine, Ramoshi, who runs away with another's wife.

In addition to these characters, the author has also described certain events like the fair of Goddess Mavalya, persons possessed by the spirit, intrigues in the village, folk music, the scene of grazing and the sheep returning to the village in the evening, changing climate, harvesting, etc.

About Madgulkar's style, Gangadhar Gadgil says: "He (Madgulkar) has a wonderful ear for the sound of words and the rhythm of sentences..... He expresses himself with an economy of words..... He lets his stories happen without the least effort to control them, and even when they end one has a feeling that they continue to flow on..... He has an uncanny understanding of the language of the human body and he can reach deep into the human hearts that nebulous core which for want of a better word we may call the soul".

The National Book Trust has translated this novelette into major Indian languages and it has also been translated into English with the title The Village has no Walls.

Av.S

BANALATA SEN (Bengali) is a collection of poems by Jibanananda Das; post-Tagore, he was one of the most striking poets of the Bengali language. Chronologically the third of the poet's seven poetry collections the book was first published in 1942 by Buddhadev Bose, in his Kavita Bhavan edition from Calcutta; a second edition was brought out by Signet Press in 1952. Later, Bengal Publishers collected the poet's entire poetical works and brought them out in two volumes, under the title Jibanananda Daser Kavyagrantha; the first volume containing four collections and including the present one came out in 1970 and had had several reprints since.

The book is a collection of thirty poems, written between 1925 and 1939. Several of them have been translated into many Indian and European languages, quite a few of them having more than one translation in a given language. Particularly, the title poem, "Banalata Sen" is one of the most famous poems in the Bengali language, ranking in fame with some of the finest compositions of other literary giants. Almost countless translations of it already exist in English alone; nearly two decades ago, in 1962, Writers Workshop of Calcutta set a pioneering example by bringing out a collection containing, among other poems of the poet, several English renderings of this same poem done by different translators. The title itself of the poem, in today's Bengal, is equal almost to a state of mind and had become synonymous with the poet.

All the major thematic preoccupations and particularly the way of expressing them, which have made this poet so distinct from others, are amply in evidence in this collection. Quite a few of them prominently characterise the title poem itself.

His work, strikingly original in the context of what has preceded him in Bengali poetry, is marked by an acute awareness of his times and reflects the imperilled image of man in the 20th century. A loss of faith, characteristic of the times and resulting in agony, often goes hand-in-hand in him with an understanding of and an intense interest in man's life on this much beautiful earth. An insight into the inescapability of the human condition occasionally lends his work an unfailing maturity and wisdom. A strange sadness pursues him everywhere as a result of a sense of loneliness from which he neither finds nor seeks any escape and for the adequate expression of which he takes refuge in a lyricism resonant with such combination of words with sounds and embodying such word-images which, while being intensely Bengali in spirit and imagination, have no parallel in the history of Bengali poetry. Conscious of a continuity of life and time, his poetry binds the present moment with ages of past history, often enlarging the scope of his vision to include the infinity of outer space. There is also a certain sensuousness, a love for luxury (notably in a poem like "Nagna nirjan hat" i.e. Bare solitary hand) in this collection, in his evocation of the past times of which his present is so inseparable a part; at times even a strange love for the feminine body, a subtle eroticism which is often so transformed that it may speak about the breasts or the vagina of darkness, as in the poem 'Andhakara' (Darkness).

Lastly, and no less importantly, though intensely personal and having the appearance of complete naturalness, the language of his poetry is free from all past conventions and norms of what has so far been regarded in Bengali as poetic language.

There is also a certain death-wish inherent in the poet which comes back again and again in his work, in this volume as elsewhere. Simultaneously, the primeval nature, in its various manifestations, is an eternal consolation, a constant healing touch and a source of rebirth. The desire to be reborn, at times as grass or an orange, is a longing for death as well as for return to nature, of which man is certainly a part, though apparently not so tempting a part as to be the object of the poet's desire to be reborn. Here, for example, is the poem "Ghas" (Grass) from the collection, in Buddhadev Bose's English renderings: "The world this morning is filled with soft green grass, gentle, like/green lemon-leaves,/like an unripe orange it is-this green grass-as fragrant-with/the deer ripping it off with teeth./ How I wish I too could drink the fragrance of this grass, like/some greenish wine, beaker after beaker,/could squeeze the flesh of this grass, rub my eyes against its eyes/and my feathers against its plumage,/could descend from the savoury darkness of some warm/grass- mother's flesh and be born as grass within the grass."

A shining example of most of the points made above is, of course, the title poem 'Banalata Sen'. Here are its first two stanzas in Martin Kirkman's translation: "A thousand years I have wandered upon the earth,/From the sea of Ceylon to the midnight sea of Malay,/Much have I wandered; in the grey lands of Vimvisar and Asoka,/There have I been; and to the dark, distant town of Vidarva;/ Tired of this life, this foaming sea of life,/I found peace for a while with Banalata Sen of Natore./ Her hair is dark as the nights of far Vidisha,/Her face the architecture of Sravasti. As the rudderless pilot/Drifting and lost on a distant sea/Sees the island of cinnamon trees and grass below,/So have I seen her in darkness, who asked me: Where have you been/ So long away? This she asked raising her bird's-nest eyes, Banalata Sen of Natore."

Bidal (The Cat) is a poem of yet another special flavour, equally characteristic of the poet. Here, in Chidananda Dasgupta's English rendering of the poem, is an animal true to its early instincts, yet, poised suddenly against an enormous canvas, playing a cosmic game of the universe: "All through the day I keep meeting the cat;/In the shade of the tree, out in the sun,/Amidst the dense shade of the leaves/After a spot of success with a few bones of fish/He lies hugging the skeletal-white earth/ Wrapped up in himself like a swarm of bees./And yet he scratches at the trunk of the Gulmohar tree,/Walks behind the sun, stalking it./One moment he is there;/The next, he has vanished./I saw him in the autumn evening stroking, with soft white paws,/The scarlet sun; then he gathered the darkness/like little balls, grabbing each with a jab of his paws/And spread them all over the earth."

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Chidananda Das Gupta, Jibanananda Das, New Delhi, 1972; Dipti Tripathi, Adhunik Bangla Kavya Parichay, Calcutta, 1958.

Lo.B

BANDH GATHARIYAN (Gujarati). Chandravadan Mehta, poet, dramatist and theatre expert of international repute, has written a series of eleven books of autobiography. It begins with Bandh Gathariyan which covers the first three decades of author's life. In the first part he narrates the story of his childhood and school-life. He received his primary education in Baroda. Since he was born and brought up in the environment of railways, he gives a lively realistic picture of railwaymen and their life. (On the basis of his first hand experience of the life in Railways, Chandravadan has written a play named Agagadi which, in a way, is unique, in Indian literature). In the second part Chandravadan talks of the romantic days of college life. During this period his creative ability develops and he comes in close contact with literary giants like Narsinharao Divatia, Balvantrai Thakore, Nanhalal Kavi and Keshavlal Dhruva who encouraged him in literary pursuits in collaboration with friends like Yusuf Mehralli, Sali Batliwala, Minoo Masani and Karl Khandalawala. He established Rasputin club which provided ideal platform for public speaking.

He was responsible for starting amateur activities in theatre art in Bombay. While narrating his experience in this field, C.C. Mehta draws an outline of the history of Gujarati Theatre and severely criticizes the professional theatre for its vulgar theatricalities. He also draws a picture of ideal Theatre for whose realization he has spent his entire life.

This part of his autobiography also narrates the tragic story of his married life, which ended in divorce.

C.C. Mehta is a versatile prose-writer, who employs numerous modes of writing (portraits, pictures, dialogues, travelogues, etc.) while narrating his story. Warmth and playfulness are the common characteristics in each of these modes.

Bandh Gathariyan furnishes well-knit story of the first two phases of the author's life. Other parts are mostly written in the form of scattered memoirs. Bandh Gathariyan will long be remembered for its outstanding literary qualities.

D.T.

BANDHAKAVITA (Oriya). Bandha Kavita means a poem written within the bandha or the frame of a particular picture drawn by the poet himself. While writing such a poem, the poet has first to draw a broad outline of the picture and then divide it into small squares or circles and then arrange the letters of the poem according to his plan. In order to decipher the poem one has to read it along with the plan of the poet, otherwise it may appear as a riddle. However, this poetic device whose source may be traced to Sanskrit literature, was generally current in the post-Medieval period of Oriya literature, that is, mainly in the 18th and 19th centuries, as the poets of the time were interested in composing such poems. Thus in a way a tradition of Bandha Kavita has grown up in Oriya poetry, and in course of time these have also been used as decorative patterns on the walls of the homes in the villages, though these are mostly found as illustrations in the palm-leaf manuscripts.

These Bandha Kavitas have been generally written through the pictures of the lotus, house, temple, pavilion, wheel, chariot, fish, serpent, tortoise, weapons, musical instruments, ornaments and articles of common use such as the cart, umbrella, pillow, plough and so on. The poets in recent time who have tried their hands in experimenting with this type have written Bandha Kavitas on such new things of the period, as cycle, wall clock, motor car, lantern, chair, church, mosque, etc.

At the outset the name of the famous poet Upendra Bhanja (18th century) may be mentioned as the first and the foremost author of Bandha Kavitas in Oriya literature. Towards the end of his literary career he composed a work named Chitrakavya Bandhodaya containing eighty-four pictorial poems. Subsequently other writers were naturally attracted to write Bandha Kavitas on the same line.

The next known poet who wrote Bandha Kavita was Sadananda Kabisurya Bramha. In his Lalita Lochana' a romance in poetry and Prema Kalpalata, a poem on Krishna Leela, we find nineteen and five Bandha Kavitas respectively. Similarly in the works like Kanak Lata of Tribikrama Bhanja and Rasa Sindhu Sulakhyana of Kesabraj Harichandan a few Bandha Kavitas have also been incorporated. But a complete work named Prabandha Ratnakar containing ninety four Bandha Kavitas was written by Bhubaneswar Kavichandra on the models provided by Upendra Bhanja's Chitra Kavya Bandhodaya.

Surprisingly enough, the tradition of writing Bandha Kavita was not completely discontinued even after the new education was introduced and newer types of poems were being written in Oriya towards the end of nineteenth century. Brajaraj Singh Deo, in 1885-87, composed Prabandha Chitra Kavya a collection or Bandha Kavitas in seven cantos containing seventy-two pictorial poems. The next poets who with success followed the same old tradition were K. Balakrishna Patra and Golak Pradhan. K.B. Patra's Bichitra Kavya is a collection of sixty pictorial poems. Also in such works as G. Pradhan's poem Indurekha and Manomohini Devi's Asoka Banare Baidehi Soka we find a few instances of Bandha Kavita.

As a result, this device has led to the development of a distinct art form in Orissa whose purpose has been poetic as well as decorative and the decoration found place in palm-leaf manuscripts as well as on the walls of the houses.

J.B.M.

BANDIJAN, RAGHUNATH (Hindi; flourished between 1740–1770). Raghunath Bandijan belonged to Kashi and was a court poet of the king of Kashi, Maharaj Bariband Singh (1740–1770). He lived in a nearby village named Chaura which was granted to him by the King. The following four works attributed to him are known to be authentic: Rasik Mohan, Kavya Kaladhar, Jagat Mohan and Ishk Mahotsava. Rasik Mohan published by the Munshi Navalkishore Press in 1890, was in all probabily composed in the year 1739. It is a work on rhetorics and consists in all of 323 'Chhands' (stanzas). Kavyakaladhar is supposed to have been written in the year 1745 A.D. It refers in passing to the categories of emotion and aesthetic relish (rasa) but concentrates mainly on the categorisation of heroines and heroes. Jagat Mohan was composed during the year 1750. It appears to be rather a voluminous work but contains only a detailed description of Sri Krishna's twelve-hour routine. It helps prove only one thing that the poet knew something of everything—and that is all! Ishk Mahotsava also focuses on the erotic sentiment but unlike the poet's other works it is composed—not in Braj Bhasha but—in Khari Boli.

The poet was well-versed in rhetorics and the characteristics of figures of speech enumerated and examples cited by him are enough to prove that he had a very clear understanding of the subject. The poet's examples are not limited to 'Sringara Rasa'. He elucidates the figures of speech by citing examples pertaining to other 'Rasas', too. The passages he picks for exemplifying the figures of speech are peculiar in the sense that all the four lines thereof are appropriate examples of the same figure of speech. In the categorisation of heroes and heroines, the poet sticks more or less to the tradition and there is nothing much which may be termed as original. He is more of a poet than a scholar. The emotional content of his poetry is touching and refreshing. His lively imagination has immense power of recreating images that arouse a sympathetic note in the reader.

Raghunath Bandijan may be safely reckoned as one of those rare scholar-poets of the 'Riti-Kal' whose poetic faculty did not succumb to his scholarship. His success may be attributed more to the poet than to the rhetorician.

Ma.C.

BANDIR BANDANA (Bengali) (Homage of the Prisoner) is a collection of poems by Buddhadev Basu (1908-1974), one of the foremost writers of the Kallol period. The poems were written during 1926-29 and Bandir Bandana was published in 1930 from Calcutta. Its subsequent three editions came out in 1940, 1947 and 1962 respectively. For an insatiable artist like Buddhadev, it was only natural that his poems would undergo some changes while passing through these editions.

The book may be considered as the young poet's first confident work, with his poetic personality gradually gaining ground. Buddhadev himself said: 'I had something of my own to say, and it was herein that I could speak first in my own voice'. (Amar Chhelebela, 1972).

Bandir Bandana, as the title suggests, is truly a captive's hymns. It shows the young poet as a natural captive to eros, but his ultimate goal is to transcend those bonds. He says: Wonder-struck, I decipher the script 'O youth, neither a rogue nor a beast you are, nor a mere insect- A god you are, banished from paradise!' A god I am, banished from paradise! My eyes, therefore, like a couple of captive birds want to snap the bondage of body and soar....(Sapabhrashta/Bandir Bandana translated by Alokeranjan Dasgupta).

Such poems made it quite evident that a new trend in Bengali poetry, both in form and in content, was imminent. But the conservative critics failed to look beyond the erotic passions depicted in the poems of Bandir Bandana and the young poet was attacked for preaching an amoral philosophy through his poems. Fortunately there were also others who could discover in these poems a powerful modern poet in the making. Rabindranath said, 'These poems are like the deep clouds full of water– from within them the glowing rays of the sun are being radiated'.

Dh.D.

BANERJEE, BHABANICHARAN (Bengali; b. 1787, d. 1848), a great contemporary of Raja Rammohun Roy, served the East India Company in different capacities. A widely travelled man he championed the cause of orthodox Hinduism and established 'Dharmasabha' in 1830. His journalistic career started with Sambad Kaumudi in 1821 but dissociating himself from it for difference of opinion on religious matters he started the Samachar Chandrika in 1822 which under his leadership became a very important journal of the day. A man of strong personality, he wrote very hard hitting satires in which with a strong sense of humour he drew sketches of the people and their habits. His chief literary works include Kalikata Kamalalaya (1823), Hitopadesh (1823), Nababababubilas (1825), Dutibilas (1825), and Nababibibilas (1831). He also edited Sanskrit classics like Srimad Bhagavata, Manusamhita, Gita, etc.

So.B.

BANERJEE, BIBHUTIBHUSHAN (Bengali; b. 1894, d. 1950) is a novelist widely known as the author of Pather Panchali, his magnum opus and a contemporary classic. Bibhutibhushan, right from his early life, was steeped in the manner and lore of village life which, later, would form the subject matter of his many celebrated works. Muraripur, where he was born in the house of his maternal grandfather, was a village situated a little north of Calcutta in the western part of the then undivided Bengal and near the towns of Kanchrapara and Halisahar. It was from the High School at Vanagram his ancestral village that in 1914 he passed the Matriculation examination, securing a first division in spite of difficulties resulting from his extreme indigence. Later, for pursuing higher studies, he shifted to Calcutta where, appearing as a student of Ripon College, he secured a first class in the Intermediate Arts examination in 1916 and, two years later, obtained the B.A. degree with distinction. It was about this time that, at the age of 23 or 24, he was married to Gauri Devi who died shortly afterwards. Twenty-three years later, in 1940, he married a second time and had one son. This second marriage to Rama Devi (alias Kalyani Devi) had a considerable influence on his later works.

Throughout his active life, except for short interruptions, he was a school teacher. He started his teaching profession in the village school of Jangipara belonging to the Hooghly district before moving to the Harinabhi School of Sonarpur as a teacher. Later, after a short intervening period when he pursued a varied career and was appointed first an inspector to a society for the protection of cattle and thereafter a clerk in an estate office, he returned to his original profession joining the Khelatchandra Memorial School at Calcutta where he taught for a long time. Towards the end of his life he also taught at the Gopalnagar High School which was not far from his family home of Barrackpore.

His early life was spent in abject poverty. His father Mahananda, who had a good voice, roamed from village to village earning a precarious living as an occasional family priest or by reciting traditional lore. With all his talents he was an impractical man, incapable of looking after his family, and it was often left to Mrinalini Devi, the author's mother, to provide even the barest necessities for his household, which included an old widowed relative, Menaka Devi whom Mrinalini considered an unwanted addition to her many worries. The inter-relationship that existed among the members of this household and the effect it had on the tender mind of the young Bibhuti were, later, faithfully reconstructed in the depiction, in Pather Panchali, of the household of Harihar, Apu's father, a prototype of Mahananda. Likewise, Mrinalini and Menaka in real life were transformed in the novel into the unforgettable characters of Sarbajaya and Indir Thakrun respectively.

Pather Panchali, originally published in 1929, was the author's very first novel, though his first published work was a short story entitled Upekshita which the then reputed Bengali magazine Prabasi accepted for publication in 1922. Since the publication of this first novel which immediately brought its author into limelight, in about two decades of an intensely active literary life he produced more than fifty works including seventeen novels, twenty collections of short stories, travelogues, autobiographical compositions, children's literature, a Bengali grammar, a translation of Ivanhoe and some scattered writings relating to astrology and the occult which, as a subject, never ceased to fascinate him. Apart from Pather Panchali, its sequel Aparajita (1932) and Aranyaka, an unusual novel published in 1938, are considered to be his most important contributions to Bengali literature. Among his other works of fiction are Meghamallar (1931), Mauriphul (1932), Yatrabadal (1934), Dristipradip (1935), Kinnardal (1938), Adarsa Hindu Hotel (1940), Anuvartan (1942), and Ichhamati (1949). For the last mentioned work he was posthumously awarded the Rabindra Prize.

Sahitya Akademi and National Book Trust have published translations of his works like Aranyaka and Adarsa Hindu Hotel into several major Indian languages. French and English translations of Pather Panchali have been published under a UNESCO programme.

One of the stalwarts of contemporary Bengali fiction, Bibhutibhushan is known for his power of observation, his profound love of nature, his comprehension of simple men and women including children in particular, and his acute sensibility. Unlike his predecessors like Saratchandra Chatterjee whose convincingly realistic pictures of Bengali village life are not devoid of critical observations and comments, and Rabindranath Tagore who in his works often idealised the village life, Bibhutibhushan presents the village as it is, without commentary or criticism, but very often with such sympathy for the people who live there that it has earned him a very special place in the annals of contemporary Bengali literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Srikumar Bandyopadhyaya, Banga Sahitye Upanyaser Dhara, Calcutta, 1965., Sukumar Sen, Bangla Sahityer Itihas, Calcutta, 1958.

Lo.B

BANERJEE, BRAJENDRANATH (Bengali; b. 1981, d. 1952) was a Bengali literary historiographer. Born in a poor family, Brajendranath lost both his parents at an early age, and could not continue his studies beyond class IX. Between 1908-1928, he worked as a typist-cum-stenographer in different private organisations. In 1929, he joined as an Assistant Editor of Prabasi and Modern Review (two well known monthlies in Bengali and English respectively), where he worked till his death. Brajendranath has written some historical short stories, but his main contribution to Bengali literature is his biographies of Bengali writers who were involved in the social and literary movements of the 19th and 20th centuries. In the series Sahitya Sadhak Charitmala (Collection of biographies of devotees of literature), he has compiled biographies of more than hundred writers with dates of publication of their works, major events of their lives, and some hitherto unknown facts about some of them. From 1930 onwards, Brajendranath with the help of some old newspapers wrote four books: Bangiya Natyasalar Itihas (The History of Bengali Theatre, 1933), Sambadpatre Sekaler Katha (The Story of the Past from Newspapers vols. I, II, III 1932, 1933, 1935) Desio Samayik Patrer Itihas (The History of vernacular Periodicals, 1935) and Bangla Samayik Patra (Bengali Periodicals, vols. I & II 1939, 1951). These books constitute the first authentic cultural and social history of nineteenth century Bengal and everywhere in these works Brajendranath has given long quotations and references in support of his statements. For every scholar of Bengali literature Brajendranath's books are indispensable.

Ja.C.

BANERJEE, CHARUCHANDRA (Bengali; b. 1876, d. 1938) was a novelist, short story writer and a critic of repute. For a living he worked at first in Indian Press, Allahabad, then became a sub-editor of Prabasi and Modern Review, the two journals edited by Ramananda Chatterjee. Belonging to the Bharati group of litterateurs he showed promise as a novelist and a short story writer; particularly his adaptations of foreign authors (like Knut Hamsun and others) were remarkable and specially appreciated. Side by side with fictional writings he developed a flair for criticism and the editing of the old classics and in recognition of these qualities he was appointed a lecturer at the Dacca University in 1924 and awarded the honorary degree of M.A. in 1928. Among his novels and adaptations are: Aguner Phulki, (The Sparks, 1914); Sroter Phul, (The Flower in the flowing Current, 1915); Pargachha, (The Parasite, 1917); Dui Tar (The two Strings, 1918); Pankatilak (The Mud Mark, 1919), Chorkanta, (The Spear-grass, 1919); Dotana, the opposite pulls, 1920); Herpher, (Discrepancy, 1920); Muktisnan, (The Purificatory Bath, 1921); Jamunapuliner Bhikharini, (The Beggar Maid of the River Bank of the Jamuna, 1923); Hyphen (1926); Jor-Bijor, (Even and uneven, 1928). Rabindranath provided him with plots for some of his novels.

FURTHER WORKS: (ed.) Kabikanakan Chandi, Sunyapuran, Mahabharata, Vishnupurana, Kadambari, etc. Rabirasmi in two volumes (evaluation of Tagore's works)

N.C.

BANERJEE, HEMCHANDRA (Bengali; b. 1838, d. 1903) was a poet. Born to poor parents Hemchandra came to live with his maternal grandfather in Khidirpur at an early age. He joined Hindu School in 1853. Hemchandra was then awarded scholarship for his academic performance. He then joined Presidency College and took an examination for the employment or promotion in the Education Department. He was one among the first batch of successful candidates to appear in the Entrance examination held by Calcutta University, in 1857. Hemchandra passed B.A. in 1859 and later took his B.L. degree also. He started his career as a pleader in the High Court where he was supposed to have translated Norton's Law of Evidence in Bengali for the Hey & Company, though the translation is not available any more. After a stint as munsif for a brief spell of time, Hemchandra started practising in the High Court, and in 1890 became the Chief Government Pleader. Educated in Hindu School and Presidency College, the premier seats of Western learning, Hemchandra can be described as the representative of the educated Bengali of the latter half of the 19th century. Hemchandra started writing poetry during his college days. His first book Chintatarangini (Waves of Thought) was published in 1861. Around this time Hemchandra came into contact with Michael Madhusudan Dutta, the greatest Bengali poet of the 19th century. In 1862, he wrote a preface to Madhusudan's Meghnadvadh Kavya, where he criticised the poet's choice of diction and imagery. In the fourth edition of the book he changed many of his views and acknowledged the immortality of Meghnadvadh. Hemchandra, alongwith Nabinchandra Sen, has always been grouped together as the true successor of Madhusudan to try their hands at epic poetry. His epic Britrasamhar (Vol. I published in 1875 and Vol. II in 1877, The killing of Britra), based on a tale from the Purana depicts the war between Indra, the king of gods and Britrasur, the demon and the sacrifice of sage Dadhichi Muni. Hemchandra was a true follower of Rangalal. Like him Hemchandra's poetry is also too full of descriptions, prosaic diction and materialistic imagery. But his poems were very popular in his life time, and their range shows the versatility of the poet. They include Birabahu Kavya (1864), a long narrative poem, Asakanan (1876), an allegory, Chhayamayi (1880), an adaptation of Dante's Divine Comedy and several volumes of lyric, patriotic and comic verses. He also translated Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet and Tempest in Bengali, the latter he named Nalini Basanta (1968). Hemchandra is still remembered mainly for his patriotic poems. Among these, those entitled 'Bharat-Bilap' 'Bharat-Biksa,' 'Bharat-Sangit', all included in Kabitavali (1870), used to be widely recited at the beginning of this century. The patriotic poems of Hemchandra, full of fire and feeling, were the outcome of the awakened spirit of political nationalism of the eighties and the nineties. Hemchandra was perhaps not a poet of high order. His poems have not been able to survive the test of time. His significance in Bengali literature is mainly historical. In him, the political consciousness of the Bengali found expression for the first time.

FURTHER WORKS: Life of Sri Krishna (English), and Brahmo Theism in India (1869). Kabitavali (Vol. II) (1880)., Dasamahabidya (1882) Hutom Penchar gan (1884), Bharateswari Maharani Viktoriar Jubili Ustab (1887), Chittabikas (1898).

Ja.C

BANERJEE, INDRANATH (Bengali; b. 1849, d. 1911) was a reputed Bengali satirist. Educated in Purnea and Calcutta, Indranath worked as a headmaster for some time, and then went in for the legal profession. Having started his literary career with a small satirical poem named 'Utkrista Kavyam' (1870), he had his second venture in a novel, Kalpataru (1874), which was profusely praised by Bankimchandra Chatterjee, the doyen of Bengali letters, and likened to Alaler Gharer Dulal and Hutom Penchar Naksa, two earlier masterpieces in humorous writing. In it he severely castigated the then Brahmo movement of Bengal for its alleged failings and foibles. He then produced his Bharat-Uddhar (1877), a long poem complete in 5 cantos and couched in blank verse which might be regarded as one of the best satirical compositions in the Bengali language. But it is as 'Panchananda' and 'Panchu Thakur', the two pseudonyms under which he wrote his humorous skits in prose and verse, that he became most widely known. These writings, full of banter and sarcasm on social oddities, first appeared from Chinsurah in 1880 in the form of minor serial publications, but later found place in the pages of Bangabasi, the journal edited by Jogendrachandra Basu, as a regular feature thereof and continued for a long time. These have now been compiled in five volumes.

Although Indranath was a bit conservative in his outlook, there was no mistaking the fervent patriotic note in whatever he wrote. The exterior of fun and wit hid a serious core.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Brajendranath Bandyopadhyaya, Sahitya Sadhak Charitmala, No. 34, Calcutta, 1948;

N.C.

BANERJEE, KARUNANIDHAN (Bengali; b. 1877, d. 1955) had joined General Assembly Institution (now known as Scottish Church College) in Calcutta in 1896. Here he came to know some of his fellow poets–Satyendranath Dutta, Jatindramohan Bagchi and Sudhindranath Tagore. In 1901, he published his first book of verse Bangamangal. Karunanidhan was actively involved in the Partition of Bengal movement for a brief period of three years (1905-1908). After that he went back to the literary world. He was a teacher by profession but throughout his life he suffered financial hardship. Karunanidhan was the eldest among a group of poets, who have been described as Tagorians by Bengali critics. They were so much influenced by Tagore that in their choice of theme, diction and meter they tried to follow him too closely. The result was not very rewarding. Karunanidhan's poetry is full of his love for nature, and a profound religious feeling pervades it. His verse is melodious, and varied in meter, but rather lacking in depth. The world of his poetry is an enchanting El Dorado depicting a romantic view of nature. Karunanidhan had also tried to write long narrative poems but was unsuccessful. On the whole, the significance of his poetry is mainly historical.

FURTHER WORKS: Bangamangal (1901), Prasadi (1904), Jharaphul (1911), Santijal (1913), Dhandurba (1921), Rabindra-arati (1937), Gitayan (1949), Gitaranjan (1951).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Madanmohan Kumar, Karunanidhan Bandyopadhyay: Jiban O Kabya (1974), Bangiya Sahitya Parishad.

Ja.C

BANERJEE, KEDARNATH (Bengali; b. 1863, d. 1949) was a noted Bengali humorist. Kedarnath had his early education in Dakshineswar but soon after his father's death, the family moved to Meerut, and he continued his studies in various places of U.P. In course of his business he went to China and stayed there for three years (1902-1905). His experience there has been recorded in a humorous travelogue Chinyatri (China-traveller, 1918). Kedarnath started his literary career with a play Ratnakar (1893); but his real genius is expressed in his humorous writings which he continued to write till the end. He has written nineteen books comprising novels, short stories and humorous poems. His subject matter was middle class Bengali life; his humour always mingled with pathos. Some of his books are Kabulati (1928), Maphaleshu (1936), Namaskari (1944).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Srikumar Bandyopadhyay, Bangla Sahitye Upanyaser Dhara (5th edn. 1965).

Ja.C.

BANERJEE, KRISHNAMOHAN (Bengali; b. 1813, d. 1885) was an eminent scholar, writer and patriot in the 19th century Bengal. Early part of his life passed in great distress. He studied first in Hare School at Pataldanga and then in Hindu School. After an outstanding student career he served as a teacher in a school at Pataldanga. He was influenced very much by David Hare's ideas. He accepted Christianity in 1832 and became a Christian Missionary in 1837 and afterwards the head of the Christ Church; he baptised or helped to baptise many young men of Bengal. He criticised Rammohan's religion and Tattwabodhini Sabha but congratulated him on his success in Satidaha movement. He became the President of the branch of Literature and Philosophy of the Bethune Society in 1867. He was connected with Bangiya Samaj Bijnan Sabha, Bharat Sanskar Sabha, Bangiya Asiatic Society and was elected Dean of the faculty of Arts in the Calcutta University. His collections in Bengali and English are many. He edited and was connected with various journals or periodicals such as Hindu Youth, Government Gazette, Bengal Spectator, Enquirer, Sambad Sadhana, etc. Updeshkatha (1840), Satya Sthapan O Mithya Nason (1841), A Preservative against Romanism (1846), Vidyakalpadrum (Cyclopaedia of general knowledge in English and Bengali), Puran Samgraha (Ist vol. edited), Srinarad Pancharatram (edited), etc. are his collections. He edited the Rigveda Samhita, (1st & 2nd Adhyayas of the Ashtaka), Raghuvama (vol. I & II), Kumara Sambhava) etc. Amongst his English books The Persecuted (1831), a Prize Essay on Native Female Education (1841), Dialogues on the Hindu Philosophy (1861) and The Aryan Witness (1875) are worth mentioning.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: B.N. Banerjee, Sahitya Sadhak Charitmala (6th Vol.); Harihar Das, Bengal Past and Present (April to December, 1929); Indian Review (Oct. 1842); Sibnarayan Sastri, Ramtanu Lahiri O Tatkalin Bangasamaj.

Du.M.

BANERJEE, LALITKUMAR (Bengali; b. 1868, d. 1929) was an eminent humorist prose writer. He wrote under the pen-name Amodar Sharma. He took his M.A. degree in English from the University of Calcutta. He had profound knowledge of English and Bengali iiteratures. His first literary appearance in Bengali was with an article, Garur Gari (The Cart). It was published in three parts in the Narayana. Humour was his spontaneous way of expression and his writings irrespective of serious and non-serious matter were interspersed with fun and humour. He wrote on different branches of Bengali literature. His literary criticism, linguistic thought, social criticism, simple literary story, children's literature were all praised and readily accepted with great admiration by the readers. Lalit Kumar was given the title of 'Vidyaratna' (gem of learning) for his erudition in 1915.

FURTHER WORKS : Essays-Foara (Fountain, 1910), Paglajhora (A mad waaterfall/Name of a mountain, 1916), Sahara (1927).
Language-Vyakaran Bibhishika (Horror of Grammar, 1911), Sadhu Bhasha Banam Chalit Bhasha (Chaste Language versus colloquial Language, 1912), Anupras (Alliteration, 1913), Banan Samasya (Spelling Problem, 1920). Literary Criticism—Premer Katha (Love-tale, 1920), Sakhi (Girlfriend of a Girl, 1921), Kavya sudha (Nectar of Poetry) and*Kapalkundalatattwar* (Theory of Kapalkundala).
Children's Literature—Ahlade Atkhana (un-dated), Charha O Galpa (1910).

Na.S

BANERJEE, MANIK (Bengali; b. 1908, d. 1956). An eminent novelist and short-story writer, he was born in a middle class Brahmin family. His real name was Prabodhchandra. His father was in Govt. service and Manik had to move with him to several places, thereby gaining much experience. While he was a student of B.Sc., he took a challenge to write a story and get it published in one of the reputed journals. Thus came out his first story, 'Atasimami' (Aunt Atasi) in 1928. With this Manik made his mark; then he dedicated himself completely to creative writing and within nine years he wrote many novels and short-stories, e.g. Janani (The Mother, 1935), Divaratrir Kavya (Ballad of Day and Night, 1935), Putulnacher Itikatha (The Puppet's Tale, 1936), Padmanadir Majhi (Boatmen of Padma, 1936), Pragaitihasik (Primeval, 1937). One of the significant characteristics of his writings is his scientific attitude. He noted with discerning eyes the vice, the injustice and the corruption in the middle class. Hollow sentimentalism and vile hypocrisy were its charactristics. Putulnacher Itikatha, Pragaitihasik, Sarisrip (Reptile, 1939), Samundrer Swad (The Salt of the Sea, 1943), etc., show this aspect of his artistic vision. On the other hand, he portrayed with masterly insight the life and struggles of the boatmen on the Padma and the toiling labour in factories on the outskirts of Calcutta in Padmanadir Majhi and Sahartali (The Suburbs; Part I, 1940; Part II, 1941 respectively). He joined the Bangashree, a fairly well-known journal for two years. During the second World War he joined the Progressive Literary Movement and ultimately joined the Communist Party of India. He was the Vice-President and later on the Secretary of the Progressive Writers' Association.

He felt that Marxism alone could give us the true meaning of the past and the present with accuracy. This change can be seen in his Darpan (The Mirror, 1945). He wrote another novel Chintamani (1946) against the background of war. Aj Kal Parsur Galpa (Stories of to-day, to-morrow and the day after, 1946) and Paristhiti (The situation, 1946) are two collections of his short-stories on war and famine. His emphasis was on how the spirit of man seeks to rise triumphant from its ordeals and misery. In 1945 he wrote another unique novel, Chinha (The Mark) on the indignant protest against the trial of I.N.A. officers. He wrote two famous stories-'Haraner Natjamai' (Grandson-in-law of Haran) and 'Chhoto Bakulpurer Jatri' (Travellers to Chhoto Bakulpur) on the peasant movement against the exploitation of zamindars and the police repression.

The reaction of the common man to the communal riots is very ably portrayed in his next novel Swadhinatar Swad (Taste of Independence). Sonar Cheye Dami (Dearer than Gold, Part I, 1951, Part II, 1952) and Sarbajanin (Concerning Everybody, 1952) are two novels on the problems of the refugees and their settlement on the forcibly occupied lands. Arogya (Convalescence, 1953) reflects his acute social consciousness. All the stories in the collection Feriwallah (Vendor, 1954) show man at war with his circumstances for a bare living. Most of the stories in the collection Lajuklata (Sensitive Plant, 1954) reflect the resultant consciousness and change of values. Haraf (The Letter, 1954) is about Kalachand, a compositor and his daughter, Atti. His other novels are Jibaner Jatilata (Tangles of Life, 1936), Amritasya Putra (Scions of the Immortal, 1938), Ahimsa (Non-Violence, 1941), Dharabandha Jiban (Routine Life, 1941), Pratibimba (The Reflection, 1943), Saharbaser Itikatha (Annals of City life, 1946), Adayer Itihas (Dues realised, 1947) Chatushkone (Four cornered, 1948), Jiyanta (Alive, 1950), Pesa (The Profession, 1951), Chhanda Patan (Lapse from Rhythm, 1951), Itikathar Parer Katha (Post-script to the Tale, 1952), Pasapasi (Side by Side, 1952), Tris Bachar Agey Parey (Twenty-three Years before and after, 1953), Nagpas (Serpent's Coil, 1953), Chal-Chalan (Ways and Modes, 1953), Subhasubha (Weal and Woe, 1954), Paradhin Prem (Love in Bondage, 1953), Halud

Nadi Sabuj Ban (Ochre River and Green Woods, 1956), Masul (The Price, 1956), Praneswarer Upakhyan (Tale of Praneswar, Posthumous, 1956), Matighensha Manus (Man of the Soil, Posthumous, 1957), Santilata, (Posthumous, 1960), Majhir Chheley (Son of a Boatman, Posthumous, 1960). His other collections of short-stories are Atasi Mami O Anyanya Galpa (Aunt Atasi and other Stories, 1935), Bou (The Wives, 1935), Mihi O Mota Kahini (Tales Crude and Fine, 1938), Bhejal (Adulteration, 1944), Haludpora (Burnt Turmeric, 1945), Khatian (The Ledger, 1947), Chota Bora (Big and Small, 1948), Matir Masul (Price of the Soil, 1948), and Chhota Bakulpurer Yatri (Travellers to Chhoto Bakulpur, 1949).

He wrote quite a number of stories for the young. They are collected in Chhotader Sreshtha Galpa (Best Stories for Children, 1958), Kisore Vichitra (Juvenile Varieties) and Manik Granthabali (Collection of Manik's Works). The most remarkable feature of these stories is the human appeal. He also wrote a number of poems. Here also he did not follow the beaten track. Lekhaker Katha (The Writer's Creed, Posthumous, 1977) is his only collection of essays. Many of Manik Banerjee's works have been translated into English and other languages. Especially Putul Nacher Itikatha has been translated into English, Chinese, Czech, Hungarian, Norweigian, Russian and Swedish.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Srikumar Banerjee, Banga Sahitye Upanyaser Dhara, Sarojmohan Mitra, Manik Bandyopadhyayer Jiban O Sahitya (Calcutta, New edn., 1980).

Sa. M.

BANERJEE, MANILAL Bengali; b. 1885, d. 1965) was a playwright and novelist, who took to letters early in life. When he was twenty-five he started a monthly, called the Rangamancha. It was a pioneering effort in those days. The paper supplied two major needs of the day. It discussed both modern European drama and the drama as it had evolved in ancient India. Contemporary developments were also noticed. Amarendranath Dutta, a formidable figure on the stage in those days, who was also a dramatist of no mean order, ran a magazine, Natyamandir which young Manilal soon joined as an assistant editor. An association so begun was to last long and he later became the editor of the magazine.

He had a chequered career. Business took him to Varanasi where he often lived. For sometime he edited the weekly Basumati. A journalist professionwise, he had the makings of a gifted dramatist and all along gave a good account of himself.

His first play Bajirao was produced at the Great National Theatre in 1911. His next play Ahalya was produced at the Star in 1914. At the same theatre were successively launched his later plays, Brata Udjapan (1915), Madhav Rao Peshwa (1915), Varanasi (1916) and Vasudeva (1938). Another play of his, Jehangir ran at the Manomohan in 1929 and Jhansir Rani was performed at the Minerva in 1949.

Though basically known as a dramatist, he later on concentrated on fiction and produced a number of novels. Among these Swayamsidhha drew wide acclaim and a film based on it was also made. Calcutta University offered him the Girish lectureship which he accepted.

D.G.

BANERJEE, NAGENDRANATH (Bengali; b. 1850, d. 1882), a well known novelist, started his early education in a local school. After completing his school education he engaged himself in cultivating voice and acting. Ultimately he became a good actor. He had a natural capacity as an organizer. As a result he joined the amateur theatrical activities of the locality as an organizer and actor.

He was secretary to the National Theatre, founded on the 7th of December, 1872. It was the first public theatre in Bengal. He was one of the founders of the Hindu National Theatre, founded in 1873. He was also the Manager and one of the founders of the Great National Theatre which was founded in 1873. Nagendranath was also the founder of a touring theatre named Great National Opera Co., started in 1875.

The literary career of Nagendranath began with writing books of different types such as Pherar Dak, a book of poems (1920), Lilavas (1930) and Hazrat Abubaker (1938), Kamyakanan (1873) a stage play, Sati ki Kalankini (1874), the first opera of Bengali public theatre staged by the Great National Theatre party in 1874; it was followed by Parijat Haran or Deva Durgati, an opera (1876). His operas were very popular at that time. Most of his books were published posthumously.

Ga.B

BANERJEE, PANCHKARI (Bengali; b. 1866, d. 1923) was an eminent journalist, essayist and a scholar in English, Bengali and Sanskrit literatures. He was a brilliant student in school. He passed the Entrance Examination from Bhagalpur Zila School in 1883 and graduated with Sanskrit honours from Patna College in 1887. He obtained Sahityacharya title in Sankhya from Benaras. He admitted that he was influenced very much by Krishnaprasanna Sen, editor of the Dharmapracharak, who inspired him to write in Bengali. He was also a disciple of Sasadhar Tarkachuramoni. He served as a teacher in T.N. Jubilee Collegiate School at Bhagalpur where the great novelist Saratchandra was his student. In 1895 he left the school and joined as editor of the Bangabasi. He considered Indranath Banerjee the reputed satirist of Bengal his literary master. He was also the editor of the Telegraph, a daily paper in English. He served as an editor of many periodicals and journals like Basumati (a weekly magazine), Rangalaya and Bharatmitra (Hindi Daily), Prabahini, Swaraj, Nayak, and Sahitya. He was a Bengali translator of the Bengal Publicity Board of the Government in 1918. His literary knowledge was very deep. He is chiefly regarded as a journalist and his literary articles of permanent value are very few but his editorial essays on different topics are unparalleled. There are valuable elements of social history of Bengal in his scattered writings. Bangiya Sahitya Parishad has published many of his essays in two volumes. His deep study, love for the country and countrymen, penetrating insight and a strong sense of literature are reflected in many articles. He was an authority in Tantra-Sastra. Some of his outstanding essays are Ramani O Janani, Dante, Jiban Chariter Mulsutra, Bhagwan Ramkrishna, Madan Tattwa, Bankim Chandrer Trayi, Banglar Upasak Sampradaya, etc.

FURTHER WORKS: Ain I Akbari O Akbarer Jibani (1897), Sri Sri Chaitanyamrita, Uma (1901), Rupalahari, History of Sepoy Mutiny (banned by the then Government), Bimsa Satabdir Mahapralaya 1st vol. 1915 and Sadher Bau (a novel), etc.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: B.N. Banerjee, Sahitya Sadhak Charitmala (7th Vol.), Panchkari Rachanavali (Sahitya Parisat, 1st Vol., Introduction.)

Du.M.

BANERJEE, RAKHALDAS (Bengali; b. 1885; d. 1930) was an eminent archaeologist, historian and novelist. After passing the M.A. Examination of the Calcutta University, Rakhaldas joined the Archaeological Survey of India. From 1917 to 1926, he worked as Superintendent, Western and Eastern circles of the Archaeological Survey of India. However, despite his efficiency and creditable performance as an archaeologist, he had to retire under compulsion in 1926 with a little pension due to his strained relations with his superiors. As an official of the Archaeological Suvey of India, it was Rakhaldas who first made the epoch-making discovery of Mohenjodaro in 1922-23 which pushed back the antiquity of Indian Civilization to 5000 years. His other excavations include those of Paharpur in Bengal (now in Bangladesh) which revealed general outline of the famous Somapur Vihar built during 8th century A.D. In 1928, Rakhaldas joined the Benaras Hindu University as Manindra Chandra Nandi Professor and Head of the Deptt. of the Ancient Indian History and Culture. He held the post till his death. Rakhaldas, within a short span of life distinguished himself in the field of epigraphy, palaeography, numismatics, iconography, Indian art and history of India. His numerous contributions both in Bengali and English reveal his objectivity and critical acumen. Rakhaldas was a great lover of Bengali language and literature. Besides his historical works in Bengali, he had written a few historical novels which rank very high amongst the works of its kind. Some of his works are:

The Palas of Bengal (Calcutta, 1915); The Origin of Bengali script, (Calcutta, 1915, 1919); The age of the Imperial Guptas (Varanasi, 1933); Eastern Indian School of Medieaval Sculpture (Calcutta, 1933); Pre-historic, Ancient and Hindu India (Calcutta, 1934); The Temple of Siva at Bhumara (Calcutta, 1924); The Palaeography of Hati Gumpha and Nanaghat Inscriptions, (Calcutta, 1924); Bas Reliefs of Badami (Calcutta, 1928); History of Orissa (Calcutta, 1930-31), (Bengali)–Pashaner Katha (Calcutta, 1914), Sasanka (Calcutta, 1914), Prachin Mudra (Calcutta, 1915); Banglar Itihas, Vols. I-II, (Calcutta, 1914-17, Revd. edn. 1917); Mayukha, (Calcutta, 1916); Karuna (Calcutta, 1922); Asima (Calcutta, 1925).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: G.G. Sengupta, Rakhaldas (Samakalin Calcutta, Vol. II, No. 11, 1964.); R.P. Chanda, Rakhaldas Bandyopadhyay (Pravasi, Sravan, 1957).

G.S.

BANERJEE, RANGALAL (Bengali b. 1826, d. 1886) was a poet of great distinction. He started a long career of Government service as a lecturer in the Presidency College, Calcutta in 1860. In his younger days he had his poems published in the Sambad Prabhakar of Iswar Gupta and edited quite a number of Bengali weeklies including Sambad Rasasagar, Education Gazette, and Saptahik Bartabaha. In his later life when he lived in Orissa he edited an Oriya journal Utkal Darpan. But his real greatness lies in his long historical poems through which he nurtured a spirit of strong patriotism. By choosing historical episodes of heroism as his subject matter instead of old mythological tales as were usual, he gave Bengali poetry a new dimension. His three major writings were based on the historical tales of Rajputana-Padmini Upakhyan (1858), Karmadevi (1862), and Surasundari (1868). These long poems were written long before Todd's Annals of Rajasthan was translated into Bengali. In the preface to the Padmini Upakhyan he expressed the hope that by following the models of western poetry we could write such poems that would replace trifles going in the name of poetry. His Kanchikaveri (1879) is another verse-tale of Oriya heroism. He also did some translation work from English.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Brajendranath Banerjee, Sahitya-Sadhak-Charitmala; S.K. Sen, Bangala Sahityer Itihas (Vol. II).

So.B

BANERJEE, SARADINDU (Bengali, b. 1899, d. 1970) was a popular Bengali novelist. After passing Matriculation from Munger, Bihar, Saradindu joined Vidyasagar College in Calcutta. He had a close friend called Ajit Sen, who served as a model for the 'Watson' of Saradindu's amateur detective Byomakes Baksi. The Harrison Road House where he put up, has been described as the residence of Byomakes. In 1926, Saradindu joined the bar as a junior to his father. But he did not have any liking for the profession. During 1929-1938 he wrote many short stories. His first significant short story 'Raktasandhya' (Bloody Evening) was published in 1930. In 1938, Saradindu went to Bombay to work with Himangsu Roy of Bombay Talkies. There he stayed upto 1941, writing scenarios for films. He then joined Acharia Art Production for a short term. Then from 1943, he worked as a free lance scenario writer. As far as his literary activities are concerned, this period of life is almost barren. He wrote only four stories within a span of fourteen years. He severed all relations with film world and went to Pune in 1952 where he stayed and wrote regularly till his death. Saradindu was awarded several prizes for his historical novel Tungabhadrar Tire (On the Banks of Tungabhadra, 1967). Saradindu has to his credit many novels and short stories. His literary works can be divided into the following groups: (a) detective novels and short stories, (b) historical novels and short stories, (c) stories of the supernatural, (d) miscellaneous. Perhaps the most popular of his writings are his stories and novels depicting the activities of an amateur detective Byomakes Baksi, in the tradition of Doyle and Christie. His first detective story featuring Byomakes was Pather Kanta (Thorn in the Way); it was published in 1932. Between 1932-1936 he wrote ten stories of Byomakes. Then for fifteen years not a single story of this popular character appeared. It is said that at the request of some young readers Saradindu resumed Byomakes stories again in 1951, with Chitra Chor (Art-Thief) and at the time of his death there were altogether 32 complete and one incomplete stories of Byomakes Baksi. This detective is not eccentric or idiosyncratic like some of his English counterparts. He is a smart educated young man from a Bengali middle class family, possessing high intelligence and keen power of observation. In the course of thirty two stories, Byomakes grows old, falls in love, marries, and has a family. Stories of Byomakes, unlike conventional detective stories, do not have any horror element in them. Though they portray murder, burglary or some such crimes, the main attraction of these stories is the ingenuity of the detective contrasted with the obtuseness of his friend Ajit who needs to have everything pointed out to him and explained. Saradindu has created a theosophist young man Baroda, for his ghost stories. Baroda's different encounters with the supernatural form the basis of these stories. Saradindu is at his best when he writes historical novels or short stories. His pictorial descriptions have successfully reconstructed the past. Most of his historical stories are set against the background of Hindu-Buddha period. He had a great fascination for Buddha, and many of his stories centre around Buddha, or Buddhist monks. One of Saradindu's often used techniques is to introduce past within the framework of the present. Jatismar, a collection of short stories published in 1932, is based on this technique. It contains Raktasandhya, perhaps his best story; with the help of two characters, one historical, Vasco da Gama and the other imaginary, Mirza Daud, Saradindu portrays the first encounter of East and West at Kalikut. On the whole, Saradindu's works are very entertaining. Lucidity of his language and the artistic integration of his narrative make all his writings very pleasant reading. His Jhinder Bandi (Prisoner of Jhind) and Sajarur Kanta (Porcupine's Quill) have been translated into Hindi. Some of his stories have been translated into Gujarati, Tamil, Marathi and Kannada. His other major books are Yauvonsmriti (1918), Vishakanya (1940), Kaler Mandira, Chiriyakhana (1953), Tumi Sandhyar Megh (1958), Bahu Juger Opar Hote (1960), Emon Dine (1962), Kumarsambhaber Kavi (1963), Magna Mainak (1963), etc.

Ja.C.

BANERJEE, SRIKUMAR (Bengali, b. 1892, d. 1970) was a distinguished educationist and literary critic. He had a brilliant academic record starting from the Entrance examination and ending with Eshan Scholarship at the B.A. level and first class in M.A. English. He joined Bengal Education Service and served first as a lecturer and later as a Professor of English literature at the Presidency College, Calcutta upto 1946. While attached to the Presidency College, he also served as a lecturer in English of the post-graduate classes of the Calcutta University. Srikumar got Ph.D. degree of the Calcutta University in 1929 for his thesis on the Romantic poetry in English. Srikumar studied Bengali literature thoroughly and his studies in the Bengali novel Banga Sahitye Upanyaser Dhara–first published in 1939, put him in the front rank of Bengali literary critics. In 1946, Srikumar was offered the post of the Head of the Department of Bengali of the Calcutta University (Ramtanu Lahiri Professorship) which he accepted. He occupied this post for about ten years till August 1955. In 1960 he was elected to the Bengal Legislative Assembly. Srikumar was also associated with a large number of educational and cultural organisations of Bengal. However, he is remembered mainly as a critic of high order of Bengali literature in its various aspects. His writings both in English and Bengali are distinguished for their eloquent style and elegant choice of words. His published works include:

Bangla Sahitya Upanyaser Dhara, Calcutta, 1939; Bangla Sahityer Katha, Calcutta, 1946; Ingraji Sahityer Itihas, Calcutta, 1946; Bangla Upanyas, Calcutta, 1947; Bangla Sahityer Bikaser Dhara, Calcutta 1953; Bangla Sahitye Nataker Dhara, Calcutta, 1957; Bangla Sahitya Parikrama, Calcutta, 1957; Sahitya Sanskritir Tirtha Sangame, Calcutta, 1962; Critical Theories and Poetic Practice in the Lyrical Ballads, 2nd edn. Calcutta, 1965; Studies in the Poetry of Coleridge and Keats, Calcutta, 1965; Rabindra Srishti Samiksha in 2 vols. Calcutta, 1965-69.

G.S.

BANERJEE, TARASHANKAR (Bengali; b. 1898, d. 1971) was an eminent Bengali novelist and short story writer. He was born in Lavpur, a village in the westernmost district (Birbhum) of individed Bengal. The topography of his home district has been faithfully depicted in many of his fictions, particularly in the first para of his novel Dhatridevata (Mother Goddess). The peculiarity of the topography, the combination of a rocky hardness and alluvial tenderness, has contributed much to the maturity of his mind. The content of his novels and their techniques owe much to this background. He came of a once-prosperous landlord family of Lavpur. This again helped him much to understand the tragic situation of the Bengali zamindars, which was the subject matter of some of his novels and many stories.

He lost his father when he was eight. His mother and aunt had strong characters of their own and they influenced his life in many ways. In his boyhood days he took Bankimchandra, Vivekananda and Kshudiram Bose as his ideal. Pronounced and honest patriotism was the mark of his personality throughout his life. Though a good student he could not complete his B.A. course in the St. Xavier's College, Calcutta because of his active participation in the freedom struggle. In 1930 he joined civil disobedience movement and was imprisoned for six months. So long he had been torn apart between politics and literature, but after six months of prison life he completely switched over to literature,–his principal vocation of life. Pecuniary condition of his family was then so insecure that one of his favourite daughters Balu died without proper treatment.

This death left a deep mark on his mind and the sad destiny made Tarashankar what he grew into ultimately.

His first novel Dinar Dan (Gift of the poor Lady)–a stale imitation of Saratchandra was published in an obscure journal, it never came out in book form. While in the prison he started writing Chaitali Ghurni (Whirlwind of April, 1931). His prison–ward experience found expression in the next novel Pashanpuri (Stone–house). Chaitali Ghurni sometimes reminds us of Saratchandra's Mahesh (1922), but at the same time it speaks of his own grip over rural life. Pashanpuri shows us, though fragmentarily, Tarashankar's deep attachment to endless variety of life and his faith in the ultimate triumph of life over death.

Dhatridevata (Mother Goddess, 1939) and Kalindi (1950) clearly show Tarashankar's development as an artist. The historical destiny of the rural Bengal and the inevitable advent of new India in the twenties of the present century have been depicted in these novels. His awareness of the contradiction of the socio-economic pattern of our villages and its fluid condition in the throes of change has been reflected in his great novel Ganadevata (People, the God, 1942) which was awarded the Jnanpith award in 1966. Panchagram (Five villages, 1943) is a sequel to Ganadevata. The muslim peasant community has been placed in right perspective in this novel. Debu, the hero of the novel, Nyàyaratna, Srihari Shau, Durga, Aniruddha Kamar, Padma, Dwarik Choudhury, Tinkari and last but not the least Swarna are the result of Tarashankar's keen insight into socio-economic background of the individuals and show his deep understanding of the individual destiny. Tarashankar's claim to greatness depends largely on these two novels. That he did not fail to recognise the change taking place in our urban society also was proved in Manwantar (Famines, 1944), a novel based on the Calcutta life in the dark days of famine and World War II.

In 1942 Kavi (The poet) came out in book form. Kavi, Hansuli Banker Upakatha (Tale of the River bend of Hansuli, 1947) and Nagini Kanyar Kahini (Tale of the Snake-goddess's Daughter, 1951) are novels of different colour and tone. His originality is more expressed in these books. Hitherto unknown life of the people resident in the farthest corner of the society, so long ignored by the middle class Bhadraloka have been used as the subject matter, yet it is not documentation he sought for; his search for the vibrant mystery of eternally changing life has received a full artistic treatment in these novels. Nagini Kanyar Kahini deserves special mention. Deification cannot erase the eternal sex hunger of a woman. This theme set against the macabre background of the snake charmer community has been fully utilised by the author and the result is an artistic perfection.

Among his other novels Arogya Niketan (The Cure House, 1952), Kalantar (Change of Time, 1956), Bicharak (The Judge, 1956), Saptapadi (Seven Rounds of Marriage), Radha (a novel with historical back ground, 1958), Uttarayan (The Summer Solstice, 1958), Yogabhrasta (One detracted from the Path of Meditation 1960), Manjari Opera (1964), Aranya Banhi (Forest Fire, 1970) fully reflect his strength as a novelist. His range of experience and moral awareness have been blended artistically in these novels. Among these novels Arogya Niketan is a class by itself. Essence of life and death, particularly death, is the quest of its protagonist Jiban Mashai, a physician of the older Ayurvedic School. Again he proved that he could handle subject matters which no one esle had handled with such artistic skill and effectiveness.

Tarashankar's short story developed along with his novel. Brevity and concentration were never his forte, but if singleness of aim and effect is taken into consideration, his short stories will appear to be artistically very powerful. His outstanding short stories are Rasakali (1928), Agradani (1936), Jalasaghar (Dancehall, 1932), Tarini Majhi (Tarini, the Boatman, 1935), Daini (Witch, 1940), Tin Sunya (Three Zeros, 1937), Pratima (Goddess' Image, 1937), Sare Sat Gandar Zaminder (A small Landlord, 1945), Boba Kanna (Silent crying, 1944), Kamadhenu (1946), Mati (Soil, 1949), etc.

He wrote several plays, among which Dui Purush (Two Generations, 1945) was taken up by the professional stage and it was a great success.

His Amar Sahitya Jiban (My literary Life, 1966) is not only a biography but a history of an artist's own becoming.

Tarashankar was awarded Rabindra Purashkar for his Arogya Niketan in 1955, Akademi Prize for the same in 1956. Universities of Calcutta and Jadavpur awarded him D. Litt. honoris causa. He was a fellow of Sahitya Akademi, and a member of the Rajya Sabha. Calcutta University awarded him Jagattarini medal. Bangiya Sahitya Parishad elected him their president in 1968.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Jagadish Bhattacharya, Tarashankarer Galpaguchha (1975-77); Saroj Bandyopadhyay, Bangla Upanyaser Kalantar (1961); Srikumar Banerjee, Bangla Sahitya Upanyaser Dhara (1965); Ujjalkumar Mazumdar, Tarashankar, Desh Kal Sahitya (1977).

So.B.

BANERJEE, UPENDRANATH (Bengali; b. 1879, d. 1950). A revolutionary leader of the Jugantar group and a colleague and disciple of Arabinda Ghosh (later Sri Aurobindo), Upendranath Banerjee was caught in the Maniktala Bomb Case along with Barindrakumar Ghosh, Ullaskar Dutta, Hemchandra Kanungo and others and sent to the Andamans under a sentence of transportation for life. After serving his full term he returned to Bengal and got himself engaged in journalism for a livelihood. His was a facile pen both in English and Bengali and at times he could very well be pungent if he so desired. He worked as the Editor of the weekly Nabasakti, Assistant Editor of the daily Amritabazar Patrika, and during the last five years of his life (1945-50) he edited the daily Basumati with a quiet efficiency, the net product of long experience in the line.

But journalism apart, his output in the form of literary endeavour was no less striking. His Nirbasiter Atmakatha (Memoirs of an Exile, 1921) at one time used to be very avidly read in Bengal because it contained a vivid picture of the life lived by the revolutionary convicts in the Cellular Jail, Port Blair, Andamans. His Unapanchasi (1922), a bunch of shorter essays written in an idiosyncratic vein, as the title suggests, was remarkable for their sardonic humour and caustic wit. Jater Birambana (The Harms of the Caste-system, 1921), Dharma O Karma (Religion and Duty, 1922), Bartaman Samasya (The present Problem, 1921) are some of his other works.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Bangiya Sahitya Kosh, 10th vol; Samsad Bangali Charitabhidan.

N.C.

BANGADHIP PARAJAY (Bengali) is a historical novel written in two parts by Pratapchandra Ghosh. The first part of the novel was published in 1869 and the second part came out in 1884. The story of the book is simple.

Pratapaditya, the hero of the novel was famous among twelve zamindars (Bhuniyas) of Bengal. Not contended with his small estate, he dared to conquer Mughal Empire in league with the Pathan rulers. In order to realise his ambition he sheltered the brother of the Arakan king. He also took the help of a Portuguese pirate Sebastin, under whom his soldiers were trained. In his lust and desire to become an omnipotent ruler he conspired to kill Kachu Ray, his cousin. Sebastin Gonzales, the Portuguese pirate, instigated Pratapaditya to press on with his plan. The story starts with the death of Pratapaditya's uncle Basanta Ray, the king of Raygarh. After Basanta Ray's death, his son Kachu Ray became the king of Raygarh. Pratapaditya wanted to capture and kill Kachu Ray with a view to annexe his kingdom. Indumati, princess of Jayanti (a small kingdom of Assam), was brought up by Basanta Ray to Raygarh. Pratapaditya fell in love with Indumati when she reached her youth. On the other hand Indumati was betrothed to Kachu Roy. Pratap ditya sent Sebastin Gonzales, Krishnanath, Hujurmal and Anupam to Raygarh to abduct Indumati.

Old Anangapal was the minister of Raygarh. He was greedy and incompetent. Pratapaditya was sure that his men would be sucessful in abducting Indumati because of Anangapal's incompetence. But Malikraj, the son of Bijaykrishna, the minister of Pratapaditya, and Suryakumar, prince of Jayanti went to Raygarh to save Indumati. At that time, the Mughal Chief Mansimha appeared on the scene. Kachu Ray, Suryakumar and Malikraj fought unitedly against Pratapaditya. They were at first defeated in the battle, but in their second attempt they won it with the help of Mansimha. Pratapaditya was captured.

In the second part Pratapchandra tried to complete all the episodes described in the first part. Pratapaditya's illicit connexion with Bimala, wife of Basanta Ray, was narrated. Bimala's fall was terrific. Indumati was united with Kachu Ray. Suryakumar failed to marry Sarama, daughter of Pratapaditya, as she died of bereavement for her father.

Pratapchandra depicted Pratapaditya as a tyrant, who knew no morality. He tried to kill his cousin by foul means. He even ordered to kill his son-in-law Ramchandra. He killed his faithful valet Carvello. He had illicit relation with his aunt. He unlawfully tried to capture his uncle's kingdom. Those were crimes for which he was punished. Pratapchandra attempted to write a true historical novel. The facts were there, he was not swayed by emotion or imagination. An inhabitant of Raygarh, the writer gave an elaborate description of his native place in the book.

Pratapchandra was inspired by the idea of freedom. At the same time he showed that freedom could not be achieved while there were animosities among brothers. A moral tone informs the whole work.

Pratapchandra's style is heavy. He introduced innumerable men but could not manage to convert them into fictional characters. Hence though the novel is an ambitious work, its literary value is meagre.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Aparnaprasad Sengupta,Bangla Aitihasik Upanyas; Bijit Kr. Dutta, Bangla Sahitye Aitihasik Upanyas.

Bij. D.

BANGALIR ITIHAS: ADI PARVA (Bengali) by Niharanjan Ray was first published in 1949. It was reprinted in 1952. The second edition with addition and corrections appeared in 1979. "It is a monumental work by any standard," so remarked Jadunath Sarkar in his preface. The book runs into 1600 pages. The writer was awarded the Rabindranath Tagore Memorial Prize instituted by the Government of West Bengal, on this work.

This is not merely a political history of Bengal. It covers the whole range of the Bengali people from 1000 B.C. to 1200 A.D., i.e. from the pre-historic period down to the Muslim invasion of Bengal. The aim of the writer is to find out 'the why and how of the people's evolution. It has surpassed all the historical works on Bengal. If we compare it with Britain under the Romans (in the Penguin series) and Coulton's Social Life in Mediaeval England (1916), we can understand the depth, vastness and all-comprehensiveness of this monumental work.

Niharanjan Ray, the eminent historian, went deep into the pre-historic period in search of the roots of the Bengali people. He evaluated all the available materials in building up the history of the Bengali people. He used such materials, as inscriptions, excavation reports, coins, records of Greek and Buddhist invasions and travels, Sanskrit, Prakrit, Arabic and Persian literatures prior to the 12th century, to substantiate his thesis.

Niharanjan Ray used the word 'history' in its widest connotation. It covers all the aspects of a class of people.

If we take an overview of the ambitious scheme of this monumental work we can have a glimpse into its range and scope. Its detailed contents appear in the following order.

The early roots of the Bengali people, an anthropological, in-depth study of the pre-historic period, and a thorough search for identity; the land, rivers, hills, forests, humidity, rainfall, weather, riverine lowlands, coastal lines, and their impact on the people; the wealth of old Bengal, what were its characters, the method of producing wealth and its distribution, the variegated character of the produce; the agriculture, industry and commerce, and their impact on society; the land, land-tenure and land revenue system, the ownership and management of land—its distribution, the status of landowners, middlemen, ryots and tillers; the social distribution–impact of caste-system, various castes—high, middle and low, how were they placed, what were the relations between them, the relation between caste and class, its overall impact on the society; the class system, its impact on the social infra-structure; various divisions in the class system—cooperation and confrontation between themselves; distribution of towns and villages–how villages grew up, how they react to the interest of the state, conflict of interests between towns and villages; the structure of the state–the civic life, relation between the state and castes and classes, revenues and expenditures of the state—distribution of wealth, influence of the state on it—ideals of the state, relation between the state and society; social culture—the goal of the state, the ruling class, who were they, their role in the society; the impact of the ruling class on the different strata of the society—the culture of the people—its character, evolution and role-the varied manifestation of culture in the fields of food-habits, social norms, art and architecture, dance and music, beliefs and custom as reflected in daily life; cultural tradition and heritage; the religious beliefs perhistoric traditions, Jaina, Buddhist, Brahmanical canons and their differences in religious practices, a comparative study of North Indian and South Indian practices, the mental make up of the Bengalis, difference with that of other Indians; the art and architecture, dance and music–their religious bases, their impact on the society; the attainment in various disciplines, viz, literature, song, scripture, education—their impact on the society.

These clearly bring out the all-embracing plan of this monumental work. The book will remain a guide in its field for many years to come.

A.M.

BENGDEL, LAINSING (Nepali; b. 1919) was educated at Government High School, Darjeeling. After completing his Matriculation Examination, he proceeded to Calcutta and studied fine art for six years. Painting being his forte and his first love, he went to Paris for further enlightenment and training in the subject. He spent ten long years in Europe and came back to India with art experience in abundance. He recollects his meeting with geniuses like Picasso and Braque who, he says, are the perennial fountain of inspiration to him. His marriage to Sushi Mankumari in Paris was a turning point in his career.

Bengdel combines in himself the subtle sensitivity of a writer and the penetrative imagination of an artist. A harmonious intermingling of both is discernible in his artistic and literary creation.

The individual's acquiescence in the supremacy of social mores and traditions is the keynote of his novel Maiti Ghar (Parental home of a married daughter). The lowly and the lost have been given an important place in his works. Lanqara Ko Sathi (The Lame man's companion) symbolises the emptiness and hypocrisy of human relationships–a total disregard for the hopes and aspirations of the disabled and the downtrodden by the fortunate few. Rembrandt is another novel of his, based on the life of the famous artist. His sympathy for the people thrown into the vortex of misery and social ostracism is evident everywhere.

Spain Ko Samjhana (Reminiscences of Spain) and Europe Ko Chitti (Letters from Europe) are two delightful books remarkable for vivid descriptions and lucidity of style.

He also brought out from Calcutta a journal Prabhat (Dawn) of which he was the editor. Prior to his departure abroad, he worked in Calcutta for about six years with Satyajit Ray, the film director.

Biswa Ka Chha Mahan Kalkar (Six Great Artists of the World) is his interesting biographical work. Biswa Katha Sangraha (Collection of World's Best stories) is his translation work.

Inimitable in his style of writing, Bengdel has travelled extensively and possesses a deep sense of humility which makes him a gentleman of the first order.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Krishna Chandra Pradhan, Nepali Upanyas Ra Upanyaskar (Sajha Prakasan 1980); Madhavall Karmacharya, Alochana Ra Sahitya (Ratna Pustak Bhandar, 1965); R. Joshi, Adhunik Nepali Sahitya Ko Ek Jhalak (Royal Nepal Academy, 1964); Taranath Sharma, Nepali Sahitya Ko Itihas, (Sahayogi Prakashan, Kathmandu); Timsina Bhandari, Hamro Sahitya Ra Sahityakar Haru (Pustak Sansar, Biratnagar, 1967); Uttam Kumar, Shrasta Ra Sahitya (Rupayab Prakasan, 1966); Yagya Raj Satyal, Nepali Sahitya Ko Bhumika (Ratna Pustak Bhandar, 1966).

M.B.P.

BANHATTI SRINIWAS NARAYAN (Marathi, b 1901, d. 1975) was a literary critic and research scholar. His father Narayan Daso was an assistant professor of Sanskrit and the son inherited his love for Sanskrit from his father. He studied Sanskrit for his M.A. and secured the coveted Jhala Vedanta Prize of the Bombay University in 1923. He worked as a professor but sought premature retirement after 18 years of service. He started his literary career with a series of magazine articles and his first book Mayur Kavya Vivechana (a critical review of poet Moropant's works) was published in 1926. It was followed by a review of Chiplunkar's work. In 1931 he established Navbharat Granthmala and in 1934 Suvichar Prakashana Mandal. For some time he was the editor of a magazine Vihangama and a weekly journal Samadhan. His history of the Marathi Theatre Marathi Rangabhumicha Itihas is the first of its kind. His estimate of the dramatic works of Natyacharya Deval (1967) is a model of comparative criticism and it was the recipient of the Sahitya Akademi Award. The last decade of his life was dedicated to the research of Jnanesvari and six Adhyayas of the classic were published during his life time.

M.M

BANI, RAJINDER MANCHANDA (Urdu b. 1932, d. 1981) was born at Multan (now in Pakistan). His family migrated to India in the wake of partition and after wandering around for a shelter, ultimately settled down in Delhi where he completed his education with a Master's Degree in Economics.

Soon, after he took up a teaching assignment in a local higher secondary school and continued in that capacity till his death. Having secured for himself and his family the means of living he turned whole heartedly to the study and service of literature, which had been his only real passion in life right from his early youth.

While he wrote excellent prose also, he concentrated primarily on Urdu ghazal. His earlier critics tried to dismiss his approach as absurdly novel. His daring wit and pungency of his volcanic diction distrurbed them but it caught the attention of some of the more perceptive readers.

The first volume of his poetry Harf-e-Mantbar (1971) was hailed as a significant addition to the ghazal that his contemporaries were writing in those days.

Bani's was a free and restless spirit and would have liked to soar higher and higher in an open-air atmosphere full of activity and adventure but the ill effects of his long and sickly arthritis forced him to a sedentary indoor life. His ill-health persisted for nearly twenty years but could kill neither his magnificant spirit nor his creative faculties. He continued to write and released his second collection Hisab-e-Rang in 1976. With this poetry, which had freshness about it, the poet finally emerged as one of the most significant contributors to modern sensitivity in Urdu poetry.

The long battle between his ill-health and his young sturdy mind added the elements of dramatic conflicts in his verse and lent it the profundity of the tragic comedy that yielded yet another important collection Shafaq-Shajjar, which however, was published after his death by the joint collaborative efforts of understanding friends, like Gopichand Narang, Shams-ul-Rehman Faruqi, Ramprakash 'Rahi' and Jairam Das 'Falak.'

Bani has written poems, and touched some other traditional verse genres also but his ghazal remains supreme, his life-blood and the echo of his soul.

Bani has also left behind many impressive analyses of the works of some of his contemporaries, which speak volumes about the wide range of his critical perception.

B.V.

BANKIMCHANDRA (Kannada). Bengali Kadambarikara Bankimchandra by A.R. Krishna Sastri is a critical biography of the well known Bengali writer who was mainly responsible for the renaissance of Bengali literature during the latter half of the last century and whose influence through translations of his novels extended to almost every other Indian literature. First published in 1960, the book won the Sahitya Akademi Award for 1961 and ranks among the finest critical works in Kannada.

Thoroughness, precision and clarity are the hallmarks of Krishna Sastri's writing and the present work not only bears evidence of those qualities but also makes it, in the opinion of knowledgeable persons, the best book on Bankimchandra in any Indian language. It fully succeeds in bringing home to the reader a complete picture of the life and personality of the subject, his place in and contribution to the making of modern Bengali literature along with detailed and objective studies of all his works, both fiction and non-fiction. This has been rendered possible by the author's intimate knowledge of the Bengali language and literature and his typical reluctance to accept nothing at second hand. The work is a product of his personal study extending over years and a critical faculty trained and enriched by a close and wide study of literatures both classical and modern.

Since the work is intended for readers who are not acquainted with the originals, the study of individual works is preceded by a general survey of Bengali literature and then by an account of Bankim's life. The former helps to highlight the background to his contribution to the modernisation of his literature in the true sense and the latter to define the features of his personality, his characteristic attitudes and his whole-hearted devotion to the cause of his language and literature. Though Bankim's fame and influence rest upon his novels, his interests were diverse. He was deeply concerned with the rejuvenation of both Bengali life and literature as also with many contemporary problems, social and religious, which engage his attention in a large number of articles. He wrote poetry, a commentary on the Bhagavatgita and edited Vangadarshana, a periodical which greatly influenced the development of Bengali language and literature by inculcating into the minds of the educated a love for and faith in the power and beauty of the mother tongue. The present work deals with all these aspects of his work.

His thirteen novels in Bengali and the one in English-Rajmohan's Wife–claim a chapter each and these chapters form the core of the work. The plot of each novel is clearly outlined at the outset so that the main lines of the action and its development are not missed and this is followed by a detailed commentary on every single aspect of the novel like plot, characterisation and significance. The reader misses precious little but is on the other hand attracted to go to the original work. That is how critical commentary fulfils itself and this is achieved by the author's scholarship and critical insight coupled with his warm understanding of Bankim's importance and influence in the shaping of modern Indian literature.

V.M.I.

BAPAT, VASANT WAMAN (Marathi; b. 1922) is an outstanding poet born and educated at Pune. He worked as a teacher of Marathi language and literature at National College and Ruia College, Bombay. He was appointed as a Professor of Comparative Literature at Bombay University during the seventies.

Bapat has had an inclination towards Rashtra Seva Dal, a socialist organization, from his college days. He participated in freedom struggle. His freedom-songs captivated the minds of youth during the struggle. They have been published in Sainya Chalale Pudhe (1965) and Shing Funkile Rani (1982). His first book of lyrical poetry Bijli (lightning), published in 1952, enabled him to take his place among the select group of young poets of fifties. It contains many poems written in traditional verse form. Bapat being well versed in Sanskrit literature and himself a performing artist has a keen sense of rhythm. He is essentially influenced by medieval poetry of Marathi Shahirs. Amorous sentiment dominated his compositions in this collection. In Setu (1957), Akravi Disha (1962) and Sakina (1975) Bapat's potentialities as a poet of the modern age were amply exhibited and the next collections to come justified his claim as a modern Marathi poet of great sensibilities. In Mansi (1977), his poetic achievements reached the new height, and in Pravasachya Kavita (1982) his poetry has acquired maturity and perfection.

Bara Gavacha Pani (1966) is a book of travelogue and Taulanic Sahityabhyas (comparative study of literature-1981) is an introductory book on the basic ideas concerning comparative study of literature.

Bh.K.

BAPIRAJU ADAVI (Telugu, b. 1895, d. 1952) was a poet, novelist, playwright, editor, art-director and teacher. He regaled the Andhra people with his literature and art for nearly three decades in the first half of this century. Born and brought up in an artistic atmosphere, he dedicated his life to art.

Bapiraju was born at Saripalle in the west Godavari district of Andhra Pradesh. He obtained his primary education at Bhimavaram and his higher education at Narasapur. At Arts College, Rajahmundry, he was the favourite pupil of Principal Couldrey. It was under Couldrey's benign influence that Bapiraju developed into a great personality. Couldrey and Bapiraju together visited most of the historic and holy places in India. The sculpture and art of Ajanta, Hampi and Amaravati made a permanent impression on the receptive mind of Bapiraju.

For a few years after 1921, Bapiraju devoted his time to the national movement then raging in the country. The teachings of Bipinchandra Pal had inspired him so much that he courted imprisonment for a considerable period. Later, as a student of Pramodkumar Chatterji at Jatiya Kalasala, Machlipatnam, he fully equipped himself with the knowledge of painting. As a student of Law College, Madras, he took his degree in Law. For a year he practised law and than gave it up. He then took up the post of Principal, Jatiya Kalasala, Machlipatnam. Even in that short period of his stay there, many a student got inspiration from Bapiraju. In 1934, he relinquished the post of Principalship and entered the field of cinema. Being the very first Art Director, Bapiraju is rightly acclaimed as a pioneer of the Telugu Cine-enterprise. 'Sati Anasuya', 'Dhruva Vijayamu' and 'Meerabai' were directed by him. Art lovers were delighted by his imaginative and creative art. The popular art-directors, Vali, Koteswara Rao and Venkatarao were his assistants at that time.

From 1943 to 1946, Bapiraju edited the Telugu Daily Mijan published from Hyderabad. Later he established a 'Kalapeetham' at Guntur, where many received their training in painting.

Bapiraju's talent lies in the field of art and painting. The Kinnerasani Songs and the lyrical Sringara Veedhi of Vivanadha and Enkipatalu of Nanduri were picturised by Bapiraju. This is yet another proof of his power in poetry as well as in painting.

His literary art took the form of novels. Among them his social and historic novels won admiration. Narayarao, Konangi, Tupanu, Jajimalle and Narudu are his social novels. Himabindu, Gonagannareddy, Adavi Shantishree, Amsumathi, historical novels-are very popular. Madhuravani and Shailarathamu are the two unfinished historical novels from his pen. His writing reflects his ideology, psychology, tastes and artistic aptitudes. He has fully drawn inspiration from Telugu's ancient history in order to depict Telugu life in his novels.

Bapiraju has written more than a hundred stories. Ragamalika, Anjali, Tulikanatyamu, Tarangini and Bhageeraloya are the six titles under which his stories were published. Some of these stories were for the first time published in journals like Meejan and Bharati. The gurgling music of the running brooks, the gorgeousness of gardens and parks, the roaring tumult of the billows of the ocean, pretty ladies and pleasing gentry are frequently found in his novels. Nature in all its majesty pervades his novels. Stories like Nagali, Narasanna Papayi, Guddipilla and Nelatalli present before us a realistic picture of life. Many of these stories were translated into English and Hindi.

'Tolakari', 'Godhuli' and 'Shashikala' are poems penned by him. His well known literary work was Shashikala. He has contributed a large number of 'Geyams' (Lyrical songs) infused with description of nature and imbued with patriotism. 'Uppongi Poyindi Godavari-tanu teppunna yegasindi Godayari' and 'Lapakshi Basavayya Lechiravayya-Kailasa Shikaripai Kadaliravayya' are the two 'Geyams' which have become household songs in Andhra Pradesh.

Bapiraju wrote many small plays for the radio. Ushasundari, Kritisamarpanamu, Shailabala, Navodayamu, and Eruvaka are some of his noted radio hits.

Bapiraju should be described as a versatile writer. Mutnuri Krishnarao, a leading journalist of that time, conferred on Bapiraju the title of 'Kulapati'.

J.J.K.B.

BAPU REDDI (Telugu, b. 1936) is a member of the Indian Administrative Service who has distinguished himself as a poet. His published works include Chaitanya Rekhalu, Bapu Reddi Geyalu, Rocket to Rayabaram (Message through the Rocket), Bapu Reddi Padya Kavyam, and Praja Vijayam. He received the award for poetry from Andhra Pradesh Sahitya Akademi in 1968 for his collection of poems Bapu Reddi Geyalu. He translated into English some of his poems under the caption In Quest of Harmony. He is equally at home in handling traditional verse with as much ease and grace as he writes free verse and modern style of poetry.

In his poetry we find a deep concern for the plight of the common man, love for nature and abiding faith in the perfection of human nature. He regards poetry not only as a means of self-expression and exploration of self but also as a powerful medium for propagating healthy ideals which ennoble and exalt life. He wrote some poems which commended the plans and projects formulated for the improvement of the people. Some of his poems express lofty aspirations and visions which have aesthetic as well as spiritual flavour.

His poetry has simplicity and directness of appeal. He refrains from indulging in superfluous ornamentation. He admires the best in the past and at the same time he is aware of the contemporary predicament, appreciative of the achievements of science and technology and anticipates a new order based on equality and fraternity. This progressive outlook is based upon a strong faith in democratic socialism which ushers in a new world without violence and bloodshed. He admires heroes in various walks of life who have left their foot-prints on the sands of time. Without standing in isolation, Bapu Reddi shares the joys and sorrows of the common people and believes in harnessing poetry to the dynamic struggle of the masses against ignorance and poverty.

He continues to write poetry which bears the stamp of all the divergent trends found in modern Telugu Literature.

C.N.S.

BARAHAMAHINA (Sindhi) is a form of poetry containing stanzas named after twelve months of the year in succeeding order. The form has its origin in the Sanskrit literature. While describing the seasons which come and go in the circular movement of the wheel, representing time, the poets draw the parallels between nature and human love. The changing seasons not only serve as a background to human love, but they also interpret and accentuate many facets of this love. The Indian sensitivity to nature, to its changing moods, goes back to the very beginnings of Indian literature, the Rigveda.

The Sindhi poets brought further innovation in this form by describing the various facets of human love according to the seven days of the week (Hafto), or according to the days (Dinhan) or the nights (Ratyoon) of the month. The main theme of these poems is generally a continuous yearning of the lover for the beloved–every Sunday, Monday, Tuesday and so on, for all the week days, everyday and night for the whole month, and every month over the whole year. The feelings of separation are expressed by naming a week day in a serial order, a given day or night of the month, or a given month or the year. Thus, a set of poems composed after the names of the week days is called the Hafta (Pl. of Hafto-a week) or 'the week-day poems'. The poems mentioning the days of the month in numerical order (eg. the first day, the second day, the third day and so on) to the thirtieth day of the month are known as Dihan (Pl. of Dihan, a day) the day-poems. Similarly the poems mentioning the nights of the month in numerical order (eg. the first night, the second night, the third night and so on) to the thirtieth night of the month, are called Ratyoon (pl. of rati-night). In the same way, the poems based upon the names of the months of the year in succeeding order are called the 'Mahina' (pl. of mahino-month) or the 'Barahan Mahina' poems.

Hafto or the week-day poems generally start with Saturday and terminate with Friday. But, there are some poems which begin with Friday or Sunday or Thursday or Monday. Most of the poets in such poems have composed one stanza on each day. But, there are some poems in which two or more stanzas are written on each day. Dinhan-ain-Ratyoon (Days and Nights): In the day poems, most of the poets have composed thirty stanzas, each pertaining to one day of the month counted in ordinal numbers, successively. There are some poems of this type in which stanzas have been composed on six, seven or fourteen days only. Similarly, there is a practice of composing thirty stanzas, each mentioning different nights of the month in numerical order. But there are some poems in which nine, ten, fifteen nights are enumerated in a numerical order. In 'Mahina' (Months or the twelve month poems) poems, most of the poets have written complete poems having twelve stanzas, each composed on the name of each month in serial order. No doubt, some poems contain only six months. As regards the order of the months, Muslim poets have followed the serial order of 'Hijri' year beginning with the month of Muharram. Hindu poets have mentioned the names of months according to Hindu calendar beginning with the month of 'Chetu' (i.e. Chaitra, March-April). Some Sufi poets of the present century, have enumerated the months according to the Christan calender.

This type of poems was very popular among the folk poets of Sindh, who often narrated love-legends in this form. Later on, Sufi poets adopted it for describing their spiritual union with God or separation from Him. They employed this form not only for the sentiment of love, but also for giving vent to their spiritual realisation. Occasionally, they expressed didactic message through this form. This technique of composition has been followed in written standard literature by some poets. The earliest example of this form of poems in the written Sindhi literature is found in the poetry of Sufi poet Shah Abdul Latif (1689-1752). He has described the ascetics and seekers of God in 'Sur Ramkali' in the form of thirty days.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Nabi Bux Khan Baloch, Hafta, Dihan, Ratyoon, Mahina (Weeks, Days, Nights and Months), Simdhi Folklore and Literature Series, Book No. VII, Sindhi Adabi Board, Hyderabad Sindh, 1961.

M.K.J.

BARAHAMASA (Maithili) is a popular seasonal song, prevalent all over the Northern India. It is a kind of love song describing the state of love-lorn ladies throughout the twelve months of the year. In the course of such long period of separation the poets get an opportunity to paint the beauties and hardships of all the seasons of the year. The emphasis is almost always on the callous absence of the lover or husband. The earliest Barahamasa is known to have been written by Vidyapati (early 15th century) but in the 19th century a number of saint poets wrote them in a literary style. The best Barahamasas of the new kind were written by Sahabaramadasa using the legend of Krishna and his love-lorn 'gopis' as the background and thereby making them out a sort of devotional songs to Krishna.

The abbreviation of twelve months into six or more is most common. The six months covered are from 'Jyesth' to 'Kartik', and the four are the 'Chaturmasya' when journey from foreign land to one's native village was impossible owing to rains. The rainy season is otherwise also known to be erotically attractive and has been the object of flights of poetic imagination for a traditional Indian poet for whom erotic poetry was the best kind.

In an ideal Barahamasa there is a synthesis of folk and literary poetic styles. The theme in it is the state of the heart and mind of a love-sick lady as affected by the cycle of seasons.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Ramikbalsingh 'Rakesh', Maithili Lokagita, Hindi Sahitya Sammelan, Allahabad.

J.M.

BARAHAMASA (Rajasthani): The Indian seasonal calendar is known for its six seasons spread over twelve months. This change of seasons also affects human beings, there being an intimate relationship between the two. The feelings experienced by human beings, while in union with and separation from their dear ones, throughout the year, are reflected in literature in the descriptions of 'Satritu' (six seasons) and Barahamasa (twelve months). The Rajasthani Barahamasa poems depict the pangs of separation, and emotional feelings as experienced by the female partner in each month of the year. The fact that these poems contain descriptions of emotions felt during the twelve months of the year accounts for the nomenclature of Barahamasa. The oldest available specimen of this genre is Neminath Chatuspadika of Vinaychandra Suri, a Jaina poet. Composed in 'Chaupai' it is styled as 'Chatuspadika' and describes the feelings of separation, beginning with the month 'Sawana', as experienced by the heroine Rajmati. The poem was composed sometime in about 1260. Another such work of the 13th century is Nemi Barahamasa by the poet Palhana. Both of them have been published (Prachin Gurjar Kavya Sanchaya, L.D. Institute of Indology, Ahmedabad, 1975). The Barahamasa poems composed by the Jains are dominated, in the first place, by the description of Rajmati and Neminath, the 22nd Tirthankara, while in the second place they are related to 'Shulibhadra' and 'Kosya', and some other couples. In addition to such independent pieces it is also available in the Prabandha Kavyas. The Madhavanala Kamakandala Prabandha (G.O.S., Baroda, 1942) written by Ganapati Kayastha in 1528 contains the Barahamasa type description.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Agarchanda Nahata (ed), Rajasthan men Hindi ke Hastalikhit Granthon ki Khoj. vol. 4, Sahitya Sansthana Rajasthan Vidya pitha, Udaipur 1954., Prachin Kavyon ki Rup Parampara, Bharatiya Vidya Mandira Sodha Pratisthana, Bikaner, 1962.

Hi.M.

BARAHATHA ASO (Rajasthani; b. 1993-1593 approx.) was the son of Gidhoji of Bhadaresa (Barmer). Isaradasa, the eminent saint poet who was his brother's son, was brought up and initially educated by him. He was a favourite of Rava Maladeva (d. 1562) of Jodhpur. Karamasi, son of Rav Lunakarana (d. 1526) of Bikaner, who also enjoyed the grant of the place 'Rini', had bestowed the award of 'Koda Pasava' (award of the value of one crore of rupees) on a single couplet recited by him. Having left Bhadaresa, he settled at village Nathusara of the Kalu region in Bikaner. His works are as follows: Rawala Mala ro Guna which describes the heroic deeds of Megharaja, the eighth descendant of Rawal Mallinath, and it also contains a brief narration of his ancestors. Gogaji ri Paidi (Gogaji Chauhana ri Rajasthani Gatha), tells of Gogaji being born under the blessings of Gorakhnath. Gogaji is one of the five famous seers of Rajasthan. Rava Chandrasena ra Rupaka describes the virtues of Chandrasena, son of Rava Maladeva of Jodhpur, contained in the illustrations of 26 kinds of metres. Umade Bhatiyani ra Kavitta is an emotional poem describing the act of committing Sati, by the displeased queen of Rava Maladeva. Bhaghaji ra Duha is a collection of elegiac verses written with extreme pathos by the poet on the death of Badha of Kotada village. Rawala Jam ra Duha are 'Marasiyas' (elegiac verses) composed on the death of Rawala Jama of Jamnagar, Guna Niranjana Prana (Purana) contains the description of the greatness, and the nature of the limitless supreme soul, devoid of all attributes. The poet has also given us some 'Gitas' composed on some historical personages, and also some devotional ones. In his devotional writings there is a co-ordinated expression of the 'Saguna' and 'Nirguna' and the oneness of Rama, Krishna and 'Allah' has been described. The poet is more known for his works–Umade Bhatiyani ra Kavitta, Badhaji ra Duha and Guna Niranjana Prana (Purana). He has made a significant contribution to the heroic and puranic religious currents of the Rajasthani Charana literature. His works are also important from the point of view of cultural and religious traditions.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H.L. Maheshwari, Rajasthani Bhasha aur

Sahitya (1960); History of Rajasthani Literature (Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi, 1980); M.L. Menariya, Rajasthani Bhasha aur Sahitya 1978.

Hi.M.

BARAHATHA KESARISIMHA (Rajasthani; b. 1872 d. 1941) was a revolutionary and patriotic poet of Khari Boli , Rajasthani and Braja. He was born at Devaj-ka-kheda, his ancestral Jagir village in former Sahapura state. He was trained in the art of poetry by his father Krishna Simha Barahatha and his maternal uncle Kaviraj Shyamaldas, both eminent scholars of their times.

He served in the erstwhile states of Udaipur and Kota in various capacities. He played an important part in bringing about social reforms among the Rajput and Charana communities, in his capacity as an active member of the Walter-Rajput-Hitakarini Sabha (1905). He was also associated with the Bharat Dharma Mandal of Benaras. He formed a secret society with Bissen Dutta (1910), which was later on converted into a political organisation. On the failure of this society, Kesarisimha launched a scheme to open primary schools and boarding houses. Being a staunch follower of Lokamanya Tilak, he had developed close relations with eminent revolutionaries of the country. He was arrested and imprisioned for 20 years on the charge of murdering a wealthy sadhu, Pyarelal, and was sent to Hazaribagh Jail. He was released in 1919 on the occasion of the victory celebrations of the first World War. Thereafter he devoted himself to meditation and performance of religious austerities.

He is more known in Rajasthani literature for his Chetavani ra Chungatya (13 couplets) addressed to Maharana Fatehsimha on the occasion of the ruler's departure from Udaipur to attend the coronation Darbar of Delhi in 1903. It is said that the couplets had the desired effect on the Maharana and he made up his mind not to attend the function.

His other works are: Kavya-kusumanjali (based on pun, which he presented to Lord Curzon); Hindi translation of Buddhacharita by Asvaghosa. Hindi translation of the biography of Majinis by Vir Savarkar, couplets presented to prince Bhupalsinha of Mewar state, etc.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Hiralal Maheshwari, History of Rajasthani Literature. Rajasthan ka Swatantra-Sangram Kavya (Rajasthan Sahitya Academy Sangam, Udaipur.

B.M.J.

BARAHATHA KRIPARAMA (Rajasthani; b. 1743, d. 1833) was the son of Charan Jogaram of the Khidiya branch, resident of village Khairadi in the paragana (district) of Parabatesara (Nagaur-Rajasthan). He was a favourite of Ravaraja Devisinha (d. 1795) and his son Laksmansinha (d. 1833) of Sikar. Laksmansinha granted him the village Lichamanpura in the year 1801, which was inhabited by his second son, Kishanaji. This very village came to be known as 'Kriparama ki Dhani'. His published works are–Kavitta Chalairaya ka, Sat rut Varnan, assorted writings on the Gita, 'Kavitta', Duha, 'Chappaya', etc. and Rajiya ke Sorathe (Total number of verses 140, ed. Jagdishsinha Gahalote, Hindi Sahitya Mandir, Jodhpur, 1934) and Rajiya ra Duha (Total number of verses 165. ed. Narottamdas Swami, Bikaner). Besides these, Alankara Grahha, Chalakaneci, Chalakaraya Nataka, etc. are also believed to have been written by him, but nothing can be said positively till the texts are available. His popularity, however, rests entirely on his Rajiya ra Soratha or Duha. Rajiya was the personal attendant to Kriparama and felt sad for his having had no son to carry on the lineage. Kriparama, therefore, thought of immortalising him by addressing some didactic verses to him. These verses in 'Soratha' metre came to be known by the name of Rajiya. Here the poet's experience of public life and the multifarious aspects of ethics have been expressed in simple words. The poetry is quite interesting and touching. The verses have gained immense popularity among the masses as ethical sayings and maxims appropriate to various occasions. The moral preachings are based on experience instead of the available ethical texts. His other writings are concerned with devotion to God, and heroism.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H.L. Maheshwari, History of Rajasthani literature; M.L. Menariya, Rajasthani Bhasa aur Sahitya; Udayvir Sarma, Rajasthani sur ko Sekhawati ka yogdana; Varada, April, 1982-March, 1983.

Hi.M.

BARAHATHA NARAHARI DAS (Rajasthani; b. 1591, d. 1676) was the son of Charan Lakhoji of the Rohadiya branch. He was a favourite of Maharaja Gajasinha of Jodhpur who had granted him a village namely Tahala. Maharaja Jaswantsinha of Jodhpur had also honoured him by offering an award of 'Lakha Pasava' (award worth rupees one lakh). Suryamall Misran has given him the first place among the prominent poets preceding him. He is known mainly for his celebrated work Avatara Charitra. His other writings include 29 Dingal gitas composed for contemporary historical personages, and Rava mara sinha ra Duha (Rajasthani Sahitya Sampada. Saubhagya Sinha Sekhawat, Bikaner, 1977). He was equally proficient in Dingal and Pingal. His poems were concerned with devotion, spirituality and heroism.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: M.L. Menariya, Rajasthan ka Pingal Sahitya, Udaipur, 1952.

Hi.M.

BARAHMAHA (Punjabi) literally means twelve months. It is a poetical form evolved round twelve months of the year. In Punjabi, many poetical folk forms are related to the unit of time which were later adopted for creative poetry, Barahmaha is one of these forms.

Barahmaha generally consists of twelve stanzas, each based on one month. Its main theme is love. The separated beloved relates her innermost and intense feelings for the lover. Simple but befitting analogies and imagery from nature are employed, to make them more objective. Sometimes the poetic diction is in tune with nature, but at times there is a marked contrast.

The oldest Barahmaha available was written by Guru Nanak Dev in Raag Tukhari which is considered a marvellous piece of poetry. The imagery is borrowed from nature and folk-life, which makes the philosophical concepts intelligible. A married woman awaits her husband, who has gone abroad. Her mood changes with the change of the season. The romantic rainy season has started, and the separated beloved feels loneliness and pangs of separation. The panoramic vision of Guru Nanak elevates the Barahmaha to new heights in diction, imagery and thought-content. Another Barahmaha in Adi Granth is in Majh Rag written by Guru Arjan Dev. These Barahmahas are simple outbursts of innermost and intensive feelings and are very popular in rural areas. Among the sufi poets, the Barahmaha of Ali Haider and Bulhe Shah are worth mentioning. Among the modern poets Amrita Pritam has written an artistic Barahmaha. Its subject matter is revolutionary and different from that of others of this category.

S.S.W.B.

BARAHMASA (Hindi): Mulla Daud (14th Century) was the first poet who wrote Barahmasa in his great narrative poem Chandayan. Two Barahmasas are found in Chandayan. The first Barahmasa is the song of 'Twelve months' expressing pangs of separation narrated by Chanda to her companion. This begins from the month of Magh and describes Phalgun also, each in one Kadawak (a group of Chaupais followed by a doha). One Kadawak is devoted to Chaitra also but is mutilated. The rest of the nine months are also missing. Another Barahmasa expresses the pangs of separation and miseries suffered by Maina in the absence of her husband who has run away from Maina with Chanda and she relates these to a man, Sirjan and asks him to go and convey her pathetic state to her husband. This Barahmasa begins from the month of Shravan (savan) and making use of the main features of every month as figurative medium she relates her grief and sorrow to Sirjan. She says her eyes have savan within.

There is quite a long list of ballads in Hindi which are written on the inspiration from Chandayan and all these have Barahmasa as a common feature. Mrigavati of Kutuban, Padmavat of Jaysi, Chitravali of Usman are some of the notable examples. Jaysi's Barahmasa is Nagmati's separation song. Sadhana's 'Maina Sat' is also a very popular love-ballad. One wicked person, Satan by name, sends Ratna Malin (flower-maid) to persuade Maina who was left behind by Lorik to suffer pangs of separation, to marry him. Ratna Malin, month by month, describes the nature's temptations and advises her to forget her husband and enjoy the company of some other person. Maina does not yield. In the end, when twelve months are over Maina sends her out disgracefully. Gavasi is a poet of Dakhini Hindi. He was the court-poet of Abdulla Kutub Shah of Golconda. He wrote a 'Masnavi' entitled 'Maina Satvanti' which appears to be based on Sadhana's 'Maina Sat' and includes Barahmasa as the pivotal theme describing nature, its temptations every month to allure Maina while Maina expresses her miseries and pangs. Thus, we find that Barahmasa has been written for various purposes.

Barahmasas in the Hindi region are mostly separation songs. Some of these commence from the month of Chait, some from Ashadh, some from Savan Bhadon and some others from Kartik. Modes of expressing grief and sorrow and pangs of separation also differ. Some Barahmasas end with a note of happiness by showing that the husband has returned and thus make the grieved lady happy. Yet there are some Barahmasas where we find some lady describing the attractive features of each month which works as a stimulant aggravating the pangs of separation and tries to persuade the heroine to meet some other person and enjoy her life with him. By this novel method the folk poet serves three purposes at the same time-firstly, he depicts the beauties and temptations which excite love; secondly, he expresses the pangs and sufferings of separation of the heroine which are fanned to their poetic heights and thirdly, he shows that a faithful lady cannot be persuaded to deviate from the path of righteousness by any means.

In some regions the Barahmasas are used to instruct people about their duties or work which they have to perform from month to month.

There are stylistic differences also in Barahmasas. One lady whose husband is not with her expresses her grief by refusing to enjoy her ride on swing (Jhula) and with the strain, 'Main Jhula Nahin Jhulungi, (I will not enjoy a swing ride) she describes the miseries of twelve months in the absence of her husband. Really speaking, every Barahmasa is stylistically different from the other.

S.

BARAL, AKSHAYKUMAR (Bengali; b. 1860, d. 1918) was a poet, and a close follower of Biharilal Chakrabarty, the forerunner of the Romantics in the 19th century Bengali literature. However, Akshaykumar's poetry does not show the looseness of style and the ecstatic overflow of sentiment of his other contemporaries, though it lacks Chakrabarty's spontaneity. Though essentially an emotional poet, Baral was more intellectual than passionate. Browning was one of Baral's favourites and the English poet's influence left its stamp on the style of Baral and also on his faith in the ultimate goodness of creation. Economy of expression and meticulousness in the choice of words are the sterling qualities of Baral's diction. Though Baral was senior to Rabindranath Tagore by one year, Tagore's early lyrics influenced–though not very deeply–some of his poems.

Baral's books of poems are not many. His first book Pradip (1885) reveals his romantic discontent and love for woman and also the universal love. His next book Kanakanjali (1886) continues with the same characteristics excepting one ballad which may remind one of Hugo's Toilers of the Sea. His third book Bhul (1888) was dedicated to Rabindranath Tagore. His fourth book Sanka contains some poems of Bhul. His last book Esha (1912) is written in memory of his departed wife. He translated some poems of Hugo and wrote some beautiful songs one of which was set to tune by Tagore.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Sukumar Sen, History of Bengali Literature, Sahitya Akademi (New Delhi), 1960.

U.M.

BARAMAHI (Assamese). There is a class of songs in Assam as in other parts of eastern and northern India describing the twelve months of the year as a background to the feeling of a girl, whose husband is away somewhere. Such songs are known as Baramahi or 'twelve-monthly'. The narration in Hindi Barahmasas begins from the month of Ahar, in Assamese it usually begins from Aghon (Nov.-Dec.). 'Kanya Baramahi' found in the Kamurp district has a 'Kanya' or maiden as its central figure. It has one hundred and ten lines, in rhyming couplets. The song, which may be termed a ballad because it has a narrative structure, may be summarised thus: A young merchant sees a girl and offers her his love. Beginning from Aghon he goes on urging his suit in the months that follow. The girl refuses him everytime declaring that she is married and her husband is alive. When he says that her husband must be dead, she asserts:

No, my husband cannot be dead,
For then my hair would have loosened, my tight fist would have broken,
The two conch bangles on my hands would have been in pieces.
The vermillion on my forehead would have faded.

At last in the month of Ahin the merchant declared that he was none other than her true husband. The merchant apparently had left soon after his marriage. Though the typical Baramahi like Madhumati in Assamese should depict the sorrows of a wife left by her husband, the theme of Kanya Baramahi is the test of the virtue of a wife.

Sita-Baramahi describes the sorrows of Sita at her separation from Rama. In one or two of these songs there are similarities in language and ideas with Bengali Baramasi and Nepali Sanchi-git. All these songs have the themes popular with women-folk, and they do not seem to have a literary origin.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Phanindranath Kalita, Baramahi Aru Bilap Git, Gauhati, 1960., Praphulladatta Goswami, Asamiya Aru Jana-Sahitya, Gauhati, 1965, Ballads And Tales of Assam, Gauhati, 1970.

Pr.G.

BARAMASYA (Bengali) is a typical form of poetic composition, which was quite popular with the Indian poets in different languages since the medieval age. In short, Baramasya or Baramasi means a continued description of human feelings in the perspective of changing seasons throughout the year. It is usually written in the form of a monologue of a young woman, who displays her feelings and sentiments. These Baramasyas were often used to be sung by the village-folks.

The two most popular forms of Baramasya are: a) descriptions of sorrows, sufferings and unfulfilment of certain practical aspirations and b) descriptions of longings, frustrations and setbacks in the emotional lives. In both the forms, usually the narrators are young women. Sometimes such narrations form the parts of longer stories, such as Bengali Gitikas or Mangalkavyas; sometimes independent monologues are also found in this genre. Besides poverty and love, certain Baramasya had also religious sentiments and feelings as their themes. Though aesthetics and spirituality may not be their guiding modes of expression yet they happened to represent sometimes a combination of both.

In Bengali literature, the number of Baramasyas belonging to the major two types is quite impressive. All the major streams of medieval Bengali literature produced some Baramasyas. In Vaishnava literature the poems of this genre depict the sorrows of Radha and Bishnupriya when Krishna and Nimai left them behind, not to come back again. In the Mangalkavyas, however, Baramasyas on 'Biraha' (desolation after the beloved's departure) were there, though the other type i.e. those centering round poverty, was more popular with the Mangal-poets. Of this category, Phullara's year-long sorrows and hardships as depicted by Mukundaram, form a well-known piece of composition. Similar Baramasyas of Lahana and Susila also were by him. The Baramasya of widowed Behula written by Sasthibar Datta was really interesting for its novelty. Another novel Baramasya, that is, the triumphant monologue of Manasa, was composed by Bipradas Piplai. Even Krittibas Ojha also had written one such describing the pathetic conditions of Sita in Ravana's captivity. Heroines of Mymensingh Ballads had often been portrayed as singing Baramasyas. The Baramasyas of Mahua, Malua, Kamala were most important among them. These verses displayed both the social and the personal aspects. Vidya's Baramasya written by Bharatchandra Roy displayed her passionate moments throughout the year. Some of the modern poets too, like Bishnu De and Jatindranath Sengupta, have written poems of Baramasya type.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Asutosh Bhattacharya, Bangla Mangalkavyer Itihas, (Calcutta, 1964); Md. Abdul Kalum, (ed.), Loksahitya, Bangla Akademi, Dacca (1965); Sibaprasad Bhattacharya, Bharatiya Sahitye Baramasya (Calcutta, 1959).

P.S.

BARASAN RA DEGODA DUNGAR LANGHIYAN (Rajasthani) is a Sahitya Akademi award winning book (1981), by Narayan Singh Bhati of 'Malungo', Jodhpur. It was published in 1980 at Jaipur. It consists of six line stanzas, one hundred in all, which cannot strictly be called free verses. Though there is no rhymed termination in any of the feet, there is a sort of measured gait with equal steps that go to create an intrinsic sense of rhythm in all the stanzas. The language is at times too archaic which fails to speak for itself. There is an apparent attempt at coining of words. A number of words known for their particular meanings have been assigned fresh meanings, while those which are newly coined pose problems of intelligibility. Each separate stanza presents an independent picture of the emotion attempted in it. The intricacy of the imageries, however, mars the beauty of description. As suggested by the title, 'The Crossing of the lofty mountains of the past' the poet seems to be deeply involved in pleasant reminiscences of joyful days spent with his sweet heart. At places the expression suggests that the beloved is probably a third person. It is an extremely erotic piece of poetry bordering on the side of open sex. It is in its own way a story of love-life in continuity, from the beginning to the advanced age when hair turns grey.

Raw.S.

BARAVAI (Hindi), Baravai also called 'Dhruva' and 'Kuvanga' (metre, consists of four feet; the first and third feet contain 12 'matras' (syllabic instances), while the second and fourth contain 7 matras; e.g.

Prem priti kau birava, chale lagay,
Seenchan kee sudhi leeyo, murajhi na jai'.

In this metre Rahim–a Hindi poet of the 17th century wrote his famous book Baravai Nayika–bheda (A treatise on different classifications of the heroines). This metre has casually been used by other poets also, especially of the medieval period.

Sa.C.

BARBARUA, HITESWAR (Assamese; b. 1876, d. 1939) was a leading modern epic poet, sonneteer and historian of Assam. Though he was born into the illustrious Barbarua family of which his grandfather Bhandari Barbarua happened to be a Prime Minister during the Ahom rule in Assam, the chill penury was his lot of life. Struggling with poverty he could not even complete the Entrance examination and spent his whole life as a tea garden clerk. Gifted with a poetic temperament and a patriotic zeal, and also being widely read in English and Bengali literatures, he took to epic poetry and sonneteering in Assamese with a promise. A series of family tragedies made him express a tragic vision of life through his entire writings. His three literary epics written on the source-materials from the past history of Assam are: Kamatapur Dhvamsa (The Fall of Kamatapur, 1912), based on an intrigue in the royal family, leading to the ruination of the Kamatapur Kingdom; Tirotar Atmadan (The Self-Sacrifice of a Woman, 1913), based on the martyrdom of the illustrious Ahom princess Jaymati for the cause of her husband; and Yuddhakshetrat Ahom Ramani (An Ahom Lady in the Battle-field, 1915), based on the indomitable courage and heroism of an Ahom lady named Mula Gabharu who fought against the Mughul invaders under General Turbak. His four longer narrative poems are: Birahini Bilap (The Lamentation of a Lovelorn Woman, 1913), dealing with the pathos of a lovelorn woman through a series of odes, Abhas (The Glimpse, 1914), dealing with the immortal virtues of twenty-one heroines of whom seventeen are Indian and four foreign; Desdemona (1917), delineating the tragedy of Desdemona in a sequence of 22 sonnets, based on the source-material of Act V, Sc. II, of Shakespeare's Othello; and Angila (1917), an Assamese version of a romantic ballad, incorporated in Oliver Goldsmith's novel–The Vicar of Wakefield. His contributions to the Assamese sonneteering are: Malancha (The Garden of Flowers, 1918), a collection of 128 sonnets, dealing with varied aspects of Life and Nature; and Chakulor (The Tears, 1922), a sequence of 33 Sonnets, expressing the poet's pain at the death of his youngest son. The model of the sonnets is Shakespearean with many variations in the number of syllables in a line and also in the rhyme-scheme. His miscellaneous lyrics are: Dhopakali (The Bud, 1902); 'Tifuk Prabas' (The Stay in Tifuk) as appended to Dhopakali; and 'Santaptar Hamrao' (The Lamentation of the Aggrieved), an elegy-sequence appended to Birahini

Bilap. His solitary contribution to the domain of Assamese novel is Malita (1914).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Nagen Saikia, (ed.) Hiteswar Barbarua Smriti-malya (Asam Sahitya Sabha publication on the poet's birth centenary, Jorhat, 1976): Satyendranath Sarma, Asamiya Kahini Kavyar Prabah, Gauhati, 1970.

Pu.S.

BARDOLOI, NABINCHANDRA (Assamese; b. 1875, d. 1936), popularly known in Assam as Karmavir Nabin chandra Bardoloi, has left an indelible mark of his personality in both literature and politics of Assam. After obtaining the Law degree from Ripon College, Calcutta in 1899, he joined the Bar at Gauhati. In 1908 he moved to the Calcutta High Court where he was practising till 1918. He was also teaching at Ripon Law College for sometime. In 1918 he returned to Gauhati and devoted himself to the literary, social and political activities in Assam. Besides donating two plots of land at Gauhati and North Gauhati for the establishment of Kumar Bhaskar Natya Mandir and Ananda Library at the respective places, he took a pioneering role for the establishment of Cotton College and Earl Law College at Gauhati. He was the guiding spirit behind such institutions in Assam as Silpa Samiti, Khadi Pratisthan, Kaivarta Sanmilani, etc. He was actively associated with the Assam Association founded in 1903 and along with Prasannakumar Barua of Dibrugarh went to London to give evidence against the rule of Montague-Chelmsford on behalf of the Association. There he strongly pleaded before Montague, the Secretary of States for India, for recognising Assam as a separate province of India. Bardoloi's arguments convinced Montague and consequently Assam was included into Montague Administrative Reform. Prior to this change, Assam had not had the status of a province and was ruled by a Chief Commissioner. Bardoloi joined the Indian National Congress in 1919 and took part in the Non-Cooperation Movement launched by Gandhiji in 1921. For the efforts of Bardoloi and Tarunram Phukan, the Annual Session of the National Congress was held at Pandu (Gauhati) in 1926. He was twice imprisoned by the British in 1921 and 1932 for fighting for the independence of the country. He was the Chairman of the Local Board, a member of the Assam Council and also a member of the Indian Legislative Council.

Bardoloi made significant contribution to Assamese literature. A dramatist, lyricist, singer and an actor, Bardoloi wrote a number of books and songs while in prison. His only book of songs Tirthayatri (Pilgrim, 1959) contains a number of patriotic songs and devotional poems. Grihalakshmi (1911) is the first Assamese drama on family problems. From the last decade of the 19th century, the Shakespearean plays began to be translated into Assamese and Bardoloi took a leading role in this venture. He translated into Assamese Shakespeare's Taming of the Shrew (Danduri-daman), Troilus and Cressida (Tarunkanchan) and King Lear (Bishad Kahini). His only social novel is Sewali which depicted a vivid picture of the Assamese Society. In the biography, Anita Garibaldi (1932), he described the heroism of the famous Italian hero Garibaldi. It is a pen-picture of Garibaldi's life, his dramatic union with Anita who died a tragic death in the battle-field and his exile. Bardoloi's other books are the translations from Urdu, Hatem Tai and fairy tales for children, Amatar Mat (Voices of the Mute). The chief characteristic of all his writing is patriotism which was the guiding spirit of his life and work.

H.S.

BARDOLOI, NIRMALPRABHA (Assamese; b. 1933) is a popular poetess and song-composer of Assam. Born in an orthodox family in the old town of Sibsagar, the last capital of the Ahom kingdom, she was married while she was a school-going girl of twelve or thirteen. But under paternal care, she studied up to the post-graduate level. Having taken her M.A. degree in Assamese she became a lecturer in a Gauhati college in 1955 and after twenty years she shifted her teaching career to Gauhati University, having obtained a Ph. D. degree in the meantime.

Nirmalprabha's fame rests mainly on her sweet cadenced sensitive poetry redolent with nostalgic rural scenes and reminiscences. Her imagery, diction, choice of words and use of symbols breathe an air of freshness. Her contribution to the school of modern poetry has been enshrined in four slim volumes, viz., Bam Pharingar Rang, (Colour of Grasshopper, 1972), Antaranga, Dinar Pachat Din (Day after Day, 1977) and Samipeshu (1977) where instead of betraying the iconoclastic attitude of some of the modern poets towards the old abiding values, she reveals her endearing sympathy with the old fast-vanishing Assamese society. She loves the world inspite of its limitations and sometimes expresses her pain for the worldly vanity. Her poetry is surcharged with love for and sympathy with nature which does not stand detached from the human life and its emotional activities. She could catch the right word or symbol for conveying the intended suggestions. The music and rhythm of her poetry is one of its assets.

Nirmalprabha has composed nearly a hundred lyrics meant to be sung, some of which have been tuned and sung in AIR and earned approbation of admiring listeners. These lyrics are rich in emotional content and conform to musical adaptability. Some of these can also stand independently as pieces of lyric poetry even if they are detached from the musical garb.

Nirmalprabha is interested in the folk culture also. She has published a work, Asamiya Loka Samskriti dealing with several aspects of folk festivals and ceremonies. She has also written a couple of books for children one of which won India Government's award. She was also the recipient of the 1983 Sahitya Akademi award in Assamese for her collection of poems entitled Sudirgha Din Aru Rati.

S.S.

BARDOLOI, RAJANIKANTA (Assamese; b. 1867, d. 1939) has been acknowledged as the pioneer novelist in Assamese literature. It was in his hands that the Assamese novel first acquired a characteristic form.

After having passed his B.A. in 1889 he entered Government service and served first as a Sub-Deputy Collector and later as an Extra Assistant Commissioner, whence he retired in 1918. He was a man of varied experience and his creative faculties were shaped at a time when there was the clash of eastern and western ideas. Bardoloi got his education in Calcutta, at that time considered rather far from his home town. It may be noted that he collected materials for his novels from his extensive tours in connection with his work as a Sub-Deputy Collector.

Though an officer under the British Govt. and surrounded by their dazzling ways of life, he was not a slave to everything that came newly from the West. He wanted a happy combination of all the good that was to be found in both the East and the West. From the bottom of his heart he wanted good ideas and traditions of India to remain intact. He was a deeply religious man, but had no excessive orthodoxy. He led a pious and tolerant life and had firmness of purpose. All these virtues are reflected in the leading characters of his novels. Instances of India's cherished ideas, faith in a just providence, hopefulness and a healthy outlook on life, are found in his writings. He was a devout Vaishnava and a firm believer in the idea that all terrestrial activities were regulated by an unseęn, all-knowing power. He also believed in the validity of good actions. He used to say, 'Not birth, but actions confer dignity on man'.

He was a great patriot wedded to the welfare of his country. When he began writing his novels, contemporary Assamese society was static and could hardly provide him with materials for his books. Hence he went back to his country's past which was full of life and movement.

The compelling motives in his historical novels may be briefly summed up as follows:

(a) To hold up to the Assamese reader instances of valour from past history and infuse patriotic ideals in him.
(b) Identification of the reasons for enslavement of the Assamese people who always had their independence in the past.
(c) To hold up the picture of Assamese society, its customs and manners, beliefs and rituals, its commerce and social conditions.
(d) To show the play of eternal passions and emotions and the action and reaction that always go on beneath political turmoil or historical changes.
(e) To acquaint the growing generation of Assamese people with their own characteristic culture and relgious beliefs and ideas.

His ideal characters, therefore, embody both spirituality and patriotism which hold his reformist zeal to bold relief.

Bardoloi has to his credit eight novels viz Miri Jiyori, Manomati, Rangili, Nirmal Bhakat, Rahdoi Ligiri, Tamreshwarir Mandir, Danduadroh and Radha Rukminir Ron. Miri Jiyori, published in 1895, was his first novel. Long before anyone else had taken any note of tribal life, Bardoloi wrote this novel. Against the background of tribal life and in warm sympathy he wrote the story of a pair of Miri young man and woman and depicted their simple but robust and pure love. In poignant and touching language he describes how the love of the twain Janki and Panei ended in tragic fulfilment through death because of opposition from parents, from society and the rivalry of Tranayan. The writer has given a faithful and realistic picture of Miri society, their Narasinga Bihu, congregational worship in the village Assembly Hall and their customs and beliefs. Excluding this novel all his other novels derive their materials from history.

His second novel Manomati published in 1900 has its background in the Burmese invasion of Assam. Similarly his novels Rangili (1925), Nirmal Bhakat (1928) and Rahdoi Ligiri (1930) have for their background the decadent times of the Ahom rule in Assam when the powers that be were torn by authoritarianism, selfish acrimony for power, licentiousness and political intrigues and these are reflectd in the vicissitudes of his heroes and heroines. The novel Danduadroh (1909) deals with the revolt against Ahom rule launched by the famous brothers Haradotta and Biradotta of lower Assam and the other novel Radha Rukminir Ron (1925) has for its background the Mowa-Maria rebellion.

In his novels women play a more dominant role. No where do we find any bad woman character. The characters are straight and simple. There is no mental conflict in his men and women. It must be noted that the resulting action in his novels is not dependent on any mental conflict of his heroes and heroines. Their fate is determined by some force outside them. But so varied is the action, so simple and sincere and charming are his idealistic characters that they sustain the reader's interest to the end.

Ni.B.

BARDOLOI, RUDRARAM (Assamese; b. 1836, d. 1899) wrote a satiric play Bangal-Bangalani (An outsider and his wife, 1971) which is considered to be the third modern Assamese play. In this play the dramatist has made an attempt to show how some outsiders coming to Assam for business had kept some unchaste Assamese women as their paramours and created social complications.

The drama reflects to some extent Shakespearean techniques. However, the playwright has introduced Sutradhara (the stage manager), a man character of the old Assamese drama consisting of one Act. An important feature of the play is that there are characters speaking different languages like Assamese, Bengali and Marwari. Poor in character-development and plot-construction, the play deals mainly with certain aspects of some social problems.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Harichandra Bhattacharya, Asamiya Natya Sahityar Jilingani, (Gauhati, 1970); Satyendranath Sarma, Asamiya Natya Sahitya (Gauhati, 1973).

H.S.

BARDOLOI, SARADAKANTA (Assamese; b. 1902), an actor of repute, is one of those few persons who associated themselves with the theatre–world of Assam and made significant contributions to the development of the post-war Assamese drama. His first play Magribar Ajan (1948) written against the background of rural life presents a picture of Hindu-Muslim unity in Assam. The plot centres round Karim, a Muslim youth who sacrificed his own life in order to save the life of a tribal Hindu girl. Pahila Tarikh (1954) and Sei Batedi (1957) are two other successful plays written by Bardoloi. The first is a realistic picture of the miserable economic conditions of the lower middle class people. Besides these full-length plays, Bardoloi has also written a few one–Act plays like Birambana, Bihuvan etc.

S.B.

BARGITA (Assamese) is a class of devotional lyrics sung in different ragas of classical Indian music. These devotional lyrics are called Bargitas in order to differentiate them from other contemporary lyrics or songs with classical ragas, as those of Durgavara or Mankar, having predominance of secular elements. Literally this genus of early Assamese literature means the great songs ('bar'-great, 'gita'-song) differentiated from other songs by its intensive devotional tone, elevated style of composition, and high moral and philosophical significance. B. Kakati, an eminent critic of Assam, has compared these lyrical songs with R. Herrick's Noble Numbers.

Sankardeva, the saint-poet of Assam, is said to have composed and initiated this tradition of musical composition towards the closing decade of the 15th century. According to the Vaishnavite tradition handed down through hagiographies, the great preacher composed the first Bargita, beginning with the line–'mana meri rama charanahi lagu' (Oh my mind, rest yourself at the feet of Rama) while he visited the holy temple of Badarikasrama during the course of his first pilgrimage which commenced towards the beginning of the eighties of the 15th century and continued till the first two years of the closing decade. According to one biography, Sankara's own compositions of 240 lyrics were consumed by fire, out of which only 34 could be recovered and they are still sung in religious and cultural circles. It is said that at the behest of his guru (Sankara), Madhavdev, an able poet and proficient musician, composed about nine scores of Bargita dealing mostly with 'lilas' of child Krishna. While the greater number of songs of Madhavdeva centre round the childish pranks and naughty behaviour of Krishna, the majority of Sankara's lyrics deal with the futility of the wordly pursuits, fleeting nature of our life and the redeeming power of God's name.

According to the tradition prevalent among the Vaishnavas, the Bargita, as a genre of literature deals with six devotional aspects, viz. lila (sports), paramartha (ultimate reality), virakta (indifference to and detachment from the world) and viraha (sorrow at separation). Songs expressing the aspects of lila are again subdivided into several species, viz., jagarana (awakening), chalana (movement), khelana (sporting), nritya (dancing), chaura (stealing) and chaturi (deception). Lyrics on paramartha and virakti, on the one hand, dwell on the futility of the worldly prusuits, unreality of the earthly existence, evil propensities of the mind due to the influence of the six internal enemies, and on the other, narrate pantheistically the omnipresence and omnipotence of God and His divine attributes and redeeming power. They also extol the virtues of indifference to the pleasures and sorrows of the earthly existence and urge for the cultivation of the sense of detachment. The poets expressing repentance and sorrow for their willing or unwilling enmeshment in the share of the worldly bondage, have completely surrendered to the feet of God for ultimate protection and bliss.

The songs of viraha mainly deal with the sorrows and bewailing of the cowherd maidens (gopis) and Yasoda due to separation from Krishna at his departure from Gokula to Mathura at the bidding of Kamsa. The lyrics of this type are replete with the sense of pathos depicted with nostalgic recapitulation of Krishna's dealing with the womenfolk of Gokula. It may be mentioned in this connection that lyrics depicting viraha and lila mainly centre round the personality of Krishna; only a limited number is devoted to the portryal of Rama and other incarnations. Krishna is considered as the supreme incarnation of the Lord.

Among the varieities of lila songs, those of jagarana are related to the awakening of chjld Krishna by his foster-mother Yasoda in the morning with sweet words, describing the morning beauty and the movement of the inhabitants of Gokula on different errands. The chalana songs vividly describe the daily journey of Krishna, Balarama and other cowherd boys to Brindavana to tend cows in gleeful mood, playing on flutes and pipes accompanied by dance and frolicsome mirth. The songs depicting sports of Krishna with his mates in Brindavana, occasionally arranging picnic on the sandy bed of Yamuna are replete with description of various types of sports in vivid details showing Krishna as the central figure. Some of the Bargitas are exclusively devoted to the portrayal of the mirthful atmosphere of Krishna dancing to the rhythmic clapping of cowherd maidens, being induced by the latter's offerings of sweets, butter and curd. A number of songs are concerned with childish pranks, naughty behaviours, pampered vanity and stealing of butter by Krishna who by his shrewdness, presence of mind and deceptive movements not only befools the cowherd maidens but also puts his mother sometimes in an awkard situation. Madhavdeva, a celibate throughout his life, excels in depicting this naughty aspect of the divine child in relation to his mother and cowherd maidens. Lyrics dealing with the above aspects of child Krishna are classed as songs of 'nritya', 'chaura' and 'chaturi'. Although the poets have not forgotten to remind the readers or the audience of the divine aspect of Krishna, he is mostly treated as a human child with all the naughtiness and sensitiveness of an only and pampered child of a mother.

Each Bargita contains a refrain denoted by the insertion of the word 'dhrum' at the end of the second line, followed by verses called 'padas', narrating a particular incident of Krishna's childhood or any other incarnation. But the Krishnite elements generally predominate. Radha does not play any significant part in the narration of the lyrics. Only one Bargita deals with Rama's exploits. Madhavdeva's Bargitas can be favourably compared with the lyrics of Surdas, and some musicologists equate these devotional songs to 'prabandha sangita' of medieval India.

The tradition of composing lyrics or songs in the style of Bargitas of the two saint-poets easily caught the imagination of the succeeding Vaishnavite poets of the 17th and 18th centuries and as a result several hundreds of lyrics tuned to classical ragas were composed in imitation of the songs of the first two religious poets. Although these later productions fulfil the outward characteristics of Bargitas, they are generally found to be lacking in depth of feeling and sublimity of the real ones. Therefore, they are not accepted as genuine Bargitas.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : H.N. Datta Barua, (ed.) Bargita (Nalbari, 1950); R.M. Nath, (ed.) Bargita (Gauhati, 1943).

S.S.

BARHATH ISARDAS (Rajasthani; b. 1539, d. 1618) was born at village Bhadresa near Badmer in Malani region. He was brought up and educated by his paternal uncle Aasoji, on the death of the child's parents at a very young age. In 1560 Aasoji took him on a pilgrimage to Dwarka. Raval, Jam of Jamnagar was pleased with Isardas's talent and so took him under his patronage. He had an opportunity for studying the classics, especially the Bhagavata, under Pitambar Bhatta, an erudite scholar of the Jam's court. Gradually the devotional aspects of his life developed to a sufficiently advanced stage. In his maturity his fame soon spread all over Saurashtra and Gujarat which brought him plenty of wealth and land grants. Living for about 49 years at Jamnagar he returned to his birthplace, and settled near village Gowdha on the bank of Luni river till his death.

It has been proverbial among the charans to praise him by saying 'Isaraa so parmessraa' (Isardas is a manifestation of the Almighty himself). Pirdan Lala (earlier half of the 18th century) regards him as his 'Bhava Guru' (spiritual preceptor). In his Bhaktamal Nabhadas had also mentioned the name of Isardas among fourteen charana devotees. His contribution to the historical-cum-heroic and pauranic-cum-religious tradition of Charan poetry is very noteworthy. His works are more concerned with heroism and devotion. His comparatively larger works are:–Halah Jalan ra Kundaliya, Harirasa, Gunaras kils, Deviyan, Gasen Purana, Gana Agan Guna Vairat Guna Bhagvant Hamsa, Guna Ninda Stuti and Bal Lila, Harirasa, Apan, Gangavataran. Devotional padas and Dingal gits are some of his smaller works and writings.

It was mainly through Harirasa that Isardas attained fame as a Bhakta (devotee). Numerous Hindi and Gujarati editions of this work have been published. Many later poets were influenced by this work, prominent among whom were Muni Man (Gyanrasa), Veni Ram (Jinarasa), Surajanji (Katha Harigun) and Udoji Adinga (Vishnu Charit).

Halan Jhalana ra Kundaliya is an exquisite work of heroic sentiments. Banidas, Suryamalla Mishran, and several other poets were influenced by him. It can, however, be fairly compared with Kalla Raymalot ra Kundaliya by Asiyo Dudo Amaravata.

His devotional poetry is a noble effort directed towards religious tolerance and harmony. Rising above all religious difference and sectarian view, he has variously described the supreme element, and has stressed the importance of chanting the name of God. An equal importance has been attached also to the Puranas and the Quran. The Harirasa and Deviyan have been held to be the sacred texts of the Vaishnavas and the Saktas, but from the philosophic point of view there seems to be no difference between Hari and Sakti i.e. Devi. Among the Avtar's (Manifestations of divinity) also he has equally depicted the meritorious deeds of all of them in a spirit of deep faith. He has made frequent references to the comparatively more popular incarnations of Rama and Krishna especially that of Krishna. The poet has referred to the formless and the concrete concepts of divinity. He sees no conflict between them and has stated that from the formless (Nirguna) is created the concrete manifestation (Saguna) and not vice versa. The formless pervades the universe under several names and forms.

There are distinct expressions of the intricacies of the devotional aspect of 'yoga', as related to the individual and his 'Sadhana' in his songs. In its totality, the poetry of Isardas is a successful attempt at singing the greatness of God. The poet's dominant note is one of devotion. He does not practise devotion for its own sake, but rather to liberate himself from the cycle of birth and death and to extricate himself from the bond of 'Karma' or action. The predominant influence of the Bhagavata is clearly visible in almost all his religious works.

His poetry carries the accomplishments of free and frank expressions and boundless self confidence. His language is mostly easy. The linguistic style of course differs according to the subject matter which represents a fairly large variety.

Hi.M

BARIBAHARA (Gujarati) is a collection of Gujarati poems by Prahlad Parekh, first published in 1940. Gujarati poetry before 1930 was marked by a strong social consciousness and tendency to follow Gandhian thoughts. Baribahara opened new possibilities for Gujarati poetry. The poems of this collection possess a certain sensuous musicality influenced by Tagorian and old Gujarati Bhajan melodies. The simplicity of compositions and the aesthetic purity of expression which mark this collection, make Prahlad Parekh one of the seminal poets of the language. The poems of this collection abound in fresh images like the striking of the monsoon songbird against the prisonbars, the night offering herself unreservedly into the stretched arms of the sun, etc. But above all, the olfactory sense transforms everything seminally. The poet perceived even the flood of fragrance. Not the idealisation but the intensification of sense perceptions is the prime source of creativity in Baribahara.

C.T.

BARKAKATI, RATNAKANTA (Assamese; b. 1897, d. 1963). After passing the Entrance examination from Nowgong Govt. High school in 1915, Ratnakanta went to Calcutta for higher education. In response to Gandhiji's call for Non-Cooperation in 1921, he left college and returned home against the wishes of his father. After a period of occasional engagement in services, Barkakati finally took to assisting his father in running his affairs as Maujadar, and later took upon himself the responsibility of his father's estate. He died just after presiding over the Asam Sahitya Sabha Session at Nazira, Sibsagar district.

He was a person who would be happier in the company of poets and thinkers than in the world of everyday mundane affairs. The facts that he was of delicate physical health, the eldest son in a prosperous family, and one who had received special attention and care because of the early loss of his mother, must have contributed towards making him a 'misfit' in the practical world of struggles and material success. As against this, he had an easy access to the world of books and magazines that provided him with the kind of mental and spiritual food that his heart most cherished and craved for. As a school student, his intimate friends were Suryakumar Bhuyan, who was also gifted with poetic and literary talents; Mahichandra Bora and Dinanath Medhi, both of them having creative talents; a class-mate Sudhirkumar Raha who might have aroused in Barkakati's adolescent mind the initial interest in Rabindranath Tagore's poetry. Besides, during the formative years of his life, Barkakati felt the impact of three contemporary literary magazines: Usha (edited by Padmanath Gohainbaruah), Bahi (edited by Lakshminath Bezbarua) and Chetana (edited by Ambikagiri Roychoudhury). It was in Usha that most of his poems which were later included in his personal anthology, Sewali, had been published.

His already growing interest in the literary works of the leading personalities in Bengal's Reanaissance, particularly Rabindranath, and also in the philosophical writ- of Vivekananda, was further strengthened during his brief college life in Calcutta. It was here that his patriotic feeling was deepened by hearing the inspiring speeches of Bipinchandra Pal, Chittaranjan Das, Surendranath Banerjee and finally Mahatma Gandhi. At the same time, his personal association with Lakshminath Bezbarua, Krishnakanta Handique, Padmadhar Chaliha and Benudhar Sarma in Calcutta must have filled his heart with a stronger urge to serve the cause of Assamese literature and culture.

Ratnakanta Barkakati's published works are: Alap, Sewali, Chandrahar, Madar, Moina Parijat, Hind Swaraj (an Assamese translation of Gandhiji's work of the same title), Shankar-Sowarani, Upanishadar Saundaryya, Alaka, Sura, Gandhi Sakshat aru An An Prabandha, Puthi Bharal, Tarpan, Sahitya, Our Script Question, Rajnaitik Alochanar Prabandharaji, Sakuntala, an Assamese version of Merchant of Venice (incomplete) and Charai-Chirikatir Vivah Paddhati.

It is chiefly as a lyric poet that Barkakati has made his most memorable contributions towards Assamese literature, even though he has, to his credit, some other miscellaneous writings, particularly some essays on philosophical and literary subjects. His most representative collection of lyrical poems is Sewali (1932) which was followed by two other collections, Tarpan (1953) and Chandrahar (1963). This poet of Sewali-fame is entirely dedicated to the ideals of love and beauty. His ideal beloved is also for him an object of ideal beauty who has absorbed in her all the beauties that this universe has to offer. As a poet of love, he passes through all the varying moods of eager expectations, the thrills of union and the pangs of separation. There is a touch of the mystic and the philosophy of the Upanishads in Barkakati's songs of love and beauty. The joys of human, marital love are combined with the spiritual urge and yearnings of the finite heart for the infinite. Barkakati was inspired not only by Rabindranath Tagore's precept of synthesising Western humanism with Indian spiritual heritage, but also by the latter's example of lyrical expression and metrical harmonies. Ratnakanta will always be remembered for his life-long devotion to the art of letters, his lyrical rendering of the passion of love and the adoration of beauty, and his excellence as a craftsman of verbal music and metrical forms.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Biswanarayan Shastri, (ed.) A Commemorative volume on Ratnakanta Barkakati (in Assamese), Asam Sahitya Sabha, Jorhat (1965).

E.U.

BARKATAKI, PADMA (Assamese; b. 1927) is a prominent novelist and story writer, actively associated with the local press of Assam. Born in the Barkataki family he had school and college education at Jorhat. His first two books, the collections of self-composed poems, are Sapon Dekho Mai (I Dream, 1957) and Suna Priya Mor Parichay (1958). The second collection drew the attention of the critics. But Barkataki is very popular particularly for his novels. His first novel, Manar Darpon (Mirror of the Mind, 1958) portrays the so-called educated middle class society of Shillong while his second novel Khabar Bichari (Looking around for Information, 1959) gives a very good picture of the high-class society of the tea-garden estates. Bicharar Babe (For Judgement, 1961), another novel, is based on the various problems of the so-called urban society. His other novels Jiwan Eshana (Search of Life, 1965), Najvala Dhupar Itikatha (History of the unburnt Sandalwood), Putular Namaskar (Doll's Salute, 1968), Natun Pratiti (New Confidence, 1968), Abibahita Tar Nam (1968), Jiwan Arani (Fire of life, 1969) are all based on Assamese middle class society, his satirical treatment of which is admirable. Two other novels, Dushmantar Chuma (Dushmanta's Kiss, 1970) and Ranga Ranga Rang (Red Colours, 1972) are influenced by the Lokayata Darsana of Deviprasad Chattopadhyaya. His only historical novel, Kono Khed Nai (No Regrets, 1963) is based on the life of Phuleswari Kuwari, queen of Ahom king Sivasingha.

Barkataki is considered to be a powerful writer for his prose style and selection of subject matter and treatment of characters in the novels. His short stories are still scattered in the magazines and journals like Asamiya, Dainik Asam, Asam Bani, Purbakash, Amar Pratinidhi, Ramdhenu, Awahan (New), Prakash, etc.

Sa.G.

BARKHURDAR, HAFIZ (Punjabi) was a resident of Pargana Cheema Chatha of Lahore region. He has mentioned the name of his village in his Kissa Mirza Sahiban. Maulvi Dil Pazir has made a mention of two Hafiz Barkhurdars in his Kissa Yusaf Zulaikha. Mian Muhammad says the same thing in his poem Saif-ul-Muluk. Mian Ahmad Yar follows suit in his Kissa Yusaf. Zulaikha. About Hafiz Barkhurdar of village Musalmani, Maula Bakhsh Kushta writes that he was born in the time of Shah Jahan and became famous as a poet in the time of Aurangzeb.

He wrote four Kissas: Yusaf Zulaikha, Sassi Punnu, Mirza Sahiban and Kissa Khetri. His Mirza Sahiban was composed in the form of Sad on the model of the Kissa of the same name by Peelu. He has acknowledged this indebtedness to Peelu. In Sassi Punnu there is brevity in his narration. Yusaf Zulaikha bears evidence to his learning. This Kissa was composed at the bidding of Nawab Jafar Khan in 1676. The poet borrowed several similies and metaphors from Persian. In Kissa Khetri, the poet has depicted the world as a kheti (field), where one reaps the harvest of one's actions.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: S.S. Kohli, (ed.), Punjabi Sahit da Itihas, Volume II, Chandigarh, 1967; S.S. Kohli, (ed.), Punjabi Sahit Kosh, Vol. II, 1976.

S.S. K.

BARMA, JNANINDRA (Oriya; b. 1916) is a well known Oriya poet, novelist and translator. He was born in a moderately rich zamindar family, but was deprived of college education. In the beginning of his literary career he was closely associated with two well-known periodicals of the time, Arati and Samkha. He was also the editor of the now defunct story magazine Mausumu, and of the Utkala Sahitya when it was revived in 1973. Presently he is the News Editor of the News of the World, the prominent English daily published from Orissa.

A versatile writer, he has about 40 titles to his credit, which include poems, poetic dramas, novels, and Oriya translations of several European and American classics. His early poetry covering almost a quarter of a century (1940-64) is very much in the romantic tradition. It is descriptive and lyrical and depicts the themes of love, nature and human sorrow. The poems like 'Krishaka Balika', 'Byathita Asadha' and 'Kalarei Phula' belong to this category. In 'Krishaka Balika' the poet gives a sympathetic portrayal of a village girl who on a rainy evening visits her neighbour to borrow some rice, as her family is hungry. Elsewhere his romantic sensibility revolts against social iniquities and contradictions. He is out to destroy the decrepit social order and invokes and celebrates the spirit of destruction embodied in the mythical character Hiranyakasipu. In another poem he looks upon Lord Jagannath as a hypocritical god and desires the demolition of the famous temple at Puri.

However, with Renasar O Dikadensara Epik (Epic of Renaissance and Decadence, 1964) his poetry takes a different turn. This long poem is highly experimental in its style; it abandons traditional metre and evolves a free-verse form; its diction is a queer mixture of the colloquial and the learned. The central situation is taken from childhood memory: a young village boy escorting his girl friend to see a 'yatra' performance. As the adult speaker ruminates over the experience, many scenes of country life pass across his vision. He is not able to grasp their meaning. Most of the people he remembers are either dead by now or have left the village in search of a livelihood in the city. Thus his consciousness blends personal memory with general history. This is a poem about the loss of beauty and meaning in life. At times it is eccentric, and lacks orderly organisation of its material.

His Ebam Brihannala O Chandrara Fasil (A Brihannala and the fossil of the moon, 1967) contains two long poems. 'Chandrara Fasil' repeats the theme of Renasar Epik in terms of a story from the Arabian Nights. 'Ebam Brihannala' is an ironical comment on contemporary life, its moral and spiritual decay.

Among his novels Bhumika (Preface, 1954), a realistic study of life in rural Orissa, deserves special mention for its close critical analysis of human problems, its psychological insight, and moral fervour. His Aranyara Kujjhatika (Mists of the Forest, 1973) is based on the life of the renowned Oriya painter, the late Bimbadhara Barma.

FURTHER WORKS: Poetry: Sana Dinara Kavita (1940), Swarnayugara Sandhya (Evening of the golden Age, 1957), Charbakara Charyapada (Meditations of Charbak, 1971). Novels : Satabdira Swapnabhanga (Disillusionment of the Century, 1944), Aparahnara Akasa (Sky of the Afternoon, 1966), Elorara Chayabithi (Shady Groves of Ellora, 1966). Oriya translations : Podabhui O Anyanya Kavita (The Waste Land and Other Poems, 1957), Durbadala (Leaves of Grass, 1957); Neela Bihanga (The Blue Bird, 1962), Nana (1963).

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Mayadhara Mansingh, Odia Sahityara Itihasa (Cuttack, 1976)., Pathani Patnaik, Odia Upanyasa Parichaya (Cuttack, 1966).

Sau.M.

BARMASA (Gujarati) literally means twelve months. The poem in which changing beauty of nature is described month by month, covering all the seasons of the year is called Barmasa. The description starts sometimes from the month of Kartik, the first month of the year according to Gujarati calendar, or Chaitra, the beginning of the spring. Special features of all the seasons, winter, spring, summer, rainy season, autumn are described, which include besides the beauty of nature, the changing living habits of the people to adjust with the changes in the atmosphere. This description is sometimes short, while in some Barmasa it is in detail. Though the poem describes the beauty of nature Barmasa is not purely a nature poem. Against the background of the beauty of nature its effect on the mind of the lady-love whose lover is away is delineated. Pangs of separation become more and more intense month by month and reach the climax at the end of the twelth month, or at the end of the thirteenth month when there is an additional month according to lunar calender. When the agony becomes unbearable, and the heroine is on the point of committing suicide the lover makes a dramatic appearance and the poem ends with a happy note, describing the love sport of the lovers. Usually the heroine of the poem is a charactar from Hindu mythology like Radha (beloved of Krishna), Parvati (beloved of Lord Siva) or Sita (wife of Rama). Though the characters are divine, human emotions are forcefully depicted through them.

In Jaina Barmasas, however, at the end of the poems, the lovers do not unite, as the lover who is mostly Neminath, a character from Jain mythology, while going in a wedding procession, sees the animals collected for slaughter for a wedding feast renounces the world. Rajemati the bride waits for him month after month and after learning about Neminath's renunciation she also renounces the world.

In Barmasas of Shakti literature the devotee pines for a glimpse of mother goddess, his agony increases month after month and at the end of the twelth month, the devotee has a glimpse of mother goddess.

In Barmasa of non-devotional sect, the hero pines for the union of his individual self with the universal self, and after pining for twelve months at the end he merges with the universal self.

C.M.

BARQ, JWALA PRASAD (Urdu ; b. 1863, d. 1911) did his Entrance (Matriculation) from Kheri and his B.A.,

LL.B. in 1885 from Canning College, Lucknow. He joined the judicial service of Uttar Pradesh as Munsif and rose to become a Sessions Judge.

A gifted poet and a brilliant prose stylist, he was a votary of prose style adopted by Rattan Nath 'Sarshar' in his renowned prose work Fasana-e-Azad. His poetic work Masnavi-e-Bahar is an important addition to Urdu poetry with the rare distinction of having won praise from no less a dignitary than Sir Syed Ahmed Khan. The work abounds not only in the reflective nature of its thematic contents but is also unique in the colourful depiction of the beauty of the spring season.

His prose works are mainly translations of several novels of Bankimchandra Chatterjee. These writings going by the titles : Bangali Dulhan, Pratap, Rohini, Mrinalini and Maar-e-Aasteen reached transcreative heights of original endeavours enriching Urdu literature. He also translated some dramas of Shakespeare into Urdu. None of these could, however, be published.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Agha Muhammad Baqir, Tarikh-e-Nazm-o-Nasr-e-Urdu (History of Urdu poetry and prose), Lahore, 1938.

Ra.R.

BARRISTER PARVATISAM (Telugu). Coming from the pen of a noted humourist, Mokkapati Narasimha Sastry (1892-1973), Barrister Parvatism has become a modern classic of Telugu Literature. Published first in 1925, it still holds its readers in thrall. In 1971, two more parts were added to it as a sequel. In this trilogy, the author traces the growth of an unsophisticated Andhra youth, Vemuri Parvatisam, a native of Mogaliturru Narsapur in Andhra Pradesh. The story takes place in Andhra Pradesh and England around the First World War. The first part describing the journey of Parvatisam from Nidadavolu to Edinburgh is full of humour of the Dickensian type. Parvatisam, born in a wealthy, orthodox Brahmin family, gives up his education at secondary level and turns to socio-political activities under the inspiration of a patriotic lawyer of local reputation, who advises him to go to England to study law so that he may hoist the Englishman with his own petard. As his parents would not accept the proposal, he raises a secret loan and makes good his escape. Owing to his lack of experience and inadequate English, he makes a number of mistakes on his way to England which tickle us to laughter. His vain attempt to stop the train by shouting through the window of the train, the way he buys a lady's hat and his unsuccessful efforts to get rid of it, his wrangle with the gate-keeper at Thomas Cook and Sons at Colombo, his behaviour at the table on board the ship, etc. are occasions for laughter. The first book ends on his arrival in England.

In part II, Parvatisam's adventures in England and Scotland are described. Here the young, orthodox Hindu Brahmin youth who is a total stranger to the ways of the new world is confronted with a highly sophisticated Western civilization. His inability to adjust himself at once to the changed conditions of life and values is the prime source of amusement and laughter. His behaviour at an at-home party in an Edinburgh household is a memorable event. But as time passes, he loses his innocence. His behaviour becomes normal. He is no longer a butt of ridicule. On the other hand, he himself has fun at the expense of his land lady and her daughters. His practical joke about his innocent Andhra friend on receipt of the news of his girl-wife who attains puberty is in the nature of a farce. In spite of such episodes, we must admit that there is a general decline of humour in this part. The third part wherein Parvatisam is shown as a young barrister eager to build a prosperous career for himself, first in Madras and then in Andhra, after his marriage to an accomplished girl of his choice, is like a period-piece. Events in the life of the hero are etched against the background of National Movement under the leadership of Mahatma Gandhi. The hero plunges headlong into national politics and ultimately lands in a jail. On release, he gives up his profession in utter disgust and takes to the path of social service. Humour in this part is limited to a few jokes introduced rather artificially in the narrative. It will be no wonder if the readers are disappointed with the third part. However, it gives a graphic picture of the society in transition under the impact of British rule and Congress culture. The novel occupies a high position in the humorous literature of Telugu. Its humour is without malice. Therein lies its excellence.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Mutnuru Sangamesam, Telugu Hasyamu, Tirupati, 1954. Pullabhatla Venkateswarly , Telugu Navala Vikasamu, Vijayawada, 1974.

G.Sr.

BARTHAKUR, INDRESWAR (Assamese; b. 1887, d. 1960) is called the Natyacharya (teacher of dramatic art) because of his eminence as dramatist and actor. He was also a poet, a painter, a sculptor and an educationist. He wrote in blank verse a mythological drama, Sribatsa-Chinta (1927), the story of which was taken from the Mahabharata. Although mythological in nature and theme, the play revealed some features of the contemporary Assamese society through some characters. The play though not successful on the stage bears excelllent literary quality. The other unpublished dramas of Barthakur are Simhasan (The Throne), Daksa and Biswamitra. His Chrysanthemum is a collection of seventy poems on various themes. Ranjeuti (The Glory of War, 1955) is another poem based on the story of the Kurukshetra war. The anthology of his critical writings is entitled Saptaparna (Seven Leaves, 1955).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Harichandra Bhattacharya, Asamiya Natya Sahityar Jilingani, Gauhati, 1970; Satyendranath Sarma, Asamiya Natya Sahitya, Gauhati, 1973.

H.S.

BARTHWAL, PITAMBAR DUTT (Hindi; b. 1901, d. 1944). A scholar and researcher, he was born at village Pali of Garhwal district. His father Pandit Gauri Shankar was a scholar of Sanskrit. Pitamber Dutt after his double M.A. taught first at Benaras and later at Lucknow universities. He was the first D. Litt. in Hindi from the Benaras Hindu University. The subject of his D. Litt. thesis was Hindi Kavya-mein Nirgun Sampradaya (Nirgun Sect in Hindi poetry). His thesis is regarded to be the first major research work on Hindi Literature in Indian universities. It is upto-date the most authentic work on the subject.

Barthwal had written nearly thirty essays published in literary magazines from time to time. In Gorakh Bani, he had described the life and works of Guru Gorakh Nath. He had an important place among those who put the foundation stone of literary research in Hindi. He was one of the foremost writers to draw the attention of the Hindi scholars to the study of old Hindi and apabhramsha literature. His work on 'Nath Sampradaya' is remarkable for the profundity of its treatment.

FURTHER WORKS : Pranayam Vidya aur Kala (Science and Art of Meditation)-1922. Dhyan se Chikitsa (Treatment by Meditation, 1924). Gorakh Bani (Speech of Gorakh); Ram Chandrika (ed.), Kabir Granthavali (ed.).

Sa.C.

BARUA, AMULYA (Assamese; b. 1922, d. 1946) was a modern Assamese poet. With a brilliant academic career he passed his B.A. from J.B. College, Jorhat in 1945 and then went to Calcutta for doing M.A. in English. But he was brutally murdered by communal rioters on August 18, 1946 in Calcutta. His writings, seized from the hostel by the Police, could not also be recovered. He is one of the pioneer poets who had introduced the anti-romantic and realistic trend in the Assamese poetry. The influence of Marx is evident in his writings. A collection of his forty-one poems-Achina (The unknown, 1964) contains his epoch-making poems–Besya, Koyla, Kukur, Andhar-ar Hahakar and Biplavi.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Debesvar Saikia, (ed.) Amulya Barua : Parichay aru Pratibha (Jorhat, 1977).

Pu.S.

BARUA, ANANDACHANDRA (Assamese; b. 1907, d. 1983) was an eminent poet and playwright. Remarkably simple in his ways of living he was popularly known as the Bakulbanar Kavi (The poet of the Bakulban). He was given the Sahitya Akademi Award of 1977 for his Bakulbanar Kavita (The poems of Bakulban, 1976), a collection of one hundred poems, written at different times between 1931-1971. In most of the poems the poet records through introspection his emotional excitements at the sights, sounds, colours and smells of the earth and his spiritual hankerings after the mysteries behind the terrestrial life and the Universe. In this context special mention can be made of poems–Prithivir Preme Mok Devalia Karile, Jivan, Basanta Bahar. Priya Aru Kavita, Svapna Yatra, Rupar Nao, Bhitar Chara, Jivan Samasya, Bisvarupa, Kandari, Raba, Alap Apeksa Kara and Punya Prabhat. It also contains a few other poems that express the poet's genuine love for his motherland and mother-tongue, and a few eulogies on the worthy sons of India.

Earlier, his Hafizar Sur (The Tune of Hafiz, 1933) and Kumarsambhaba as the Assamese renderings of Sufi poetry and Kalidasa's epic respectively endeared him to the Assamese readers. His other published collections of poems are : Parag, Pushpak, Ranjan-Rasmi, Soviet Kavita (An Assamese translation of poems by several Russian poets) and Paparir Parimal (A poetic reply to his dear departed poet-friend Ganes Gogoi's Papari).

He has also made his mark as a playwright. His plays Bisarjan (1933) and Nal-Damayanti (1934) are based on epic and religious themes. The theme of the former is the abandonment of Laksmana by Ramachandra, a tragic tale from the Ramayana, while that of the latter is taken from the Purana and it deals with tragic sufferings of king Nala of Nisadha at the anger of God Kali. His Kamata Kunwari (1949) is a historical play, dealing with the fall of the kingdom of Kamatapura during the reign of king Nilambar. Another play of his, Bijaya (1932) deals with a tragic theme culled from an article–'Romeo and Juliet in the Spanish Literature' by the erudite Assamese scholar Krishnakanta Handique.

He was elected President of the Asam Sahitya Sabha in 1969.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Nanda Talukdar, Chira Chenehi Mor Bhasa Janani (Gauhati, 1976); Satyendranath Sarma, Asamiya Natya Sahitya (Gauhati, 1973).

Pu.S.

BARUA, ATULCHANDRA (Assamese; b. 1916) graduated in Arts from Cotton College, Gauhati, in 1940. For some time he worked as a teacher in Kamrup Academy, Gauhati, and then joined the clerical service in the Assam Secretariat. Urged by an unabated zeal for higher education, Barua took the M.A. examination in Assamese under Calcutta University as a private candidate in 1944.

This was followed by some years of service as a Lecturer in St. Mary's and St. Edmund's College, Shillong. In 1949, Barua qualified for the Assam Civil Service and was appointed a Sub-Deputy Collector. In 1974, he retired from service as the Additional Deputy Commissioner, Kamrup district. Barua was offered a literary pension in 1976.

Barua's literary career had its early beginnings when he was a High School student and edited a hand-written fortnightly, Bina. His substantial contributions to the cause of Assamese literature and culture may be studied under two heads–as an organiser of literary-cultural organisations and as a litterateur.

His first venture was the establishment of a Pragati Samiti and guiding it as the Assistant Secretary when he was a student of Cotton College in 1938. During his service career, he founded the Shillong Mukul Sabha in 1945. This literary club is still very much alive and has to its credit several literary publications like Mukul Prakash, Himalayar Ahban, etc. edited by Barua himself. His other achievement is Rangia Alochani Sabha which had the credit of publishing the book Atit aru Bartaman edited by Atulchandra. In 1955, while serving as a civil servant at Gauhati, he founded another literary study circle–Guwahati Alochana Chakra.

As a writer, Atulchandra Barua is better known for his literary studies and criticism–mostly on the academic line. In creative literature, his only works are in the capacity of an entertaining narrator of stories as in Ulat-Palat–a collection of humorous sketches and stories meant for children. Other works of this nature are Khelimeli Sandhiyar Sadhu, etc.

Barua's works on literary studies and criticism include Sahityar Ruprekha (1957), a collection of essays dealing with the basic conceptions of literature and its various genres in a lucid manner ; Samalochana Sahitya (1958)–an anthology of critical essays on the function and modes of literary criticism both in the Western and the Indian traditions, together with a few pieces of applied criticism evaluating selected classics of neo-Vaishnavite Assamese literature and some modern works ; Sahitya-Dristi–another collection of essays on literary subjects ; Asamiya Kavyat Premar Buwati Suti–a historical analysis and treatise on the tradition of love poetry in Assamese; Chhandasilpi Bholanath Das—a critical assessment of Bholanath Das's achievements in the art of poetry and handling of blank verse ; Asamiya Abhidhan aru Bhasa–a thoughtful discussion of lexicography in Assamese, and Manasa Kavya aru Ojapali.

Barua has also been an able, diligent and discerning editor of a number of anthologies like Kavya Prabha–a historically arranged selection of Assamese works of poetry ; Bholanath Das Rachanavali–a compilation of the works of poet Bholanath Das, a pioneer in the use of blank verse and the lyrical mode. He has edited as many as nine volumes comprising works both in prose and in verse.

Atulchandra Barua has also written some biographical studies ; these are Bagmineta Deshabhakta Phukan bringing out the oratorical power of the Assamese freedom fighter and patriot Tarunram Phukan, and Saratchandra Goswami.

Besides, Barua has also contributed various other miscellaneous prose works : these include a few religious treatises such as Lokadevata Siva and Nabi Katha ; two interesting and pioneering studies on the art of love in the context of life and literature, a few works of folklore like Bhumi aru Jivan, Dake Bole Suna Upaya and retelling of stories in collections like Galpa Bharati, Maj Nisar Sadhu, etc.

His literary contributions were accorded wide recognition when he was elected President of the Asam Sahitya Sabha in 1979.

E.U.

BARUA, BHABEN (Assamese ; b. 1940) graduated with Honours in English from Scottish Church College, Calcutta. Before obtaining his post-graduate degree in English in 1963 from the Delhi University, he had a year's (1960-61) professional experience as school teacher at Jorhat and another one and a half years' (1961-1962) experience in the news section of Akashvani, Delhi. After completing his post-graduate studies, he joined the English Department of the Punjab University as a Lecturer for some time, and latèr, in 1964 joined the Department of English Teaching, Gauhati University. A few years later, he joined the Department of English, Gauhati University as a regular teacher.

Bhaben Barua began his literary career early in life as a school boy when his first collection of poems, Natun Prithivi (The New World) was published in 1953. The poems carried the impress of adolescent fancy and revolutionary zeal.

It was during the sixties that Bhaben Barua attained a distinct individuality and maturity as a poet. The phase of Barua's poetic creations is adequately represented by his personal anthology, Sonali Jahaj (The golden Vessel) which was published in 1977. Barua's creative power in the realm of post-Second World War Assamese poetry was widely recognized when he became the co-winner of the Publication Board Award in 1978 and the winner of the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1979 for this collection of poems.

The poems comprising Barua's award-winning Sonali Jahaj have been arranged under six different sections–each section bound by the connecting thread of a major theme such as art in relation to life, the varied and ever-changing mysterious aspects of nature, the relations of love between man and woman, life and death as seen against the back-drop of the eternal flow of Time and the vast cosmos, the disturbing questions of values and significance in human life, man as a social and historical entity with his sufferings and dreams, etc. Read as a whole, these thematic variations, again, compose a kind of over-all, inter-related thematic unity, suggesting an orchestrated vision of life, art and the universe. Using the symbolist technique of multiple suggestivity, Bhaben seeks to express in this volume his version of the variety and multiplicity of life as opposed to any strait-laced, dogmatic view of it.

His critical essays, reviews and analyses cover various branches of literature, such as poetry, drama, novel and short story. In poetry, his most notable contributions are searching analyses of a number of poetically successful and significant pieces by such older generation of Assamese romantic poets as Chandrakumar Agarwalla and Ambikagiri Roychoudhury as also those by a few senior modern poets such as Navakanta Barua, Mahim Bora, Homen Bargohain, Nilmani Phukan, Hiren Bhattacharyya and Nirmalprabha Bardoloi. As a critic of Assamese poetry, Bhaben Barua's role has been that of a revaluer of past achievements as well as a discoverer of new talents.

Bhaben Barua has also offered a few illuminating critical essays on the novels of Birinchikumar Barua (writing under the pseudonyms of Bina Barua and Rasna Barua), Birendrakumar Bhattacharyya and Homen Borgohain ; on Jyotiprasad Agarwalla's drama Lobhita and Arun Sarma's modern dramatic pieces ; and on the short stories of Lakshminath Bezbarua, Saurabhkumar Chaliha, Bhabendranath Saikia and Mahim Bora.

In addition, Barua has also applied his sharply critical mind to socio-philosophical and cultural subjects.

Besides his contributions as a poet-critic, Bhaben Barua has also distinguished himself by his serious, highly discriminating approaches to art and life and his sense of variety in his role as Editor of The Assam Quarterly and The Assam Academy Review (1967-1970), Samlap (1971-1973) and the Research Journal of the Arts Section of the Gauhati University.

E.U.

BARUA, BINANDACHANDRA: (Assamese; b. 1901, d. 1982) was a noted nationalist poet and a playwright of Assam. Popularly known as Dhvani Kavi (the poet of Sonority) he took to the teaching profession after his graduation with Honours in History from Cotton College in 1925 and retired as the Headmaster of Jangi High School. He contributed to three collections of Assamese poems: Shankhadhvani (The Clarion Call, 1925), Pratidhvani (The Echo, 1938) and Jayadhvani (The Joyous Call, 1974). The first two of the series established him as a poet of strong nationalism in the heyday of the British colonial rule in India, particularly at a time when the Indian Nationalist Movement under the leadership of Mahatma Gandhi was gaining momentum all over the country. As a proud Assamese he paints a picture of the glorious and independent Assam, particularly under the Ahoms. The highly popular poems of Shankhadhvani are: 'Shmashan', 'Saraighat' and 'Mogaldutar Prati Lachit' and those of Pratidhvani are: 'Rangpur', 'Gargaon', 'Rangamua Bir', 'Agiathutir Bir', 'Najana Birar Mur', and 'Dhvanya Saraighat'. Of these poems of the latter the first two have won the hearts of the Assamese people not only for their superb patriotic tone, but also for a racy style and a sonorous rhyme. Through all the poems mentioned above the poet laments at the setting of the sun of the glory of Assam and expresses his severe shock at the stark realities of the present. He also appeals to the patriotic hearts to restore the lost glory with renewed vigour and united efforts. The poet's profound sense of the past glory of Assam originating from her soil, merges into the broad Indian nationalism. And it becomes crystal clear through three poems: 'Bharat Garima' and 'Bharat' of Shankhadhvani and 'Bharatabarsha' of Pratidhvani. In these poems the poet sings the glory of India that has been the seat of wisdom and culture since the time of the Vedas and the Upanishads.

His contributions to the domain of Assamese drama are: Parthasarathi, Saraighat and Srikshetra of the serious type. His contributions to children's literature are: Maharaj Naranarayan, Rajasthanar Galpa, Amar Lakshminath and Asam Gaurab.

He was elected President of the Asam Sahitya Sabha in 1966.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Birinchikumar Barua, History of Assamese Literature (Sahitya Akademi, 1964); Jatindranath Duvara, Preface to the Pratidhvani (Jorhat, 1949); Nanda Talukdar, Chira Chenehi Mor Bhasha Janani (Gauhati, 1976).

Pu.S.

BARUA, BIRINCHIKUMAR (pen-names Bina Barua, Rasna Barua; Assamese; b. 1910, d. 1964) was a novelist, short story writer and critic. Educated in Gauhati and Calcutta, he started his career as a teacher in Assamese department, Gauhati University and worked there from 1953 till his death. He has to his credit two novels, two collections of short stories, and a good number of critical books. His first novel, Jivanar Batat (On the Highway of Life, 1944) portrays all the phases of the Assamese rural life and is a significant contribution to Assamese novel. Although its narrative technique is conventional, the novel is noted for its vivid description, humanistic appeal, fine characterisation and lucid expression. In his second novel, Seuji Patar Kahini (Story of Green Leaves, 1951) written under the pseudonym, Rasna Barua, he has depicted the life and society of tea-garden labourers with insight. Of his two collections of short stories, the first, Pat Paribartan (1948) contains stories which mostly deal with the sentimental love-affairs of the college girls and the second, Aghonibai (1950) contains vivid portraits of rural life. His critical works include Kavya aru Abhivyanjana (1941), Assamese Literature (1941), Asamiya Katha Sahitya (1953), Asamiya Bhasha aru Samskriti (1957), Modern Assamese Literature (1959), Asamar Loka Samskriti (1961) (which was given Sahitya Akademi Award) and A Cultural History of Assam. Kavya aru Abhivyanjana, a treatise on literary criticism, is written under the influence of Benedetto Croce. In his other critical works, Barua has enquired into the various aspects of Assamese life, language, literature and culture. He has also edited some rare books, like Ankiyanat and Mahamoha-Kavya. Barua was, however, more at ease in his creative writings which include, besides his novels and short stories, one-act plays and some travel memoirs. The one-act piece, Abelar Nat (Drama of half a Day, 1955) that deals with the conflict of ideals between the old and the new is one of the earliest of this genre. His Switzerland Bhraman (1948) and Professor Baruar Chithi (Letters from Professor Barua, 1968) based on the experiences of his visit to Switzerland and America respectively, are as fascinating as his novels.

S.B.

BARUA, CHANDRADHAR (Assamese; b. 1874, d. 1961) was an eminent Assamese dramatist. He passed the pleadership examination in 1900 and joined the Bar. In 1910 he took to tea-cultivation. Barua was closely associated with social and literary activities. He presided over the second Annual Conference of Asam Sahitya Sabha in 1918 and joined the Round Table Conference twice in London as a state delegate from Assam.

Since his student days, Barua devoted himself to Assamese literature whole-heartedly. His first drama Meghnad-Badh (Killing of Meghanad, 1904) was written in blank verse. The play may be called a milestone in the development of mythological drama in Assamese because a good number of Assamese mythological plays has been written in the technique of this play. Barua's other mythological plays are Tilottama Sambhav (The Birth of Tilottama, 1924), Rajarshi (The Saint-king, 1937) and Punarjanma (Rebirth, posthumously published in 1975). His serio-comic play Bhagya Pariksha (Trial of Fortune, 1915), admittedly a borrowed plot from a tale of the Arabian Nights, is adopted to suit the Assamese society. Biva-Biloi (Misery in Marriage 1975) is a socio-comic play. Barua wrote two historical plays, viz, Mogal Bijay (Victory over the Mughal, 1975). and Asam Sandhya (Decline of the Ahoms, 1975). Besides, he has to his credit a collection of satiric and other poems called Ranjan (Delighting, 1927), two Kavyas, viz. Bidyut Bikash (A Flash of Lightning, 1962) and Britrasur Badh (Slaying of the demon Vritra, 1962), one social novel Shanti (Peace, 1975) and a good number of songs, essays, presidential addresses and travel memoirs. However, he is accepted as a pioneer in respect of using blank verse in Assamese drama.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Harichandra Bhattacharya, Asamiya Natya Sahityar Jilingani (Gauhati, 1970); Satyendranath Sharma, Assmiya Natya Sahitya (Gauhati, 1973).

H.S.

BARUA, DEVAKANTA (Assamese; b. 1914). In Assamese poetry Devakanta Barua is notable as a modern Assamese poet even though he has given us only a small number of poems. Most of his poems were products of the period preceding the outbreak of the second World War and most of these were published in the Awahan, the premier Assamese magazine. The collection of his poems Sagar Dekhicha however was published only in the year 1948.

Devakanta could give a new taste of realistic poems in place of poems of loose form and escapist romantic exuberance. He used diverse metres for his poems. Over and above, Devakanta followed the technique of dramatic monologue in his poetry made popular by Robert Browning, the English poet. With polished and appropriate words this dramatic mode of expression could bring a new thrill to the Assamese reader.

The emotion of the poet, who seeks refuge in the love of a woman, has been manifested in Sagar Dekhicha. From this point of view, this is in line with the romantic poetry. Along with it, the poet's lack of faith in the traditional values and his analytical approach have found expression. The conflicts and doubts, and consciousness of modern mind are reflected again and again in the poems of Devakanta Barua. The new wave of western realism propagated mainly by T.S. Eliot, subtly woven with romantic love, have found expression in Sagar Dekhicha. From all these points of view he seems to be a poet at the cross roads.

Devakanta wanted to take refuge in love. But love appeared to be a temporary shelter for the tired poet. Love, it seems, has only been a short-lived peace for him when there is death all around. For him, love has the hues of the rainbow. It brings joy to us and dispels the darkness of our pain-stricken lives.

In his imagination love provided the eternal shelter and his earthly absorption in love has been printed in the poems like 'Olag', 'Drishti-Srishti', 'Ranga Eti Karabir Phul'. In the poem 'Manorama' the physical beauty of the poet's beloved has been described very passionately. He, however, announces in the poems like 'Premer Uttar' and 'Kalang Parat Majnisha' that his love is entwined with earthly desire, and he is not afraid of the traditional sins.

What is further observed is that he has boldly announded in almost all his poems the easy victory of destiny and defeat of ever-fighting human being. He has sharply discarded the age-long tradition in the poems like 'Devadasi', 'Prithivir Aprakash' and 'Asarthak'. In the poem 'Lachit Barphukan' Devakanta has narrated the moral degradation of Assamese people in a satirical way and has given a call to be inspired with a patriotic zeal.

In poems like 'Ami Duvar Mukali Karo' and 'Eti Prarthana' the lost faith of modern man, their false rush for gold and their hesitation found expression. 'Mor Desh Manohar Desh' was a poem, written against the background of the chinese aggression of India in 1962. In this poem he has issued a call to the people for protection of India's independence.

Devakanta continued to be in active politics since the period preceding India's attainment of independence. Formerly he was a believer in socialism but a few years after independence he joined the Indian National Congress. First he was the speaker of Assam Legislative Assembly and also for a certain period he was the education minister of Assam. Then he became the Governor of Bihar and later India's Minister for Petroleum. He was also elected the President of the Indian National Congress.

He was the editor of two daily papers namely Asamiya and Natun Asamiya for a period before he entered national politics.

Ni.B.

BARUA, DURGAPRASAD MAZINDAR (Assamese; b. 1865, d. 1928) was born near Nalbari in the district of Kamrup. His parents came to settle in Sibsagar. He began his career as a school teacher but subsequently took up trading in timber. Being a young man with independent cast of mind he was not attracted to jobs under the government. He came in contact with Mahatma Gandhi when he visited Assam for the first time in 1921 and remained a Gandhite till his death in 1928. He was a keen homeopath and wrote a few books on the subject and also on naturopathy for the good of the rural people specially. He served the Sibsagar Local Board for a number of years, as member and subsequently also as Chairman.

He was actively connected with the stage and was a very successful actor. He wrote two farcical comedies, Mahari (1893) and Negro (1896). Mahari represents a rather seamy side of life in a tea-garden in Assam in those days. The farce consists of a number of scenes centring round Mr. Fox, a tea garden manager and Mukari, a woman from the low stratum of the society, whom the exile-European kept as a mistress, a practice not uncommon in those days. A few scenes hold up a young man with a ridiculous knowledge of English but bent upon securing a job in a tea establishment. Negro represents an anglicised Hindu. Neither of the two pieces has anything of plot or character. Both are valuable, however, as satirical pieces showing aspects of the Assamese society affected by the western impact. Brishaketu (1899) and Gurudakshina (1901) are dramas on mythological subjects drawn from epics and puranas–a tradition already created by Vaishnavite poets. In both the plays the central characters are boys. For children also Durgaprasad wrote smooth, memorable verses. His verse compositions collected in Ujukavita (1895) please before they instruct. Some of the poems are even now selected for inclusion in text-books for children. Under his guidance, a monthly journal for ladies was published and it continued for some years.

An enthusiastic member of the Jonaki group of litterateurs, Durgaprasad is remembered as a pioneer in stage craft and drama and for his contribution to juvenile literature. His farcical comedy Mahari is still fresh and popular on the stage. He wrote another satirical playlet Kaliyug in collaboration with Benudhar Rajkhowa, a contemporary man of letters.

Ni.B.

BARUA, GUNABHIRAM (Assamese; b. 1837, d. 1894) was the first dramatist of the modern Assamese literature. He studied Law in Calcutta and thereafter became an Extra Assistant Commissioner. Though a Brahmin, he embraced the liberal Brahmo religious faith. After the death of his first wife he married a Brahmin widow, Bishnupriya, in 1870. He retired from Government service in 1890 and permanently settled in Calcutta.

Gunabhiram began his literary career in the journal Orunodoi. His first drama Ram-Navami is the first play in modern Assamese. Barua published an Assamese journal called Asam Bandhu (The Friend of Assam, 1885-86) and a social play named Bibaha Rahasya (The Mystery of Marriage, 1886). The purpose of the play was to delineate the character of the opium–addict Assamese people, but the play was not completely published. The first Assamese biography was also written by him. Anandaram Dhekial Phukanar Jiwan Charit (The biography of Anandaram Dhekial Phukan, 1880) describes in a lucid language the events of Dhekial Phukan's life. Another important work of his was Asam Buranji (History of Assam, 1884 from its early days to the emergence of the British rule in Assam). The book is also valuable for its prose style. Kathin Shabdar Rahasya Byakhya (The explanation of the mystery of difficult words, 1912) is a work of pure humour. His journal Asam Bandhu inspired some people to cultivate literary taste. He also holds a unique place as a writer of serious essays. He was one of the pioneers of modern Assamese literature in the 19th Century.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Jatindramohan Bhattacharya, (ed.), Ram-Navami, (Gauhati, 1965).

H.S.

BARUA, HEM (Assamese; b. 1915, d. 1977) was a versatile man who made his presence equally felt in the worlds of politics, literature and education. An M.A. in English, he was a very powerful orator. He started his career as a college teacher and became ultimately the Principal of the B. Barooah College, Gauhati and remained there for a long period of time (1945-1967). So he was popularly known as 'Principal Hem Barua.' But the Principal was also a very powerful politician, and he was an M.P. from Assam to the Lok Sabha, elected consecutively in three general elections (1957, 1962 & 1967). The powerful politician was also a powerful writer both in Assamese and English. The genres in which he made his marks are–the modern Assamese poetry, Assamese travelogue, Assamese literary criticism and other writings.

Hem Barua began his poetic career as the most promising modern poet in Assamese. He was a pioneer of the school of modern poetry, which primarily aims at the emancipation of man from age-old socio-political exploitations and taboos. Though a clear-cut philosophy of life does not emerge from his poetry, he is a trend-setter in technique and ideas. The collections of his poetry are Balichanda (1959) and Man Mayuri (1965). From a poet who turned a critic, we have a series of critical works in literary prose: Adhunik Sahitya (1948), San Mihali (1958), Cupid Aru Psyche (1959), Kannaki (1960), Ei Git (1961), Sahitya Aru Sahitya (1962), Achuphul (1964), Bahagate Pati Jaon Biya (1969), Pachowar Rengani (1969), Smritir Papari (1970), Satya Aru Ahimsa: Gandhiji (1971), (1969), Kannaki (1960), Cupid Aru Psyche (1959) and Sahitya Aru Samasya (1978). All these are in Assamese. His equally powerful works in English are: August Revolution in Assam, The Red River and the Blue Hill (1954), Idle Hours (1962), Assamese Literature (1962), Folk Songs of India (1965), and Lakshminath Bezbarua (1967).

Besides being a trend-setter in the modern Assamese poetry, Hem Barua has set a new trend in Assamese travelogues. His travels abroad have been so nicely depicted that they read more like novels than travel accounts. Simplicity of diction, witty expression and an elegant manner of story-telling are some of the noteworthy features of his travelogues. The most popular among them, Sagar Dekhicha? (Have you seen the Sea?–1954) is a superb poetic description of his travel to the U.S.A.–through some European countries. His other works of this genre are Ranga Karabir Phul (1959), a description of his travel in the U.S.S.R., Israel (1965), a travel-account of Israel, and Mekong Mai Dekhilo (I have seen the Mekong river, 1967), a travel-account on the South-East Asia.

Hem Barua was closely connected with Asam Sahitya Sabha, of which he became the President in its Annual Session (1972) held at Dhubri. Towards the close of his versatile career he became the editor of a new English Daily Assam Express (1971).

Endowed with progressive ideas and outlook he worked and wrote for the common man. And with a zeal he wanted to focus the worth of Assam in all fields of the socio-political arenas of India.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Nanda Talukdar: Chira Chenehi Mor Bhasha Janani (Gauhati, 1976).

Pu.S.

BARUA, HEMCHANDRA (Assamese; b. 1835, d. 1896) is one of the founders of the modern Assamese language; he was instrumental in formulating the Assamese syllabic pattern after the model of the Sanskrit syllable by balancing the 'tatsama' and 'tatbhaba' words. Although an orthodox Brahmin, he began to learn English under Captain Broady, the then Deputy Commissioner of Sibsagar district, and the baptist missionaries. Starting his career as a translator in the DC's court, he moved up to the position of Superintendent in the Judical Commissioner's office and retired from service in 1881.

Barua tried to correct the Assamese syllable system introduced by the Missionaries and made it an acceptable form by bringing it closer to the Sanskrit pattern. For this, he wrote articles in the Orunodoi besides writing dictionaries and grammar books. Realizing the importance of grammar for mastering a language correctly, he wrote Asamiya Vyakaran (Assamese Grammar, 1873), Asamiya Larar Vyakaran (Grammar for Assamese Boys, 1892), Pathasalia Abhidhan (Dictionary for school-students; 1892), Samkshipta Hemkosh (The concise Hem-kosh, 1894). He also wrote two useful texts for school students–Adipath (First Primer, 1886), Pathmala (Lessons).

His monumental literary work, the Anglo-Assamese dictionary called Hemkosh (A Treasury of Gold, 1900) was posthumously published. This dictionary contains eight thousand more words than Miles Bronson's first Assamese-English Dictionary, Asamiya Ingraji Abhidhan (1867), which contains about 14,000 words. Barua's dictionary pointed to a direction in the formation of Assamese syllables. Assam News, an Anglo-Assamese journal (1883-85) edited by Barua, had also contributed significantly in this respect. Barua was an ardent social reformer of his time. As a protest against the social restriction on widow-remarriage, Barua, being a widower at a comparatively early age, decided not to marry again. The prevailing social customs, superstitions, religious hypocrisy came in for severe criticism in Barua's Bahire Rangchang Bhitare Kowan Bhaturi (Empty Vessels sound much, 1876), a book written in the novel form. His other important book is the second drama in Assamese, Kaniyar Kirtan (Opium-eaters' Song, 1861) where he dramatised the very harmful effect of opium. He also translated into Assamese the English book Way to Health and a treatise on various Assamese marriage systems, viz. Notes on the Marriage Systems of the People of Assam (1892).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Sarbeswar Kataki, Hemchandra Baruar Jivan-Charit, Gauhati.

H.S.

BARUA, NABAKANTA (Assamese; b. 1926) is a reputed poet, novelist, dramatist and writer of children's literature. Third son of Nilakanta Barua, a school teacher and Swarnalata Barua, he was educated in Nagaon Government High School and Visva Bharati, Santiniketan and took his M.A. degree in English from Aligarh Muslim University in 1953. He served as a lecturer in A.K. College, Sikuhabad, J.B. College, Jorhat and finally in Cotton College, Gauhati wherefrom he retired in 1984 as Vice-Principal.

His first collection of poems He Aranya, He Mahanagar (1951) which introduced a new realistic trend in modern Assamese poetry, was well received by the critics and he was acclaimed as one of the pioneers of the postwar period. His other collections are Eti Duti Egharati Tara (1958), Yati Aru Keitaman Sketch (1960), Samrat (1962), Ravana (1963), Manar Khabar (songs, 1963) and Mor aru Prithivir (1973). He was one of the first to introduce surrealism in modern Assamese poetry. His collections established him as an eminent poet and a visionary. His poetic expressions are lucid and symbolic. His poems were a revolt against the traditional poetic norms and hence he could be regarded as one of the pioneers of modern Assamese poetry. He could depict in his poems the gradual destruction of modern society and torture of human mind and soul. He was awarded Asam Prakashan Parishad Puraskar for the volume of verses entitled Mor Aru Prithivir in 1974. Some of his poems were translated into Hindi, Oriya and English.

As a novelist he preferred to base his novels chiefly on historical facts and backgrounds. His published novels are Kapili Pariya Sadhu (1953), Kakadeutar Har (1973), Garama Kuwari (1980), Manuh Ataibor Dvip (1980), and A-padartha (1980), a science fiction published in a journal. In his first novel Kapili Pariya Sadhu which was translated into Bengali, Navakanta Barua depicted the Kapili-par as one of the characters of the novel. He received Sahitya Akademi Award for his novel Kakadeutar Har in 1975. This novel was also translated into Hindi and other Indian languages.

Government of India awarded him Padma Bhushan in 1976 for his outstanding contribution to modern Assamese literature. He received the Soviet Land Nehru Award (Category I) in 1980.

He wrote books for children also. Some of his publications are Akharar Jakhala (1956), Makhanar Kukura Powali, Siyali Palegai Ratanpur, Bhat U Kare Bhu, Beli Phul Aru Golap, Mai Tunie Tun Tunalo (a verse play) etc. As a dramatist he wrote a few plays such as Eti Gitar Janma Hal, Kusha Jataka etc.

He edited Bharatiya Charukalar Bhumika, Children's journal Jonbai, and Pohar. At present he is editing a socio-cultural monthly entitled Siralu.

The poet travelled to USSR as a Tagore scholar in 1962 in connection with Tagore centenary celebrations at Moscow, attended the 5th Afro-Asian Writers Conference in Alma Ata, Kazakhastan in 1973 and participated in Afro-Asian Poets Symposium held in Erivan, Armenia. He also visited Poland and Yogoslavia on a cultural exchange programme in 1975.

He is well versed in Hindi, Bengali and English. He translated some books into Assamese. They are Visva Manabar Abhimukhe (Rabindranath Tagore's Towards Universal Man), 1965; Rabindra Chayanika (Poems of Tagore), translated in collaboration with Ratnakanta Barkakati, 1964; Hundred Poems of Walt Whitman, 1974; Mukta Dhara (a drama by Rabindranath Tagore), 1965; Alcestis (a verse translation of Euripides's Alcestis, in press); Asiar Sadhu, 1978; Adaptation of some childrens' verses by Kornei Chukavsky; Hindu Musalmanar Yukta Sadhana (by Kshitimohan Sen) and The Wounded Swan (Pushkin's lyrics), 1980. He also translated Vaskopopa and other Yugaslav poets and nursery rhymes of Assamese tribal languages into English (in press).

Li.S

BARUA, PARVATIPRASAD (Assamese; b. 1904, d. 1964) was an Assamese poet and playwright. His poetic fame rests on some nature-lyrics which were well received for their lucidity. Gungunani (1967), Bhanga Tokarir Sur (1959) and Sukula Dawar Aru Kahua Phul (1963) are collections of some of his best lyrics. The dominant qualities of Barua's poetry are spontaneity and a refreshing simplicity. His two plays—Sonar Soleng (Golden Utopia, 1929) and Lakhimi (1931) are also noted more for their lyricism than their dramatic qualities. The plays are symbolic. Lakhimi is welcome as the Goddess of Autumn, the deity of harvest. The playwright has beautifully rendered the spirit of the season in which plantations being over, the people enthusiastically wait for the fruits of their labour. Sonar Soleng reminds us of Maeterlinck's The Blue Bird. Bin Baragi (The Roving Minstrel) is a play in which the chief character of the drama is in eternal quest of ideal bliss (sonar soleng). He interrogates everything that he comes across if it can tell him as to where sonar soleng can be found. After a long time he, however, realises that sonar soleng is something which cannot be had but which is in life itself. The play contains some of his best songs and lyrics. In fact, it is a play which is read for its melodious music and lyrical fervour.

S.B.

BARUA, SATYAPRASAD (Assamese; b. 1919) is a first rate actor and director, a powerful playwright and a noted dramatic critic of Assam. A person of varied experiences of life and the stage, Satyaprasad Barua mastered modern techniques of light and shade, sound effects and other dramatic devices to project before the audience the psychological conflicts of his characters against social, cultural and political backgrounds of his plays. Through his lifelong associations with the All India Radio, Gauhati where he served for many years and the Directorate of Information and Public Relations, Assam, wherefrom he retired as its Director in 1974, Satyaprasad accumulated experiences both in theory and practice of the dramatic art in general and audio-visual technique of the modern stage in particular. Consequently, almost all his plays–original, translated or adapted have been crowned with success on the stage. His characters may be called good psychological studies of man wavering between the call of duties on the one hand and the urge of the soul on the other in any situation of life–personal, social and political.

Satyaprasad's manifold contributions to the treasury of Assamese drama may be put into certain broad divisions i.e. social, historical, translated and adapted plays. His original social plays are: Sakoi Sakoa (A pair of ruddy Sheldrakes, 1940), Sikha (Flame, 1957), Jyotirekha (A Ray of Light, 1958), Saswati (On the eternal Truth about Marriage, 1966), Bhaswati (A revolt against maladjustment in wedlock, 1966), Dupar Nisa (Midnight, 1976), Jabala (Modern version of the Jabala Satyakam episode of the Upanisad, 1976), Nayika Natyakar (The Heroine and the Playwright, 1976), Mrinal Mahi (Auntie Mrinal, 1977), Asa (Hope, 1980) and Phul Kali (Flower Bud, 1980). His original historical plays are: Anarkali (1957), Kunal Kanchan (1957), Ranadil (1957), Simhagar (1980) and Angikar (1980). His adaptations and translations are: Banahamsi (Ibsen's The Wild Duck, 1961), Raja Idipus (Sophocles's Oedipus, 1964), Othello (Shakespeare's play, 1974) and Macbeth (Shakespeare's play, 1980) and Lakshmir Pariksha (Rabindranath Tagore's play, 1977).

Satyaprasad's critiques on dramaturgy are, Natak Aru Abhinay Prasanga (1961), Natyakar Rabindranath (1965), Bertolt Brecht (1980), Mancha Pratibha (1980) and Anagata (1959). Besides editing a translation work on nine world famous short stories entitled Biswa Bikhyata Chuti Galpa Nata, he also wrote Sambad Sewar Katha (A Critique on journalism with reference to Assam, 1976), Amar Nousena (Our Navy: an Assamese rendering of Com. R.N. Gulati's book) and Punjabar Lokakatha (1981).

It is to be noted that Satyaprasad's Dharaloi Jidina Namiba Sarag (When the Heaven will come down to Earth) was the first radio play in Assamese, broadcast from All India Radio, Gauhati on 6.7.48. Since then he has been writing radio-plays and features for broadcast through A.I.R., Gauhati. He was awarded a literary pension (1978) by the Government of Assam.

One of the most prominent Assamese actors on the stage and on the radio, Satyaprasad won India's Best Actor Award (1978) given by the All India Critics Association for his outstanding performance in the role of Oedipus.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Harichandra Bhattacharyya, Asamiya Natya Sahityar Jilingani (Gauhati, 1968); Satyendranath Sarma, Asamiya Natya Sahitya (Gauhati, 1973).

Pu.S.

BARUANI, DHARMESWARI DEVI (Assamese; b. 1892, d. 1960) is an eminent poetess of modern Assamese poetry. Daughter of Jagneswar Deva Goswami she was married to Durganath Barua, a noted businessman of Gauhati. She suffered from an incurable disease from the youth till her death. Deprived of all the physical and earthly pleasures she tried to express her sorrows and sufferings in the form of poetry. Her husband was a constant source of inspiration to the poetess in her creation.

Her first published work Phular Sarai (Tray of Flowers, 1929) is a collection of fifteen poems. Most of the poems are based on her personal sufferings, her willingness to do something for others who have done a lot for her. This generated in her mind the idea of submitting herself to God who might give the poetess a new life so that she could come back again to the world after getting a new life. Some poems also express her love for nature. Other collections of the poetess are Praner Paras (Touch of the Soul, 1952) and Ashrudhar Aru Jivantari (Stream of Tears and Boat of Life, 1963).

The poems of Devi Baruani, though not many in number, reflect her inner mind and feelings and bear a mystic touch. In some poems she has depicted nature as a representative of her own life.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : B.K. Barua, Modern Assamese Literature, 1958; S.N. Sarma, Asamiya Sahityar Itibritta, 1971;

G.G.

BARVE ANIL (Marathi; b. 1948, d. 1984) was a versatile writer, whose abrupt death cut short a career of great promise. While still very young he came to be related to the Naxalite movement in Andhra Pradesh and suffered imprisonment for some articles in Ranangan, a weekly which he himself edited and published. His earlier journalistic career was marked by his extensive reports from distant parts of the country. He was a confirmed Marxist and all his writings reveal an undercurrent of leftist thought. He came to the limelight with his short novel Thank You, Mr. Glad (1975) which after a lapse of two years he turned into a play of the same name (1977). Both, the novel and the play, achieved instant popularity, and thenceforth he never looked back.

Thank you, Mr. Glad relates the story of the struggle between a Naxalite prisoner Virbhushan Patnaik and the British jailor Mr. Glad. It is more the story of the jailor than his prisoner, for the prisoner is totally committed to his Naxalite creed, while the conversion of the brutal and inhuman jailor into a lovable man, who shoots his prisoner at his request and thus takes his place in the prison, is absorbing. There is also a very delicate romantic love-story involving the prisoner and the jailor's daughter. But the theme of the novel and the play is martyrdom.

Barve's next venture was Dongar Mhatara Zala (1977), again a short novel with some overtones of the former Mr Glad. The Dongar is none other than an old decidated communist comrade, and the story goes on to describe his confrontation with a stiff retired army officer, who gradualy veers round towards the lovable comrade and his creed. The confronting characters are moulded in the same way as they were in the Glad story.

The locale of Barve's next short novel Akara Koti Gallon Pani is a coalmine, and its story deals with the struggle between a corrupt mine-owner and an honest engineer, who is bribed to change the plans of the underground coalmine to suit its owner's dubious motives. The duped engineer tries his level best to save the mine from an overwhelming flood of water, but to no avail.

Along with the short novels, Barve was busy writing plays such as Hamidabaichi Kothi (1979) and Putrakameshti (1980). Both the plays depict still other locales, and in content they are more psychological than the earlier ones. The former play deals with Hamidabai, a kept woman, and her daughter's attempts to escape from the brothel life, while Putrakameshti deals with a business deal by a rich man, instigated by his childless wife, with a prostitute for a child. The strange aftermath of the deal can only be imagined!

The three novels and the three plays Barve wrote held promise of a brilliant future, which unfortunately was never fulfilled.

M.M.

BASAI (Nepali) (Leaving Hearth and Home) is a reputed Nepali novel penned by Lil Bahadur Chettri (b. Assam. It was published in 1957 and has run into ten reprints so far.

The novel depicts the feudal exploitation of the Nepalese people very realistically. Ultimately the dispossessed peasant Dhaney, his wife Maina and his sister Shumawati are perforce compelled to leave their ancestral hearth and home to seek an uncertain living elsewhere.

The novel is easefully simple in its structure, contrivance of incidents, conversation and narration. A pervasive sense of wholeness is brought into being by the subtle interlacing of these seemingly separable and simple components. Perhaps it is mainly the language that is so finely attuned to the subject or theme of the novel that continually effects the transformation. The writer's sympathy goes with the exploited but he does not vent his ire against the exploiters. This too has contributed to making Basai a sound literary work.

Basai occupies a nodal point in the chain of great realistic Nepali novels.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Krishnachandra Singh Pradhan, Nepali Upanyas Ra Upanyaskarharu, 1980; Saratchandra Sharma, Basai Parichay, 1962.

Ke.G.

BASANTAGI BANSI (Manipuri) is a book of poems by Rajkumar Surendrajit Singh which won the Jamini Sundar Memorial Gold Medal of the Manipuri Sahitya Parishad in 1980; it was published in 1978 at Imphal.

Basantagi Bansi (The Vernal Flute) is a collection of poems covering a period of nine years from 1958 to 1967 having a total of 40 poems altogether. There are nine sections: the first section contains five poems composed in 1958, the second section has three poems composed in 1959, the third section has seven poems composed in 1960, the fourth section has 10 poems composed in 1961, the fifth section has 6 poems composed in 1962, the sixth section has two poems composed in 1963, the seventh section has two poems composed in 1964, the eighth section has two poems composed in 1966. The poems are written in free verse without being festered by traditional form. The themes are romantic in many cases but there are poems of realism and of didactic note as well. In the book an interplay of romanticism, idealism, traditionalism and modernism is woven by the poet in the choice of themes, expression and conception. But the overriding preoccupation of the poet in all the poems is an insatiable desire for perfection and longing for bliss.

R.K. Surendrajit Singh is distinguished in Manipuri for his love for the use of musical and sonorous words and a sense of keenness of the musical quality in language which he does not fail to explore in the poems. He is an idealist who will worship beauty for its own sake. Any reader who reads his poems has this impression.

I.R.B.S.

BASAVANNA

BASAVANNA (Kannada; b. 1131,d. 1167). His birth in the 12th century in Karnataka marks a milestone. By his towering personality Basavanna achieved much in this wordly life. The meanness and rottenness existing in the society then were considerably washed away by the mighty waves of Basavanna's social revolution. His humanitarian views became the bedrock for the new social order. Thus Basavanna and his echelon became the chief whips of the society of that age.

A sense of unhappiness prevailed during the reign of Vikramaditya VI who was weak and unable to rule. Internal wranglings were working to wreck the social and religious strata of the society. There was instability in the political life of the kingdom. Basavanna was born at this hour.

Books written on Basavanna are many but there are no works found so far on Basavanna written by his contemporaries. It is only from the works of post period-poets that some life sketch of Basavanna can be made out. Harihara's Basavaraj-devar-ragale, Bhima's Basava-puran, Sadaksharadeva's Vrishabhendra-vijaya, Singhiraja's Amala-Basavacharite, Lakkannadandeshi's Shiva-Tatwachintamani, only provide with some historical facts about the life of Basavanna. However, a true image can be had about his individual life from these books. Madalambika and Madarasa of Shiva-Brahmin community who were running the "Bagewadi-Ingleshwar" (Learning-Seat) were the parents of Basavanna. Madalambike, wife of Madarasa, performed penance in Nandi temple of Bagewadi to be blessed with a son and Basavanna was born to this couple in 1131 A.D.

Since childhood he showed signs of a prodigy. Jatavedamuni, a saint, performed the initiation caremony of Basavanna on his birth. He spent his childhood in a religious atmosphere. Whether the thread ceremony (unpanyane-samskar) of Basavanna took place or not, is, a point of dispute, even today. But Harihara has written that Basavanna cut the sacred thread calling it a thread of 'Karma', when it was forced upon him, much against his will. But this incident of cutting, adjuring and throwing away the sacred thread marked a big turn in his life. It is no doubt a true incident beyond question. Accompanied by his sister Nagalambika, he deserted his birth-place, estranging his ties with his dearest parents and nearest relatives. On this occasion, he declared that he would not recognize any religion as a true religion which bred inequality. He abhored the traditional Vedic teachings that he learnt in the seat of learning at his birth place. He came to Kudala-Sangama, the native place of Shivaswami, husband of Nagalambike, his sister. Kudala-Sangama was then known as Kappadi-Sangama and it was one of the famous educational centres of that time in Karnataka. Basavanna continued his studies at Kappadi-Sangama under the guidance of Eeshanya-guru, the chieftain of Sangameshwar temple. The environment and the life around him at Kudala-Sangama was very favourable to him to prepare and equip himself well for the prospective role that he was to play in the social life. His long stay at Kundala-Sangama, eleven to twelve years at a stretch, was very helpful to him, to practise and perfect the Shaiva-devotional path. This long stay became as if the bedrock of his future life. He prepared himself for the great task of establishing peace, justice, equality, purity, devotion, dedication, individual freedom, etc., in the social life and to rejuvinate the same in a systematic and scientific way.

The first step taken to mark the turn in the trend of social life, was, severance from the traditional ties and practices. During this process Basavanna had to leave Kudal-Sangama and come to Mangalaweda. King Bijjal was the patron of Basavanna. He dethroned king Tailap III of Chalukya dynasty (in 1155-56) and Basavanna settled with him in Kalyan, made the place his centre of activities. Like-minded people began to flock together at Kalyan from all sides. People who aspired aften a spiritual life came to Kalyan and started to live under the guidance of Basavanna doing some vocation suited to their socio-spiritual activities. They were convinced that they could achieve divinity through "Work-worship is heaven" policy. Basavanna gave much importance to vocation in life. He advocated that "to lose oneself completely in the work while doing the work is a higher stage in divine life and even if one forgets to worship god while doing some work, it is immaterial." When Basavanna and his followers noticed that 'all are equal in life' theory was quite capable of giving very good dividents, they practised it themselves unmindful of caste, creed, sect, religion, etc., and freely mixed with one another. After a day's dedicated work a Sarana was expected to take that just enough requirements out of the total earnings of the day, for his maintenance. A Sarana was not to worry about today's or tomorrow's provisions. It was also the practice to set apart some portion of the daily earnings for the purpose of giving alms, charity, for any religious work. Being attracted, people began to appreciate and welcome the society imbibing such popular doctrines and dictums. People rushed to join the organisation started by Basavanna and become aware that the theory of 'work-worship is heaven' worked like a miracle. People were pouring in to Kalyan from all over the country. They started giving active help, co-operation, and support to the revolution in the society.

Daily discussions over the experiences of one's life were held on a common platform known as Anubhava-mandap. Out of the discussions held in this Anubhava-mandap, some social values of life were recognised and they became the doctrines and dictums of every day life. Besides holding discussions, another paractice was also followed. It was the practice of serving food to the mass (dasoha) after the discussions. Where both these practices were observed, it was popularly known as 'Mahamana'.

Basavanna was not at all satisfied from within, with this sort of arrangement. He stood for inner clearness of an individual. To him all the above activities like holding discussions, serving food, working on some job, were only outword activities. He insisted on crystal–clear inner cleanliness to dwell in the heart of every individual. To achieve the same in life, he urged them to follow the practice of worshiping a personal god daily with all the heart, mind and money, besides organising guru, linga and jangama worshiping activities. He preached to the public that an individual can realize god through pure devotion and internal cleanliness. He advised them to be introspective over their deeds and weigh the same with their true consciousness. Basavanna and his followers had understood that if one's technings and preachings were to be reflected in the minds of others or in the society, one should be always pure at heart, mind, soul and body. Basavanna and his echelons lived like that. Basavanna, the leader, thus became the guiding star to human race.

Basavanna who was a tested devotee, could alone lead the public on the right path of true devotion. He brought home to the public that it was better to worship one god only, the creator of this world, rather than worshipping hundreds of gods who are nothing but the creations of the human mind and imagination. The 'sati-pati' thought of preachings about worshipping guru, linga and jangama and the personal god, like a chaste lady worshipping her husband, went through the organisation built by Basavanna and reached every nook and corner of the society.

In the new organised society of Basavanna, all differences melted away and the idea that mankind is one, became very dominant. Psychologically, the thought that'all are equal' in Shaivism irrespective of high or low caste, was accepted. By quoting his own experiences, he exhorted the people not to put him to shame by addressing him as the high-caste born. He declared that good character and good practices are not the monopoly of any particular caste or creed or religion. Anything good, anywhere, should be noticed, respected and brought into practice, according to Basavanna. Woman who had lost her freedom in the society and religion due to traditionalism, regained her freedom in Basavanna's time, and was treated as equal to man in the society.

Basavanna introduced 'linga dikoha' to women also in the new society he built, and elevated her status in the society. As a result of this progressive step, there were hundreds and hundreds of female saints (Saranaru) participating freely in the activities of Anubhava-mandap along with male saints (Saranaru). The preachings of Basavanna about the importance of devotional path in the realization of god, describing a devotee as a wife, god as husband, was understood well, and the individual freedom enjoyed by an individual paved the way for an all-round development of an individual. Basavanna never tolerated untouchability in the society. He encountered the public with the question "If one is called untouchable, can the light of the house of that man become also untouchable? He challanged the public to name any single religion in the world that does not bear kindness, love and compassion towards mankind and other living beings. As life is common to man and animal, love, kidness and compassion are natural corollaries of life, according to Basavanna. Man and animals reciprocate these qualities by nature. His greatness is reflected in a saying of his own requesting the public not to praise him as great, and that there is none in the world smaller than him and greater than a Shiva devotee.

It is under his able guidance that all religious principles, dictums, practices, etc., were recognised and sanctified and put through the organisational pipeline to reach the public at large. Saint Siddharam who had come along with Allamaprabhu decided to remain in Kalyan and dedicated his services to the social cause. The joining of Akkamahadevi, an incarnation of divinity in female form, brought an aroma of saintliness to the organisation and through his Anubhavamandap and Sunya-pith she made her life much more purposeful. Siddharam soon was recognised as an incarnation of god. The root cause for all this was the devotional path which Basavanna advocated and all worked miraculosly under the dynamic personality of Basavanna. Thus Basavanna is also rightly called the 'divine teasure' (Bakti-bhandari) by one and all.

Basavanna's towering personality was thus the main cause for setting up various types of new currents in the society. Another noteworthy quality of Basavanna was that he did not totally discard the traditionality, instead he gave a new touch injecting in them a new blood and remoulding them as per the needs and necessities of the society of that time. Those which he found as useless, he ruthlessly threw away. It is this policy of equality of all that led to the marriage of Haralaiah's daughter with Madhuvarasa's son. Haralaiah was treated as equal in all respects though he was originally an untouchable. The membners of Basavanna's organisation found nothing wrong with such a marriage. But some extreme traditionalists took this opportunity to create trouble. They were successful in inflicting punishment socially on the married couple and Haralaiah and Madhuvarasa because of inter-caste marriage. There was an outburst of violence in Kalyan resulting in bloodshed.

Basavanna immediately left Kalyan as he could not bear the situation and came to Kudala-Sangam where he is believed to have become one with the Eternal Almighty (1967). Though Basavanna was mainly a saint, his Vachanas are excallent examples of photosophical ideas poetically composed his social and religious revolution inspired a host of writes to write with a greater sense of freedom and a more liberal view of life.

M.S.S.

BASAVAPPA SHASTRI (Kannada; b. 1843, d. 1891). The earliest Kannada play available is Mitravind Govinda written by Singararya (1680), a Pandita in the court of Chikkadevaraja of Mysore. It is an adaptation of the well-known Sanskrit play Ratnavali of Shri Harsha. Though we have epigraphic and literary reference to the existence of Theatre House (Nataka Sala) and drama (Nataka) from 10th century onwards, it was only during the reign of Chamaraja Wodeyar (1968-1894) that the professional Kannada stage had its beginning. It was during his reign and at his instance that a dramatic troupe named after him as Chamarajendra Nataka Sabha, popularly known as Maharaja's company, was formed under the aegis of the Palace (1892), and a great need was felt for Kannada stage plays. The royal command for writing plays was conveyed by the Dewan to scholar-poets like Basavappa Shastri and others of the royal court to translate the famous plays of Kalidasa and other Sanskrit dramatists. It was Basavappa Shastri that commenced work in right earnest in this direction and translated the following plays from Sanskrit:
1. Abhijnana Shakuntala (1883). 2. Vikramoravasiya 3. Malavikagnimitra. These three are by Kalidasa. 4. Uttararamacharitra (1911) 5. Malati-Madhava by Bhavabhuti. 6. Chandakausika of Kshemshvara 7. Ratnavali Natika of Harshavardhana (1929).

He also adapted Othello of William Shakespeare in collaboration with one C. Subba Rao, as he had no knowledge of English. The title of the Kannada version is Surasena Charite (1895).

Though a few other contemporaries of Basavappa Shastri came out with their translations of Sanskrit plays, the translations of Basavappa Shastri outshone all of them by virtue of the mellifluous diction, scholarly approach and the stamp of originality in the art of translation,—a combination of rare qualities in them, i.e. Kannada versions by Basavappa Shastri.

Besides translations of Sanskrit plays and the three famous satakas Bhartruhari, viz., Niti Sataka, Srngara Sataka and Vairagya Sataka, Basavappa Shastri wrote original works both in Kannada and Sanskrit. He was respected as a Ubhayabhasha Kavi. The following are his original works:—

Kannada 1. Savitri Charitre: A narrative poem in Bhamini Satpadi metre, based on the Upakhyana (illustrative tale) contained in the Mahabharata. This work was specifically written at the instance of the Maharaja's Private Secretary Ambuil Narasimha Ayyangar with a view to inculcating patibhakti (chastity) among school going girls. The work is in simple and chaste language.

2. Damayanti Svayamvaram: This work also is based on the story of Nala, another illustrative episode in the Mahabharata. This is a Champukavya, with a moral purpose, exclusively meant to please the royal court and for the purpose of being used as a text book for girls in higher classes. And naturally the style of the work is scholarly.

3. Niti Sarasangraha (1911); A collection of 124 didactic verses in Kannada metre divided into 12 paddhatis such as vidya paddhati, dana paddhati, kulastri paddhati, etc.

4. Renuka Champu: An incomplete Champu kavya on the life and teachings of Sri Renukacharya, one of the five early propagators of the Virasaiva faith.

Sanskrit: 1. Trishashti Puratana Gana Stava; 2. Sivashtaka 3. Amba Shodashi Majari 4. Sivabhakti Sudha Tarangini; 5. Arya Satakam. These minor works amply illustrate his mastery in composing verses in elegant Sanskrit and in a variety of vritta metres, and also his devotional fervour.

Basavappa Shastri (b. 1843; d. 1891) was the only child of the palace priest Mahadeva Shastri when Krishnaraja III (1799-1868) was the ruling prince of Mysore. He was orphaned when he was just six years old and he came under royal protection. The education of the boy was entrusted to a team of scholars and artistes of the royal court; the teenager became proficient in Sanskrit, Kannada, music, gamaka ("musical recitation of poetry") and many shastras. After a stint of original writing which attracted the attention of the Prince he was entrusted with the task of translating Shakuntala of Kalidasa and that brought him immediate fame. At the instance of the ruler Chamaraja Wodeyar, Dewan Rangacharlu convened a Vidvatsabha ('assembly of eminent scholars') and arranged for a reading of the tranlated work by the author, after which he was conferred the title 'Abhinava Kalidasa', by which he is remembered to this day.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: B. Sivamurti Shastri, Basavappa Sastrigula: (Bangalore, 1974). B. Sivamurti Shastri, Virasaiva Sahitya mattu Itilvasa: (Bangalore, 1961).

M.V.S.

BASAVARAJADEVARA RAGALE (Kannada) by the mediaeval poet Harihara is a verse biographical narrative of the great religious and social reformer, Rasaveshwara. Though the exact date of Harihara is difficult to ascertain, he is the earliest among those who wrote about him, at any rate earlier than the Telugu poet Palkurike Somanatha and the Kannada poet Bhimakavi who made Basava the subject of their puranas (mythologies). Even though the earliest and probably the nearest in time to his subject, Harihara does not claim to have directly known him and therefore, like others of a later age, has depended upon the legends that had grown about his name. No contemporary record or direct evidence of the facts of his life is available so that any attempt at his biography has to depend upon what indirect light his own vachanas and the vachanas of some of his contemporaries throw on them and where even such evidence is not available, it had to depend upon what popular imagination had "mythologised" about him. The result is that even Harihara, like later writers, falls back upon a mixture of fact and fiction or legend and his account is no less an amalgam of facts historically corroborated and 'miracles' calculated to underline his super-human status.

Though only the first half of Harihara's work is available, it has certain features, in respect of both content and form, which make it unique in the history of Kannada literature. There are variations in the factual particulars about Basaveshwara's life which the composition provides. While later writers maintain that Basava left his home for Sangama because of his difference with his father on the subject of initiation, Harihara says that Basava having lost his parents early was brought up by his grandmother and that he left his native place after discarding the sacred thread; which means that he had already been initiated. Other accounts say that having married the daughter of his maternal uncle, Baladeva, a minister of Bijjala, he succeeded him after his death; but Harihara tells us that it was Bijjala's treasurer Sidhdandadhisa who introduced him to his ruler who put him in his position after the former's death and so on. These and other differences have led to the conjecture that the second half of Harihara's manuscripts might have been suppressed or destroyed by those who would not accept his account of the closing years of Basava's life.

The second distinctive feature of the work is the metrical form Harihara employs in the ragale. The ragale is made up of four-foot couplets with end rhymes. The length of the line is variable depending upon whether the constituent feet engage three, four or five syllables. Well-suited as it was for narrative purposes, Harihara used it to describe the lives of the sixtythree 'ancients' and popularised it so much as to make it a generic name for the kind of verse narratives he wrote. The use of prose in alternate sections–another characteristic feature of his–to relieve the monotony of the rhyming couplets was an innovation which proved a step forward in the use and development of Kannada prose. Basavarajadevara Ragale, even if incomplete, claims a unique status in the history of Kannada literature and the evolution of newer prosodic forms.

V.M.I.

BASAVARAJU, L. (Kannada; b. 1919) born at Idaguru in Kolar district and educated at Siddhaganga and Mysore. He rose to the top of the academic ladder, in spite of unfavourable circumstances, by hard and dedicated work. Winning the D. Litt. degree of the Mysore University where he worked, he rose to be a Professor of Kannada at the Institute of Kannada Studies of the University. Well-read in the classics and particularly in the literature of the Virashaiva faith, he edited the Vachanas of Basava, Akka Mahadevi, Allama and Dasimayya, all with detailed critical introductions. His edition of Pampa's Adi Purana bears evidence of this painstaking aptitude for careful research and remains a classic in the field. An abridged version of Torava Ramayana is among other early works which he edited with erudition and understanding. Jyotilingada Mooru Mukhagalu and Tirumalarya-Mattu Chikkadevaraja Wodeyaru are his essays in literary criticism. The former deals with Virashaiva faith and the latter is a detailed study of the seventeenth century writer Tirumalaraya and his relationship to the then ruler of Mysore who was his friend and patron. Whether in his introductions to his edited works or in his essays in literary criticism, Basavaraju displays a careful study of the texts which is the main basis of all his critical observations. He was honoured by the State Sahitya Akademi in 1977 with its annual award.

V.M.I.

BASHEER, VAIKOM MUHAMMAD (Malayalam; b. 1910) was born in a middle class Muslim family at Vaikkam. He had his education in a local English school. Even as a student he was a political activist and suffered imprisonment for a time. When released, he started, in another's name, a monthly, Ujjivanam (Rebirth) to propagate his terrorist motives. To avoid apprehension by the police, he left for Madras and from there for North India, where he spent seven years under various names, doing odd jobs. He returned to Kerala with a fund of experience and the story teller in him stirred beyond supression. His drama Pattathinte Pekkinav (The Nightmare of Pattom), which came out soon afterwards, was highly critical of the government and the book was banned and he was once more sent to jail. But he put his experiences in the jail to good use by bringing out a novel based on them, Mathilukal (Walls), one of the best of its kind in Malayalam. Before long, Indian Independence, to which he had long been looking forward, became a reality but he was disillusioned to find things happening in unexpected ways. Constrained by circumstances he found himself again in Madras as a bread winner contributing to a weekly named Jayakeralam. But he was branded as a communist and imprisoned. On release, he got back home. At Ernakulam he opened a book stall, which began to flourish and attract many kinds of people including politicians of diverse hues. The Sahitya Akademi honoured him by conferring fellowship in 1970 and the Central Government recognized him as a veteran freedom fighter.

He has written 75 stories, collected in ten volumes. Most of the stories deal with the ordinary people of his own community, diving deep into the complicated problems of human life and bringing out the value of love in all its varied forms. His greatest contribution through the stories is the touch of humour in treatment even in the face of bitterness and cruelty.

Thirteen novels have so far been published by Basheer, Balyakalasakhi (Childhood Friend, 1944), Premalekhanam (Love letter, 1944), Sabdangal (Voices 1947), Entuppappakkoranendarnnu (My Grand Father had an Elephant, 1951) and Jeevitanizhalppadukal (Shadows of Life, 1954) are social novels. It was Basheer who introduced the Muslim social background into Malayalam fiction. Balyakalasakhi is perhaps the greatest short novel in the language and also his master piece. Its initial touch of humour gives way to tragic feelings towards the close. The book is remarkable for its stringent criticism of the orthodox practices of the Muslims in Kerala. Sabdangal is akin to this in that it presents a vivid picture of the moral and cultural degeneration of the society.

Maranathinte Nizhalil (In the Shadow of Death, 1951), Pathummayudu Atu (Pathumma's Sheep, 1959), Mathilukal (The Walls, 1965) and Manthrikappucha (The Magic Cat, 1968) may be called biographical novels. In all these Basheer writes about his own sorrows and sufferings with biting sarcasm and saintly detachment. He is second to none in this type of novels.

There is a third type of novels–the humourous ones. Mucheettukalikkarante Makal (The Gambler's Daughter, 1951), Sthalathe Pradhana Divyan (The Chief Divine of the Place, 1951), etc., are good examples.

Basheer is the inventor of 'Continual stories' in Malayalam in which each chapter is an independent unit and the different chapters when put together will constitute a well knit novel. The stream of consciousness novel was also introduced by him.

He has written three more books, one of them being a drama and the other two memoirs. A number of his books have been translated into other Indian languages and a few into English and Russian.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: K.P. Sarachandran, Novalukalilute; N.Krishnan Pillai, Kairalyute Katha; Vijayalayam Jayakumar, Basheerinte Kathasahityam.

K.S.N.

BASUDEVAGHOSHA (Bengali) alongwith his two elder brothers, Govindaghosha and Madhavaghosha was a close follower of Chaitanya. All the three brothers possessed some poetic talents which may be traced in their songs. Ballabhaghosha, their father, also a devotee of Chaitanya, was a resident of Mursidabad, but shifted to Nabadwipa, for living at closer proximity of the Master. His three sons were efficient kirtan-singers (devotional Vaishnava songs depicting Krishna-lila). They accompanied Chaitanya to Nilachala (Puri). The elder brother, Govinda stayed with the Master at Puri, but two brothers came back to Nabadwipa for propagating Vaishnava faith and message of Chaitanyadeva in Bengal. Some of the devotional songs on Chaitanya, composed by the three brothers, are fine examples of real life-story of the Master, intermingled with his inner life. As they were familiar with him, their songs regarding his life, spread warmth of personal touch. Vasudevghosha, popularly known as Vasu Ghosha, the youngest of the three, composed the Nimai-Sanyas-Pala (Nimai, that is, younger Chaitanya) or Nimai's renunciation of world, in simple Bengali verse. Some modern scholars like to place more importance on these songs than the exhaustive hagiographies by Vrindavandasa and Krishnadasa Kaviraj Goswami, because Vasu had personal experience of seeing the Master's day-to-day activities in Nabadwipa, full of miracles and mystic experiences. His Padas may be divided in two main branches: Imaginary episodes attributed to Chaitanya, which are rather a close imitation of Sanskrit alamkara-sastra and puranic episodes relating to Krishna-Lila. These are usually pedantic, artificial and far-fetched, particularly when he tries to depict Chaitanya as an incarnation of Krishna. Some of the songs of Chaitanya's Nagarabhava (episodes akin to the amorous dalliance of Krishna) verge on grossness and are quite incompatible with the divine and pure life of the master. The second group of songs centres round the Master's life-history in Nabadwipa. These are composed in simple Bengali payar and tripad metres. These metrical compositions helped him a great deal in depicting Chaitanya's domestic life with a special note of deep pathos where he describes the Master's renunciation of the world. These simple verses are still admired as pieces emanating from the real and divine life of Chaitanyadeva.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : D.C. Sen, History of Brajabuli Literature. S.K. Sen, History of Bengali Language and Literature.

As.T.B.

BATAGAMANI (Maithili). One of the important forms of Tirahuti 'Batagamani' is generally characterised by the refrain Sajani ge (Oh friend or comrade, invariably female). Its main purpose is to portray the nayika (heroine) in abhisara (i.e. while going to meet her lover). The peculiar melody in which it is sung distinguishes it from the ordinary 'Tirahuti', made immortal by the great poet Vidyapati who was the most successful writer of this Maithili lyric-form. He was followed by poets like Bhanjana, Karana Jayananda and others. In his description of separation, Bhanjana imagines that the separated lady has been bitten by poisonous snakes and has been verily washed away in her tears; he paints the intense pain and suffering of the woman who can save herself from the poison by drinking the nectar in her lower lip which contains the peculiar sweetness of the nectar. Jayananda was another successful writer of 'batagamani' who betrays great influence of Vidyapati in his songs with marvellous imageries that are simply unique. In one of his songs he touchingly describes the grief of a love-lorn soul who feels as if she were deserted by God: "In all directions, I gaze, upon the way of Hari and there poreth from mine eyes a stream of tears. My home no longer pleaseth me night or day; What am I to do? Between him and me there was not a grain of difference, our very breaths were one. Yet, he went away pitilessly to a far country;

"What can I say of his wisdom? Oh friend, the creator has become opposed to me. Who will be my help?"

Ramadasa Jha (17th century) was yet another master writer of 'batagamani' and his imitation of Vidyapati's famous 'batagamani' describing the youthful heroine on the way is well-known to the lovers of Maithili.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Jayakanta Mishra, History of Maithili Literature, Allahabad, 1949., Niranjan Chakravarti, Vidyapati Samiksha (Calcutta,1970)., Upendra Thakur, History of Mithila (Darbhanga, 1956).

U.T.

BATAN RI PHULAWADI (Rajasthani) is the general title of a series of volumes (over one dozen) of folk tales retold by Vijayadana Detha of Borunda, Jodhpur. The number of folk tales published in these volumes exceeds well over one thousand. Vol. 10, (Borunda, 1972) of this series was given the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1974. It contains 21 folk tales covering 333 pages. The first ten tales are concerned with snakes which depict various convictions of the local people about snakes. As per the pattern of folk tales, the snakes also behave like human beings and display their supernatural powers. The rest of the lot contains fairy tales, didactic tales, tales based on riddles, etc. Three of these tales may be separately categorised under tales of thieves, tales of ghosts and tales of peasant life. It has been claimed in the introductory article (not by the author) that the underlying social truth contained in these tales has been vividly expressed by the author in his powerful style and forceful diction. The author's commitment to the ideology of siding with the downtrodden has inspired him not to miss any occasion when he could strike at the exploiters and the parasites of the society Apparently, such a statement cannot fit into the scheme of folk literature which has always remained free from such biased thinking. The tales of this volume, therefore, may be better taken as folk tales retold from the Marxist view point in a literary style. The language of the author, although idiomatic, is purely dialectal and at times unintelligible to the average Rajasthani reader.

Raw.S.

BATATYACHI CHAL (Marathi) is a very popular book of collection of humorous articles by P.L. Deshpande, Deshpande has explored the chawl-system which is one of the peculiarities of the life in Bombay. He presents before the reader a lively picture of the different aspects of this life. It includes twelve different articles including Samskritik Chalval, Samskritik Shishtamandal, Nishkam Sahityaseva, etc.

No doubt the reminiscences of the author's childhood in a chawl-type seem to be the basic source from which the subject matter is derived. But his capacity of looking at the subject in a humorous way makes the book interesting.

The community life in a particular chawl, the individual members of it (who happen to be types rather than characters), their oddities, their limited but rigid outlook on life are presented in details in this book.

Minute observation is another notable feature of the book. The residents Mangeshrao Hattangadi, Trilokekar, Varadabai, Baba Barve, Kushabhau Akshikar, Nagutatya Adhye, Anna Pawshe, etc., are the outcome of the interfusion between the imagined ones and the real ones. They are portrayed with an outstanding skill by the author. Types as they are they lean many a time towards caricatures because of the element of humour woven in the pattern of the characterisation.

The articles in the book can be categorized in two major groups. Samskritik Chalval, Samskritik Shistha Mandal, Bharaman Mandal, etc. are such articles in which a variety of humorous episodes and anecdotes are inculcated.

Nishkama Sahitya Seva, Raghunananchi Kanyes Patre, Kahi vasarya, Agami Atmacharitre Samgitika, etc. are articles pertaining to literary life. They are presented with the sure touches of satire and parody and subtlety of humour. They are packed with references to Marathi literature. The humour in these articles has an intricacy and fineness as well. All possible varieties of humour are found in this book, viz. the wit, the pun, the contextual humour based on specific episodes, obliqueness, parody and satire. Its stage performance by the author himself was enjoyed by the Marathi spectators, which goes to prove the dramatic element in the book.

M.J.

BATWER, AHMAD (Kashmiri; b. 1845, d. 1918) was a Sufi poet of distinction. Nothing is known about his life for certain and his poetry remains still uncollected. It is due to the oral tradition that a few of his poems have survived which amply reveal his great poetic faculties and originality. His two most admired poems are 'Yindrazin Yarbari' (in the Court of Yindraz) and 'Nay' (pipe). In the former poem the poet has used the conventional symbols of Kashmiri mystic poetry, for instance, 'Yindraz' (the God of music, dance and rain) 'Mansoor' (the famous mystic and martyr) 'Shama' (Candle) Gas (light) 'Nar' (fire) 'Khak' (earth), etc. but the use of these symbols is quite ingenious and their arrangement expresses a very original imaginative experience. The poem is also remarkable for a sweet combination of allusions to Indian mythology and Iranian legend and for various innuendoes. 'Nay' is the story of a pipe narrated in the first person but is in fact an allegorical lyric which is an unsophisticated expression covering the whole story of the creation, its coming into being, its present state of alienation and its expected regaining of the lost abode. The theme of the poem is suggestive and the symbol of music of the pipe shows in a subtle way that there is a unity in an apparent plurality of this phenomenal world. The metaphor of the pipe was originally used by Maulana Roomi, the famous Persian poet and Ahmad Batwar might have been familiar with it.

Sh.S.

BAUL SONGS (Bengali). We get the first reference to the word 'Baul' in the Maladhar Basu's works. Sri Chaitanya was called 'Mahabaul' in Sri Krishnavijaya (Triumph of Lord Krishna) (15th century A.D.). The preceptor was known as guru or Murshid or Pir or Karta. Side by side with the commonly known theological speculations and religious practices, there has been flowing in India an importnt undercurrent of mystic symbolism which not only searched the truth for its own sake but also wanted to live it, in their social behaviours as can be seen in Sahajiya movements. The fact is that this form of rural expressions is a process of reconstruction of one's own legends, irrespective of caste, creed and colour or of whether one was a Hindu or a Muslim or an adivasi or an animist. As Rabindranath Tagore, who was a great lover of Bauls and their songs, said, this is the common heritage of the Hindus and Mohamedans alike. Here one does not hurt another. The outer frame of the language may be rude and crude, but it touches the inner springs of the human heart. Here minds meet minds irrespective of caste and creed.

Their teachings to their disciples were often opposed to what they learnt from their social customs, conventions or ritualistic tendencies and were more in kinship with natural flowering and functioning of body and mind in ecstasy and eroticism sublimated to the pedestal of God-search in the shape of a lover hankering after the mate of his or her heart. The cardinal test was that one had to find divinity within one's own self and rediscover it in outside objects. Love is sought there. Set free that entombed humanity within and get him or her or it without. There is no question of gender or person why and when and where. It is the feeling of unified coexistence, a sense of oneness; and the special significance of the Baul Agamani songs is that it has taken the shape of Mother-child relation in consonance with the social custom of Bengal, that in the month of Aswin (September/October) we have the Durga Puja and the symbolism has taken the shape of mother waiting to see her daughter who is returning to her father's house for a three-day visit.

The word 'Baul', some say, is a synonym of the word 'Byakul' or over-anxious and 'Akul'; it denotes one who is over anxious. From the historical point of view, this particular from of 'Sadhana' and the growth of folk-literature associated with it may be traced to the Buddhist-Tantrik age of the tenth and eleventh centuries particularly in the Natha and Sahajiya cults, and then it merged into the pre-Chaitanya and post-Chaitanya Vaishnava Sadhana. Later there was a mixture with Sufi-thought. The influence of the great poets and mystics Rumi and Rabia on Pirs and Fakirs of Islamic origin is well-known. The cult of the Bauls and their 'Prakriti Sadhana' was congenial to all those known as wandering poets.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H A Wilson The Various Religious Cults of India; Sashibhushan Dasgupta, Obscure Religious Cults; Suddhan shumohan Bandopadhyaya, Baul; Songs of Bengal; Upendranath Bhattacharya, Banglar Baul O Banglagan (second edn.)

Si.B.

BAWA PREM SINGH HOTI (Punjabi; b. 1882–d. 1954) Bawa Kahan Singh, the grandfather of Bawa Prem Singh Hoti shifted to the North West Frontier Province after its annexation to the kingdom of Maharaja Ranjit Singh from Goindwal (Amritsar). He got his education from indigenous institutions and gained proficiency in Punjabi, Persian and a working knowledge of English. Pashto was his mothertongue. His surroundings reverberated with the heroic deeds of the Sikhs. Maharaja Ranjit Singh, Hari Singh Nalwa, Akali Phula Singh were a kind of mythical heroes in that area. This attracted Bawa Prem Singh towards Sikh history and he started research in it. He migrated to Patiala at the time of the partition of Punjab in 1947 along with his library which is now a proud acquisition of the Punjabi University Library's research section.

His first historical biography Akali Phula Singh (1914) was well received by readers. Encouraged by this he wrote detailed biographies, Maharaja Ranjit Singh (1918), Kanwar Naunihal Singh (1927), Hari Singh Nalwa (1937), Khalsa Raj de Badeshi Karinde (1945), Khalsa Raj de Usraiya (Part I), Maharaja Sher Singh (1951), and Nawab Kapur Singh (1952). Another writing of his has been edited by Fauja Singh and published by the Punjabi University, Patiala (Punjab) under the title 'Punjab da Samajak Itihas' (Social History of Punjab) (1979).

Basically Bawa Prem Singh can be termed as the product of the Singh Sabha movement of the later part of the 19th century. Inspired by its ideology,' he wanted to present the glorious period of Sikh history before his countrymen. He collected a lot of basic historical material in these biographies but these are more documentary than literary. His contribution to the historical literature of Punjab pertaining to the 19th century is monumental. Although his style is descriptive and engrossing yet at some places his attitude has become subjective and the descriptions of events charged with emotion.

Gu.S.

BAWANI (Rajasthani). Any composition with fifty two stanzas may be called a 'Bawani'. This has been a popular number with all sorts of writers. It has also its roots in the common man's parlance in the forms of 'Bawana Burja' (fifty two turrets in a fort), Bawani Ujada (a tract of wilderness spread over fifty two 'kosha' a couple of miles), and 'Bawana Bhairun', etc. A stronger reason may be the pattern of 'Akhar Bawani', (Prachina kavyaon ki Rupa parampara, introduction, Bikaner, 1962) written profusely in accordance with the 'Nagari' alphabets numbering fifty two. There is no restriction in regard to the metres, and any metrical writing limited to fifty two verses may be named as such. The first important work in chronological order is Chhihala Bawani, written by poet 'Chhihala' (16th century). Durasa Adha (16th-17th century) a poet of the first rank, wrote his Kirtara Bawani (Durasa Adha, New Delhi, 1983) in 'Chhappaya' metre. He has given a masterly description of the lot of people from all walks of life who have to struggle to earn a living. Bankidasa (19th century), the doyen in the field of such writings, has given us three such works–Kayara Bawani, Santosa Bawani; (Bankidasa Granthavali, pt. 3, Nagari Pracharini Sabha, Varansi, 1938) and Datara Bawani dealing with the demerits and merits of cowardice, satisfaction and literacy respetively. Instances of adding the names of metres to such titles are also available. Savaiya Bawani of Rajasi (18th century), Kundaliya Bawani of Dharmavardhana (18th century) and Kavitta Bawani of Jinaharsa (18th century) and Udairaja (18th century) are some of the examples. Among other such works, mention may be made of Kisana Bawani (1710) by Kisana, Guna Bawani by Bhainrudasa, Prastavika Bawani and Dharma Bawani by Dharmasi (18th century), Sara Bawani by Sarakavi and Bhama Bawani by Bhamashaha.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Hastalikhita granthan ki suchi, Pts.I-IV, Jodhpur.

Raw.S

BAYABHAV (Konkani, b. 1899, d. 1983), whose real name was Naik Kashinath Shridhar, was an eminent poet. He took his primary Marathi education in Goa and left for Bombay at an early age. In due course of time, he established his own 'Gomantak Printing Press' in Bombay and went on to publish almost all of Shenoy Gomybab's works. He also edited and published Novem Gomy (New Goa), a quarterly in Konkani for three years in collaboration with Shenoy Gomybab. Under the pen-name Bayabhav he published his first collection of poems, named Saddya-velim Fulam (Flowers in the Desert, 1946), thus ushering in the era of modern Konkani poetry. The collection contains poems written during 1923-1946, numbering fifteen in all. It begins with 'Konkan Amcho Desh' (Konkan, our Land) pledging solidarity with Konkani speaking community followed by poems like 'Magnem' (Appeal), 'Athreknni' (Longing) with the famous line, Vatt polletam, dukam gallaitam/Dolle gele suzun, (Waiting for you, sobbing, the eyes already swollen), 'Gomantageet' (song of Goa) etc. Some of these poems are odes on persons like his sister Baya Aka, sculptor Kamat and Shenoy Gomybab. They clearly express the poet's emotions and also musings on life and its affairs. 'Sadyavelem Ful' (Flower in the desert) is the longest poem in the collection, running into eighty lines. The second edition of the book appeared in 1982. Bayabhav had, in fact, prepared the press copy of a second collection of poems called Sukrut Fallam (Fruits of Fulfilment) even before bringing out the second edition of the first collection. However, it remains unknown why he did not get it printed. Sukrut Fallam contains, in addition, some twenty four new poems from the previous book. Script is subtitled, 'Poems written during 1923-80.'

Manohar Rai Sardesai the renowned poet and critic remarks: 'Bayabhav, the poet has the fire of emotions, the maturity of experience and high technical skill'. Bayabhav and Gomybab worked and also suffered together for the cause of Konkani language and literature. The relationship between the two is often described as analogous to that between Boswell and Johnson. Gomybab is regarded today as the undisputed father of Konkani Renaissance and its literary upsurge. Many do not know that Bayabhav, the man behind the curtain, the printer, publisher and the inspiring force behind Gomybab's monumental work deserves important share in the credit given to the latter.

P.G.T.

BAYAN, KHWAJA ASHAN-ULLAH KHAN (Urdu; d. 1213) was a Urdu poet. His forefather migrated from Kashmir. Born at Agra, be settled down at Delhi. He was a disciple of Mirza Mazhar Jan Janan in poetry and in spiritual matters a follower and disciple of Maulana Muhammed Fakhr-ud-Din. In later life he migrated to Hyderabad where he got employment under Nizam Ali Khan Nizam-ul-Mulk, ruler of Hyderabad. He died in 1213.

His Diwan includes, besides ghazals, a masnavi Chang Nama or Chik Nama, two qasidas and a few rubais. He is known primarily as a ghazal writer. He was a contemporary of Yaqeen, Fughan and Qasim etc.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: N.H. Hashmi, Dilli Ka Dabistan-e-Shairi,2nd edn. Lucknow, 1965; Sri Ram, Khumkhanae javed Vol 1. Lahore 1908.

G.J.

BAYT (Sindhi). Originally Arabic, the word Byat (couplet) has retained its meaning in Persian, but has acquired a wider connotation and significance in Sindhi poetry which observes the rules of Persian Prosody as well as Sanskritic 'Chhandas'. In the first case, 'bayt' is a distich (pair of 'misras' or verse lines) or a couplet (pairs of successive lines which may or may not rhyme).

In the chhands and matra system, in Sindhi, 'dohas' and 'sorathas' are the basic units known as 'bayts'. These are of four varieties:

1. In which the last word of the first half of the first hemistich rhymes with the last word of the first half of the second hemistich.
2. In which the last word of the first half of the first hemistich rhymes with the ending word of the second hemistich.
3. In which the last word of the first hemistich rhymes with the last word of the first half of the second hemistich.
4. In which the last word of the first hemistich rhymes with the last word of the second hemistich.

But then, that is not all. There is no restriction as to the number of hemistichs a 'bayt' can have. One of the bayts of Shah Abdul Latif well known for its concluding lines has as many as eleven hemistichs.

It is necessary to point out that 'bayt' is, perhaps, the oldest genre of Sindhi poetry. However, it is still under dispute whether the extant bayts relating to the folk-tale of Dodo Chanesar, said to have been composed between 1290 and 1321 (during the reign of Sumras), could be termed as the earliest bayt.

S.M.J.

BEDEKAR, DINKAR KESHAV (Marathi; b. 1910, d. 1973) was one among the outstanding thinkers and critics in modern Marathi. He was born at Satara and educated at Pune, Karachi, Shantiniketan and Benaras. He studied for engineering but gave it up and turned to painting. This course also he could not go through. At the end he got his degree at the Benaras Hindu University in 1932 in Philosophy and Economics. He joined the worker's movement in Bombay and became a member of the communist party. He underwent a two year term of imprisonment in 1940. After that due to difference of opinion he resigned his membership of the party and withdrew completely from active politics. He took his M.A. with Philosophy in 1954 and began to work as editor of the quarterly journal Arthavidyan started by the Gokhale Institute of Economics and Politics. He worked as a lecturer in Philosophy for a short period, (1954-56) at Nasik, then as sectional Editor in the office of Marathi Encyclopaedia at Wai, (1962-64); again in Gokhale Institute as the Editor of Marathi translations. When he died, he was Professor of Philosophy at the Tilak Maharashtra Vidyapith, Pune.

Bedekar had started his literary career in 1936 with short stories and political articles. All his important writing however was done after 1950, in literary criticism and philosophy. He put to close critical examination the so called elements of modernism in literature and aesthetics and tried to define the basis of the modern philosophy of existentialism, as a Godless religious creed. His critical and thoughtful writing is contained in such books as Sahitya Nirmiti Ani Samiksha (1954), Sahityavichar (1964), Keshavsutanchi Kavya Dristi (1966), Adhunik Marathi Kavya, Udaya, Vikas Ani Bhavitavya (1969), Samajchintan (1969) and Vicharyatra (1975) reveal his social thinking. His philosophical writings include his massive work, Hegel, Jivan Ani Tatvadnyan (1966) and Astitvavadachi Olakha (1972).

He tended to look upon the work of art as a product of the interaction between the world of material reality outside and the psyche of the individual artist. All products of art have a social and cultural context and have to be understood and evaluated with the aid of social sciences. His critical credo was formed by that aspect of dialectical materialism which remained true to Hegel. He believed in the concept of beauty but also believed that it was related to historical and social traditions. Besides literature, he dealt with other fine arts such as painting and sculpture. Even though he could not evolve a whole scheme of life-oriented aesthetics, he, at all times, tried to relate the history of literature with its contemporary practice. He also examined the roots of Indian aesthetics and the theory of 'Rasa'.

His other writings are Hindi Udyogdhandyat Rabnarya streeya va Mule (1936), Sanyukta Maharashtra (1947), Sumitranandan Pant (1948), Anuyugatil Manavadharma (1971) Towards Understanding Gandhi (1975), Dharmachintan (1977) and Dharma Shraddha Ek Punarvichar (1977). He edited with B.S. Bhange the volume, Bharatiya Prabodhan: Samikshan va Chikitsa (1972).

D.K. Bedekar brought to the treatment of literary problems and work a rigorous training in logic and philosophy and a firm conviction in the validity of marxist compulsions. His analysis of B.S. Mardhekar and modern short-story writers as well as of Keshavsut remains thought-provoking. He was firm in his thinking, though by no means rigid, as was seen in his writings in the final stages.

M.D.H.

BEDEKAR, MALTI VISHRAM (Marathi, b. 1904), the Marathi novelist, was Miss Balutai Khare before marriage. She graduated from the S.N.D.T. Women's University in 1923. Before starting novel writing she was already the author of two books Alankarmanjusha (1931) and Hindu Vyavahar Dharma Sastra (1932) which she wrote in collaboration with K.N. Kelkar. Then appeared Kalyanche Nisvas (1933) with an introduction by Ketkar under her pseudonym Vibhavari Shirurkar. This book created quite a sensation in the literary circles, not because of its literary merit alone but because of its theme also. The stories in this book almost for the first time deal with complicated social problems of the educated middle-class women. The main issue raised in these stories was primarily this: The women were denied education till almost the first decade of this century, but thereafter women's education progressed with the times and the controversial issue of female education seemed to have been solved. However, could one say, the educated woman become happy because of her education? She had to face other and newer problems, one of which was whether to look after her father's family or to look after her own interests.

Hindolyavar (1934) her next book, a novel, posed a still more intriguing challenge of the educated woman to the society. Achala, the heroine of this novel was already a married woman, but her husband was undergoing a long-term sentence in jail. In the meantime she had fallen in love with an intelligent advocate, and now she yearned to give birth to and raise the child of her lover. The issue was stormy and it was bound to call for an uproar in certain sections of society, which could not bring itself to agree with her decision. Then came Virlele Swapna (1935) a thin novel in the form of a diary. The real authorship of these books was a closely guarded secret.

After a long silence of 15 years when she wrote Bali (1950) one felt that the book was worth waiting for' Bali in an extremely brisk and controlled style tells the story of the inmates of a criminal tribal settlement camp. This proved to be a major novel of the author.

Then came a number of novels like Shabari, Jai ani Changuna, which somehow failed to achieve the impact of her former works. The former fire was somehow missing. She has also written a play Paradh and a book of reflections, Manasviniche Chintan. Such books reveal the making of a dedicated woman given to social work.

M.M.

BEDEKAR VISHVANATH (VISHRAM) (Marathi; b. 1906) is a Marathi novelist, playwright and film maker. He hails from Amravati (Vidarbha). He is a post graduate with a degree in law. His first contribution to literature was a play Brahmakumari (1933). It deals with the mythological story of Ahilya, who was married to the sage Gautam and was duped by Indra into submission. After some attempts at film making (Thakiche Langa and Satyache Prayog) he went over to Germany for further training in film technique. But on the eve of the Second World War, he had to return to India. This bitter experience led him to write a short novel Ranangana (1939), which was destined to change the course of the Marathi novel. He, however, threw himself head-long into writing scripts for the screen, some of which like Shejari and Amar Bhupali were instantanous hits. He also wrote and directed Pahila Palana and Vasudev Balwant, which were some of the distinctive Marathi films of the era. For many years onwards he devoted his talent and time to the making of pictures. Then once again he turned to his first love and wrote a few plays including Naro Wa Kunjaro Wa (1961), Waje Paul Apule (1967)—both adaptations of foreign plays and finally a biographical play 'Tilak Ani Agarkar' (1980).

Ranangana is a novel to reckon with; it has something original to offer in theme and technique. It tells the story of two star-crossed lovers, Chakradhara an Indian and Harta, a German Jew refugee. They had accidentally met on the deck of a sailing ship bound for Hongkong. The story starts with the suicide news of Harta and recedes back to the events which lead to the tragedy. The delicate love story takes shape amidst the complex happenings on the board of the ship. The narration is simple, brisk, bereft of rhetorical flourishes. Ranangan is an important landmark in the history of Marathi fiction.

Bedekar's play Tilak Ani Agarkar unravels the tangled thread of relationship between the two great men in the making. It has become quite popular in Maharashtra. He has also written an autobiography under the title Ek zad Ani Don Pakshi which earned him the Sahitya Akademi award of 1985.

M.M.

'BEDHAB' BANARASI (K.D. PRASAD GAUR—Hindi; b. 1895) Born in Benaras, he became a lecturer in the local D.A.V. College after taking his M.A. degree and subsequently became its principal. He has written humorous and satrical poems in Hindi under the pen name of 'Bedhab Banarasi'. He has so far published about a dozen books in prose and poetry.

Bedhab's poems deal with problems of love, romance, modernity and politics. His humorous poems present biting and sarcastic comments on the incongruities of our present long life. Bedhab took to humorous writing at a time when the revivalist trends in the entire national life were very strong.

One comes across in the short stories of Bedhab the conflicting complexities of society. There was turmoil in the life of middle class and both villages as well as cities were passing through a transitional phase. There was conflict between the values of the village and the city, between those of the service class, between Indian and Western values. This conflict found expression in Bedhab's short stories. He invested humour with the dignity of a serious literary genre and endeavoured to develop it along healthy lines.

His major composition include Bedhab Ki Bahak (1940), Kavya Kamal (collection of poems, 1940), Banarasi Ekka (short story), Gandhi ka Bhoot aur Tanatan (short stories), Abhineta (play), Laftanto-pigeon Ki Diary (1968).

Gov.R.

BEDI, RAJINDER SINGH (Urdu; b. 1915 d. 1984) son of Sardar Hira Singh Bedi (a Punjabi Khatri) and Smt. Seva Dal (a Punjabi Brahmin), Rajinder Singh was born in Village Dhale-Ki, Tehsil Daska, District Sialkot (now in Pakistan) on Ist September 1915. He did his Matriculation in 1931 and Intermediate in 1932. While still a student, he wrote a number of poems and short stories in Urdu, English and Punjabi. All these were published here and there but have not been included in any of his collections. His first employment was as clerk in a post office in Lahore (1933-1943); second a brief six month's engagement in the Publicity Department of the Central Government in Delhi (1943) and the third as staff artist in the All India Radio, Lahore (1943-46). He married Somavati renamed Satwant Kaur in 1934 when he was hardly nineteen years of age i.e. soon after joining service. He joined Sangam Publishers Ltd., in 1946, but left them and Lahore also for good in 1947 to settle down at Delhi. He visited Kashmir in 1948 as part of a writer's delegation and became Station Director, Jammu Radio Station. He returned to Delhi in 1949 but soon left the metropolis to join films in Bombay. He wrote stories, film-scripts and dialogues for over 40 films, prominent among these are 'Devdas', 'Mirza Ghalib', 'Daag', 'Madhumati', 'Anuradha', 'Anupama' and 'Abhiman'. Also produced and directed a few films including 'Dastak' which won a National Award.

In his literary career of over fifty years he wrote only 70 short-stories which are contained in six collections, namely Dana-o-Dam (1936), Grehan (1942), Kokh Jali (1949), Apne Dukh Mujhe de do (1965), Haath Hamare Kalam Huei (1974), Mukti-Bodh (1982). These six collections contain all major stories of Bedi. Later collections like Garam Kot, Lambi Larki, Jogia, Mehman etc. also appeared but almost all their contents are drawn from the earlier six collections. While it is difficult to pick out his best, stories, like Bhola, Garam Kot, Grehan, Rehman ke joote, Zainsul abdin Gha mein bazar mein, Kokh jali, Gaali Lajwanti, Babhal, Lambi Larki, Apne Dukh mujhe de do, Haath Hamare Kalam Huai, Jogia, Sirf ek Cigareette and Mukti-Bodh are often discussed as some of the finest short-stories in Urdu.

Bedi has also written some plays which are often referred to as significant additions to Urdu drama. These are Be-jaan Cheezen (1943) and Saat Khel (1946). His novel Ek Chadar Maili Si (1962) won the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1965. Other honours and awards include 'Padma Sri' (1972), Ghalib Award (1978), besides several filmfare and regional awards. Bedi lost his wife in 1977. In 1979, he suffered an attack of paralysis and was confined to bed for several years. The death of his wife and soon thereafter of his son Narinder Bedi (a film producer-director) was perhaps much too much of an emotional burden. He did not recover from his illness and died on 11 November, 1984, an unhappy and disillusioned man whose great mind would have further enriched the coffers of Urdu literature.

After the death of Premchand, Bedi was one of the four great writers of Urdu fiction whose influence inspire generations of writers for several decades. The others were Manto, Krishan Chander and Ismat Chugtai.

Although he remained a follower of the progressive writers movement right from the date of its birth in 1936, Bedi has never written in accordance with the dictates of that movement. His stories are the tales of life he encountered and experienced.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Gopichand Narang, Urdu Afsana Riwayat aur Masait, (Delhi, 1981); Jaeza (Peshawar) Bedi special Number, (1983).

B.V.

'BEDIL' QADIR BUX (Sindhi b. 1814, d. 1872) Fakir Qadirbux better known by his nom-de-plume 'Bedil' (One bereft of heart), was the son of Khalifo Mohamed Muhqsin, who was a disciple and an ardent admirer of the Sindhi poet Sachal Sarmast, one of the great Trinity of Sindhi poetry–Shah, Sachal and Sami.

After this famous trio of Sindhi poets, two other stars that shone on the firmament of Sindhi poetry and who could measure upto them in excellence, were the father and son-Bedil and Bekas. They wrote poetry both in Sindhi and Persian.

Bedil was well versed in a number of languages Sindhi, Persian, Urdu, Arabic and Hindi. He has written poetry in Sindhi, Siraiki, Urdu, Persian and even in Hindi.

The burden of his poetry is sufistic which cult he inherited from his Murshid–Sachal, but he was not a rebel like the great Bard and did not offend Mullahs and Maulvis as Sarmast did. He was a staunch muslim who moulded his life strictly according to the laws of 'Shariat'. He was very simple and frugal in his style of living and gave away, whatever he received, to the needy.

He followed the path of Ishqu Majazi (Physical love) to attain the heights of Ishaqu Haqiqi (spiritual love) as dictated by the Sufistic doctrine.

He was a devotee of Lal Qalander Shahbaz of Sehwan also. Although he had deformity in one foot, yet he undertook long journeys to Sehwan to pay his homage to the Saint's shrine. He went to Jhok Sharif to pay homage to the Shrine of the Sufi saints, Shah Inayat and also to Daraz, to visit the shrine of Sachal. He compiled as many as 23 books on prose and poetry written in Persian, Sindhi and Urdu more known being Masanavi Riyaz Alfugr, Diwan-e-Sulook-ul-Talbin, Diwan Minahaj-ul Haquiqat-a, Rumuz ul-Qadri, Masnavi-Nahr-ul Bahr (Persian poetry), Panj Ganj (Persian Prose) Diwan Musbah-ul-Tariqat (third collection of Persian ghazals), Vahdat Namo (couplets in Sindhi) Sarud Namo (Kafis and couplets in Sindhi and Siraiki) and Diwan-e-Bedil (collection of Urdu ghazals).

Among his poetical compositions we have his famous elegy Diwan-e-Bedil, written on the death of Sachal Sarmast immortalizing the master and incidentally himself too. Some of the verses from this elegy are "Wonderful was the magic of love in Daraz, my friend Sachu was there, the intoxicated seeker and the gnostic. Heavy was the shower of rain, of yearning on that hero. The pangs of separation were there, visible and invisible. Inebriated he was, truly, with the rapture of oneness. Verily he was another Mansoor, love itself incarnate. He was attar (perfume) himself in fervour and sentiment. Commander he stood in the ranks of those given to love. Bedil haunts the door of the donor for a gift of his ardour. About himself he proclaims in the mood and style of Sachal: "I am what I am. I put on various garments, and again divest myself of them" (Diwan-e-Bedil,) Khangah is the shrine where thousands of his Murids (followers) throng every day to pay the homage to the great saint poet–Abdul Qadir by birth and Qadir Bux by his choice.

BIBLIOGRAPHY :Abdul Majid Sindhi, Fiqre Bedil, (1970-71), Diwan-e-Bedil, 1954. L.D. Keswani, Sindhi Shaira-Ji-Kasauti, 1946.

R.P.

BEEJ (Hindi) is a novel by Amrit Rai about the Indian middle classe, during the period immediately preceding Independence. All the leading characters in the novel, Babu Bhagwan Sahai, his son-in-law Chandrama Babu, his daughter Rajeshwari, Prafulla Babu and his son Amulya, Satyavan and his wife Usha, belong to various middle-class families, and reflect the multi-layered social structure of the Indian society in the forties. The incidents of the novel cover the period from 1942 to 1947; and through them, the novelist discusses a wide variety of subjects, like exploitation of woman, the dowry system, blackmarketing and the need for socialist thinking.

Babu Bhagwan Sahai is a Head Clerk, deeply steeped in the Indian middle-class ethic of displaying one's affluence to impress people around. He spends lavishly at the wedding of his daughter Rajeshwari but does not bother to check whether a sensitive and well-brought up girl like her, could adjust to an oppressive marriage with a poverty stricken Chandrama Babu. Rajeshwari comes back from the husband's house never to return. She falls in love with a scoundrel Mahendra who, when he finds that Rajeshwari is expecting his child, gets her murdered.

In contrast to the incredible tragedy of the poor tormented Rajeshwari is the story of Satyavan and Usha. Satyavan who is deeply moved by his reading of the writing of Marx and Engels, decides to rebel against the constricting joint family system, which is making life miserable for him and his wife Usha. He moves away from the folds of the joint family despite the mother's vehement protests and gradually wins his wife to his liberated thinking. He explains to her how the traditional social system has exploited women and how she must rise above it. Usha changes slowly confessing that her husband had indeed planted a new seed of knowledge in her heart. She begins to teach the children of the poor and the downtrodden and finds that her life has acquired a new meaning.

Interwoven with the family drama is the theme of social and political upheaval. Linguistically, Beej (1953) is a smoothly flowing work of fiction. The Hindi, liberally mixed with Urdu and local colloquialism, fits the locale admirably and the contrast between the urban languages of the educated folk, with the less refined but equally graphic idiom of the common people is interesting.

M.P.

BELAGALI, D.N. (Kannada, b. 1931). Born at Banahatti in Bijapur District and educated at Ainapur, he passed the Bombay SSLC Examination and after acquiring qualification as a Hindi teacher he joined the Banahatti High School where he continues to work. He has made his mark as a writer of short stories with four collections to his credit. Benna-Hindina Kannu, Sittyako Raya Nanamyala, Masterana Hendati and Goudara Magalu. He is among the few writers in Kannada who use the vividly portrayed rural background and life as the mainstay of his fiction. He has written a few books for youngsters of which Badukuva Bayake won a national award. A survey of the novel in Kannada and an introduction to the life and work of the Hindi writer Premchand are among his critical works. Jogi Maradi brings together some of his poems. His popularity rests on his stories which are true to life without any particular bias or emphasis.

V.M.I.

BENDRE, DATTATREYA RAMACHANDRA (Kannada; b. 1896, d. 1981) an eminent Kannada poet was born in a Chitpavan Brahmin family from Dharwad. What he received from his forefathers was a genuing love of knowledge. His grandfather was a great vedic scholar. But his father, since he suffered from scrofula, lived with a sense of duty, as if to hand over the torch of knowledge to his son. It was the poet's mother and his grandmother who played a crucial role in shaping the personality and spirit of Bendre. His mother could give nothing to her son except her love which instilled in his tender mind a profound reverence for life and a sincere faith in a supreme power.

Bendre was educated at Poona and after his B.A. returned to Dharwad in 1918. He got employed as a teacher in a local high school, and started his literary career; he organised a friends' circle called Geleyara Gumpu which attracted many new idealists and talented writers like V.K. Gokak, R.S. Mugali, Madhura Chenna, Krishna Sharma Betgeri, S.B. Joshi and many others. Bendre acted as a mentor of this group and he infused a sense of purpose and significance into the the activities of the circle.

After his retirement as a professor of Kannada at Sholapur, Bendre returned to Dharwad. His reputation as a poet of eminence had been steadily increasing and it was confirmed when he received the most prestigious Jnanapith award in the year 1974. Incidentally he has tried his hand at other forms of literature like drama, short story and personal essays with considerable success. But these works, although important in their own way, are by-products of his creative intellect; it is poetry which is the most profound expression of his whole being. It was poetry which revealed to him the doctrine of 'Samarasa' (The Unity of Being), a principle of creativity which is aesthetic as well as metaphysical. Creativity for Bendre is the foundation of all existence and his poetry is the manifestation of this principle.

Bendre as a poet came to limelight by the publication of his first collection of poems 'Gari' (The Feather), a collection which is unique in many respects. He has published in all about 27 collections of poems which have established him as a poet of eminence in Karnataka. Bendre is one of the most sophisticated Kannada poets and, at the same time, he is the most popular. He is not only a writer of poetry but also a performer and many of his popular poems possess the power and beauty of the oral tradition. Of course, the use of colloquial language and folk imagery is the main reason for the popularity of these poems. Although he used the 'language of the tribe.' it was completely modified and enriched in its poetic usage. One would venture to describe Bendre's handling of poetic language as an 'orchestration of several dialects', in the sense that each particular blend of the colloquial and standardized form of speech reveals a complex of feelings, ideas and attitudes of life.

Unlike many other modernist poets writing today, Bendre is a poet of celebration, a poet who has reverence for life. But he is not a humanist in a restricted sense, for his humanism has a transcendental, almost a mystical quality. His belief in life is the result of his belief in the divine and therefore, every metaphor, or even a simple image that he uses is an act of faith. That is why his poetry does not deal with the conflict between good and evil; if at all there is any conflict, it is between being and non-being. Addressing Gayatri in his 'Gayatri Sukta' Bendre says, "You have fixed (literally speaking 'pressed') a cluster of stars like a series of crest-jewels on the innumerable hoods of the python of darkness." Gayatri is the primal force behind all the activities of the universe and takes as much care to paint the wings of a butterfly as to suspend the stars and planets in the void. But the image of stars and darkness also sheds light on the conflict of being and non-being. Light is positive in its character, persistence and action while darkness is both the womb and tomb of all existence, but mainly negative. Only love which transcends all differences can separate light from darkness.

The poetry of Bendre is neither narrative nor dramatic in form but it is essentially lyrical. It was R.S. Mugali who identified the form and called it 'intellectual lyric'. But the phrase, although true to some extent, needs further classification. Bendre's lyrics are songs which are profoundly simple, depicting either love or beauty of nature. There are poems which have dialectical structure expressing the complex and ambivalent aspects of human experience. Kalpa Vriksha Vrindavanangalali (In the grooves of Kalpa Vriksha and Vrindavana), a poem depicting the mystery of love, which is erotic as well as mystic, through an image of heaven, represents mythical poetry. In the same way Mahanubhavaru (The Mighty ones), a poem addressed to the three seasons, is a metaphysical lyric reminding one of the austere precision and flame-like pur of a vedic hymn.

The poets of Bendre's generation are all idealists, and they believe that poetry has some mission and a poet ought to fulfil some obligations to his country and the society to which he belongs. Bendre has written many poems which are filled with genuine patriotic and reformist zeal. The poem Muvattu Muru Koti (The thirty three crores), which sarcastically presents the moral degeneration of the Indians, is one of the most popular of his poems. Similarly he has also written poems on the social and economic problems of our country. But, in spite of the powerful appeal of these pieces, they fail to attain the perfection and excellence of the other kinds of poems that he has written. It is not true to say that the appeal of these poems is limited because they deal with topical problems. The reason is that the language and idiom of Bendre's poetry are not drawn from the world of academic ideologies. His language is shaped by the fundamental principles that govern the life of an organic community, and his imagination and intellect have deep roots in the historical beliefs and the behavioural pattern of our people. His poetry describes a world with God in its centre and life on the periphery, and the relation between the two is that of love. The aesthetic and moral values of his poetry have definitely strengthened the tradition of Kannada poetry

FURTHER WORKS: Poetry: Krishnakumari (1922), Murti matty Kamakasturi (1934), Sakhigita (1937), Uyyale (1938), Madalile (1938) Meghduta (1943), Hadu-Padu (1946), Gangavatarana (1951) Aralu-Maralu (1956). Criticism : Sahitya Mattu Vimarshe (1937), Sahitya Samshodhane (1940), Kavyodyoga (1962), Sahityada Virta Svarupa (1974). Drama : Hucctagalu (1936), Hosa Samsara mattu Itra Natakagalu (1950).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: B.H. Sridhar, Bendre ... (1956); K.D. Kurtkoti. Bhringada Benneri. (1975); V.K. Gokak, Bendre, Poet and Seer, (English) 1970.

K.D.K.

BENJAMIN BAILY (Malayalam; b. 1791, d. 1871) is known for his contribution to printing, compilation of dictionaries and translation of the Bible into Malayalam

He was born in Dusebery in Yorkshire in 1791. On completion of his education, he joined the Church Mission Society and came to Kottayam in 1817 at the age of 26. While engaged in his activities as a missionary, he also worked as the Principal of the Theological Seminary at Kottayam for 18 months. After a short while, he left that field and concentrated on printing, translation and linguistic studies with a view to enhancing his efficiency in propogating the Gospel. He translated the Bible into Malayalam with the help of scholars like Moses Iverfaty (a Jew), Vaidyanatha Iyer (a Tamil Brahmin) and Chattu Menon (a Keralite Nair). With nobody to direct or help him, he made a wooden printing press and moulded models of Malayalam script with his own hands. This is how he gave birth to the first ever printing house in Kerala, namely the C.M.S. Press at Kottayam, from where he published the New Testament in 1824 and the Complete Bible in 1848, thereby enriching the Malayalam language.

Baily's fame rests on his dictionaries. A Dictionary of High and Colloquial Malayalam and English was published in 1846. This great book of 852 pages was the result of his constant and dedicated work for 29 years. In 1849 he published his English and Malayalam Dictionary (545 pages). These dictionaries are planned scientifically and function as a firm foundation for the growth of Malayalam language. Baily started Jnananikshepam, one of the earlier magazines in Malayalam which began to be published from the C.M.S. Press in 1848. Baily returned to England in 1850 and died at the age of 80.

BIBLIOGRAPHY John Chandy, The Rev. Benjamin Baily and the Kottayam C.M.S. Press,, Kerala Society Papers, series 4, (1928-34). P. Cherian., Malabar Syrians and the Church Missionary Society Kottayam, 1935., Thomas, Malayalam Literature and Christians Kottayam, 1961. Samuel Chandanappally, Models of Missionary Malayalam Prose, Kottayam, 1975.

S.C.

BE-SOKH RUH (Kashmiri) is the only collection of poems, of the internationally reputed artist (Painter, State Academy Award Winner for Kashmiri Opera Gulrez and play But-tu-Buldozer) Ghulam Rasul, Santosh (b. 1929). It covers a period of about twenty years (1954-73) of his creativity. The book is spread over 392 pages containing 29 poems (1954-71), 125 Ghazals, (lyrics 1962-73) and 30 sonnets (1960-65). Be-Sokh Ruh (Restless soul) has been edited by the author himself, depicting his approach to life and artistic quest for finding truth and being one with the infinite 'Siva'-The Source of all pervading 'Sakti' (force) making the matter living in endless motion with immense mercurial forms. Santosh received the Sahitya Akademi Award for the collection in 1978, at a special function in his home city, Srinagar.

Santosh first wrote narrative poems; then he turned to Sonnet writing but has written Ghazals at the same time from 1962 onwards.

The poet has his own individual style and diction, but one may say that he has selected his poetical compositions indiscriminately. He is basically an artist (painter) par-excellence. All of his creative endeavours do not possess creative, artistic and aesthetic value. But some times he succeeds in making artistic experiments as could be seen in one of his poems and sonnets like 'Ves-Minany Noorah' (Noora, my sweet heart) and 'Raat' (The Night), and also in letters like 'Lakhchi Chu Lakchun' (Lakhch's Mole). In his sonnet 'The Night', for example, he writes:

A Star come tumbling down the sky and splintered against the night's dark glass it flashed and fell. I felt a pang and on the earth, behind the wall a pair locked in embrace, close as the mouth of thirst to a water fount, a wail some one is dead,
a shout of joy some one is born– a son to a young mother, perhaps.
He looks plight truth, thereon owls screech, someone lets body for hire, desire deflowering a jessamine youth, thought leads to thought scraping my wounded heart and night looks on.

He has written sonnets in the octave-sestet and three quatrains and a couplet form as well as attempted to naturalize other rhyme schemes and even what may be called the blank verse Sonnet. He is among the first rank sonnet writers of Kashmiri poetry.

He has also introduced a prosodial experiment in Kashmiri poetry called Bahr-e-Taweel (the longest rhyme scheme), as can be seen in his introductory page.

The dominant theme of Santosh's poetry is love, both earthly and celestial. He wants a harmonious society based on equality and justice, irrespective of caste and creed. Santosh stands for international brotherhood and cosmopolitan human values as in one of his poems on page 77 of the book he says:–

I do not know who gave me birth and where was I born. When I opened my eyes I saw my known self. The time was glittering like a mirror. Some one read Allah-o-Akbar in my ears. I thus turned to be a Muslim. I requested them to dub me as a human being. On hearing this they made me suckle my mother's breast to be quiet.

Disillusionment, aimlessness, and disappointment are conspicuous in his poetry by their absence. He has not adopted modernism as a fashion. He has definite views about life and art. He has a destination in the present day world of chaos and is trying to find a way for himself, maybe by way of intuition or a being a mystic and a yogi. It may be a futile attempt, but he is firm in his conviction. He has his own ideal romantic world, which he tries to portray in his sensuous romantic images. He practises 'tantra' in his paintings, which has definitely crept into his poetry. His Bahr-e-Taweel may not reveal anything concrete but one gets lost into its spontaneity, craftsmanship and fascinating alliteration.

Santosh has his own individual style and diction. He does not borrow images from outside. His poetry breathes in his millieu. He is proud of the inherent potentialities of his mother tongue as a vehicle of poetic thought. His idiom, his selection of words, and metaphors are familiar.

Ghazal (Lyric) originally is meant for love theme. In view of its subjective content, it could be compared with English sonnet. Following the pre and post-Independence formative era, Ghazal had already accommodated new realities for a changed world in the late 40's. Like other contemporaries Santosh has also accepted the challenge representing the feelings of modern man in his Ghazal. Santosh seems to be a poet of faith but some times distrust haunts him and he cries,

I) May be that I will be strangled by my own hands;
The unrealiable times have robbed me of the trust I had.
II) The city has turned desolate, I alone live
The time is all fire I alone melt.
III) For ages together he lived and travelled by my side
In the end he parted, saying your memory is not your faithful guide.
IV) First he chopped off my hands
And then offered to go hand in hand.

Santosh sees unity in diversity. He yearns to be one with the infinite reality, by achieving paramananda, the super tranquility. For this he delves deep into the ocean of Hindu mythology.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J.L. Koul, Studies in Kashmiri, Kapur Brothers, Srinagar 1968. Trilokinath Raina, An Anthology of Kashmiri Verse 1972.

S.R.P.

BETAB, NARAYAN PRASAD (Hindi; b. 1872, d. 1945). His ancestors, who were Brahma Bhatta Brahmans, came and settled in Delhi. His father, poet Dhala Rai was a pupil of the famous poet Mirza Ghalib. When in Calcutta, Betab wrote plays for Alfred Theatrical Company. During that period he also brought out a magazine in which translations of Shakespeare's plays were published.

Betab was a playwright associated with the mythological school of Parsi Theatre. He wrote plays for the spectators who wanted to see with their own eyes their gods and godesses, their glory, and their supernatural powers. These plays had also parallel minor stories meant to entertain the spectators. Alongside, the difference between the old and the new was also demonstrated.

The object of Betab's plays was to present before the spectators the mythological stories, anecdotes, and characters and at the same time entertain them and give them religious sermons. The languages used in his plays is, more or less, colloquial in nature. His major plays are: Zahri Sanp (1906), Mahabharata (1913), Ramayana (1915), Patni-Pratap (1919), Krishna Sudama (1920), Shankh ki Shararat (1920), Hamari Bhul (1937), and Sakuntala (1945).

Gov.R.

BETAGERI, KRISHNASHARMA (Pseudonym 'Anandakanda') (Kannada; b. 1900). As he was afficted by plague in his early childhood, he could not get higher education. But he read at home the Kannada classics and also was deeply influenced by the folk-poetry and folk-drama. In his early youth he came over to Dharwad and for some time worked as a teacher in the National schools of Belgaum, Dharwad and Bangalore. After that, he took to journalism and worked as the Editor of Jayanti, a Kannada monthly magazine of high standard.

Betageri's literary output is varied. His poetry, although it gradually lost the beauty and simplicity of his early writings, is known for its musical and picturesque qualities.

Betageri's achievement in the area of fiction is considerably significant. The short stories in two of his collections, Badatanada Balu (1932) and Matanduva Kallu depict the life of ordinary men and women in realstic details. What is significant is that the stories reveal a pattern of culture in the utterly wretched life of the individuals. The documentation of life in these stories is so authentic that a social scientist with some insight could build up new sociological theories on the basis of this material. Besides these stories, Betageri has written six novels, out of which four are historical. The two social novels,–Sudarsana (1933) and Magala Maduve (Daughter's marriage, 1952) made some impact when they were published. Sudarsana depicts the experiences of an idealist against the ruthless pragmatism of the actual world. The second novel deals with the tensions caused by the problem of the marriage of a daughter and is frankly realistic in its outlook.

The historical novels of Betageri deal with the colourful life of the heroes of the Vijayanagara empire, and in spite of their patriotic fervour and a fascination for heroic personality, they present history in a meaningful perspective.In his latest novel Mallikarjuna (1961) a group of fictitious characters made up of artisans and beggars, comment on the political happenigns in the country, slowly building the structure of the meaning of history.

Betageri is a creative writer as well as a scholar of eminence. His book on Kanakadasa's Mohana Tarangini contains criticism of high erudition. Next to Bendre and Shivaram Karanth, he is a great authority on folk arts like poetry, music and drama.

FURTHER WORKS: Bhavagit (Lyrics) 1926., Muddana Matu (Poems) 1927., Prasarna Venkata Bhagavata (Research) 1927., Sansar Chitra, short stories 1934., Karnatakada Janajivara (Research) 1939., Benda Hridaya (Plays) 1954.

K.D.K.

BETAI SUNDARJI GOKALDAS (Gujarati; b. 1905) was a poet, critic and translator. He was born at Shankhoddhar-Bet (Dwarka).

He obtained primary and secondary education at his native place. He studied for two years at St. Xavier's College, Bombay and passed his B.A. Examination from Elphinstone College and LL.B. Examination from the Law College, Bombay. Thereafter he joined Karve Mahavidyalaya as a Lecturer. Later on he joined S.N.D.T. Women's University, Bombay as a Professor of Gujarati. His collections of poetry include Jyoti-Rekha (1934). Indra-Dhanu (1939), Visheshanjali (1952) Sadgat Chandrashilane (1959), Anuvyanjana (1974), Shishire Vasant (1976), and Shravani Zarmar (1982). Among his metrical verse compositions, his specific contribution to sonnet is considered a landmark in Gujarati literature. His poetry is marked with clarity of expression. His poems dealing with pathos are also noteworthy. His Sadgat Chandrashilane is a noteworthy attempt to write an elegy.

His contribution to the field of Gujarati criticism is significant. His mature critical insight is moulded by the principles of Indian poetics. Gujarati Sahityaman Sonnet is a collection of his articles on the form of sonnet, which also includes his response to 18 best Gujarati sonnets. His other works include Suvarna-Megh (1964), and Amod (1978). He has written a monograph on Narsinghrao in the Makers of Indian Literature Series of Sahitya Akademi. Over and above his translations of English books such as Mahamana Thoreau, Walden, he has also translated the last four cantos of the Mahabharata viz: Mahabharatna Chhella Char Parvo (1976) and has given verse translation of Bhagavadgita, titled Romharshini which aptly reflect his proficiency as a verse translator. He has also edited text-books such as Sahitya Madhuri, Sahityodyan, and Sahitya Sushama.

Betai's poetry is marked by diction drawn mainly from Sanskrit classics and mastery over metres. Increasing presence of certain playfulness is revealed in his later poetry. These features establish him as one of the leading figures of the Gandhian Era. His chief achievement lies perhaps in the longer poetic form known as Khand-Kavya.

B.J.

BEZBARUA, LAKSHMINATH (Assamese; b. 1868, d. 1938). Lakshminath Bezbarua's father, Dinanath Bezbarua was a Munsif under East India Company's Government. He was the last of the Bezbaruas to be appointed as a physician under the Ahom kings. He was pensioned off in the year 1838 when he was serving king Purandar Singha as his physician.

Lakshminath's schooling began in the Sibsagar Govt. High School. He proceeded to Calcutta after passing the Entrance examination and in the year 1986 he graduated from there and prosecuted his studies for the M.A. and B.L. examinations. But due to some unforeseen reasons he had to discontinue his studies. He was married to Prajnasundari Devi, daughter of Hemendranath Tagore and grand daughter of Maharashi Devendranath and one of the nieces of Rabindranath Tagore. After his wedding Lakshminath joined hands with the great Assamese timber merchant, Bholanath Barua in his business. Later he got a job under M/s. Bind and Co. and at long last he started his own timber business at Sambhalpur in Orissa. During his studies in Calcutta Lakshminath came in touch with the Romantic poetry of the West. Lakshminath, Chandrakanta Bardoloi, Hemchandra Goswami and Rajanikanta Bardoloi spontaneously responded to the influences that came to them through English education. They promptly recognised this romantic possibility and their delight in colour, physical beauty and love was exhibited in their writings. They gave a new freedom to our literature and as a result a new age in Assamese poetry was ushered under western influence.

Lakshminath Bezbarua by dint of his versatility enriched all the branches of the Assamese literature. For this reason, this period of fifty years of Assamese literature is described as the Bezbarua epoch by some critics. Born in a very respectable and traditional family of Assam, Lakshminath had the opportunity of studying thoroughly the Assamese society of the 19th century and it had influenced his literary productions. Bezbarua is also largely responsible for paving the unity among the writers of his age. For this reason, he has been a source of inspiration even to the elderly writers.

Bezbarua's contribution to Assamese literature is manifold. He was a poet, a playwright, an essayist and a humorist. To him should go the credit for laying the very foundations of critical studies in Assam. Bezbarua belonged to the Jonaki cycle and his farces and humorous writings were published serially in Jonaki. Litikai was the first farce we have from him. Thereafter we have had Kamat Krittitwa Labhibar Sanket (1903) Kripabar Baruar Kakatar Topala (1904), Padum Kuwari, his only novel (1905), Surabhi, a collection of his short stories (1909), Kripabar Baruwar Obhotani (1909), Dangariya Dinanath Bezbaruar Chamu Jivani, Shankardeva (1912), Burhai Air Sadhu, Kakadeuta Aru Natilara (1918), Chikarpati-Nikarpati, Nomal (drama), Pachani (drama), Jonbiri (collection of short stories (1913), Mahapurusha Sri Shankardeva Aru Sri Madhabdeva (1914), Bakhar (1914), Jaymati Kuwari (drama), Belimar (drama), Chakradhwaj Simha (drama, 1915), Sadhukathar Kuki (collection of short stories), Junuka (a book for children), Bhagavat Katha, Kripabar Baruwar Bhavar Burburani (published serially in the Banhee), Barbaruwar Bulani (a collection of his articles published in Banhee, Kadamkali (another collection of his short stories) and Din-Lekha (his diary); the last three books were lately published.

Bezbarua edited from 1909 to 1929 Banhee, a monthly journal started by him while in Calcutta. Through Banhee he succeeded in forging a class of young writers in the state. 'Krishna Katha' and other articles that were published in the Banhee give evidence of his being a great thinker. His comments and views on the Assamese language and literature and literary criticism were regarded as valuable guidelines by his many followers. With his unique and towering personality, Bezbarua was for a long period of fifty years, the friend, philosopher and guide of the new generation of the Assamese writers. The well-known literary critic of Assam, Banikanta Kakati held that his love for his homeland, his peculiarly plastic style of writing and his wit and gentle humour are the chief characteristics of Bezbarua's writings. For his sense of wit and humour he was honoured with the title of Rasaraj by the Assamese people. Kadamkali is the only collection of his poems. Some of these poems are also touched with frolic and gentle humour. His poems are chiefly in tune with enlivened patriotism and deep philosophy. His poems are well known for the distinguishing features of the romantic mode. He also gave us a few metrical romances of the ballad type; such as Dhanbar Ratani. He was a lover of simple tunes of folk songs. The poems of Bezbarua though free from the influence of the popular ballads are all replete with sensuous love. Although he was under the influence of the West, particularly of English literature, he retained the distinct quality of the traditional Indian. In the love poems of Bezbarua the sublimity of love or of heart in contrast to the sensuous attachment finds vivid expression. In his Binboragi, Asam Sangit, O Mar Aponar Desh, Brahmaputra and some other poems, he has portrayed the valour and heroism of the people of ancient Assam and through them gave a clarion call to his people to rise up from the age-old slumber. Bezbarua's poems are full of optimism.

Bezbarua published in the year 1913, his farces, Nomal, Pachani and Chikarpati Nikarpati. The theme of Bezbarua's farces is rather feeble. In these farces he has portrayed the character of the simple but ignorant peasants and their mode of conversation with his characterstic sense of humour. The serious dramas of Bezbarua are historical: Jaymati Kuwari and Belimar are tragedies and Chakraddhwaj Simha is a historical play. Historical dramas of Bezbarua have not deviated from history in the development of the plot but the author has introduced sub-plots for the sake of diversity. There is, however, certain weakness in dialogue and characterisation. But Dalimi Pijou and Gajpuria are the creations of Bezbarua and their characters give evidence of his skill.

Among the writers of the Jonaki epoch Lakshminath Bezbarua's name deserves to be mentioned first. Bezbarua's pseudonymous work was Kripabar Baruar Kakatar Topala published in the year 1904. Kripabar Baruwa's humorous writings that appeared in Usa were published as Kripabar Baruar Obhotani in the year 1909.

In these four books one can get evidence of Bezbarua's inimitable style of writings and his angle of vision. The articles in Kripabar Baruar Bhavar Burburani and Kripabar Baruar Obhotani display Bezbarua's individualism. These books give us an insight into the political and social spheres of Assam. The inventive genius of Bezbarua, who was an intellectual of high order and a humorist of considerable power, is evident in these books.

Over and above, we have from him two other thoughtful books, viz. Bhagavat Katha and Kamat Krititt-wa Labhibar Sanket. Besides these, Bezbarua has enriched the Assamese prose literature through his critical studies such as, Krishna Katha,, Kanhudi Aru Kharali and various articles on literature and society.

The modern Assamese short story is a gift from the West. The Assamese short story was born during the Jonaki epoch and the pioneer in this field also was Lakshminath Bezbarua. Strictly speaking he virtually bridged the gulf between the old folk-tales and modern short-stories. He collected the folk tales of Assam and printed them, entitled Kakadeuta Aru Natilara and Burhi Air Sadhu, keeping intact the very language and style in which these are handed down from generation to generation.

Under the western literary impact Bezbarua wrote modern short stories. During the British rule in Assam there was a clash between the old and the new and Bezbarua has ably portrayed that spirit of tensions in his work. His original short stories have been compiled and published in his books of stories Surabhi, Sadhukathar Kuki and Jonbiri.

The life of the Assamese people has been charmingly portrayed by Bezbarua. He was deeply acquainted with the life in the urban areas and also the villages of Assam.

Though he had skill in other literary forms and he tried his hand in novels, he could not attain any success as a novelist. He gave us only one novel, Padum Kuwari and that too does not quite make the grade.

The address delivered by Bezbarua as President of the Asam Sahitya Sabha is invaluable. His song 'O Mor Aponar Desh' has been the most popular patriotic song in Assamese.

Ni.B.

BHADDALI (Rajasthani). There has been a long tradition in the folk literature of Bengal, Bihar, Uttar Pradesh, Rajasthan etc. of popular sayings known by the names of 'Bhaddali', 'Bhadari', 'Ghaga', 'Daka', 'Dakka', and 'Khana'. Several works under the titles of Bhaddali Vayka, Bhaddali Purana, Meghamala Bhaddali Vakya, etc. have been traced out. While there is no positive proof of the period of their composition, A.C. Nahata was able to find at Jodhpur a manuscript written in the 14th Century (Swadhyaya Sangraha Pustika by Lokahitacharya written in 1372) which contains some verses in the name of Bhaddali. Nahata was, therefore, of the opinion that Bhaddali flourished before 1363. The word Meghamala (clouds) combined with Bhaddali (Meghamala Bhaddali Vakya) suggests that the work consists of wisdom, based on experience, regarding the rains. Some other topics, such as, the characteristics of various persons from all walks of life, etc. have also been included. The range of topics varies from place to place, the text being in the oral tradition. Scholars have not been able so far to arrive at any definite conclusion as to the identity of the author. There are different versions of the popular story available to us. It is believed that an eminent Brahmana astrologer (the name of Varahamihira is also quoted) once found that a wonderful combination of grahas was to occur shortly which could produce a brilliant astrologer if he could impregnate his wife at the right moment. It was, however, so destined that he had to halt on his way home at an Ahira's residence. He was too tempted not to miss the opportunity and so contracted an immediate marriage with the Ahira's girl for the purpose. The son born out of that union was known as 'Dakka' or 'Daka'. He was also called Ghaga. Bhaddali was his wife to whom he addressed his sayings occasionally. But this theory has been refuted by others who hold that 'Daka' is no proper name, as it is a Tibetan word meaning 'wisdom'. In addition to this, all ancient texts so far available in Rajasthan carry the name of Bhaddali which help in concluding that this popular work of folk wisdom may be safely attributed to the person known as Bhaddali. A few of the verses of the author have so far been published in various books and magazines.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Parampara, Vol. 12, Jodhpur, Rajasthani Sahitya ka Adikala.

Raw.S.

BHADRAMBHADRA (Gujarati) is a full length humorous novel by Ramanbhai Nilkanth (1868-1928) published in 1900. He has in the novel tried to expose the rigidity, pettiness and hypocrisy of the anti-reformists of his time. The author has taken recourse to satire. The hero of the novel Bhadrambhadra is the representative of the orthodox Hindu brahmin, who is allergic to anything non-traditional and different from the age-old high caste Hindu way of life. The hero whose real name is Daulatshankar changes it to Bhadrambhadra because the word Daulat is non-Sanskrit and non-Indian. The humour originates from the idiosyncratic behaviour of the hero. The language of the hero is highly sanskritised Gujarati and hence he is not able to make others understand what he wants to say, and that creates humorous situations. Ramanbhai has made one person the target of ridicule because of his mannerisms and unadjustible behaviour. There is no development of the character and because of the lack of variety of situations and the same behaviour of the hero, the humour is not sustained throughout and the later half of the book becomes uninteresting. Yet in Ramanbhai's contemporary period it became very popular and anybody who spoke sanskritised Gujarati was nicknamed Bhadrambhadra.

C.M.

BHADRARJUNA (Bengali) is a drama by Taracharan Sikdar published in Calcutta in 1852. It is the first Bengali drama wherein the Sanskritic canons of dramatic composition were discarded and the Western form adopted. In the Preface running over six pages the author explains the departure from the traditional form and introduces to the Bengali readers the new form. He criticises the prevalent practice of presenting the action by means of songs. Actions, he says, should be depicted in logical sequence.

In view of the importance of this pioneering work the relevant portion is translated from the Preface–"This drama, in respect of action and its place of occurrence has followed European model. But no exception has been made in respect of application of verse and prose. I have not followed the model of Sanskrit drama in respect of things like Nandi, appearance of Sutradhara and Nati (actress), presentation of the subject (prastavana), introduction of Vidushaka etc. Barring these, Sanskrit dramas are not much different from European dramas. The Sanskrit drama is divided into Ankas, called Acts in English. Every Act is divided again into several scenes in English, while it is not so in Sanskrit and so I have used the word samyogasthala instead of scene. The scene indicates the place of action in the drama. The European theatre creates the illusion of the place in the scene."

A growing awareness of the nature of dramatic compostion is quite discernible. He thought, however, that a play, to be successful, had to depend on a suitable subject. So he fell back on the inexhaustible source of traditional Indian literature, the Mahabharata. He chose the story of Subhadra's abduction by Arjuna. The episode indeed is full of dramatic possibilities, but unfortunately the author could not make proper use of them. He makes certain innovations which, of course, do not add much to its success. The drama has four Acts. Each Act is divided into several samyogasthalas.

So far as the progress of events in the drama is concerned, the first Anka (Act) really is not much necessary and could have been referred to through narration only. On the other hand, the fourth Act which is full of tension and actions, has been made out mostly through narration.

The first Act introduces Narada out to cause a stir in the happy mood of the Pandavas. Ultimately Arjuna goes in exile to Prabhasa. In the second Act the reader is taken to Vasudeva's palace where among the women Subhadra's marriage is being talked about. So the author comes down from the classical height and takes us to the familiar Bengali home. Baladeva decides to marry his sister to Duryodhana.

In the third Act the events take place at Prabhasa where Krishna holds his court. The news of Arjuna's arrival is conveyed to him and a fitting ovation is planned. Upto this point the play proceeds in prose but the next scene i.e. the fourth, is in 'payara' verse. This is the scene where the heroine, Subhadra appears for the first time and talks about Arjuna to Satyabhama, wife of Krishna. In the next scene the author tries to create a relief by introducing a drunkard and a mad man. Satyabhama and Subhadra watch the procession of Arjuna entering the city from a housetop in the following scene. Subhadra at once falls in love with the hero. Unable to control her emotion Subhadra begs Satyabhama to arrange for their union. Such effusion of sentimental love is the legacy left by Bharatchandra.

Satyabhama communicates to Krishna the predicament of Subhadra. Krishna agrees to their marriage. Subhadra meets Arjuna in his room secretly where they are married according to the Gandharva rite and so a complication in the drama is created. It becomes more complicatd when in the last scene, Narada, proverbially a shrewd person, makes Vasudeva irate by giving him the hint that Krishna was preparing to give away Subhadra to Arjuna.

Then opens the fourth Act in the court of Dhritarashtra. Baladeva sends his envoy to him with the proposal of the marriage of his sister to Duryodhana. Duryodhana readily accepts the proposal and starts for Prabhasa. Duryodhana's cousin Yudhishthira is also called to accompany them. But the conspiracy of Krishna succeeds. The insulted Duryodhana returns home. In the last scene, Baladeva, insulted and crest-fallen, retires.

The drama, on the whole, is not properly balanced. The frequent use of conventional vese-form, 'payar' and 'tripadi' is more a hindrance than help to the dramatic movement. Evidently Taracharan intended it to be staged. But there is no evidence of its having been staged at all.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Ashutosh Bhattacharya, Bangla Natyasahityer Itihas Vol I; ; Sushilkumar De, Nana Nibandha (Calcutta, 1954).

B.D.

BHADURI, SATINATH (Bengali; b. 1906, d. 1965) was a distinguished Bengali novelist and short story writer. He was born in Purnea (Bihar) which remained his home town till his death. An M.A. and B.L. of Patna University he was an ardent political worker and devout freedom fighter. First a Gandhian, then a believer in the creed of Congress Socialist Party, Satinath wandered through villages of his home district and came into close contact with the people's life. More than once he was arrested and put into prison. He took active part in August movement and was arrested again. While in Purnea Central Jail he faced lathi charge and was injured. He spent two years as a 'C' class prisoner in different central jails (1942-44). Noted Hindi writer Phaniswarnath Renu was his co-priosoner. The prison life was a boon to him. While in Jail he prepared the manuscript of his famous novel Jagari.

The book came out in 1946, and since then it has been acclaimed as one of the major Bengali novels. Jagari is a political novel describing the story of a single night. Eldest son Biloo is waiting in the death-cell for his death sentence to be carried out. Mother and Father in different wards are keeping awake in an anguished state of mind. Younger brother Niloo, a believer in the Communist Party policy of 1942 and responsible for Biloo's arrest is waiting outside the prison gate with a heavy mind. These four minds in their flux form the subject matter of the novel. The novel was awarded Rabindra Prize in 1949.

His next major novel Dhhoraicharit Manas was first serialised in the weekly Desh and came out in book form in 1949 (first part) and 1951 (second part). Satinath himself considered Dhhorai as his magnum opus. The protagonist's search for identity, his dreams and frustrations, his sufferings and strivings constitute the theme of the novel. The Ramcharit-Manas structure has been rightly handled and it gives this modern hero an epic dimension. The regional life of east Bihar comes into view as a whole with the development of the plot and the character of the hero.

His other novels are Achin Ragini (Unknown Tune, 1954), Sankat (Crisis, 1957), etc. His last novel Digbhranta (Bewildered, 1966) was serialised in Desh, but came out as a book after his untimely death. He did not get the opportunity to revise the book. No two novels of his are alike. Each of them differed considerably in temperament, tone, theme and structure. Characters in his novels have been delineated not through their actions, but through their inner tensions.

Satinath was a gifted, story writer also. His famous short stories are Chaka Chaki (1954), Baiyakaran (Grammarian, 1955), Bibeker Gandi (The Boundary of Conscience), Dhas (Landslide, 1958), Gananayak (Leader), Munafa Thakroon (Goddess of Profit).

Satinath visited Europe in 1959 and stayed in France for some time. He wrote an interesting travelogue, Satya Bhraman Kahini (1951). He discovered Paris in all her pecularities and depicted these in his writing. He was proficient in Hindi, English and French.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Gopal Halder, Satinath (1979); Srikumar Banerjee, Banga Sahitye Upanyaser Dhara (1955).

S.B.

BHAGAT, MUHAMMED SUBHAAN (Kashmiri; b. 1927) is the only representative writer of Kashmiri Folk Theatre, commonly known as 'Bandapather.' It has a long history of several centuries. Bhagat will be always remembered for having revived the perishing theatre and adapting it to contemporary conditions and tastes. Bhagat established 'Bhagat Theatre' in 1961 and staged several plays which he wrote. Bhagat is also a well-known actor admired by the masses. While adapting the tradition to suit the present milieu, he scrupulously preserved the inherent simplicity, humour and colourfulness of the conventional form except when he was sometimes tempted by notions of "modernity" and the 'highbrowism'. He did not have any formal education and is not familiar with the current trends in dramaturgy. The first collection of his plays is Taqdir (Destiny, 1974) which was well-received. His book on the style and technique of 'Bandapather' entitled Koshur Ruka Theatre (Kashmiri folk theatre, 1978) is the first book on the subject. His prose is simple, clear and objective. The second collection of his fanciful plays, Diviyirang (Colours of divinity, 1981) amply shows his devotion to his art and the stage. To understand the full significance of his works the reader must familiarise himself with the conventions of Kashmiri folk theatre which has a large scope for modifications and innovations yet to be exploited. Muhammed Subhaan Bhagat was awarded the "Robe of Honour" in 1974. Bhagat is a master of Flute and Nagara which are peculiar to Kashmiri folk music and essentially associated with Bandapather.

N.M.

BHAGAT, NIRANJAN NARHARI (Gujarati ; b. 1926) is an outstanding Gujarati poet, scholar, critic and journalist. He had his school and college education in Ahmedabad and Bombay. After getting his master's degree in English Literature (1950), he joined L.D. Arts College, Ahmedabad as a Lecturer. Since 1975 he has been teaching at St. Xavier's College, Ahmedabad.

Chhandolaya (1949) is his first collection of poems. As the title denotes, these poems possess special qualities of metre and rhythm. Kinnari (1950) is a collection of songs. After Alpavirama (1954) Niranjan published 33 Kavyo (1957). His poems were collected under the title Brihad Chhandolaya in 1974.

A group of poems on Bombay by him called Pravaladvipa, brought modern sensibility to Gujarati poetry. It was a breakthrough in terms of expression too, and became a new source of literary tradition. Niranjan is a scholar poet and has studied Baudelaire and other French symbolist poets.

As a poet he is concerned with human existence in its totality. His poems 'Patro' and 'Gayatri' are artistic presentations of the modern man in a negative age. His sonnets and songs are well known for their remarkable treatment of rhythm and rhyme. He has created his own diction derived from colloquial Gujarati.

Niranjan has written critical essays both in English and Gujarati. His approach to poetry is appreciative, analytical. In the book Yantravignana Ane Mantrakavita (1974), he has presented a critique of the age of technology. Adhunika Kavita : Ketalak Prasno (1972) presents his views on modern poetry.

Niranjan has translated poems and other literary works from Bengali and English into Gujarati. He also edited a short-lived Gujarati quartely, Sahitya (1978-79) which facilitated the publications of longer works.

Ra.C.

BHAGATI (Sindhi) is a part of Sindhi culture and though sung by Hindu artists, it also caters to its more numerous Muslim listeners. Basically a musical performance, Bhagati combines in itself the art of story-telling and dance. It is something more than a simple musical performance in that it not only entertains but also instructs the mind and elevates the spirit. Not much is known about its antiquity. Some people believe that it has its origin in Chaunki. While Kirtan and Sama are typically Hindu and Muslim affairs respectively. Chaunki is an amalgam of both in which the singers render the Kalam of the Sufi-poets, which is raptly listened to by people of both the communities. However, Nabi Bux Khan Baloch in his Sindhi Musiqia Ji-Tarikh states that Bhagati groups came into existence only about a hundred years back.

A Bhagati group consists of the leading Bhagati (Minstrel), one or more supporting Bhagats who may or may not be his disciples, and a few youngsters receiving training from him in music and dance. The accompanists would include at least one harmonium player, one Sarangi player and one percussionist. Some of the Bhagatas were known to perform alone without any supporting Bhagats. Some groups used to have one 'maskhiro' (Jester) also.

The Bhagatu wears a typical dress consisting of a flowing white gown called 'Jamo' or 'Peshwaz,' reaching down to his ankles, a 'bochanu' draped around the shoulders and down to the knees, both loosely held at the waist by a cummerbund. He would don a red 'pagri' on his head, wear 'kundhal' (ear-rings) in his ears and sport a tilak on his forehead. He would also tie 'chher' (bells) around his ankles. This dress with small variations, is compulsory for the leading Bhagatu but optional for the supporting artists. None in the group however, wears any make-up.

The Bhagati performance begins after every one is free from daily chores and the calm of the night descends. The performance is given on the ground level without the use of a raised stage. People gather in an open space and sit on 'dari' (carpets). The instrumentalists sit on one side and the leading Bhagatu takes his position near them. Supporting Bhagats would take position among the audience who would leave pathways for their movement and dance. Supporting Bhagats known as 'Jhellis' (literally meaning supporter) are more popularly called 'Bolriya' or the mouth-pieces which aptly describe their role. They form an ingenious public address system since they repeat each and everything said or sung by the leading Bhagatu, thus carrying it to every part of the gathering. All the artists keep changing their positions.

The performance starts with an invocation to the Lord, followed by a few devotional songs–Bhajan Kafi or Kalam. Thereafter the leading Bhagatu starts narrating some popular tale which is interspersed with music, dance, anecdotes, witticisms as also lively take-offs on the current local, social and on rare occasions even political matters. While singing, the Bhagatu adopts a peculiar stance with the left hand placed over his left ear and the right hand stretched out. The performance continues upto sunrise. The main story may spill over to the next performance or may simply be left incomplete. The performance ends with the 'Palau' when everyone stretches out some cloth–front portion of the shirt or a corner of the headgear–and begs for God Almighty's grace.

The more popular stories narrated by the Bhagats are Rup-Basant, Dodo Chanesar, Umar-Marui, Mumal-Rano, Lila Chanesar and Koel-Deepchand. The dance part of the Bhagatu lacks sophistication, being bereft of 'abhinaya' and 'mudra' but it makes up for it with vigorous rhythmic footwork and 'pheri' (pirouette). The music is based on classical ragas, or 'sur' as these are called in Sindhi. The more popular 'surs' are 'Kohyari', 'Jog', 'Rano', 'Asa', 'Prabhati, 'Sindhi Bhairavi', 'Tilang' and 'Manjh'.

The Bhagati group gives its performance on specific invitation from an individual Panchayat or a religious institution on the occasion of Holi, Baisakhi or Diwali or, to celebrate some worthwhile occasion such as the anniversary of some saint. The audience do not pay any entry fee. Some people however, as a mark of appreciation offer money to the Bhagatu which is gratefully accepted. One such Bhagatu Kanwarram used to get thousands of rupees in this way but he would not keep a single paisa for himself. The money thus collected, would be distributed among the poor and the needy without any discrimination of caste and creed.

He was the best exponent of this art and he is also revered as a saint.

Bhagatu Jararam and Bhagatu Motan are also the Bhagats of renown. Some other better known Bhagats of the recent past were Sobho, Santu, Parso, Lilaram, Tahilyo, Shamman Guddi and others.

Special mention may be made about Naru Bhagat who travelled far to Las Bela State in the South West of Sindh and carried the message and poetry of the great Sindhi poet Shah Abdul Latif through Bhagati sessions. Performing the Bhagat is not a full-time occupation. Every Bhagat is engaged in some other trade for his livelihood.

After the migration of Hindus from Sindh, the institution of Bhagati has been on the wane. However, there are still some Bhagati groups on both sides of the border which are trying valiantly to keep the tradition alive.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Lokram P. Dodeja, Visariyan Na Visran-Sindh Ja Bhagat published in (Sindhi Natak Ja Sau Saal 1880-1981, Souvenir; Sindhu Kala Sangam, New Delhi.) Nabi Bux Khan Baloch, Sindhi Mausiqia-Ji-Tarikh: Shaikh Aziz, Bhagat, (Mehran, Hyderabad, Sindh, No. 3, 1973), Tirath Basant, Kanwar.

H.N.

BHAGAVADAJJUKIYAM (Sanskrit) is the earliest available play-type called prahasana, in which comical situations, harmless humour and wit are dominant. In a couple of manuscripts the author is mentioned as Bodhayana. In the first edition of this text (Jayantamangalam, Kerala. 1925) the anonymous commentator attributes the authorship to Bodhayana Kavi. Subsequent epigraphical research, especially the Mamandur inscription has shown that the Bhagavadajjukiyam and Mattavilasa are the compositions of King Mahendra Vikrama Pallava of Kanchi in the 7th century. When King Harshavardhana was writing his Ratnavali and Nagananda, King Mahendra Vikrama was writing his two brilliant plays at Kanchi, the great Sanskrit University–city which gave to India, poets like Dandin and philosophers like Dignaga.

As befitting the title, the play is built round a recluse (Bhagavan) entering by Yogic powers the body of a courtesan (Ajjuka) called Vasantasena. This parakaya-pravesha by the ascetic was to satisfy the whims of his student Shandilya, a lazy guy given to all sorts of pleasures. The mistake of Yama's emissary in taking the life of a wrong Vasantasena results in the courtesan's life being let into that of the dead Yogi. The dazed Shandilya says at one place–'the ascetic is not the real yogin (naiva bhagavan), nor the courtesan really herself (naivajjuka). A combination of the two has come about (Bhagavadajjukam nama samvritam). The other characters like Ramilaka, the courtesan's lover, and a quack doctor add to the variety and pep in the dramatic action.

Unlike later prahasanas the Bhagavadajjukiyam is a dignified comedy rather than a farce. The Parivrajaka is a true ascetic, and not the depraved low type ridiculed in later prahasanas. In Bhagavadajjukiyam it is not so much the characters, as the plot and situations, in which the witty and comical element is to be found abundantly. The language is quite simple and breezy; the ideas are refined and expressed beautifully. In presenting the few characters on the stage the dramatist has shown admirable skill. Rightly is Bhagavadajjukiyam called the 'Prahasanaratnam'.

S.S.J.

BHAGAVADGITA (Sanskrit), is a book of 18 chapters forming an integral part of the Mahabharata. Some scholars, like Winternitz are of the view that it had been written as an independent work and was later incorporated in the Mahabharata while others, like Tilak consider it to be an inseparable part of the Mahabharata on the ground that there are passages after passages in the rest of the Mahabharata which show striking similarity with lines from the Bhagavadgita and that a cohesive unity exists between the Bhagavadgita and the Mahabharata. Traditionally Bhagavadgita is regarded as one of the three foundations of the Vedanta system of Indian philosophy (prasthanatraya) and has been commented on by almost all the important thinkers from Shankara and Ramanuja upto M.K. Gandhi, Radhakrishnan, Aurobindo and Vinoba Bhave. But more than a formulation of philosophical ideas about the ultimate reality, it is a song par excellence. There might be logical contradictions in it and there might be compression of Upanishadic thought, hard to understand, but primarily Bhagavadgita is to quote F. Edgerton 'poetic, mystical and devotional, rather than logical and philosophical.' To think that the very idea of the whole of this book to be literally composed in a battle field is absurd and therefore this could not be a part of the Mahabharata is to assume that a poet is a recorder of events. In fact, Bhagavadgita is a poem within a larger poem and the very beginning of this poem is fear of Death looming large. It is Death which opens the doors for realisation of life in its totality. Bhagavadgita is an embodiment of Krishna's attitude towards life and is an elaboration of the Upanishadic idea of viewing life as if it were different stages of a sacrificial act or continuous process of pressing of the Soma, the life substance for generating an offerable drink to the Universal Being.

Bhagavadgita starts with the unescapable path of action made into a selfless, dispassionate way of life, goes deep into the mystery of life, the whole Life and ends in the propagation of devotion, a path of total surrender, self-negation, guileless love for the Whole Being (sarva bhuta) and an unquenchable thirst for Becoming. The ascent is gradually and aesthetically sound. The description of Arjuna's predicament arising out of fear of Death, of the overpowering presence of the Virat (the Great Being) and of the Tree of Life in chapters 1, 11 and 14 are poetic pieces unexcelled in style and intensity of sublimated experience of life as the ultimate reality.

Bhagavadgita has not only stirred the Indian mind but also has become a part of the Indian ethos, it has had a deep impact on the Western mind. Schlegel, Humboldt, Yeats and E. Fromn have found in Bhagavadgita an enduring message for man irrespective of his creed and his national identity.

It has been translated into major languages of India and of Europe, South East and East Asia.

V.M.

BHAGAVATAPURANA

BHAGAVATAPURANA (Sanskrit), is a work of devotion par excellence. A significant interpretation of the term 'Purana' is that "which never becomes out-dated"–(Pura-iti-na). This is specially true of Bhagavatapurana, as borne out by the fulfilment of the prophecy in the Padmapurana that Shrimadbhagavatam is going to sport itself in every home and with every individual. It is further assured that at its sound, all the ills of this dark age will flee away.

This supreme book has inspired the growth of extensive devotional literature, not only in Sanskrit, but also in many other Indian languages and it is revered by important religious movements, as one of the corner-stones of their faith.

To the believers, Shrimadbhagavatam is the essence of all the Vedas.

It is really a poem to suit different moods and emotions, the mood of adoration or worship, of sorrow or joy, of peace and tranquillity, of discontent with the things of the world and a desire for freedom from its trammels, of humility and regret over wasted opportunities for salvation, of perplexity about the mysteries of the Universe and the ways of God or of passionate yearning for union with God.

The never-ageing mind-born son of Brahma, the personification of devotion and divine melody, Narada, is portrayed as the recurring agency for all world-benefactions. It is to him that we owe Valmiki's Ramayana and Shrimadbhagavatam of Vyasa.

Vyasa said unto Narada, who came to his hermitage-"Bhagavan, I feel that my soul has been a waste, despite all that I have done for the good of humanity. In sooth, I know not why I am so sad. I seek thine aid." At this Narada advised him to outpour the story of the Lord alone for the redemption of humanity. And so, Vyasa meditated and composed the peerless Bhagavata and taught it to his son Shuka a great Brahmajnani. Shuka expounded this to the great King Parikshit in a period of great crisis in his life. The bard-Suta heard this discourse and later recited it to Shaunaka and other sages assembled in Naimisharanya.

The transmission of the teaching is through two channels. The first started with the four-verses imparted by the Lord to Brahma, to energise and prepare him for the talk of creation (Bhagavatam–II-9-32-35). Brahma taught this to Narada who in turn communicated it to Vyasa (1-4-6 passim); from whom it passed on to Shuka and Suta as aforesaid.

The teaching had descended also through a different Guruparampara. Shankarshana had imparted the gospel of love to Sanatkumara, who taught it to Shankhyayana. It next passed to Parashara, who taught it to Maitreya. The Bhagavata of Vyasa, as expounded by Shuka, incorporates this teaching in its Books III, IV and XI.

This makes for repetition of topics, though not of their content and scope, making the work a Samhita (collection). Of the total number of 12 Books, nos. I,X and XI deal with Shri Krishna's life and doings at Mathura and Dvaraka in the context of the prime mover of the actions in the Mahabharata.

Book II deals with the origin of the universe and sacrifice and the incarnations of the Lord in general, besides setting out the topics of the Bhagavatam as a whole. Book V covers the stories of patriarchs–Priyavrata, Rishabha, Jada Bharata, etc. Book VI narrates the stories of Ajamila, Daksha, Vrittrasura, Chitraketu and so forth. Book VII is concerned mainly with Hiranyakashipu, Prahlada and the man-lion Avatara. The previous Varahavatara has been dealt with in Book III.

The highlights of Book VIII are Gajendramoksha, the churning of the milky-ocean, Kurmavatara, the Vamanavatara and the Matsyavatara. The Manvantaras are also dealt with here. Book IX narrates, inter-alia, the stories of Ambarisha and Durvasa, Harishchandra, Sagara, Shri Rama, kings of the lunar race, Parashurama, Yayati, Dushyanta, Bharata, the Kauravas and the Pandavas.

Book X (in two parts) is the central part of Shrimadbhagavatam, dealing with the life of Shri Krishna including his childhood with the cowherds and cowherdesses. Book XI gives the direct teaching of Krishna to Uddhava. The last Book (XII) refers to the Kali age, the coming Kalki-avatara, Shuka concluding his discourses to Parikshit and the latter's final salvation.

While tradition holds Vyasa as the author of Bhagavatam as in the case of other Puranas, the moderns engage themselves in controversy about the date and authorship thereof. Having regard to some special references to Tamil Nadu and its peculiar customs and the fact that Shri Shankara and Ramanuja do not cite any verse from this Book in their works, some would assign it to a later date with South Indian origin. But this is not sufficiently proved. In any case, it is clear that this work cannot be later than the 10th century A.D. In fact, its all-India character and earlier date are vouched for by Al-Beruni's reference to it, the correspondence with the Divyaprabandham of the Ashvars, and mention of some incidents in earlier Sanskrit works.

There are also innumerable stories of devotees, each charming in its own way and unforgettable.

The story of Rama and Sita is magnificently but briefly retold, with significant and daring variations from Valmiki. Of course, the delineations of Shri Krishna, especially of Balagopala is ever enchanting. The Advaitian Madhusudana Sarasvati declared that he knew of no other 'Tattva' than Krishna (Krishnat param kimapi tattvam aham na jane). Some noteworthy passages : (Items marked with an asterisk (*) are adaptations from the translation by N. Raghunathan. The rest are free renderings by the present contributor).

1. * Book–I opens magnificently :—

"Om-Salutations to the exalted Lord Vasudeva :

Let us meditate on that transcendent Reality from which proceed the creation, preservation and destruction of the universe, it being invariably present in all objects, which is omniscient and self-luminous, which inspired in the first seer-the knowledge of the Veda that baffles even the great sages ....."

2. * Book-I-Chapter VII :—Draupadi to Arjuna, who presented before her bound, the slayer of her children in sleep–Asvatthama–"Free him, free him instantly ; he is a Brahmana, supremely worthy of reverence. This is the venerable Drona himself, reborn in his son, he by whose grace you learnt the science of archery, with all the secret spells and obtained the entire range of weapons. And his wife Kirpi, his very half, still lives-she did not follow him in death, being the mother of a son.... you should not plunge the family of your Guru in sorrow... let not the mother ....weep as I do incessantly with tear-filled face for my dead children".

3. Book-III-Chapter XXIX :– Kapila to His mother, Devahuti–"I am ever present in all creatures as the inner ruler. He who treats Me with contempt there, while pretending to worship Me in an image, makes a farce of worship."

4. * Book-VII-Chapter-X :– Prahlada to the Lord, Nrisimha :–"Please, please do not tempt me with boons. He who seeks of Thee–the fulfilment of his wishes is not Thy servant, but a trader..... but if Thou wouldst still grant me boons, let Thy boon to me be that no desires spring up in my heart....."

5 *iBook VIII-Chapter-VII:–Shiva to His Consort:–"Oh, Bhavani, see the grief caused to all creatures by the Kalakuta poison that has emerged from the churning of the sea of milk . . . . I shall consume this poison. May the world gain all that is auspicious from this act of mine!"

6. Book IX-Chapter XXI:– Rantideva:–"Oh, Lord, I do not ask for the Ashtasiddhis, or even freedom from birth and death. I only pray that I, by dwelling in all beings, be enabled to take upon myself their sufferings and thus afford relief to them."

7. Book-X-Part-I-Chapter VI:– Putana, murderess of the world's children and blood-thirsty fiend attained the goal of the Good by giving Hari her breast, though with the intention of killing Him . . . . She at whose breast the Lord had fed, treading on her body, with the feet that are planted in the hearts of His devotees . . . . . attained a good that was worthy of His mother . . . . . From the pyre on which her body was brunt, a sweet fragrance arose and spread all around.

8. Book-X-Part-I-Chapter-XXV:– (Krishna lifting the hill)–Like a little boy plucking out a mushroom, Krishna uprooted the Govardhana Mount with one hand. He turned the Mount upside down, and held it as a parasol with the tip of a finger, for seven days and nights together, not moving from his place, even an inch!

9. Book-X-Part-II-Chapter LII:– Rukmini's message to Krishna:–"Hearing Thy glorious attributes sung, oh, the fairest in the universe, that through the ear enter the heart, quenching its smart . . . . . my heart, quite shameless, is on the run, Oh Thou firm refuge to all, to lose itself in Thee. And so into Thy keeping is entrusted my soul, Oh Lord . . . . . come here and take me! . . . . . Shouldst Thou, Oh Lotus-eyed One, withhold from me Thy grace . . . . . I will wear this body out and die, to take a myriad births, doing the same again, to secure Thy grace."

10. Book-X-Part-II-Chapter-LXXX:– (The poor comrade of the Lord):–At Dvaraka, Shri Krishna seeing Sudama (Kuchela) from afar, jumped from his cot, leaving aside Rukmini and rushing out, embraced the poor Brahmin. Breaking into a flood of tears, Krishna, then rested His friend of yore on His cot, paid His respect to him, washed his tired feet and sprinkled that water on His own head. Then He anointed the Brahmin's body with fragant sandal, etc., uttering joyful words of welcome all along, while Rukmini stood by fanning him. Sudama allowed all this for the Lord's pleasure! . . . . . Next morning, Krishna bade farewell to his friend. When Sudama reached home, he found it transformed beyond recognition . . . . . Sudama continued to lead a dedicated life, despite his new found riches.

Unmistakably, the central thread of Shrimadbhagavatam is devotion to the Supreme God as a Person. But bafflingly here and there, reference is made to the apprehension of the attributeless impersonal Absolute–in tune with the dissonance in the Upanishads.

The Suta ends his narration (Book XII) thus–"Ordain it so, Oh, Ruler of the Gods, that in birth after birth, devotion to Thy lotus-feet may spring in our hearts; for Thou art our sole protector, Oh, Lord! I offer my adoration to Hari, the Supreme, the recital of Whose names destroys all sins, and humble submission to Whom brings all sorrow to an end!"

Among the innumerable works derived from Shrimadbhagavatam, special mention may be made of Bhattathiri's Narayaniyam, Krishna Karnamritam of Lila Shuka, Vedantadeshika's Yadavabhyudayam (in Sanskrit) and Potane's Bhagavatam in Telugu.

As.C.

BHAGAVAT RAJARAMASHASTRI (Marathi; b. 1851, d. 1908) was in his days accepted as an intellectual force, as is evinced by a reference to his greatness as a revolutionary thinker of religious, theological and social ideas by the great poet of Marathi, Govindagraja, in one of his socially conscious poems, saying 'Follow the path chosen by Shri Bhagavata.'

Rajaramashastri hailed from south Konkan. It was his uncle who had initiated him into the philosophical and theological world.

Rajaramashastri passed his entrance examination from the Elphinstone High School and joined the medical college. But soon he was disillusioned and, leaving the medical faculty, he joined the teacher's fraternity. At this stage his father, a rather disappointed person, died, but his uncle was a great source of solace to him. Soon Shastri began his studies in ancient Indian lore through Sanskrit under the expert guidance of a Sanskrit Pundit. Within three years Shastri became a scholar in what is now called Indology. This was truly the beginning of his intellectual career. He acquired knowledge without any sluggishness throughout his life and dispensed it without any selfish motive.

In 1877 Rajaramashastri was appointed Professor of Sanskrit in Bombay's St. Xavier College. There he worked for some thirty years.

Rajaramashastri was especially noted for his love of Marathi. In those days the regional languages were hardly the mode of expression even among his own friends and contemporaries. But Rajaramashastri wrote whatever he thought best putting it down on paper in Marathi. He extensively wrote about the topics of his liking—religion, language and literature, history and ancient heritage. Of course the Bombay University's Wilson Philological Lectures (1902) were of necessity delivered in English. Although he has dwelt on the inter-relationship of Sanskrit, Prakrit (with Apabhramsha) and the modern Indian regional languages, still the focus of his thoughts seems to be Vedic lore especially Rigveda. In these lectures attempt was made to search for the deep underlying roots of Indian culture.

His close association with Justice Ranade and the Prarthana Samaja, a movement which was inspired by the Brahmo Samaja movement in Bengal, was a very significant event in his otherwise uneventful life. His uncle, Bhaskarrao Bhagavat was one of the founders of this Samaja and he introduced Rajaramashastri to the group of the entthusiastic reformers who gathered around this nucleus. He became an ardent reformer. But even then the overwhelming stress of the Samaja on the Westernized ideas to the detriment of our own indigenous roots of culture and civilization, was opposed by him. He became so great a champion of the lowly and the down-trodden castes and classes that his name is remembered as the only out-spoken and forthright advocate of non-Brahmanical cause, after the death of the great thinker and social reformer, Jyotiba Fule.

His writings were prolific, many of them lying unheeded in the pages of periodicals; and others, though in book-form they are almost neglected by the modern scholars. His grand-niece Durga Bhagavat did an exemplary service to his memory by writing a biographical and critical monograph on him in Marathi and in publishing his writings freshly.

FURTHER WORKS : Durga Bhagavat (ed.), Rajaramashastryanche Sahitya, Vol. I & II (Collected Edition).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Durga Bhagavat, Rajaramashastri Bhagavat (A biography and study, 1947).

N.G.J.

BHAGNA BHAVANAM (Malayalam) is a play by N. Krishna Pillai. Bhagna Bhavanam, which means a broken home, is a domestic tragedy in five acts. The author adapted the techniques of the Kerala stage and dealt with some of the burning domestic problems of Keralites in his plays. Each of his plays Kanyaka, Mudakku Muthal, Bhagna Bhavanam to cite a few, presents such a problem.

The dramatist does not make any conscious attempt to suggest remedies for the ills that afflict human beings. It is as though they are caught in a trap set by fate and by environment and there is no escape from it.

Madhavan Nair, now fifty, living in Trivandrum should have found happiness in life but for the fact that he lost his wife. He has three daughters, Radha, Sumati and Lila, all grown up; the elder ones are married, and the youngest, who is a college student, is in love with a classmate of hers, Ramachandran Nair. Radha's husband Janardanan Nair, though nice, is an asthmatic patient: he is unbearably jealous of his wife. Sumati's husband Kesava Kurup is also rich; but he is a rustic who fails to understand the delicate sentiments of his wife or her goodness. Sumati cannot adjust herself to the rustic ways of her husband in his village house. So she comes away and stays with her father. Kesava Kurup wants to take her back to his village home but Madhavan Nair refuses to send her with her husband. Kesava Kurup alleges that there is illicit relationship between Madhavan Nair and Sumati. He goes home and writes to his wife to commit suicide. The agonised Sumati carries out the order of her husband. The death of Sumati breaks the heart of Madhavan Nair. More than that it drives Radha mad and destroys the joy of the young lovers, Lila and Ramachandran Nair. Madhavan Nair had been the trustee of a minor, Harindran, who was to inherit a lot of wealth on his attaining maturity. Radha and Harindran were in love. Madhavan Nair did not want to exploit the situation to his advantage. He sent Harindran for higher studies and gave his daughter in marriage to Janardanan Nair. Harindran was back. He is sore and terribly depressed that he has lost Radha. He offers to marry Radha; but she tries her best to loyal to be her husband Janardanan Nair in spite of her great love for Harindran. It is at this critical moment that Sumati commits suicide. No. wonder that the death drives Radha mad. The foolish Kesava Kurup is also upset. He offers to marry Lila to make amends for his cruel treatment of Sumati. Madhavan Nair grows furious and drives him away from the house.

Radha is sent to Nagercoil for treatment. Her husband follows her there. Against the advice of the doctor, Janardanan Nair wires to Madhavan Nair, Lila and Harindran to go to Nagercoil to see Radha. Janardanan Nair persuades Harindran to marry Lila. But neither Harindran nor Lila can ever dream of such an alliance. Under the loving care of Harindran, Radha apparently seems to recover, although she is sick beyond recovery. Janardanan Nair dies, a bitterly disappointed man. Madhavan Nair sinks into an abyss of despair. Lila does not know what to do with her life nor does Harindran.

In this stark tragedy, the characterisation is convincing though the situations seem to be a little artifical. The dialogue is good, the stichomythia employed by the dramatist is very effective. The action rises out of characters and is inevitable in the given circumstance.

K.M.T.

BHAGVAT DURGA (Marathi; b. 1910) was educated at various places at different stages—primary education at Bombay, middle school education at Nasik, Ahmednagar and Poona, and higher education again at Bombay. She was awarded M.A. degree in 1935 for her thesis Early Buddhist Jurisprudence which was published in 1939. 'Synthesis of Hindu and Tribal Culture in Central Provinces' was the subject of her thesis for Ph.D. which she refused to submit to Bombay University due to differences with her research guide. She participated in freedom struggle and discontinued her study in 1929 for sometime.

After leaving the Bombay University in 1940, she joined Asiatic Society of Bombay and decided to work independently. During the past 40 years she has been recognised as one of the leading research scholars in the subjects: Sociology, Anthropology and folk-lore of India. She has been described as "The Scourging Conscience of the 60's and 70's of Maharashtra". She was elected president of All India Marathi Literary Conference at Karad in 1976. She is the recipient of a literary Award from Sahitya Akademi for her work Pais in 1971. Though Indology, Sociology and folk-lore are her major interests, her writings have shown a sparkling glimpse of creative imagination. Her early writings comprise of her erudite dissertations in English such as A Digest of Comparative Philology (1940), Romance in Sacred Lore (1948) and the like. Her creative abilities are at best in Rituchakra (1956), Bhav Mudra (1960), Vyasparva (1962), Ruparanga (1967) and Pais (1970). Her major research work on folklore, Loka Sahityachi Ruparekha has attained a classical stature in its kind and her subtle critical abilities are at best in Ketkari Kadambari (1967), a book that ranks Ketkar as one of the original novelists in Marathi literature. Satyam, Shivam, Sundaram (1978) is a collection of her speeches on literary philosophy delivered in Tagore Memorial Lecture series at Poona University.

Durga Bhagvat has written a biography of late Rajaramshastri Bhagvat (1947) who was a scholar of original thinking and who happened to be her grandfather. She had edited his entire works. She has written many books in a series of folk-tales of different kinds and regions with remarkable simplicity. Her scholarly book on the Indian bear viz. Aswal (1982) is a rare exposition of its kind in Marathi.

She is a fine essayist of an informal style, diversified in subject matter, with prose having emotional and lyrical qualities full of ripe wisdom and insights into human motivations. Her deep sensitivity is revealed when she penetrates into the emotions of Nature. In this regard, Rituchakra has no parallel in Marathi literature. Her long standing and sustained research activities have opened many vistas leading to an explication of many a myth and archetype in Indian literature. Her analytical power is reflected in a book Dharma Ani Lokasahitya (1975) which has explored the concept of origin and development of religious thought through myths and archetypes.

She has many critical editions to her credit. Prominent among them is a translation of ancient tales concerning Lord Buddha, Siddhartha Jataka, in seven volumes (1975-78). Her translation of Bana's Kadambari is yet another achivement. Lokasahitya (1967) is a translation of Rabindranath Tagore's writings on folk lore. Her Satyam Shivam, Sundaram contends that the motto Satyam, Shivam, Sundaram was adopted by Devendranath Tagore from Plato through an English translation of a French book by Victor Cousil (18th century), entitled Truth. Goodness and Beauty. She has translated some books from English and American literature and some of her major works hare been translated into many Indian languages.

Bh.K.

BHAGWANDAS (Hindi; b. 1869, d. 1958) was born in a very rich and highly respected family of Varanasi (U.P.) which also continued to be the centre of his activity almost till the end of his life. He passed his M.A. at the early age of eighteen years and worked as Deputy Collector for a while. He was a man of many parts. Early in life he came to be associated with the Theosophical Society of India and worked as Annie Besant's private secretary for a number of years. Though essentially a student, researcher and author, Bhagwandas could not keep his distance and was drawn into the web of politics by force of circumstances. He actively participated in the Non co-operation movement launched by the Congress and was a member of the Central Assembly for a number of years.

Though not essentially a creative writer, his writings did have far-reaching effects in moulding the thought processes of his readers. Bhagwandas was a voracious reader and a profound thinker. He came to have a deep faith in the tenets of the Theosophical Society which were based on the element of harmony. A refined form of this faith, reflection and contemplation are seen in his magnum opus, Samanvaya. To him this harmony formed the essence of the entire universe and all beings—animate and inanimate—were the manifestations of this cosmic harmony.

Bhagwandas was associated with many literary institutions because of his intense patriotism and love for Hindi. He was associated with the Kashi Vidyapith, Nagari Pracharini Sabha, Varanasi and the Hindi Sahitya Sammelan, Allahabad (U.P.). He presided over the Calcutta session of the Sammelan in 1920. He was a scholar of Sanskrit, Arabic, Persian, English and Hindi. His writings bear an imprint of the harmony he established amongst the languages he knew and the variety of the content has given them a richness. His writings on social, political, religious, literary and cultural topics drew the attention of men who mattered and his inmitable style of analysing became a subject of talk for them. Darshan ka Prayojan, Samanvaya and Purushartha are amongst his more significant works. A philosophical touch forms a characteristic quality of his writings. His writings helped Hindi acquire the faculty of discussing, reflecting upon and analysing philosophical and metaphysical topics besides topics of everyday interest like politics, literature and culture.

Ma.C

BHAGWANDIN 'DIN' LALA (Hindi; b. 1867, d. 1930), son of Munshi Kalikaprasad Srivastava and Srimati Surjan Devi, was the doyen of the Varanasi School of Hindi Textual Criticism, an eminent Hindi poet, critic and an examplary teacher. Starting his formal education with Urdu and Persian, he joined the Kayasth Pathashala, Allahabad as a teacher. After two years he shifted to the Maharaja High School, Chhatarpur as second master. Though he was taught the Hindi alphabet by his father, he acquired intensive knowledge of Hindi literature at Chhatarpur and founded two institutions namely, 'Kavi-Samaj' and 'Kavya-Lata' for the uplift of young Hindi poets and Hindi literature. Gangadhar Vyas used to teach him, along with other poets, lessons in poetics and language by way of suggesting corrections to their composition.

Around 1900, he left Chhatarpur to join the Central Hindu College, Varanasi as a teacher of Persian. At Varanasi, he got the right literary environment he had long looked for and edited many Hindi works of the mediaeval age at Nagari Pracharini Sabha, Varanasi. In 1907, when the Sabha resolved to prepare its celebrated Hindi disctionary Hindi Shabdasagar it put him immediately on its Editorial Board where he worked till 1918, when the work was almost complete. The same year he was appointed lecturer in Hindi by the Benaras Hindu University and served there till he retired.

As doyen of Hindi Textual Criticism, he aspired to know and understand the meaning of every reading and maintain the originality of the text along with the author's basic ideas, supported by the literary traditions, the spirit and natural use of the language prevalent in the area at the time of compositon.

As a poet, he wrote in Brajabhasha, Khari Boli and Urdu. His pen name was 'Din' in Hindi, 'Roshan' in Urdu and 'Pritam' in 'kavittas' and 'padas'. He wrote mostly in Brajabhasha. In Khari Boli he propagated Urdu 'bahams' successfully. 'Sharada' metre was his own creation. He excelled in heroic (vir), erotic (shringar), devotional (bhakti) and satirical-humorous (hasya) poetry. His Vir-pancharatna, Navin-vin (Nadime-din), etc. had won laurels for their deep patriotic sentiment.

As a critic, he never hesitated to tell the truth with full confidence. His book Bihari aur Deva is well known as a landmark in the history of comparative criticism. He did not favour lengthy critical introductions of books. As a stylist, he ws lucid and concise, and was a master of pun and humour, which showed his absolute command on the language. He supported pure and natural Hindi without inclination either towards Sanskrit or Urdu.

As a teacher, he was very laborious and earned unparalleled reputation in the field. He wrote authentic commentaries on Tulsidas, Keshavdas, etc., and paved the way for higher study of very difficult texts such as Keshavdas's Kavipriya. In almost all the texts he edited, he gave elaborate foot-notes to solve ticklish problems. He was greatly respected for his deep learning. His book Alankarmanjusha, Vyanjyartna-manjusha etc. brought him into lime-light and established him as a great scholar of poetics.

He edited numerous texts, prominent among them being; Raj Vilas of Man Kavi (1912); Bihari-Satsai with Bihari-Bodhini commentary (1921); Ramachandra-Chandrika with Keshav-Kaumudi commentary (1923); Dohavali with commentary (1925); Ayodhyakand Ramayana with commentary (1926); Kishkindha-kand with commentary (1926); Sundar-kand with commentary

(1926); Sur-Pancharatna (1927); Padamavat Part I (1924 or 1927); Anyokti-Kalpadrum with commentary (1928); Tulsi-Granthavali (1928); Keshav-Pancharatna.

He was the editor of Lakshmi, a monthly journal of Gaya. Some of his poetical works are: Vir-Pancharatna (1912); Bhavanistotra; Ramacharan Kamala; Navin-Vin or Nadim-e-Din;, Bhakti-Bhavani, Shringar-shatak, etc.

His critical works include: Swasthya-vidya (1910); Bihari aur Dev (1915); Alankar-manjusha (1915); Vyanjayartha-manjusha (1926); and Alankar-chandrika.

B.K.

BHAGWANLAL INDRAJI (Gujarati; b. 1839, d. 1888) was an archaeologist and scholar of Oriental Science and ancient scripts. He obtained primary education at Junagadh and received from his father knowledge of Sanskrit and scriptures. Even during his childhood days he had undertaken the study of Brahmi script in order to satisfy his curiosity about stone inscription of Ashoka, which was lying at the foot of Mount Girnar in Junagadh. Eventually he was able to decipher this inscription. Following the inspiration and encouragement from Colonel Lang, the then political Agent of Kathiawar, and Bhau Daji, the great archaeologist of Bombay, he went to Bombay in 1861 and presented his translation, or transcription of the Ashoka's stone inscription at Royal Asiatic Society which was approved and accepted by all experts. Largely on account of this, Bhau Daji had made necessary arrangements for Bhagwanlal Indraji to stay at Bombay from 1862 onwards.

He had also prepared a faultless version of the inscriptions of Ajanta caves and had deciphered the inscriptions of other caves such as Nasik, Karla, Nanaghat etc. In the same way, he had also prepared the versions of many volumes preserved in the Jain manuscripts store-house at Jesalmer. He travelled extensively in India. During his travels, he made a deep study of ancient coins, manuscripts and all means and materials of archaeological value, available at various places, and also wrote many research articles. From 1871 to 1874, he had visited almost all leading towns and cities of India and Nepal.

As a natural consequence of all these travels, he was successful in arranging the genealogy of Kshatriyas on the basis of coins. It was he who authentically deciphered the stone inscriptions of Kharwela. He had prepared a detailed record concerning the language, costume, manners and morals, religion and culture in respect of various regions. His contribution is marked by accumulation and interpretation of material at his disposal.

In 1877, Royal Asiatic Society gave him its honorary membership. In 1882, he was appointed a Fellow by the Bombay University. And in 1883, the Royal Institute of Hague conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Literature.

He gave away all his materials relating to archaeology and ancient arts, such as a old stone inscriptions, copies, coins, manuscripts, study-notes, etc., to Royal Asiatic Society, the British Museum, and the Native General Library of Bombay, as a gift.

B.J.

BHAI GURUDAS (Punjabi; b. 1551, d. 1637) was the son of Ishar Das, the younger brother of the third Sikh Guru, Amardas. When guru Amardas moved to Goindwal, Gurudas also went there and studied under his patronage, when Ramdas became the Guru, Bhai Gurudas was sent to Agra and other places for the propagation of the new faith. Guru Arjan Dev, the fifth Sikh Guru gave him the significant duty to scribe the Adi Granth, the Sikh scripture. He also received the blessings of the sixth sikh Guru, Guru Hargobind Singh. He is known as the first Giani of the Sikhs, because having been fortunate in attaining the nearness of the four Sikh Gurus, he was considered the most erudite and learned of the Sikhs. His poetic compositions have been considered as the key to the profound thoughts of the Adi Granth.

Besides being a preacher of the Sikh faith, a theologian of a high order, he was a great poet and elucidator of Sikh philosophy. He composed 556 'kavitt and swayyas' in 'Braj' bhasha and 39 verses (some say 40) in Gurmukhi. Because of the nearness of his time to that of Guru Nanak, he is considered to be the most authentic biographer of Guru Nanak in his first Var, popularly known as Gian Ratanavali. His compositions are a treasure of the mediaeval Indian culture. The ethos, the beliefs, the mythology and the life of people of his age have been depicted artistically. There is a great poverbial lore in his poetry which impresses with its expression and richness of thought.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Piara Singh 'Padam', Kalam de Dhani, Part I, Patiala, 1966. S.S. Kohli, (ed.), Punjabi Sahit Kosh, Vol. II, Punjab University Publication Bureau, Chandigarh, 1976.

S.S.K.

BHAI KAHN SINGH (Punjabi; b. 1861, d. 1936) was a scholar, writer and anthologist born in a family of slender means in a village called Sabz Banera in the erstwhile princely state of Patiala (Punjab) and held highly responsible jobs, those of Deputy Commissioner (1896) Foreign Minister (1911) and Judge of the High Court (1912) in the then state of Nabha. But all this did not deter him from participating in the revivalist, and reformative politics of his co-religionists and the Sikhs. To establish the separate religious and political identity of Sikhism and to rid it of undesirable accretions, was his life long passion. His literary output includes the mounmental works, Encyclopaedia of Sikh Literature (1930), also called Gursabdavatnakar Mahan Kosh and a two-volume Gurmat Martand (1962) published posthumously which incorporated two of his earlier published works, Gurmat Prabhakar (1898) and Gurmat Sudhakar (1898) and an unpublished work Gurgirakasauti. In these two volumes he has tried to define and codify all Sikh theological concepts and practice with the help of references called from authentic sources. Some of his other works are Hum Hindu Nahin (1898), Tika Vishnu Purana (1903), Sarab Nisedh (1907), Gurchand Divakar (1924), Gursabdalankar (1924), Anekarth Kosh (ed; 1925), Rupadipa Pingal (ed., 1925), Chandi di var Shatika (1935), Naam Mala Kosh (ed., 1938) and Gurmehmaratnavali which is being brought out by Guru Nanak Dev University, Amritsar (Punjab).

Pr.S.

BHAI MANI SINGH (Punjabi; b. 1669, d. 1739) was an encyclopaedic–minded man and was also a martyr, and one of the forefathers of Punjabi prose. His prominent works include Bhagat Ratnavali, and Gian Ratnavali, or better known as Sikhan di Bhagatmala (Saga of the Sikh Saints) and Janam Sakhi Guru Nanak Devji (Biography of Guru Nanak Devji, 1947). Sakhian Bhai Gurudas Jidi Var Yarwhin (References in Bhai Gurudas, Var Eleventh) is another interpretative work to his credit. His diction is more modern than that of any other contemporary prose writer. He came under the direct gurdianship of Guru Tegh Bahadur (the 9th Guru of the Sikhs) when he was hardly five. After the Guru's martyrdom, he took 'Amrit' from Guru Gobind Singh (the 10th Guru), and became his close associate. On his exhortion, he re-wrote the Adi Granth (the holy book of the Sikhs) with certain additions (1604-05). He also edited Dasam Granth (writings of Guru Gobind Singh) and was appointed by the Guru's wife as 'Granthi' (the priest) of 'Harimandir', Amritsar (1721). For his humanitarian and progressive activities, he was tortured mercilessly, torn joint by joint, by Zakria Khan and he died a martyr to a great cause.

S.S.So.

BHAI VIR SINGH (Punjabi; b. 1872, d. 1957). With a distinguished ancestory of scholarship and public service, it was easy enough for the youthful poet to realise at an early stage the need for a vision of the location and symbols. It was historically speaking a period of twilight for the Sikh sensibility, and the dominant mood of despair and nostalgia had almost undermined its pristine energy and earned strength. The man, the moment and the milieu converged, as of necessity, to produce the poet. A sullen and prostrate Punjab needed to orchestrate her agony, her dream of a vanished Empire, and her ordeal of resuscitation. Bhai Vir Singh trained in Sikh pieties and discipline and the Gurubani took upon himself the task of ushering in the Sikh renaissance.

Though he wrote a number of tender lyrics when young, Bhai Vir Singh's earlier life was chiefly devoted to journalism and pamphleteering. Clearly, three distinct impluses were at work even then, and they were: (a) an abiding and worshipful interest in the thought and poetics of Gurubani or the Guru word, (b) a deep and loving concern for the human race, and (c) a lover's passion for the Punjabi language. Added to these concerns was the modern outlook which coming from the west around the turn of the century could not but affect his humanistic world-view.

From the start, Bhai Vir Singh cultivated an air and disarming humility in the tradition and manner of Sikh saints, and many an early poem veers round the themes of renunciation and sacrifice. In poem after poem, he longs for a life of anonymity of simple pieties and prayers. The elimination of the ego is an overwhelming necessity.

The greatest early poem to emerge from his sustained labours is 'Rana Surat Singh.'

D.S.M.

BHAIRAPPA, S.L. (Bhyrappa, kannada, b. 1934). In a brilliant academic career, Bhairappa secured the first place and gold medals both at the B.A. (Honours) and M.A. examinations of Mysore University and got his Ph.D. from Baroda University for his thesis on "Truth and beauty: A Study in Correlation." Bhairappa entered the teaching profession. At present he is a Reader in Philosophy of Education in the Regional College of Education in Mysore.

Bhairappa is in the front rank of novelists in Kannada. His first novel Dharmasri appeared in 1961; but with his Vamsavriksha he stepped into the first line of novelists. He received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1975 for his Datu. His sixteenth and latest novel is Parva (1979)–based on the Mahabharata.

Vamsavriksha (1965) which won exceptional popularity and provoked a sharp controversy, centres round Srinivasa Srotri, a revered scholar who embodies the best in Indian culture. The desire of his young widowed daughter-in-law (who was a child) to marry again introduces complications. The novel portrays the conflict between the values cherished and practised by Srotri and those of a new age. Srotri wins our admiration by his loftiness and integrity. Bhairappa's next important novel was Tabbaliyu Ninade Magane (You Have Become an Orphan, Child 1968). This too presents the spectacle of the conflict between the old and the new. But traditional wisdom is here represented by villagers, and the new values are manifest in the life of a rustic lad who later gets education in the city and goes abroad and returns to the village with an American woman he has married. Grihabhanga (The Breaking of the Home), which appeared two years later, is one of the best novels in Kannada and often considered to the best novel of Bhairappa. Most of the characters here are illiterate rustics, their language is often vulgar. The protagonist is Nanjamma, who is married to a man who is really sub-human. Her mother-in-law is foul-tongued, stupid and domineering. The novel portrays Nanjamma's grim and life-long fight against stupidity, rancour, slander, disease and death for the survival of her children. Datu (1973) was followed by Anvesana (1976) which marked a departure from the Bhairappa tradition of the representation of the conflict between clear-cut ways and values of life. The central character Viswanatha, does not himself appear in the novel; we hear his voice in the last pages, in the extracts from his diary. The technique is determined by the theme of the work, which is the quest of an elusive personality. Viswanatha himself is engaged in the quest of his identity, even as others are struggling to find and understand him.

Parva is one of the most significant works in modern Kannada fiction. It is Bhairappa's most ambitious attempt to date. Here through the mythical characters of the Mahabharata the imagination of the novelist seeks to reconstruct an age of the disintegration of a vast and mighty community which draws into its eddies the people of a whole sub-continent. Human relations are probed in the context of a changing society and the conflicts and complications resulting from the coming together of the Aryans and the non-Aryans. Sex is a powerful force in the lives of the individuals here. A vast sub-continent in crisis—political, social, cultural–and in turmoil that is the picture the novel presents. It is a magnificent attempt, fascinating and worth studying; but its success is limited by its failure to create characters which are close to their originals. We get an impression of tired men and women, because of the failure to visualize Krishna more clearly, and the absence of an insight into the working of the forces of decay and disintegration. But it is a re-creation of the world of the Mahabharata which compels admiration.

Bhairappa sailed against the high tide of the Navya School. His characters faced life; they had clear-cut attitudes and values, and sought to live, to act and to take decisions and make something of their lives. This is what drew an astonishingly large circle of readers to his novels straightaway. He has been greatly admired and strongly condemned. But it cannot be denied that he has always an absorbing story to tell and that his characters are alive. He has been accused of indulging in sleights of hand to enable the traditional values of Hinduism to triumph. But they do stand for integrity of character and acceptance of life. There is melodrama in almost all his novels. But the density of experience and the conflict of values and the courage with which the characters face life make his novels absorbing to the common reader and challenging to the critic.

Bhairappa has also written, stimulatingly and with insight, on aesthetics and poetics. His other novels are Dharmasri (1961), Dura Sarisdaru (1962), Matadana (1965), Vamsavriksha (1966), Jalapata (1967), Nayi-Neralu (1968), Tabbaliyu Ninade Magane (1968), Grihabhanga (1970), Nirakarana (1971), Grahana (1972), Datu (1973), and Anwesana (1976), Purva (1979); Aesthetics and Poetics: Sahitya mattu Pratika (1967), Satya mattu Saundarya, Kathe mattu Kathavastu (1969); his English works are Truth and Beauty (Ph.D. Thesis); Values in Modern Indian Educational Thought; and Equality of Educational Opportunities.

L.S.S.R.

BHAJAN (Gujarati). In Gujarati there is a rich tradition of Bhajan literature. Bhajan like Psalm is a poetic form, which was in vogue for expression of devotional sentiments. As a poetic form, it developed during religious upheaval in 15th century. Saint Ramanand evolved this poetic form, in which the language of the people was used instead of sophisticated language of elites. Besides the followers of Ramanand and Kabir sects, 'Nijiya' sect of Ramdepeer have produced profound variety in Bhajans. In it we find different tunes of classical as well as folk music. Because of this, poetic form of Bhajan has attained a special status.

Bhajan is a poem to be sung. Brevity is the soul of Bhajan. There is ample scope for suggestion in Bhajan.

Usually Bhajan is sung in accompaniment with musical instruments at night. It begins with a couplet eulogising the guru (teacher), Ganapati (elephant headed god) or Sharada (goddess of learning). After the eulogy, Sanja type of Bhajans start in the early part of the night. These Bhajans tell about the transitoriness of the material world. As the time passes second type of Bhajans known as Chalti are sung. These Bhajans are ironical on the ways of the world and indulge in light surmonising. These first two types of Bhajans have an eye on the material world, depicting its transitoriness, the importance of human life which offers an opportunity of realising the utimate and the importance of spiritual leader. After midnight, the tone of Bhajans shifts from the world to the vast universe and ultimate reality. This type of Bhajans are known as Aradh. When the night is ending Prabhati types of Bhajans are sung, which describe the state of realisation.

As Bhajans are sung in groups, so much of their beauty is lost when they are read or printed.

Most of the Bhajans contain the names of the persons, who treaded the path of realisation. The form seems to have evolved in the 15th century, and in 18th and 19th centures it reached its zenith. During this time great composers of Bhajans like Sant Mekan from Kutch, Dhiro and Bhojo from Gujarat mainland, Bhan saheb, Sant Devidas from Saurastra have enriched the Bhajan form.

Bhajan is still in vogue. Many renowned poets of 19th and 20th centuries like Manilal Nabhubhai, Nanalal, Khabardar, Lalit, Sagar Kavi Kag, Sunderam, Makrand Dave, have successfully used the Bhajan form of devotional poetry.

No. P.

BHAJAN (Marathi) primarily means 'Singing the praises of God'. Incidentally it is the art of praising a particular deity by the devotees forming a group of like-minded individuals. The praise of the diety is invariably in the form of songs, sung tunefully with the accompaniment of Ektari Veena, Mridanga or Dholaka, Tala and Zanja i.e. Manjira. The talas are hollow, cup-shaped moulds of bronze. In Maharashtra, this Bhajan performance falls broadly under two types: (1) The Warakari Bhajan and (2) The Baithakiche Bhajan. The Warakaris are the devotees of Lord Bitthal of Pandharpur. The greatest of the Marathi saints, Jnaneshwar is credited with laying the foundation of the sect. These Warakaris chant the songs in praise of their beloved God Vitthal or Vithoba, standing in two rows facing each other. The tumultuous chorus of mingling high-pitched voices, the metallic clang of the beating cymbals, and the rhythmic beats of the Mridanga or Dholaka are simultaneous with the backward and forward moving steps of the singers. All this does have a spectacular effect. The devotional songs are generally from the Gatha collections of the great Warkari saints, headed by Jnaneshwar. The Abhangas and other numerous kinds of devotional 'padas' or songs of other saints like Namadev, Ekanath, Tukaram, and Niloba along with Jnaneshwar form the main repertoire of these Bhajanas. Songs of scores of other Warakari saints also find a place in these Bhajan performances, ending in some fast paced Bhajan 'dhuna' like 'Jaya Jaya Vitthal-Rakhumai'.

The second type of Bhajan is the Baithe Bhajan. Devoted people gather in a temple on some auspicious days like a Guruvara (Thursday) or the Ekadashi day and chant the praise of their beloved diety in a trance like abandon. But here they sit down on the ground and chant the praises of the Lord to the accompaniment of Dholaka or a Tabala, with Tala and Zanja cymbals to keep time with the theka. These Bhajana generally start with Ganesh Namana. 'Padas' written by Ekanath, Tukaram, Ramadas and others are also sung. The Ganesh song of Ekanath 'Lambodara Girijanandana' set to Raga Bhupa, traditionally is the initial song in a musical concert as also in a Kirtan or a Bhajan performance. Then follow the various types of devotional songs, also ending in some suitable quick paced 'dhuna'.

This brings us to Bhajans as songs. As a matter of fact, a song in praise of god is hardly referred to as a 'Bhajan' in Marathi usage. It is a recent commutation, acquired by this term 'Bhajan', perhaps as a result of closer contact with other regional languages through the popular media of communication. Thus a 'Bhajan' has come to be an equivalent of a 'Bhakti Geeta'–a term made almost a current coin by its constant use by the radio announcers. Formerly, such devotional songs of some saintly poet were collected together and titled as 'Abhanganchi (or Abhangancha) Gatha'. In this way not only Abhangas but other padas and even Gaulana songs in the saint's Gatha were all Bhajans, i.e., Bhajanigeetas.

The popularity of Bhajan as a group activity is, in a way, still extant. Every town has to own Bhajan Mandals. In the late 19th and early 20th centuries some saintly persons revived this Bhajan activity. Dasa Ganu, Gadage Maharaj and others gave a fillip to its revival. The famous modern saint patriot Tukadoji composed scores of new Bhajan songs and visited villages, towns and occasionally even cities with his celebrated Bhajan troupe. Thus the Bhajan songs of Tukadya Dasa, as Tukadoji called himself in his compositions, had become a source of social and patriotic inspiration to hundreds of the inhabitants of Maharashtra.

N.G.J.

BHAJAN (Oriya) The word Bhajan is derived from the root 'bhaj' which originally meant to serve. But later on it came to mean repetition of God's name with ardent love and devotion. The word in this sense was used profusely in Sanskrit literature. It is used as a synonym of stuti, stotra, prarthana and janana i.e. informing the Lord of one's sufferings. In the Gita, Sri Krishna says that whoever with ardent love completely surrenders himself to Him, is especially dear to Him. The Bhajan can be taken as the expression of pure devotion, love and complete surrender to God.

The Bhajans were and continue to be popular all over the country. Saint-poets from the Alvars to Kabir, Nanak, Tulsi, Sur, etc. were famous for their Bhajans.

In Oriya literature the Pancha Sakhas (Five Friends) were the forerunners of the Bhajan literature. From 16th century to the Ist part of the 20th, thousands of Bhajans have been written by Oriya poets. Almost all the famous poets of medieval Oriya literature had Bhajans to their credit.

The Bhajans in Oriya were written not for any particular god, but for all the gods and goddesses, of whom the most important were Jagannath, Rama, Krishna, Shiva, Durga, Ganesh as well as Nirakar Brahma (God without form).

The Directorate of Cultural Affairs, Orissa, collected and published 858 Bhajans addressed to different gods and goddesses, in three volumes, including six Bhajans in tribal languages. This is the largest collection of Bhajans published so far in Oriya. In this collection there are 148 poets who have mentioned their names. While some of these Bhajan-writers like Achyuta, Balaram, Upendra and Dinakrishna were otherwise famous as poets, there are many who have been known only for their Bhajans. Also there are some Bhajans which are anonymous. Out of 852 Oriya Bhajans, 183 are for Sri Krishna including seven for Sri Krishna Chaitanya, 17 for Durga, one for Laxmi, one for Tulasi Devi, 2 for Rama, 6 for Shiva, 2 for Ganesh, one for Hanuman, 191 for Sri Jagannath and the rest for Nirakara Brahma. From this analysis it is clear that the writers had composed Bhajans on the puranic 'pan-chadevatas' namely, Surya, Ganesh, Devi, Shiva and Vishnu (in His Krishna form, as well as in His Jagannath form). With them come some of their adjuncts such as Laxmi, Saraswati, Hanuman, Tulasi, and the various forms of Devis like Bimala. On the numerical criterion the puranic gods like Surya, Shiva, Devi and Gananatha do not appear to have enjoyed much popularity with the Bhajan writers. Instead, Nirakara Bramha was the most popular of the gods. The next in importance were Jagannatha and Sri Krishna. Sri Rama who was very much popular in the Kavyas had only two Bhajans addressed to him.

Some of the Bhajans for Nirakara Brahma are among the best songs in Oriya literature. There the poets have carefully expressed their spiritual experiences, where we come across the different stages of spiritual attainment of a devotee. At times they describe the relationship of the devotee to his god and try to explain the characteristics of saints. Sometimes they also dwell upon the nature and function of the Guru, and instruct people to follow certain rules in order to prepare themselves for the life of a mystic. They are also primarily motivated towards new directions for God-realisation, which were not present in the stotra-tradition of Sanskrit literature. Bhajan writers sang mostly of man's ultimate destiny. Some of these are examined below.

For example, in his Bhajana 'Bhulamana Bhulu' Kanhiki, Uduchhi Kala Sanchana mane nanhiki?' (Oh, careless mind, why do you forget that the Death-Bird is flying over your head?), Jagannath Das advises the mind to take resort to Nirakara Brahma in order to escape the flying of the Death-Bird. This idea is also present in the poetry of Lachhaman Das and Brindabana Das. They also begin the poem with a line similar to Jagannath Das's but in the second line they ask 'Marijibu boli jana nanhiki' (Don't you know that you may die?). It may be seen that the same question is also there in a song of Kabir, 'Re dil gaphalat matkan ek din jama awega' (Do not forget, oh careless mind, that death shall come one day). Jnaneshwar, the Maratha mystic poet, also writes in the same vein–'Ya lagi satajanajara nave, rigoni kevi nischirita loave' (You are sitting in a worn-out boat with a hundred holes. How can you hope to be without anxiety in this perilous journey?). These parallelisms reveal how the concept of the Nirakara Brahma was more or less current in the entire country.

In another class of Nirakara Bhajans the God is likened to a child. In Bhajans like 'Bohu chalinajanai go' (The child daughter-in-law does not know how to walk) by Raghunatha Das, 'Bahu Bala Akalana' (The daughter-in-law is a helpless child), 'Bohu mo naba taruni' (My daughter-in-law is a new woman) by Dinahari, 'Bohu more bala abala' (My daughter-in-law is a little helpless child) by Ananta Das, and 'Bohu mora bala taruna' (My daughter-in-law is a child-woman) by Lohinatha Das are very famous, and in all these poems, the poets have visualised God in the form of a child. This idea has also been present in other Indian writers. For example, Purandar Das, the Kannada poet, in his famous poem 'Kusanu Karidira' and Tukaram, the Marathi poet, in his poem, 'ta kripalu mauli ali bala verse javali' (Thou, my God, who act like a loving mother to us come near me in the form of a child) have compared God with a child. For a mystic, though the child has a form, yet it is formless and the real nature of a child cannot be determined by anybody. This characteristic nature of a child has attracted the poets to surrender themselves to him or her.

The Bhajan writers have given much stress on the idea that a seeker of Brahma should surrender himself to a Guru first. This is a favourite idea among all the Indian writers and the Bhajan writers of Orissa like Achyuta, Bhima Bhoi and Shyamasundar have written separate poems on this theme.

In a number of Bhajans the poets have sought to describe the nature of God and point out that God appears to those who surrender themselves to Him, and that God is formless but can also assume a form. He neither appears nor disappears. He has neither any beginning nor any end. Like the Upanishads, the Bhajana-writers also speak of Brahma as that which has no sound, no touch, no form and that which is beyond decay. But for devotees, it appears with a form and hence the poets describe His sweet smile, His ornaments and the charm of His divine self.

The Bhajan writers, while describing the nature of God, and the methodology of meditation have used interesting metaphors. Yashobanta Das in one of his Bhajans, 'Duti go jiba hansa ku dekhi' (On maid, let us go to see the swan) has compared Brahma with a peculiar swan, which has hidden his feathers within his beak. It has three legs. One of the legs has covered the entire universe, the other leg is in the hairs and the third leg is hidden in the Shunya or Void. It is a male swan but it lays an egg, only one, which covers the entire universe. The poet, Yashobanta Das surrenders himself under the feet of this unique swan. Yashobanta Das, in another song, has compared the mind with a cow which has five calves. Though the cow takes rest in a cowshed situated in the void or shunya, it always destroys crops as there is no cowherd-boy to control it. This cow gives milk and of butter comes out the milk and from butter ghee is prepared. If one takes this ghee then his body gets enchanted with the power of God. Hence Yashobanta says, if you can keep such a cow (mind) under your control then you will not be afraid of anybody. The other similes like house without any support, a broken boat, a mouse, a flower, a bee and a market place are very familiar with these Bhajan writers.

The description of the shape (Swarupa) of Brahma neither satisfies them nor the yoga practices like Sadachakra Sadhana. They always ask the devotees (Sadhakas) to control their senses and to use them not for worldly pleasure but for the service of God, so that they may taste the sweetness of God's name or the grace of God, or the ambrosial juice from the name of God. Hence they maintain that as no father, no mother, no son or daughter, and nothing in this world can save them from death. In order to become free from the bondage of illusion (Maya) one should begin spiritual practices immediately. Achyuta, in one of his famous songs, has instructed the mind to repeat the name of Krishna which alone can destroy all the sorrows of the world.

There is another very important section of Oriya Bhajans, in which Lord Jagannath is the object of devotion. Lord Jagannath is the most important deity of the Oriyas. Though Jagannath is identified occasionally with the incarnations of Vishnu, like Sri Ram, Narasingha and Vamana, he is generally regarded as Vishnu Himself by the Bhajan writers.

The important point to note in these Bhajans is that the spiritual experiences inherent in these poems begin with the vision of Sri Jagannatha. The Lord's round eyes like discs which form a circle within a circle attract the devotees most. They are also enchanted with the black colour of His body. The ornaments (Makara Kundala) of his ears as well as the Suna Chita and Chandana Bindu (the drop of sandal paste), the Kasturi Tilaka and the Tripundraka in His forehead, make Him so attractive that the devotee finds no other way but to take shelter under His feet. Dinakrishna, the famous poet of 18th century, in his poem 'Ahe Nilachala nayaka, dina akinchana sukha dayaka' (Oh the Lord of Nilachala, the bestower of happiness to the depressed and the poor) gives in beautiful words, his sensuous experiences of a union with Jagannath. The same idea has also been expressed by many Bhajan writers like Nityananda, Salbeg (Chala sakhi ame darshana kariba Nilagiri Kaliaku–Let us go my lady, today, to have vision of the black God of Nilagiri), Kalpalata Jema (Jagabandhu nathnku je murchhi nuhai Jeniki chanhile tene Sri Mukha disai–It is not possible to forget Jagabandhu Natha, you can see him in all the directions), and Harekrishna Singh.

The second point of interest in these Bhajans lies in the accounts given about the festivals of Sri Jagannatha, like Ratha Yatra, Chandan Yatra and Snana Yatra. In these yatras the God comes out of his temple to see and mix with his devotees.

In the third category of poems to Jagannatha, He is seen as a protector of His devotees like Prahlad, Dhruba, the Elephant, the female-deer, Bhusanda crow, Bibhishana, Draupadi, Ahalya, Bharati, Shabari, Ajamila, Chakrabaka, Sudama, Gopi and Bali. The Bhajan writers make references to some of these devotees in their songs and desire to have similar favours from the God to put an end to their anxiety and worries. In order to get favour from the God all the eminent devotees have stressed on the idea that the repetition of God's name is the only adequate means to secure the highest spiritual experience in life. In the songs 'Sri Krishna namaku bhaja' by Vinod, 'Radha Krishna, Radha Krishna' by Shyamasundar as well as in other songs written by Gourachandra, Kishor, Lochana the poets urge that the repetition of God's name is the only means to salvation (moksha).

The fourth category of Bhajans for Jagannatha repeats the different epithets of Vishnu. These poems do not have much poetic merit except that the devotees surrender themselves completely to God, and repeat His name incessantly in full faith, with the hope of attaining the highest realization of God.

The Neo-Vaishnava sect was concerned with Krishna, especially the youthful Krishna. The Shrimad Bhagavata, the great Vaishnava scripture inspired the Bhajan writers to a great extent. The romantic love-stories of Radha and Gopi, the beauty of Vrindavana, the adventures of Sri Krishna in his Vrindavana Lila, the glory of Sri Krishna's name and his unique beauty, have been described in highly emotional and sensuous terms. There are also Bhajans like 'Jaya jaya Ramakrishna purna shobhakara' by Ramachandra Chhotray which prays both Rama (son of Dasharatha) and Krishna, and there are some Bhajans like 'Mote sehi rupa dekha hari' and 'Jaya Sri Radha Radhe boli dake Kishori' by one Jayadeva, in which there are references to the incarnation of Vamana, Sri Rama and Krishna, one after the other. In these Bhajans the writers do not make any difference among Rama and Krishna and Vamana and they describe the episodes related to Rama, Krishna and Vamana with equal emphasis. In some Bhajans of Sri Krishna, we do not find any episode related to Krishna, but the writer requests the readers to only repeat the name of Sri Krishna or Radhakrishna, which can make them free from the bondage of the world.

In some Bhajans of Gopal Krishna like 'Ede bhagya mora hebaki, hebi Brindabaneswari sebaki, Galabele mo jiba Sri Radha das jiba, mo dina jiba para eka ehipari je', the poet imagines himself as a maid servant (sebaki) of Radha and prays for a vision of the erotic sports of Radha and Krishna. This form of worship and adoration of Radha is a predominant motif in all his poems and especially in his Bhajans.

On the model of Govinda-birudabali of Rupa Goswami, nearly eleven Bhajans were composed by Shyamkishore and other poets, where the main aim was to string together a series of birudas or epithets about Krishna. Though there have been melodious repetitions of syllables, they were more the artifice than art.

There are some Bhajans ascribed to Bhagavata where the main aim of the poets has been to give accounts of the subject matter of the twelve Skandhas of Srimad Bhagavata. We come across another set of Bhajans, where the poets have prayed to the different forms of Vishnu in Satya, Treta, Dwapara and Kali yugas.

Though there are hundreds of Bhajan writers in Orissa, the Bhajans of Achyuta, Ananta, Balarama, Yashobanta and Jagannath of 16th century, Bhima Bhoi of 18th century and Hari Das of 19th century are very popular, and these are often sung by devotees in the villages in the evenings with the accompaniment of Khanjani (small drum) and Gini (small cymbals) with rapt attention and whole-hearted devotion.

K.C.S.

BHAJAN (Rajasthani). What is popularly known and understoód by this nomenclature, is a devotional song usually recited musically in a specific "raga". It has its near equivalent, and not an exact synonym, in another popular form known as Harajasa, meaning what is described in the praise of God 'Hari'. The latter word is typically Rajasthani in its form and character and, coined by the common masses and stands in composite harmony with the folk culture, having no distinct personality of its own. As seen in actual practice, the Harajasas are mostly sung by the women folk and are largely their own creation. The Bhajana on the other hand commands a wider appeal in devotional congregations, big or small, and covers the entire field of religious faiths, crossing all barriers of sectarian fragmentation. Thus, all 'Nirguni' and 'Saguni' branches of the Hindu faith, together with those of the Budhha, the Jaina, the Sikh, and even the Christians for that matter, may be included in its vast ambit. Speaking etymologically, though the word 'Bhaj', being a verb carries a limited sense of devoting oneself to God, the Bhajana has gained the conventional meaning of a devotional song.

Bhajans include 'Padas' of famous Indian saints, such as, Kabir, Surdas, Tulsidas, Dadudayal, Miran, Raidas and a host of others of more or less importance. The text of all these Bhajanas has been so moulded as to suit the mood and texture of the colloquial dialects of Rajasthani language. Instances have come to notice when the entire text has been fabricated and not a single word is original except the stamp of the saint poet's name, such as, 'Kahat Kabir suno bhai Sadho' (Kabir thus addresses the Sadhus). Songs known by the titles of 'Sakhi', 'Sabada', 'Pada', 'Vani', 'Sabadai', etc. all find their places in this category. The authorship of the 'bhajans' is unusually well established, but cases of anonymity are always there.

The field of folk literature is so replete with devotional songs that it becomes wellnigh impossible to categorise them under different heads of Bhajans, 'Harajasas', 'Devi Devata Ra Gita' (Songs of gods and goddesses), 'Dhamals', (Songs sung during the Holi festival), 'Aratis', 'Charjass' and 'Chanwalis' (prayers sung at the time of daily ritual worship) and a host of others of unknown names sung in the 'Jagaranas' (Keeping awake in the night while singing in the praise of gods) and 'Tirthajataras' (pilgrimages), etc.

The Bhajanas by whatsoever names they might be known, were mostly composed by the initiators and devotees of various faiths, prominent amongst them being the 'Natha', 'Ramavata', 'Vishnoi', 'Jasanathi', 'Niranjani', 'Nimbarka', Dadu, Laladasi, Charandasi, Alakhiya, Ramasnehi, Gudadapanthi, Ai and Karani, besides the Digambara and Swetambara Jainas. The local deities have also been linked with one or more of these faiths.

It has been a general practice with the devotees of these faiths and also other persons of religious leanings, to collect the 'bhajanas' of their choice and copy them in a 'gutaka' (a manuscript of pocket size containing miscellaneous writings of one's choice). Such 'gutakas' are still available in large numbers in religious institutions and private possession. The practice has been largely responsible for the preservation of innumerable 'bhajanas' from oral traditions. Unfortunately no attempts have so far been made to publish anthologies of this vast literature. Extraneous sectarian considerations have weighed heavier, and compliations relating to Dadu, Mira, Jambhoji, Jasanatha, Ramasnehi, Nimbarka, Jaina, etc. have been separately brought out, leaving the rest to their oral form. There has been a long standing tradition of Bhajanas in the Jaina literature also.

The first ever compendium of miscellaneous 'bhajans' was brought out by late Raghunath Prasad Singhania from Bombay Pustaka Bhandara, Calcutta, under the title Marawadi Bhajana Sagara (1970). It contains 1125 'bhajans'. The only draw-back in this otherwise laudable attempt, is that it has made no distinction of languages and freely inter-mixed non-Rajasthani 'padas'. Mention of the

'raga' has been made on almost all entries, barring those that were not known to the compiler. It seems that a number of contemporary authors have got their own compositions included in the anthology, thus depriving it of the intrinsic worth it could have attained by publishing standard and established poets.

Ganapati Swami of Pilani has brought out two collections of 'Harajasa's (Harajasa Mala Nos. 122, Pilani, 1977-78). He has taken much pains to search out real folk songs of the devotional kind from rather inaccessible rural areas, and rescued them from rich oral traditions. These 'Harjasas' of unknown origin may be termed as competent emissaries of the culture of this land. H.L. Maheshwari has edited Sabadavani of Jambhoji (16th century), Swami Mangaladas has published Haridas ki vani (1962) and Harinarayana Purohit and K.S. Sekhawat have compiled Miran Brhat Padavali (1968, 1975). There have been dozens of small and big collections of Miran. Despite all this, no systematic approach was ever made to deal with the 'bhajans' in general.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H.L. Maheshwari : History of Rajasthani Literature, Delhi, 1980.

Raw.S

BHAJAN (Sindhi) in Sindhi means a devotional song, generally pertaining to the Hindu religion. A good many devout poets have composed bhajans which although do not strictly follow prosodic rules, are yet based upon rhythm and musical melody. No doubt, various poems of Sufi saints and poets having mainly devotional or spiritual thought content are sung in religious gatherings and have got their place in the anthologies of bhajans. Thus, a considerable number of stanzas from the poetry of Shah Abdul Latif (1689–1752), Sachal (1739–1829), Sami (1743–1850) and Dalpat (1769–1849) are popular as bhajans and are sung in religious congregations.

Nihalchand (1798–1865), also known as 'Nihal Lal' perhaps, is the first poet in Sindh who used the word 'Bhajan' for some of his poetic compositions written in Hindi as well as in Sindhi. His Bhajans are collected in the book Ratan Jote (1958, Karachi) compiled by Motiram S. Ramvani. These poetic compositions are named according to different molodies of Indian music, for instance, 'Bhajan Tilanga', 'Bhajan Asa', 'Bhajan Kalyan.'

The tradition of composing Bhajans was followed up by devout descendants of Nihalchand, who were also good singers and connoisseurs of Indian music. They were Vishindas (1843–1929), Shrichand (1874–1932) and Udhavdas (1879–1926). These songs became more popular with saint poets of 'Vaishnava cult' who sang Bhajans daily in religious and spiritual assemblies. They were known as 'Bhagata' (Devout persons) and the religious congregations became popular as 'Bhagati'. Bhagat Kanwarram was one of the famous singers of Bhajan .

Among the devout poets of Sindh who have composed and sung Bhajans, the names worth mentioning are Gangaram (1860–1950), Kalachand (1867–1911), Thakurdas Sharma (1868–1906), Basantram Sharma (1869–1907), Teunram (1887–1942), Gvalanand (1897–1941). Pahilajram (1900–1968) was the most prolific composer and singer of Bhajans in Sindh. His poetry is collected in Shri Prahlada Prema Vani in fifteen volumes, Krishna Vilasa, Kanvara-Vilasa, Prahlad Pushpanjali, Guru Nanik Vilasa, Mira Vilasa, Savitri Vilasa. Swami Shanti Prakasha's (b. 1907) Bhajans are collected in a book Bhajan Bahar.

Besides, there are a few Sindhi poets who have composed a number of devotional songs. For instances, Hundraj Dukhayal (1910), well known for his patrotic poems, has collected his devotional songs in two volumes, viz. Krishna Bhajanavali (1923) and Bhajanvali (1926). There is a good number of devotional songs in Sindhi sung in worship of Uderolal, an incarnation of God Varuna (e.g. Jhulelal Bhajanmala by Atmaram Memnani, published during the eightees, Amar-Ustuti by Thakur Isardas). Recently, a large number of Bhajans have been composed in Sindhi in worship of Rama Pir, a heroic saint of West Rajasthan, who has gained popularity among Sindhis also.

M.K.J.

BHAJAN (Telugu) is a branch of people's literature. People sing devotional songs in praise of their deities. This process is called 'bhajan'. This is a divine service which is expressed musically. Bhakti is the basis for 'bhajan'. The bhajan consists of service, (of sixteen types), praise of the deity and appeal to God for Moksha.

Pandits have begun singing songs, following 'ashta padis' and 'tarangas' in Sanskrit. Time was when the learned sang these songs to the accompaniment of drums and discs, while the unlettered ones sat listening. Slowly bhajans were written in the spoken language: It was as follows:

"Appannoy-ari billoy"
"Ramanna Ramudoy–Ram bhajana
Ramudosthunnadu–Ram bhajana"
"Sandulanta gondulanta–Ram bhajana
Ramudosthunnadu–Ram bhajana
"Chukka Chukka leedi–Ram bhajana
Soodi Kommula eedi–Ram bhajana
"Kittamma–Gopala bala Kittamma!
Vraja nanda kumara Bala Kittama"

You invite the god-head by offering ankle bells to His feet, rings to His fingers and henna to his tapering nails.

Thus started bhajans in the past, well-defined and within the reach of all. The singers shout together

'Srimad Rama Ramana Govinda Hari' both at the beginning and the end of a kirtan or bhajan. Some used to pick out this kirtan from devotional books like Gutthin divi Ramayana and Dharmapuri Ramayana. Later some composers wrote books of Bhajans. Many have published Ramayana in story form and dramatic form. Likewise they wrote 'Krishna Leelalu' from the Bhagavatam in both the forms. Thus the bhajans have branched off into several styles in course of time.

By the first quarter of the 20th century, bhajans spread to the four corners of Andhra. Presently the following are the types of bhajans followed in India: 1) 'Pandita bhajan', 2) 'Tharangala bhajan', 3) 'Sevamoli bhajan', 4) 'Chidathala bhajan', 5) 'Hari bhajan', 6) 'Thurupu' (thalala) bhajan', 7) 'Kolala bhajan', 8) 'Sapta talala bhajan', 9) 'Thappidi kundala bhajan', 10) 'Kolala bhajan', 11) 'Pandari bhajan' and 12) 'Jandala bhajan'. Each has a distinct style and so many teachers have sprung up.

During the Independence movement a book Swarajya bhajana kirthanas was published. The authorship is unknown. Propaganda is no aim of these bhajans. The writer exhorted all Indians of all religious to stand united as brothers in the struggle for independence.

Today we have Jesus Christ bhajans and Satya Sai bhajans. Gandhi started this type of bhajans in praise of godlike persons.

V.S.K.A.

BHAKTI RASA (Sanskrit) Bhakti or devotion is integral to any religion; this is true of the Hindu religion also. However, a speciality with Hinduism is that it is a particular way of life, closely associated with theology, metaphysics, aesthetics, fine arts and other related fields.

The ninefold classification in the Bhagavatapurana about the grades of Bhakti arising from the different activities in which the devotee is involved, and the attitude in such involvement, is well known. These nine types are—Listening (to the Lord's greatness) (Shravana), glorifying, and remembering Him (kirtana/smarana), attending, worshipping and saluting Him (padasevana, archana, vandana) and adopting a servile attitude (dasya), or friendship (sakhya) or complete surrender (atmanivedana) to Him. The early Bhagavatapurana, as also the Bhaktisutras (Aphorism on Bhakti) by Narada and Shandilya, describe and refer also to the phases of devotional fervour known as Kanta-Shakti such as the Gopis had for the Lord, and which was cultivated in some later school of Krishna-bhakti as Madhurabhava.

Illustrations for the above phases and types of bhakti are available even in the pre-historic Vedic hymns; this tendency has continued with full vigour in the beautiful stotras of great acharyas who hailed from different regions of India.

In the older works bhakti is an ethical and mystical passion of an intensely personal character, rather than an impesonal intellectual conviction adduced by mere knowledge. In these cases the term is interchangeable with priti, bhava, raga or sneha, as expressions of ardent love and yearning. Knowledge or belief is indeed acknowledged as a preliminary, and selfless action is not excluded, but they are not identical with it. The medieval expressions of the passion however dispense with jnana (ulterior knowledge) and karma (action) in the orthodox sense and take their stand exclusively upon mystical emotional realisation (rasa). But it also borders definitely upon sense devotion and leans towards the erotic passions. It was Bopadeva and Hemadri, who in their Bhagavatamuktaphala and its commentary Kaivalyadipika developed this idea of bhakti as the main rasa.

Following these two writers came the Bengal school of Vaishnavism. Especially Gosvamin, one of the chief disciples of Shri Krishna Chaitanya, elaborated fully the bhaktirasa theory in all its ramifications, in his Bhaktirasamritasindhu (Printed Murshidabad, 1924) and Ujjvalanilamani (Navadvipa, 1926). According to the Vaishnava alamkarikas there are twelve rasas—Bharata's eight rasas (omitting shringara and including shanta) along with vatsalya, Preyan, sakhya and dasya. A new orientation to the whole scheme is given in recognising the old shringara as the chief rasa. It is rati for their God, and is also called madhura and ujjvala.

Madhusudana Sarasvati, the famous Advaitic dialectician and devotee of Krishna, gives some new ideas on Bhakti rasa in his Bhagavadbhaktirasayana (Benares, 1927). In this unique work there are two noteworthy aspects. Firstly bhakti is, according to him, the chitta taking the form of the Lord. Secondly bhakti is considered a purushartha, which is defined by him in a comprehensive way as "bliss untailed by sorrow" (duhkha–asamsprishtasukha). He separates jnana from bhakti and so does not include bhakti in the fourth purushartha moksha. It is noteworthy that among the earlier alamkarikas Abhinavagupta proposed to bring bhakti under shanta rasa that is related to moksha.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Abhaya Kumar Guha, Rasa cult in the Chaitanyacharitamrita in the Sir Asuthosh Mookerjee Silver Jubilee Volumes (III. Pt. 3)., S.K. De, The Bhakti Rasa Shastra of Bengal Vaishnavism in Indian Historical Quarterly (vol. 8, 1932), V. Raghavan Bhakti and Madhura Rasa, The Number of Rasas (Adyar, 1975, 3rd edn.).

S.S.J

BHALAN (Gujarati; 15th century) was a poet of Patan in North Gujarat who was according to some scholars a predecessor, according to some a contemporary and according to others a successor of Narsinh Mehata (1414–1480). Popular belief has it that a devotee of Shakti, he transferred his devotion to Lord Rama in later life and took to asceticism. He rendered into Gujarati the tenth canto of Bhagavata not in the form of Puranic narrative but mostly in lyrics. He has made the varied childhood pranks of Rama and Krishna the subject of two bunches of lyrics with the fervour of an ardent devotional poet. He is equally remembered for his judiciously abridged Gujarati version of Banabhatta's Kadambari in verse. To him, again, goes the credit of contributing to the growth and development of the narrative Akhyana form of medieval Gujarati poetry, through his renderings of the stories from the Puranas, which he termed Akhyanas and to which he gave a fixed Kadavam pattern which was to be perfected by Premanand in the seventeenth century. In his Akhyanas on Nala, Durvasa, Mrigi, Dhruva, and Julundhara, he runs close to the original Purana stories and is generally averse to taking the liberty to amplify and modify them as his successors later did. He has been rightly called the father of Akhyana. An adept writer in lyrical as well as narrative poetry, he wields a facile pen and his diction is simple, chaste and dignified.

An.R.

BHAMAHA (Sanskrit), author of the Kavyalamkara, is one of the earliest writers on poetics in Sanskrit. Very little is known about him except that he was the son of Rakrilagomin. Some scholars have taken him to be a Buddhist on the basis of the term Gomin given to his father's name, and his salutation to Sarvajna in the beginning. But his scathing criticism of the Buddhist theory of apoha and the reverence shown by him to the Hindu pantheon suggest that he was a Hindu. There has been a controversy regarding the relative priority of Bhamaha and Dandin; but with the discovery of Dandin's Avantisundarikatha it is now clear that Dandin is later than Bhamaha. The date of Bhamaha can be fixed definitely; he refutes the sphota theory of Bhartrihari (500 A.D.) and the apoha theory promulgated by Dignaga (in the beginning of the 6th century); he refers to the definitions of perception as given by Dignaga and Vasubandhu; but he is not familiar with the views of Dharmakirti (600 A.D.). Hence he may be assigned to the middle of the 6th century. Bhamaha is praised as an ancient authoritative writer on poetics by Anandavardhana (850 A.D.); Udbhata in the beginning of the 9th century wrote his Vivarana commentary on Bhamaha's work.

Bhamaha is considered as the founder of the Alamkara School in Sanskrit poetics; to him all alamkaras or figures of speech are based on Vakrokti, or exaggerated and twisted form of expression with embellishments. According to him the body of poetry consisted of expression and meaning; he advised poets to avoid defect (doshas) and attain excellences (gunas) and described the poetical embellishments (alamkaras) which would enhance the beauty of the expression. He was very particular about the grammatical correctness of expressions and the absence of flaws in logical arguments. He did not distinguish clearly between gunas and alamkaras.

While the Natyashastra gives only four figures of speech (simile, metaphor, dipaka and yamaka), Bhamaha recognizes about three dozens of them. The characteristics (lakshanas) of poetry enumerated in the Natyashastra are now merged in the figures of speech. Rasa is accepted but as a figure of speech (rasavat), svabhavokti (natural description) is mentioned, but not recognised as a figure of speech. Bhamaha attaches little importance to the gunas or to the styles based on them; instead of the ten gunas enumerated in the Natyashastra, he accepts three: madhurya (sweetness), ojas (strength) and prasada (clarity). He casually refers to the two schools Vaidarbha and Gauda. Among prose kavyas he distinguishes between the novel (katha) and the historical romance (akhyayika).

Bhamaha gives equal importance to natural poetic genius (pratibha) and careful study (vyutpatti) as the proper equipment of a poet; the purpose of poetry is said to be giving fame and wealth to the poet and delight, as well as the attainment of the four purusharthas, to the readers. Bhamaha's influence on later poeticians has been very great; even while differing from him on certain points, they refer to him with respect.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: P.V. Naganatha Shastri, Kavyalamkara, English translation and notes, Tanjore 1927.

K.K.R.

BHAMBHANI, NARAINDAS MEWARAM (Sindhi, b. 1912) is a eminent Sindhi author. He taught at D.J. Sindh College, Karachi and later, after migrating to India in the wake of partition, at the Government College, Ajmer. His first book entitled Pap Ain Pakizgi (Sin and Purity, 1940), an adaptation of Thomas Hardy's novel Tess of the D'Urbervilles, fails to fit the social conditions obtaining in Hardy's England to the ones in Sindh of his day. Hence, the characters adapted in Sindhi look unreal and lifeless. His second novel, an original work, Malhini (Woman gardener, 1942) is written in a cumbersome, pedantic style and strings together the sensational incidents in which deaths and suicides occur frequently. It was with his second original novel Vidhava (Widow, 1943) that he was acclaimed as a significant Sindhi novelist. Etched in the Sindhi ethos, the novel deftly delineates a young, educated widow, Sona by name, who is caught in the tangle of social mores and individual aspirations. She emerges bold enough to defy the social barriers and marries the young man of her choice. The year 1945 saw the publication of Adabi Ghuncho (A literary bud), a collection of essays jointly by Ram Panjwani and Bhambhani on various subjects of socio-cultural and literary interest. Bhambhani's Faqiran Lai Qaido (Law for the beggars), an oft-anthologised essay for the students of Sindhi prose, sympathetically looks at the problems of beggars in our society, and makes a forceful plea for the amelioration of their lot. His critical work Shah Jun Surmyun (The heroines of Shah, 1944) is, perhaps, the best known work by him. He rightly observes in it that Shah 'Abdul Latif objectifies his 'bhavas' (emotions) through the vibhavas (objective correlatives) of his heroines' life stories. He also wrote B'arani Jun Akhanyun (Stories for children) in 1946.

Mo.J.

BHANA (Sanskrit) is an one-Act, one-character monologue type of Sanskrit play. One-act implies action lasting for not more than one day; plot, imagined, has only two Sandhis (junctures), mukha and nirvahana. The only character, the hero (or heroine, may be), is the gay Vita (parasite, man about town). He goes out on some paramour's amorous errand, and on his way, carries on talks with imaginary characters through akashabhashita. Hence monologue, consisting mostly of speech, Bharativritti. He describes his or others' adventures, amorous or heroic. Incidentally he also narrates and laughs at follies and vices of all sorts of persons; sometimes mimics them too. Hence it is satirical and formally it is the simplest, probably and most primitive, popular in nature and origin, meant to amuse commoners, instruct even the princes. Amorous plot justifies inclusion of ten lasyangas.

R.N.

BHANDARI, MANNOO (Hindi, b. 1931) was born at Bhanpura in Madhya Pradesh. She received her M.A. degree in Hindi, from the Benaras Hindu Unviersity. She taught at Balika Shiksha Sadan and Rani Birla College in Calcutta. At present she teaches Hindi at the Miranda House, Delhi University. She is married to the well-known novelist and short story writer Rajendra Yadav.

Mannoo Bhandari has written both short-stories and novels. Her short stories like 'Yehi Sach Hai' and 'Main Haar Gai' attracted immediate critical acclaim on publication. Of her novels Mahabhoj and Aapka Banti are the best known. Both these novels deal with questions that rock the traditional life in India. Aapka Banti is a psychological portrayal of the plight of a young child of divorced parents; while Mahabhoj goes further and probes the reality behind the public and political outcries against atrocities heaped on the poor, Harijans in the rural areas. Mahabhoj has also been adapted into a play by the author and staged successfully. It has been translated into English, Marathi, Bengali and Gujarati. Several of Mannoo Bhandari's short stories have been translated into English, Kannada, Marathi and Gujarati and three of them, have been made into films. Her Ek Inch Muskan is an interesting attempt at collaborative novel writing. She has written it with her writer husband, Rajendra Yadav.

Although initially associated with the 'Nai Kahani' movement of the fifties, which sought to break new ground for short story in Hindi, Mannoo Bhandari's work has matured and ventured beyond the movement. Her work shows an openness of approach, and a simple and direct analysis of vital personal and social questions of our times. Her diction is simple and direct too. She has dealt wiith familiar problems of urban families in stories like Ek Plate Sailab' the trauma of a broken marriage (Aapka Banti) the convolutions in the soul of a single working girl (Yehi Sach Hai) and corruption in politics and bureaucracy which results in untold sufferings to the innocent and the weak (Mahabhoj). She is known for her subtle and sympathetic protrayal of the educated Indian woman from the middle classes, whose upbringing pulls her one way, and her liberal education another. While they subscribe rigidly to no man-made ideology, her stories and novels demand of the reader a more intensive kind of reading and a need for introspection and re-examination of traditional values. In fine, she is one of the most sensitive fiction writers of Hindi today. Whatever the point of view, she writes with a deep concern for the problems of a changing society in which, the man-woman relationship has assumed for obvious reasons, are importance which it never assumed in the past. Her treatment of human relationship is marked by artistic power and insight. She has already published quite a few collections of her stories and novels. A list of these works is given below.

Collections of short stories: Main Haar Gayi, Tin Nigahon ki Ek Tasvir, Yehi Sach Hai, Priya Kahaniyan, Sreshtha Kahaniyan, Trishanku, Ankhon Dekha Jhooth (Stories for Children) Novels: Ek Inch Muskan (in collaboration with Rajendra Yadav), Aapka Banti, Kalwa (for young teenages), Mahabhoj Plays: Bina Divaron ke Ghar.

M.P.

BHANGI PANDURANGA RAJARAMA (Konkani; b. 1923) is essentially a poet. He wrote short stories during initial stages and his stories were known not so much for the theme or the technique they used but for their poetic style. The influence of Vamana Varde Valavalikar is intensely evident in his prose writings.

He was educated in the Portuguese language (seven years of Licium-Curso Complementar de Letras) and his love for Portuguese literature has indeed had some influence on his writings. But his themes are essentially local. His choice of words enables the reader to single out his writings from others, although Distavo (Manifestation 1972) is the only collection of poems he has so far published. He has translated Oscar Wilde's Salome from English into Konkani (1975).

Perhaps the political conditions and absence of freedom of expression during the Portuguese regime under whom he was employed is responsible for his introvert nature. His poetry is a reflection of his nature, which at least by implication is inclined to the dark side of the life. Critics call him a pessimist; but his admirers find a silver lining in the dark cloud of life he has portrayed.

BHANGU, RATTAN SINGH (Punjabi; d. 1846) His father Rai Singh, was an active member of the Buddha Dal, and had taken part in many a clash with the local rulers and the Afghan invaders. He was the grandson of Bhai Mehtab Singh Mirankotia, who beheaded Massa Rangad (1740) for sacrilege of Harimandir Sahib, Mehtab Singh was later tortured to death by being put on the rack (1745) by the orders of the Governor. Belonging to a family of martyrs, Bhangu also took his family name 'Sahid'. While concluding his great work Prachin Panth Prakash Bhangu casually makes a mention of his lineage and nativity. (He was a native of village Bhadi, Ludhana. of Mahan Kosh, pp. 2376-77). Bhangu's maternal grandfather was the famous Jathedar Sam Singh, founder of Karod Singhia Missal. Bhangu's only available work is Prachin Panth Prakash which traces the Sikh History right from Guru Nanak Dev to Sikh Missals. In the few introductory pages, he gives a short description of the ten Sikh Gurus, but in the main work he deals in detail with the Sikh Missals. Most of the episodes of Sikh history which he describes in the Prachin panth Prakash relate to his own family, and can be regarded as first hand information and contemporary evidence of the facts. He undertook to write this book on the basis of information received from his father and other contemporary eye-witnesses. He had himself also seen some of the events recorded by him. His book, therefore, is one of the most important and useful sources on the Afghan-Sikh struggle for supermacy in the Punjab, during the 18th century. Though some dates are disputable, yet his work is a solid contribution towards the major happenings of the Sikh history of the 18th century. During those days, Ludhiana was the seat of Missionaries and the centre of Studies. Bhangu was acting as a source about the incidents of Sikh history which related to his family and was, in this way, assisting Captain Hugh Murray (author, History of British India, T. Nelson & Sons, London, 1856) in his research regarding Sikh history. Murray, the renowned historian, was the political Agent of the East India Company at Ludhiana, and inspired by Sir David Ochterloney, was working on a history of British India. Bhangu incorporated in his Mss of Prachin Panth Prakash (1809) most of the incidents which he narrated to Murray. The Prachin Panth Prakash is a store-house of contemproary information regarding 'Panthak' happenings of the time in the same way as Suraj Prakash (of Bhai Santokh Singh) is for Sikh Guru's lives. For this very reason, most of the book re-narrating these episodes, tap this source. Though in the literary field it is only a versification of the facts, yet a land-mark in Panthak history e.g., Bute Shah in Tarikh-e-Punjab (IV) quotes that Sam Singh took 'Pahul' from Kapun Singh, but according to Bhangu he took it from Mastan Singh, who was a close companion of Banda Singh. When Giani Gian Singh of Longowal found Prachin Panth Prakash a poor poetic narrtion, he added some more incidents to it and in 1887 re-shapped a new book which was published in 1937. Nihal Singh, a poet of Lahore, also made further additions to it.

BIBILIGRAPHY: Bhagat Singh, Sikh Polity in the 18th and 19th Centuries (Delhi, 1978). Bhai Kahn Singh, Nabha, Mahan Kosh, (Darbar Patiala, 1930), Ganda Singh, ed, Bibliography of the Punjab (Punjabi University, Patiala, 1966), Sital Sohan Singh, Sikh Itihas de Some

S.S.So.

BHANITA (Maithili). We have almost all forms of traditional Indian poetry represented in Maithili, but the distinguishing feature of the Maithili lyric is that it is extraordinarily musical, direct and spontaneous with its length invariably suited to the expression of one mood or the other. With wide and unlimited range, it draws its main inspiration from the events and experiences of every day life, the Sanskrit poetic and erotic conventions providing background to its imagery and colour. In fact, Bhanita is the most common feature of Maithili lyric.

It is a literary form that appears to have been practised in the early and medieval periods throughout the length and breadth of upper India and its chief characteristic lies in the insertion of the poet's name or any other names he chooses (whether a nom de plume for himself or the name of his guru). It seems to have been a development of the practice of earlier Sanskrit poets to insert in the poem or a stanza the name of the metre in which it is written. In some of the Bhanitas we have the name of the king who happened to be the patron of the poet, or any other person (sometimes along with his consort) whom the poet wishes to compliment or oblige as his benefactor or friend. Vidyapati was the master Bhanita writer whose Bhanitas portray a vivid picture of conflict between propriety and enjoyment, passionate and pathetic sentiments, sensuous and respectful moods, remorse and longing.

In a recent study of the existing works on Vidyapati a very lucid analysis of his Bhanita has been given against the background of new source material from Bengali literature which throws light on the various aspects of this popular lyric form. Poet Jayananda was another great writer, and if the Bhanitas are removed from his songs it would be difficult to distinguish his imageries from those of Vidyapati.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Dineshkumar Jha, Maithili Kavya Shastra (Patna, 1978)., Jayakanta Mishra, History of Maithili Literature, Vol. I (Allahabad, 1949)., Niranjan Chakravarti, Vidyapati-Samiksha (Calcutta, 1970).

U.T.

BHANJA, DHANANJAYA (Oriya; b. 1611, d. 1701) Born in the Bhanja royal dynasty of Ghumusar, Dhananjaya wrote poetry in the traditional pattern of Sanskrit kavya in Oriya literature. In the 17th century, medieval Oriya literature was characterised by its adoption of Sanskirt poetics, rhetoric and depiction of erotic sentiments. The royal court of Ghumusar was then the flourishing seat of traditional learning, literary cultivation and culture, which Sanskrit pundits used to adorn under royal patronage. The literary practices of the Bhanja rulers ushered in a new pattern of erotic Kavya literature in Oriya, a new form and a new technique. Music also played an important role in literature.

Dhananjaya was the son of Banamali Bhanja and he was the king of Ghumusar for a long period of 65 years. Dhananjaya had more than one wife and from them twelve children and among them Gangadhar was the eldest. Dhananjaya was not only a great poet of ornate versification but he played his part as a great patron of learning and culture. His important works are Ichhabati, Ananga Rekha, Tribura Mohini, Madan Manjari and his Raghunath Vilas written in ornate style on the theme of Ramayana is still quite popular.

G.M.

BHANJA, GHANA (Oriya). The poet Ghana Bhanja, author of Govinda Vilasa was the ruler of Ghumusar, a Zamindari in Ganjam district in southern Orissa between 1707 and 1754. The Bhanjas of Ghumusar were traditionally patrons of literature, and many of them were writers themselves and composed poetical kavyas. In addition to Ghana some other leading Bhanja writers were, Dhananjaya, Trivikram and Upendra, the last being the most famous of all. Dhananjaya, Ghana and Upendra wrote 'Kalasa kavyas' following the well known Apabhramsha traditon. In Govinda Vilasa Ghana Bhanja had composed a kavya based on Radha-Krishna Lila. He was influenced by the Riti school of poetry which was dominant at the time and embellished his poetry with many rhetorical as well as alankar devices and elaborated his poetical account with descriptions of nature, and details about the beauty of the heroine, Radha. In fact Radha and Krishna met each other for the first time in the forest of Brindavan. It was spring and as it was a case of love at first sight, the poet describes the natural beauty of Brindavan which adds to the beauty of love. The lover and the beloved feel attracted towards each other, and intensely desire each other's company; the poet makes them suffer the pangs of separation, though finally they achieve their desired union through a woman-messenger of Sri Krishna.

The poet describes Radha's beauty as an Abhisharika, when in response to Sri Krishna's invitation through the woman-messenger, she proceeds to meet her lover, also in the groves of Brindavan.

Though politically Ghana Bhanja was an enemy of Upendra Bhanja whose uncle he was and had occupied the throne of Ghumusar by driving away Upendra's father, the legitimate heir, yet in liteature and particularly in writing kavyas he followed Upendra Bhanja and was largely influenced by him. The two kavyas with fictional love story that he wrote, entitled Trailokya Mohini (She who charms the Three Worlds) and Rasanidhi (The Treasure of Beauty) were done on the model of Labanyavati, the famous kavya of Upendra Bhanja. All his writings, as was usual at the time, were musically-structured units and employed raga, tala, etc., so that they could be sung. In 1739 he got the title of 'Kshatriyabar' from Birakeshari Deb, King of Puri (Khurdha), which he extensively used in his writings and at times called himself 'Kshatriyabirabar Bhanja'. He was a minor poet, but an interesting representative poet of the time.

K.C.S.

BHANJA, UPENDRA (Oriya, 17th century) One of the most celebrated poets in medieval Oriya literature, Upendra Bhanja in many respects was a pioneer of romantic and ornate poetry of power and vitality. Born in the royal family of Bhanja dynasty of Ghumusar, a Taluk in Ganjam District in Orissa, Upendra Bhanja is believed to have lived between 1680 and 1720 although scholars differ regarding his exact date. The ruling Bhanja of Ghumusar pursued a tradition of literary culture, characterised by ornate poetry. His grand father Dhananjaya Bhanja was a poet of repute in his days. Upendra received a traditional education and was trained in Sanskrit scholarship. Upendra Bhanja was a symbol of ornate poetry, inheriting the Sanskrit Kavya tradition. He is also an interpreter of the contemporary court life. His literary practice ushered in a new style of Oriya narrative poetry and his numerous compositions became brilliant specimens of art, neatly executed with a precision of words. He is credited with nearly 100 books, half of which are still unpublished. The entire skill and excellence of his poetry lie in the much laboured arrangement of words responding to alliterations, ornate versificaiton, artificial pedantries, and jugglery of words, each capable of interpreting the meaning in more than one ways. Romanticism, eroticism, the description of the hero and heroine, who are princes and princesses, their love and romance are the chief subjects of Upendra's poetry. Being a man of high contemplative vision his poetry embraced a vast canvas of imagination, emotion and artistic embellishment. Among his most subtle work of poetic art, Labanyavati Baidehishavilasa, Premsudhanidhi, Kotibrahmandasundari, Raspanchak, Subhadra Parinaya, and Rasika Harabali are noteworthy. His themes are drawn from myths and court life. He has adopted alliteration, rhetoric and music to create an abiding appeal in the minds of the readers. His characters are magnificient and pathos, romance and poetic sensibility play a powerful role in his poetry.

His Labanyavati, Kotibrahmandasundari, Baidehishavilasa give a profound romantic experience. Rasika Haravali has for its theme the story of Vidyadhar, cursed and born in Purushottam, and his daughter Rasika Haravali, a paragon of beauty. Being attracted by her exquisite beauty and charm, the prince of Koshal reached Purushottam in search of her and ultimately they were united in marriage. The work has characteristic descriptions of nature, cities, court life and social festivals including marriage. The festival performed in honour of Lord Jagannath of Puri is narrated with a great devotion. Subarna Rekha, another narrative Kavya of Upendra Bhanja, is designed in the mould of Rasika Haravali. Baidehishavilasa and Lavanyavati are the most celebrated among Bhanja's works. The theme of Baidehishavilasa which carries the 'B' initial throughout the Kavya is drawn from the Ramayana. Labanyavati has for its theme the passionate romance of Chandra Bhanu the prince of Karnatak and Labanyavati, the royal daughter of Simhala. Similarly Kotibrahmandasundari has for its theme the love and romance of prince Pushpaketu and the princess Koti Brahmanda Sundari, the much sought-after beauty. Subhadra Parinaya is based on the Mahabharata. His Chitra Kavya Bandhosaya is modelled on the same kind of literary art of Sanskrit poetics showing therein the interplay of words, each offering various meanings and interpretations.

Though erotic love is predominant in his Kavya, he has deeply pondered over the social and religious aspects of human life. He was a great worshipper of Rama. With deep love for life and society his writings conjure for his readers the universal image of a love-lorn romantic soul. An artist of deep contemplation and delicate sensitivity, Upendra Bhanja occupies a very significant position in Oriya literature.

G.M.

BHANKAR (Gujarati), the first collection of poems of Balvantrai Kalyanrai Thakore published in 1917, was a big event in the history of Gujarati poetry. The poetic mood and mode of expression in it deviate from earlier poetry. Thakore's coarse style and reflective lyricism paved a new path in Gujarati poetry and provided fresh models to his followers.

It includes sonnets, songs and a long poem named 'Arohan', wherein the Gujarati poet and critic Sundaram sees the ascension (Arohan) of Gujarati poetry. In Bhankar, Thakore has evolved a new style of expression and form of verse which he had modelled on blank verse. He called it 'Agey Pravahi Padya'. He tried to divorce poetry from music which is exemplified in the Bhankar. The poems of Bhankar may seem rough in style but are rich in emotion.

The second part of Bhankar was published in 1927 under the title Bhankar-dhara 2. In 1942 Thakore published the further edition of Bhankar which includes his previous three collections of poems namely (i) Bhankar, (ii) Bhankar-dhara 2 (iii) Mharan sonnet. Bhankar edition of 1942 also includes some other poems which were not collected in a book form. In 1951 Thakore published the enlarged edition of Bhankar, wherein he included some new poems. The latest edition of Bhankar, posthumously published in 1962, includes the remaining poems of Thakore.

D.P.

BHAN, PUSHKAR (Kashmiri; b. 1926) belongs to a middle class Kashmiri pandit family. After passing his B.A. from Punjab University, he started his career as Assistant Accountant, Modern Mills, Bombay. During his stay in Bombay he used to write in Inqlab. During the tribal raid on Kashmir in 1947, Pushkar joined the Cultural Wing of patriotic forces and participated in the revival of cultural movement launched by the Cultural Front as a stage actor. He joined Radio Kashmir in 1951 and is at present working on its staff as a Selection Grade Producer.

Pushkar started his famous satirical Radio Machama in fifties and till date 54 instalments of this serial have been broadcast by the Srinagar Station of All India Radio. This Drama serial brought Pushkar both name and fame and its characters 'Machama', 'Sula Gota', 'Rehman Dada', 'Khatiq', 'Kak' and 'Kak Ded' are the house hold names in Kashmiri families. A selection of this serial was published in book form in 1977 under the caption Machama. This book contains the stage version of some of his Machama series plays. Machama brought Sahitya Akademi Award to Pushkar in 1978.

His famous family serial 'Zonadab' in which he was assisted for some time by his friend and collegue (late) S.N. Sadhu fetched him the distinction of Padma Sri in 1974. This family serial is considered a land mark in the history of All India Radio and is being broadcast almost daily for the last eighteen years.

Pushkar has acted in two Kashmiri films 'Manzi Rat' and 'Mehjoora' and has delivered his goods to perfection. Pushkar is a homourist and satirist and both these elements are evident in his prose, plays and poetry.

The famous counter propaganda serial Wutal Buji which was broadcast by Srinagar Station of A.I.R. in 1965 was a joint venture of Pushkar and Sadhu. Besides producing plays for Radio, he has successfuly produced plays on stage also. He is a polished radio voice and a stage actor of standing.

In collaboration with (late) Som Nath Sadhu he wrote a number of stage plays. One such play Gr-and rehearsal was given first prize in play script competition in 1967 by the State Cultural Academy.

Pushkar has written a number of popular series for Radio Kashmir which include A Asun Ta Gindun and Posha Gund.

Besides Kashmiri Pushkar has a good command over Urdu, Hindi and English. He has written a book in Urdu for the Publication Division of Government of India which was published in 1970 under the caption Zari Taraqi kay naiyuofuq.

Pushkar's contribution to Kashmiri language and literature is in every respect worth praising.

Pushkar has written a lot but most of it is still in the archives of Radio Kashmir, Srinagar.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Amin Kamil and Chaman Lal Chaman, Asam Traiya, Srinagar, 1965; Bashir Akhtar, Ahwal Nama, Srinagar, 1978; J.L. Koul, Studies in Kashmiri, Srinagar, 1968; Mulk Raj Saraf, The J&K year book and who's who, Jammu, 1968; Naji and Shouq, Kashri Adbuk Tariekh, Srinagar, 1978; P.N. Bajaz, Kashmir in Crucible, Delhi, 1967; S.K. Raina, Kashmiri Bhasha aur Sahitya ka Itihas, Delhi, 1968.

Mo.S.

BHANSAHEB (Gujarati; b. 1698, d. 1755) was a follower, of Kabir sect. As all the followers of the sect applied the suffix 'Saheb' to their names, Bhàndas also changed his name to Bhansaheb. He was a philosophical poet who preached the doctrine of monism through his poetry. His two philosophical works Hastamalak (name of a character) and Ajgar-Avadhut Samvad (dialogue between a Saint and the Cobra) depicts in a dialogue form the philosophical concept of oneness of the individual and universal being. Both the works preach the Vedantic doctrine of monism, and in order that the doctrine can be easily grasped by common man, he has given a number of illustrations. The dialogues in these two poems are of the types of dialogues between Yama (God of Death) and Nachiketa in Kathopanishad.

Bhansaheb is the first poet in the medieval period who has given the name of Garbh and Garbis to a type of songs sung while dancing, and he has also composed Hamchis (a dance poem in which the participants clasp each others hands). His Hanumanni Hamchi (Hamchi of Hanuman) and Nrisinghjini Hamchi are well known. He has also composed Prahladakhyan (The story of devotee Prahlad) in which he has narrated the incident of Prahlad who incurred the wrath of his father for reciting the name of Lord Vishnu.

Bhansaheb will be remembered for his seventy one Garbas and Garbis. He is the first medieval Gujarati poet who has used the words Garbas and Garbis for his dance poems. In one of his famous poems he has described how the universal mother performs the Garba dance. His vision is cosmic. He says in the poem:

'The circumference of the sky is the pot, with which the month Bharani performs the dance. Sun is the lamp in which moon is the light. Earth is the earthen vessel in which the light is lit and mountain Meru is the wick. The seven seas are the oil.'

Thus his imagination covers the whole universe. Bhansaheb will be remembered as pioneer of Garba and Garbis in medieval Gujarati poetry.

C.M.

BHANU, JAGANNATH PRASAD (Hindi; b. 1859, d. 1945) was born on 8 August at Nagpur. Jagannath Prasad had his early education at Nagpur itself. Having a keen devotion to learning, he acquired an adequate knowledge of Hindi, Sanskrit, Urdu, English, Marathi and Oriya languages, through self-study. Having had an occasion to work as a teacher in early life, he developed interest in poetic composition and adopted 'Bhanu' as his pen-name to write poetry. He was later transferred to the department of settlement where he retired as an Asstt. Settlement Officer.

Having a profound interest in Hindi language and literature, Bhanu developed an attitude for the study of works on 'Riti' (Rhetorics). After a thorough study of various works on prosody, he penned a work on the subject entitled Chhand Prabhakar in 1894. Turning thereafter to the study of different works on Poetics, Rhetorics, traditional classification of heroine 'Guna', 'Riti' etc; he published his Kavya Prabhakar in 1905. The two works were very well-received, were prescribed in various courses of study and formed the basis of 'Bhanu's' name and fame in literary circles.

Bhanu's' tastes were varied. Along with the different aspects of literature. 'Bhanu' also interpreted the tale of the Ramayana and the Mahabharata in simple language.

He published about a dozen books—the latest edition of Kavya Prabhakar, being published as recently as 1981. Herein he has rather systematically compiled the choicest of the poetry of the poets of the past–including his own. No other such compilation is available in Hindi.

He was honoured by the Hindi Sahitya Sammelan, Allahabad (U.P.) when it bestowed on him the degree of 'Sahitya Vachaspati'. The citation establishes him as a great connoisseur of Rhetorics and Poetics in the modern age. His own poetry is embellished with the same type of grace and poetic excellence as we find in the poetry of the poet of the 'Ritikal'. Some of his passages are so well written and so well-phrased that they could be favourably compared with the best of the 'Riti' period and it is difficult to distinguish between the two.

Vi.S.

BHANU SINGHER PADAVALI (Bengali) is a collection of Bengali lyrics, by Rabindranath Tagore under the pseudonym Bhanu Singha. The poems were first published in Bharati, a literary journal published by the Tagore family, in 1877 and in 1884 they were published as a book. In Tagore's autobiography Jiban Smriti (1912), we find a detailed and amusing account of how these lyrics were composed. Rabindranath from his early age was attracted to Vaishnava lyrics, the most popular poems of Bengal, depicting the love of Radha and Krishna. He found in the Vaishnava poets, lyrical movement, startling and new images, verse-melodies and fluid language. Since the age of fourteen he was very fond of a collection of Vaishnava lyrics, Prachin Kabya Sangraha by Saradacharan Mitra and Akshay Sarkar. The young poet had also read about the young English poet Thomas Chatterton (1752–70), who deceived the public by forging medieval poems purporting to be by Thomas Rowley, a non-existent 15th century monk. This story had exercised a natural fascination, and Rabindranath made himself a poetical incarnation in a supposed old Vaishnava singer Bhanu Singha. He gave some of these lyrics to Probodhchandra Ghosh, who was much older to him. Tagore told him that he had copied these lyrics from a tattered manuscript which he had found in the library. According to Tagore, these lyrics had deceived Vaishnava enthusiasts, and Nishikanta Chatterjee was awarded a German Ph.D. for a treatise on ancient Vaishnava poetry in which Bhanu Singha was lauded. When the book Bhanu Singher Padavali was published, Rabindranath had posed himself as the publisher. In the same year he had written an unsigned satirical essay where he had hinted that he himself was Bhanu Singha. In his mature years Tagore had said about these lyrics, 'Any attempt to test Bhanu Singha's poetry by its ring would have shown up the base metal; it had none of the ravishing melody of ancient pipes, but only the tinkle of a modern foreign barrel organ'. Again he had condemned them as an intrusion in the world of literature. Still, it cannot be denied that these lyrics were of a special value to the poet. Tagore had discarded most of his writings published before he was twenty except the lyrics of Bhanu Singha. When the lyrics were first published, they were sixteen in number; later the poet wrote four more, and the last one first appeared in the first edition of Kari-o-Kamal, another of his book of poems in 1887. At present, there are twenty lyrics in the book. They are not continuous, but still can be grouped into three parts. In the first six lyrics we can find a development of incidents. They can be arranged as:–(1) Radha's longing for Krishna on a beautiful spring-day; (2) the futile search of Sakhi for Krishna; (3) Radha's pining for Krishna; (4) Sakhi goes to Mathura and tells Krishna of Radha's sufferings; (5) Sakhi returns to Radha and requests her to dress up for Krishna's arrival; (6) union of Radha and Krishna. No continuity has been maintained in the next twelve lyrics. We find lyrics of Radha and Krishna, their union, separation, Radha's complaint and sorrow, Krishna's indifference, but no particular order has been followed in these lyrics. In short, the young poet had tried to arrange in as many ways as he could think of the old themes of the Vaishnava singers; the apparent unkindness and neglect of Krishna, painful sorrow of deserted Radha, dark winter full of rains, rippling Jamuna river, melodious sound of flute,—everything was according to Vaishnava conventions. In every lyric, in compliance with the Vaishnava tradition Bhanu Singha chides or consoles or advises the disconsolate Radha. These lyrics can be considered at best as a young poet's adventurous expedition into the medieval poetry. But the 19th lyric is much superior to these in poetic value and has surpassed the boundaries of a particular religious doctrine. Deserted by Krishna, afflicted Radha addresses death as her beloved Shyam and welcomes it: "moronore tuhu mama Shyam saman". This poem in its beauty of expression and diction, is the forerunner of Tagore's many mature poems on death. The language of Bhanu Singha's lyrics is Brajabuli, an artificial poetic language devised by the Vaishnava poets of the middle ages. Three of these lyrics have been translated into English: Death, O Death like my Syam art thou: Sheaves (1932), Nagendranath Gupta; The Coming of Krishna : Ibid; Dense Clouds are massed: Anthology of One Hundred Songs of Rabindranath (Vol. I, 1962).

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Bimanbihari Majumdar, Rabindra Sahitye Padavalir Sthan (1961)., Edward Thompson, Rabindranath Tagore, Poet and Dramatist, 2nd edn., 1948.

Ja.C.

BHANUBHAKTAKO BHASHA RAMAYANA (Nepali) is the magnum opus of Bhanubhakta Acharya (1814–69) who is regarded as the 'Adikavi' (First Poet) of Nepali literature. The complete Bhanubhaktako Bhasha Ramayana was first published in 1885 from Benaras by Pandit Damaruvallabh and his co-workers.

Bhanubhakta's Ramayana is mainly grounded on the Adhyatma Ramayana. He, however, created a great literary work while Adhyatma Ramayana had virtually remained a religious text to preach the cult of Bhakti (devotion). Nowhere has Bhanubhakta deviated widely from the Adhyatma Ramayana, yet the Nepalese milieu and mores have been ingeniously assimilated by him in the telling of Ram's ayan (story). An instance should suffice. In Adhyatma Ramayana, when Hanuman succeeds in finding out Sita in Lanka and bringing message from her, Ram, by way of expressing his thankfulness draws him closer and holds Hanuman in embrace (Adhyatma Ramayana, Sundarkanda, Canto V, verse 61). Bhanubhakta recreates it to accord with Nepalese reverence of Ram who is Vishnu. In Bhanubhaktako Bhasha Ramayana, Ram bestows Hanuman his divine lap (Sundar-Kanda, 151–153), a blessed favour that Dhruva was deprived of. And never to be missed is the highly praised fact that Bhanubhakta has written his Ramayana with a natural mastery of narrative art. Bhanubhakta was not a seer or saint, he was a layman and a great poet and narrator.

Bhanubhakta had his predecessors (Basant Sharma and others) in using 'bhasha' (which later came to be called Nepali bhasha) and Sanskritic metres with versatility. But he excelled them all (and none has surpassed him yet) in varying with ambidexterity the metres, some eight only in number, in the narration. In modern terminology, in Bhanubhaktako Bhasha Ramayana, there is a perfect unison of form and subject, the form is greatly a component of the poetical content as the book is primarily meant to be recited and not only to be read.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Baburam Acharya, Tulanatmak Sundarkanda, 1945., Balchandra Sharma, Bhanubhakta, 1957., Bhaichand Pradhan, Adikavi Bhanubhakta Acharya, 1952., Hridaya Chandra Singh Pradhan, Bhanubhakta: Ek Samiksha, 1943., Indra Bahadur Rai, (ed.), Bhanubhakta ka Kriti: Adhyayanharu, 1969., Surya Bikram Gewali, Tulsi Bahadur Chettri, Jagat Chettri, (editors), Bhanubhakta Smarak Grantha (Enlarged edition), 1969.

B.R.

BHANUDATTA (Sanskrit), referred to by some of the commentators as Bhanukara, was a popular writer on rhetorics. From his works it is known that he was a native of Videha country and that the name of his father was Ganapati. The pedigree of the family is given as Ratneshvara - Sureshvara - Vishvanatha - Ravinatha - Bhavanatha-Mahadeva-Ganapati-Bhanudatta. Ganapati, the father appears to have been a poet of considerable merit, whose stanzas are quoted by the son in his several works. He was also the uncle of Chandeshvara, the minister of a king of Mithila. Bhanudatta married a sister of the Smriti writer Misaru Mishra, author of Vivadachandra who flourished in the middle of the 15th century. Hence he is assigned to a period between 1450 and 1500.

Though he is credited with the authorship of several works, he is renowned for his two popular works on the subject of Nayaka-Nayika and Rasas called Rasamanjari and Rasatarangini. The first is a small work dealing with illustrations of the topics of Nayaka-Nayika, their adjuncts and excellences, the two varieties of shringara and the ten stages of love in separation. The Rasatarangini divided into eight chapters called Tarangas deals with sthayibhava, vibhava, anubhava, sattvikabhava, vyabhicharibhava, Shringara, other rasas and three kinds of drishti in relation to sthayibhava, etc. Both the works are commented upon by many writers. Shringaradipika ascribed to him is not available though the Alamkaratilaka in five cantos has seen the light of day. The illustrations are his own and those of his father. It deals succinctly with some of the major topics of rhetorics. His anthology Rasaparijata contains about a thousand verses composed by himself and by his father Ganapati. It is divided into ten sections called Pallavas. A lyrical poem entitled Gitagaurisha or Gitagauripati is also attributed to his authorship and it is modelled on the Gitagovinda of Jayadeva. Other works attributed to him are Kumarabhargaviya and Chitrachandrika.

Bhanudatta shows some originality in his classification of rasa as laukika and alaukika, subdividing the latter into svapnika (enjoyed in a dream), manorathika (fanciful like a castle in the air) and aupanayika (as depicted in poetry). He gives a three-fold arrangement of rasa from the point of view of manifestation as: abhimukha, vimukha and paramukha. Besides giving principal position to shringara among the rasas, Bhanudatta admits maya under the category. Among the later writers on rasa he holds an important position by his originality of conception.

N.U.

BHANUMATI (Assamese) a novel (1890–91) by Padmanath Gohain Barua, is the first of the genre in modern Assamese literature. The author's intention in writing this book was to remove the want of a regular novel and he published it serially in the monthly journal Bijuli. The theme is the love-story of Bhanumati and Charugohain, a ward of her father. The maiden's father had decided to marry her daughter to the King's son, the heir apparent. Charugohain, her lover, felt helpless and submitted to his guardian's heartless arrangement. On the eve of the marriage Bhanumati left home stealthily in the guise of a youth. The king held Charugohain responsible for the flight of the bride and put him in prison. The maiden, however, could not conceal herself for long; she had to return to her father. With the help of Tara, her rival in love, Bhanumati managed to meet Charugohain in prison and offered to help his safe escape; but he refused to accept such aid. Condemned to death, Charugohain was killed by lightning while he was being led to the gallows by hangmen. Bhanumati, love-lorn and desperate, drowned herself in a pond and her rival Tara, a crazy young woman, took to a life of vagrant nun.

Charugohain is a passive hero. He has neither courage nor initiation to save Bhanumati from a marriage, inhumanly forced on her. For her, love is the whole existence and nothing is left for her but self immolation. Her rival Tara is exceptionally friendly and free from usual jealousy and rancour.

The author called it a domestic novel. Except for a reference to the Moumaria insurrection, there is nothing in the book that relates it to any historical event.

The disguise device handed down from Elizabethan romance and the divine machinery of death by lightning rather jar on the reader. The author is concerned with outer events rather than with the inner mind. The story, except for the last chapter, is put in the mouth of the heroine, thereby adopting the autobiographical method.

Bhanumati stands on the threshold of modern Assamese novel. Work of an author executed in his teens and with no example before him in the language, it has also historical importance. Some of the passages are examples of fine Assamese prose.

Jo.S.

BHANUMATI RAMAKRISHNA, PALUVAYI (Telugu; b. 1925) is an outstanding Telugu short story writer. She is one of the top stars of the Telugu silver screen and a well known singer. She started writing since 1940. Some of her short stories were published in Yuva, a Telugu monthly brought out from Hyderabad. She has a wonderful grasp of characters and a flair of her own. Her narrative sparkles with wit and human understanding. She is a recipient of the 1965 Andhra Pradesh Sahitya Award for her collection of stories Attagari Kathalu, literally Mother-in-law's stories. The short stories included in the work deal with everyday life in middle class homes with the gentle mother-in-law as the central character. This book has won for her a secure position as a humorist in the contemporary Telugu literature. The title of Padmashri was conferred upon her in the year 1966. Andhra University, Waltair, honoured her with the title of 'Kalaprapurna', an honoris causa in recognition of her contribution to Telugu literature and performing art. Her Attagaru Naksalaitlu, (literally Mother-in-law and Naxalites), a collection of short stories published in 1971, is full of humour. Her other work is: Bhanumati Kathanikalu, published in 1965.

M.C.

BHARADVAJ, PASHUPATI (Assamese; b. 1918) is the pseudonym taken by Umakanta Sarma, a renowned Assamese novelist of the sixties of the 20th century. The author wrote the novels under a pen-name, not out of a fashion in vogue, but for freedom of expression (as the author says) which he did not have as a Government Officer. A first class M.A. in Philosophy from the Calcutta University and M.Ed. from the Illinios University of the U.S.A., Umakanta Sarma started his career as a college teacher and retired as the Director of Public Instruction, Assam in 1973. Since his school days he has a knack of writing short-stories, social plays and critical discourses on literary topics, which have attained maturity in course of time. Umakanta appeared as a writer of short story, drama and a history of aesthetics in the forties when he was serving as a college teacher. Later on, when he joined the Education Department of the Government of Assam as an Officer-in-Charge of Primary Education, there was a setback in his literary pursuits, although his urge for creative writings could not be eclipsed by the humdrum routine life of a top Government Officer. In course of time he gained the maturity of experience by mixing with the cross sections of the people, seeing the climax of India's struggle for freedom in 1942 and coming in contact with hundreds of refugees from East Pakistan after the partition of the country in 1947. As a Government Officer staying in Shillong he had to visit the border of the Garo Hills through which the river Chimchang flows and to see the unfortunate refugees, taking shelter in the Indian camps and to hear their harrowing tales of inhuman sufferings. Born of a poor Brahmin family and endowed with a philosophical insight into life, Umakanta was moved by the sufferings of the unfortunate people. But to narrate the sufferings he had seen he did not have the freedom of a creative artist, and consequently he appeared as Pashupati Bharadvaj to write his novels.

The first of his novels Uranta Meghar Cha (1960) is the tale of the lower class of men, struggling relentlessly for existence in the unhealthy social surroundings, exciting pity and terror. His second, Chimchangar Duta Par (1965) deals with the tale of the tragic exodus of the Garo tribal people from the erstwhile East Pakistan into India in 1964. The author narrated the tale with his eye on the inhumanly tortured refugees. His third, Ranga Ranga Tej (1968) may be called literary photographs of the people's participation in the great Indian struggle for freedom in 1942. In all the novels the struggle of the laity either for a healthy social existence or for a political emancipation or for an escape from the socio-political injustices, is narrated in simple story-telling manner, using at times the colloquial language of the people. Though small in number, the great human appeal of the novels has made Pasupati one of the highly popular novelists in Assamese.

FURTHER WORKS: Ghuraniya Prthivir Beka Path (1947) and Uka Eti Mon (1978)–both collections of short stories, Kavya Bhumi (1950)– a critique on aesthetics, Sesh Pataka—a historical drama and Rajarshi—an Assamese rendering of Rabindranath's work of the same name.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Satyendranath Sarma, Asamiya Upanyakhar Gatidhara, Gauhati, 1976.

Pu.S.

BHARADWAJA RAVURI (Telugu, b. 1929) is a well known writer in Telugu for the last four decades. He is a short story writer, novelist, playwright, writer on popular science and also a very good feature writer. He mastered the language of the lower middle class and the poor. He presents various aspects of their life through his writings. Bharadwaja was born in a poor family. He studied only upto the high school level and entered a hard life. In his childhood Bharadwaja spent his time in the fields and observed the hard life of agricultural workers. He noted their slangs, anger, laughter, depression, love and philosophy and other moods. He used them in his later day life to portray the real world of the village people. In this field Bharadwaja excels many writers.

In his early youth Bharadwaja reached Tenali and he lived his life as a press-worker. After some years he became a sub-editor of a magazine. He resigned the job when his self respect was put to test. He worked in a fountain-pen company as a salesman. Even there he could not tolerate the inhuman behaviour of the proprietor. He resigned this job also and was at loose ends for some time. At present he is working as a spoken word producer in AIR Hyderabad.

Bharadwaja wrote his first short story at the age of sixteen. He called it 'Okappudu' (once upon a time). It was a story in the folk style. Bharadwaja was very much influenced by Chalam. He wrote many sex stories imitating Chalam. Soon Bharadwaja became an established writer of sex stories. Magazines encouraged him to write many more. He wrote them without any inhibitions or fear and earned his livelihood.

Bharadwaja wrote hundreds of short stories, a handful of novels, many plays for production and broadcast many books of popular science in quick succession. Writing for magazines and earning his livelihood was his main occupation for sometime.

Bharadwaja was influenced by the famous social reformers and revolutionaries, Tripurameni Ramaswamy Choudari and Gora. 'Karunyam' (Pity), 'Chitragraham', 'Swarthaparulu' (Selfish people), 'Palapunta' (Milky way), 'Vargadrishti' (Class conflict), 'Paristitula Varasulu' (Heirs of circumstances), 'Naku Devunni chudalani Undi' (I want to see God) and 'Jaligunde' (Kind heart) are some of his best stories.

In Swartha parulu' Bharadwaja depicted the politics in heaven. He fancies that our gods are very selfish people. He described the space travel and the experiences of astronauts long before the space expedition of Yuri Gagarin in 'Chitragraham'. In 'Palapunta' he portayed the peculiar life of a stage artist. From all angles 'Paristhitula Varasulu' is a very good story. He described a night in winter in this story. Four people-a beggar, a thief, a prostitute and a pseudo social reformer meet at a fire place on the road. Of all these people, the author tells us. the pseudo social reformer is the most dangerous and that he is a menace to society.

Bharadwaja sighted God in the hard life of a rickshaw puller. He described his own experience in 'Naku Devunni Chudalani Undi'.

Pakundu Rallu (Slippery stones), an outstanding novel in Telugu is Bharadwaja's major work. Kadambari Idam Jagat (This is life) and Karimingina Velagapandu (Much ado about nothing) are his other novels. All his novels are popular. Pakundu Rallu is the story of Manjari, a drama actor and a woman of loose words. One enterprising drama contractor took her to the movie land. There she had many bitter experiences in the beginning. With sheer will power and intelligence she overcame the adverse circumstances. She shrewdly manipulated men and matters and became a big film star. She earned huge sums of money and fame. But she was not happy with all the worldly possessions. She gambled with life and lost and ultimately she committed suicide. Bharadwaja's mastery over the narration and description makes a reader complete this novel in one sitting.

'Karimingina Velagapandu' is a very good fantasy. A husband and wife want to transform into each other's body. Gods permitted them. One fine morning their sexes were changed. On that day they realised the other's difficulty and wished to return to their own self. Gods again permitted them to be their own selves.

Bharadwaja won the people's applause and praise for his feature Jivana Samaram. He interviewed different people belonging to different professions and recorded their experiences in artistic form. As one critic remarked Bharadwaja can read the fear in the eyes of an ant. So his attempt to portray the lives of daily labourers is a big success. He won the State and Central Sahitya Akademi Awards for this book.

R.M.R.

BHARANI SONGS (Tamil). The genre is named after the second nakshatra (star, Skt. Bharani) which is part of Aries. The term Bharani particularly indicates the class of literature in Tamil produced in celebration of war-like achievements. Though it was through Kalingattu Bharani, describing the victory of Kulottunga I over the north Kalingas in 1105 that this mode of poetry was ushered into limelight, literary evidences are extant for a greater antiquity, as old as the Sangam period. On the day of the constellation Bharani, dwarfish malformed devils enjoy the feast of gruel cooked with the flesh of the dead on the battlefield, with goddess Kali blessing her attendant spirits. The constellation has as its deities Kali and Yama and is associated with the elephant. As a rule, a Bharani poem bears the name of the vanquished and is composed in the metre, 'Kali-t-tazhisai'. One born on the day of Bharani will rule over the land, 'Bharani kontavan taraniyalvan' is a popular saying. Grammatical treatises prescribe that a hero scoring victory over an elephant in the battlefield deserves a Bharani song. It is also said that the poem is sung in praise of one who has overcome a thousand elephants on the battlefields. The poetical norm used with a judicious mixture of the real and the unreal in Bharani poems is peculiarly Dravidian, as there does not appear to exist a poem corresponding to this type in Sanskrit literature.

A Bharani poem begins with invocation. Then follows the request for opening the portals to the spouses of warriors in slumber, communicating the news of victory in the war, known as 'katai tirappu'. The nature and avocation of the spirits, 'peykalaip-patiyatu', is described next. The sacred temple of Kali forms another section. The demons ventilating their grievances to the goddess expressing their woes of perennial hunger is narrated in another chapter known as 'Pyemuraipatu'. Kali commands the demon from the battlefield to render an account of the happenings there. In one more section, the devil's naration to the goddess 'Kalikku-kuli kuriyatu' gives a preface to the historical back-ground and the victory in the war. The goddess with her attendant spirits visits the battle-field which is told in one canto under the heading 'Kalam Kattutal'. In the concluding portion entitled 'Kulatutal, cooking of the Bharani gruel, its distribution and feasting among the spirits and benediction of the goddess are described. The order narrated is the normal order, but the arrangement may also vary. Except for the devil's narration, the other constituents are common to all Bharani poems. In some, Indrajalam or witchcraft is invoked.

Bharani poems can be classified under different heads. Kalingattu-Bharani and the now extinct one in honour of Vikrama Cholan (1118-1133) are poems of eulogy. To this category may also belong, Kamsavatai Bharani, Iraniyavatai Bharani and Suranvatai Bharani dealing with the slaying of Kamsa, Hiranya and Suran respectively. Annavatai Bharani, Mokavatai Bharani and Pasavatai Bharani (17th century), Bharanis about the slaying of ignorance, lust and attachment respectively, are in honour of the preceptors of religion, and allegorical in content. Pursuit of the study of philosophy forms the basis of such works. Of these, Takkayaka-Bharani and Pasavatai-Bharani deserve a closer look.

Ottakkuttar, on whom the title of 'Emperor of poetry' was conferred, was the author of Takkayaka-Bharani, Bharani of Takkan's sacrifice. The conduct of sacrifice by Dakshan (Tamil Takkan) with the malafide intention of degrading Shiva was thwarted by Virabhadra on Shiva's command. A historian by instinct, Ottakkuttar refers to the construction of chariot at Tillai by Rajarajan II (1146-1163), planning of a seven-tier tower by Kulottungan II (1133-1150) and the building of the Rajarajesvaram by Rajarajan I in the poem. Unlike in other Bharanis, in this song of praise, the poet gives the pride of place to the monarch Rajarajan II, instead of god Virabhadra.

Pasavatai-Bharani is a poem that deals with the fight against attachment and also of the conferment of knowledge by Shiva and victory thereafter. The allegories employed are: Attachment is the king. The internal enemies of lust, anger, miserliness, infatuation, egoism and envy are the king's deputies. Little knowledge is the minister of bad counsel. Wisdom is the preceptor's chief-in-command carrying out his orders. Annihilation of attachment is the destruction of the king. Such types of writing are found in Sanskrit works such as Prabodha-Chandrodaya.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: T.P. Minakshisundaran, Bharani Poetry, Tamil Conference proceedings, vol. 11., Madras 1966.

K.C.K.

BHARATA (Sanskrit), is a legendary sage to whom the Natyashastra is traditionaly ascribed. According to the account of the birth of dramaturgy given in the Natyashastra itself, the creator Brahma, being requested by gods for an entertainment for the eyes and ears of all people, created the Natya-veda selecting recitation from the Rigveda, acting from the Yajurveda, music from the Samaveda and the sentiments from the Atharvaveda, and instructed it to the sage Bharata who in turn taught it to his hundred sons and popularized it in the world. Kalidasa refers to sage Bharata, and the abhinaya technique founded by him consisting of eight rasas; he is also referred to as the dance-teacher of the divine nymphs of Indra's court and the choreographer of a drama on Lakshmisvayamvara. Some scholars have taken Bharata as a non-historic symbolical personage like the sages Manu and Vyasa. Bharata is known as a Vedic tribe; and some have explained the term as referring to bhava, raga and tala, the three main elements in natya and music.

The Natyashastra, ascribed to Bharata, is known in more than one version, and there has been no really critical edition of the text. Abhinavagupta's commentary (Abbhinavabharati) gives one version, but in that commentary itself there are references to variant readings and interpolations. The present text of the Natyashastra may belong to the 2nd century A.D., though it may contain some earlier matter also. Panini's reference to the Natasutras of Shilalin and Krishashvan (IV. 3 110-11) shows that there were some works on dramaturgy even before the 5th century B.C., but the earliest available text is the Natyashastra.

Though nothing is known about Bharata, the term is generally used to the author or compiler of the present text of Natyashastra. There are references to two different versions of the Natyashastra - Shatsahasri and Dvadashasahasri (containing 6000 and 12000 verses respectively); the available text of the Natyashastra is in two versions, one containing 37 chapters and the other 36 chapters; Abhinavagupta follows the text with 37 chapters. The Natyashastra is the basic source of information on the intricacies of the Indian theatre - the mythical origin of dramatic art, the construction of play houses, the detailed preliminaries, the treatment of rasa and bhavas, the different types of abhinaya-aharya (costume and make up), vachika (verbal), angika (gestures and dance movements) and sattvika (indicating mental reactions)-dances, foot-steps, songs, modes of address, classification of the story (itivritta) which form the body of the theatre, the Sandhi-sandhyanga division of the plot, the four vrittis like kaishiki and arabhati, siddhi or the success of the play on the stage, etc. The text is an encyclopaedia on theatre, and is intended as a manual for the actors.

Bharata's aphorism on rasa realization is well known : Rasa is experienced through the union of the vibhavas, anubhavas and vyabhichari bhavas.' This enigmatic statement is accepted by all, but explained in different ways. According to Bharata there are eight basic emotional states or sthayibhavas with their corresponding rasas. Later writers added shanta to the list. Besides these, there are 33 minor fleeting feelings like bashfulness, anxiety and indignation. Vibhavas are the basic stimuli, dependent and excitant are its two varieties. Anubhavas are the effects of the emotional excitement on the hero or heroine and can be indicated through speech, gestures or facial expression. Spontaneous and involuntary reactions called sattvikabhavas, like perspiration, tears, etc., are also to be indicated. Bharata's definition is interpreted in different ways by different scholars like Lollata, Shankuka, Bhattanayaka and Abhinavagupta.

Bharata's Natyashastra also contains detailed treatment of prosody and Prakrits to be used on the stage.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.B. Keith, The Sanskrit Drama., M.C. Byrski, Concept of Indian Theatre.,

K.K.R

BHARATA NATYA PADAMS (Tamil). The padam is a unique type of composition which plays an important role in the present-day Bharata Natyam recitals, the other musical forms used being the Alarippu, Jatisvaram, Sabdam, Varnam, Javali, Tillana, Svarajati and the Ragamalika. The Natya Sastra of Bharata mentions the padam as an indispensable constituent of the Gandharva. Bharata has used the word padam in the sense of sahitya or songs to be used in a drama for abhinaya. The dramatic performance or visual representation by gestures being an invariable feature of drama, padams were always accompanied by abhinaya. The characteristics of a padam are that it is intended for Nritya or dance with gesticulations. A padam should be full of 'bhava' an aesthetically emotional appeal and is generally intended for dance though it can be also sung without such an accompaniment. The music may appear repetitive but the motif is generally expanded in the charanas culminating in a climax in the last charana.

In the earlier stages, the term padam had a slightly different connotation. Kalidasa in the sloka 'Utsanga va malina vasana' in his kavya Meghaduta mentions a 'geyam padam' which the wife of the banished Yaksha, languishing in separation in Alaka, tries to compose on her husband. Mallinatha, the commentator, gives a long description of what a 'geyam padam' is.

Jayadeva in his Gita Govinda describes his work as a 'padavali' in one place and as a 'prabandha' in another. Following the example set by Jayadeva, later poets like Vidyapati and Chandidas composed their 'padavalis' in local dialects.

After the 13th century, the term padam came to be loosely used in the parlance of music. The kirtanas of Purandara Dasa came to be called padam and Tyagaraja, in one of his songs, calls his kirtanas padams.

But when padams came to be increasingly adopted for abhinaya in Bharata Natyam recitals, their import was established to mean a musical composition in a slow tempo, saturated with the Sringara rasa and having the Nayaka-Nayika bhava as the main motif. The composers of these padams draw their inspiration from poetic works like the Sringara Tilaka and the Amaru Sataka and alankara works like the Rasamanjari of Bhanu Dutta Misra. Many new types of Nayikas or heroines were added to the conventional number of eight and a few types of Nayakas or heroes were also depicted.

The Alvars and Nayannars of Tamilnadu, the Vaishnavite and Saivite saint-composers in Tamil (5th-8th centuries), depicted the Nayaka-Nayika motif but in the form of verse. The earliest specimens of padams in their musical garb are the Sringara sankirtanas of Tallapakkam Annamacharya (1408-1503), the Telugu music composer of Tirupati. The literary tradition of writing such lyrics continued in the Andhra Pradesh area and it later produced brilliant composers of 'padam' like Kshetrajna (17th century) and Sarangapani (17th-18th century) and a host of composers who handled the new type of composition with varying degrees of success.

Kshetrajna is the uncrowned king in the field of padam composition and leaves others far behind in his expertise. With an uncommon command over the Telugu idiom, he was an adept in employing it in the most telling and felicitous manner possible. He was a master of the Alankara Shastra and portrays faithfully the characteristics of the heroes and heroines as laid down in works on Rasa. He was patronized by several ruling princes of his time and wrote nearly 5,000 padams of exquisite beauty. His padams are highly appreciated by singers and also by dancers who find the songs eminently suitable for abhinaya.

Next in rank comes Sarangapani who was patronized by the ruler of a small state called Karvetnagar. Several Telugu composers settled in Tamilnadu for generations produced padams highly suitable for Bharata Natyam.

It is noteworthy that the princes of South India were not merely patrons of music but were competent composers as well. Maharaja Swati Tirunal of Travancore (1813-1847) wrote 67 padams in Sanskrit, Telugu, Kannada and Malayalam and he introduced them in Bharata Natyam performance by artistes patronized by him in his own state. His padams have a rare literary flavour and the padams of this royal composer are becoming increasingly popular in the Bharata Natyam field, gradually replacing those which are of inferior literary quality.

Raja Serfoji II (1798-1832), the Maratha ruler of Thanjavur, rendered a unique service to Bharata Natyam from a different angle. Thanjavur is considered to be the home of Bharata Natyam and the art was at its peak during his time. The temples in Tamilnadu had several hundreds of Devadasis who performed dance as part of the temple rituals. Serfoji wrote chain compositions in Marathi for use in dance dramas in the Bharata Natyam style and many of these padams and abhinaya padams are intended for choreography.

There was no tradition of writing padams in Tamil for being adopted for Bharata Natyam but during the Nayak rulers' reign at Thanjavur, a number of Tamil music composers were inspired to compose padams following the Telugu pattern. Tamil composers of padam include Muthu Tandavar, Marimuthu Pillai, Papavinasa Mudaliar, Ghanam Krishna Iyer, and Subbarama Iyer. Krishna Iyer, who was a contemporary of Tyagaraja, ranks as the best composer of Tamil padams and maintains a level of excellence throughout. Subbarama Iyer lived till the first decade of this century and modelled his padams on those of the Telugu composers.

Padams are also suitable for being sung in concerts but they shine best when they are taken up for abhinaya in a dance recital. Varnam is the acid test of a dancer's ability in Nritya while the padam is a challenge to her skill in abhinaya.

T.S.P.

BHARATAM KILIPATTU (Malayalam) is the second and more mature of the two works whose author is undoubtedly Tunchathu Ezhuthacchan. Like the other work, the Mahabharata is also a translation and a Kilipattu. It is intensely devotional.

The poet has taken the original Mahabharata as the basic material for his work, and all the twentyone parvas - Pouloma, Astika, Sambhava, Sabha, Aranya, Virata, Udyoga, Bhishma, Drona, Karna, Salya, Souptika, Asika, Stri, Santi, Anusasnika, Aswamedhika, Asramavasa, Mousala, Mahaprasthana and Swargarohana have been adopted in his work also. He has made use of the central theme, but modified it with deletions and additions. For example, the content of the whole Bhagavadgita has been summarised into two lines in Ezuttacchan's Mahabharata. But the poet has elaborated and added many things. The narrations, descriptions and devotional hymns reflect the poetic beauty as well as the wealth of vocabulary. The imagery, the eloquence and the power of diction are evident everywhere. The expression of sentiments and the musical quality of each portion are distinct aspects of this poem. Besides, the vedantic thought is supramental. The devotional ambience and the power of description are reflected throughout the work.

The poet integrates the literary effects with objectivity. The Gandharivilapa is a fine example of the poet's remarkable power to depict feelings according to the context.

> 'My child, my son, Duryodhana.
> Why have you thrown away
> Your golden crown and jewels
> And the pomp and pride of the king of the Gods
> And all the show of splendour and prowess
> Thus deserting me and your dear father
> All so suddenly: my heart breaks at this sight.

Ezhuttacchan shows the highest veneration for Rama in the Adhyatma Ramayana while his devotion is concentrated on Krishna in his Mahabharata and Srimad Bhagavata.

The profound poetic quality is noticed in each portion of the text. Kerala of the 15th century is said to have been morally degraded to the core. The trio-Melpattur, Ezhuttacchan and Puntanam-gave concrete leadership to the Bhakti movement and all the works of Ezhuthacchan represent that cultural regeneration. And his Bharatam Kilippattu, being a devotional rendering and a masterly work of artistic beauty, is a classic. This work in Malayalam stands as a monument of the cultural transition in Kerala.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: K.M. George (ed.), Sahitya Charitram Prasthanangalilute., P.K. Narayana Pillai, Ezhuttacchan., Ulloor S. Parameswara Iyer, Kerala Sahitya Charitram.

V.S.S.

BHARATAP ARYATANAM (Malayalam) is a work by Kuttikrishna Marar. (Explorations into the Mahabharata, 1950). It comprises a series of brilliant and highly original interpretative studies of the episodes and characters of the Mahabharata, unmatched in the whole of Malayalam literature for the brilliance of its interpretations as well as style. It combines two things in the best manner possible: Kuttikrishna Marar's high regard for Vyasa and his life-long acquaintance with and deep scholarship in the puranic lore. To this is added an independent turn of mind which, at times, becomes quite irreverential when it offers new interpretation of the episodes and characters. What makes the book unique is its challenging but refreshing originality and a consistent refusal to compromise his reason in favour of blind devotion.

The book is not a continuous or sequential narration. It consists of eighteen sections as follows:
1. Bhishma's pledge 2. Amba 3. The debut of Karna 4. The arsenal of war 5. Bhishma's decision on dharma 6. Treading the wrong path 7. The hunter God 8. Vyasa's laughter 9. Procession 10. Partha's charioteer 11. Lord's mediation 12. Two greetings 13. Between brothers 14. The evolution of the war 15. The impartial Balarama 16. Arjuna's grief 17. The exit of Dhritarashtra 18. Tests of righteousness.

In the first article the context of Bhishma's fierce pledge and his unflinching adherence to it in spite of the most valid arguments to the contrary is discussed. The filial love that motivates Rama and Bhishma is contrasted and Bhishma is shown in a better light. He further observes that the extenuating circumstances that offer themselves to alter one's pledge are but temptations and only the most sublime human will can resist them. Of all the women characters in the great epic Amba seems to have appealed to the writer's imagination more than any other. He devotes an entire article to tell her story, while Gandhari, Kunti, Draupadi and others get only incidental mention. If Bhishma is unrelenting as far as his pledge goes, it is matched only by the inveterate hatred Amba holds for him. She would not be appeased by anything other than the blood of Bhishma. She is reborn as Shikhandi and kills Bhishma. The article on Karna justifiably, points out the nobility and magnanimity of that great tragic hero. 'The arsenal of war' describes at length the conflicting interests of the two sides and underscrores the point that a war is a war and there is nothing righteous about it. How difficult it is to arbitrate on what is right and what is wrong is exemplified in the next article with reference to the episode of Yudhishthira losing in the deceitful game of chess and surrendering everything including his Kingdom and his wife to Duryodhana. In 'Vyasa's laughter', Marar examines the episode of the seduction of Rishyasringa and sees in it a lofty example of the highest form of humour that is, humour that evokes understanding and sympathy rather than ridicule. This incidentally, is Marar's view of humour. The article on Krishna as Arjuna's charioteer attempts a rational explanation of Krishna's acceptance of Arjuna's plea to be his charioteer. Equally insightful is the account of Krishna's mediation to avert the internecine war. Contrary to the popular belief fully shared by the devout, that Krishna's mission was to see the Kauravas and all the others except the Pandavas annihilated, Marar argues quite convicingly, that Krishna did want to avert the war, if he could. 'The two greetings' subject to a close scrutiny, the meetings Yudhishthira and Karna had with the fallen patriarch, Bhishma. Marar, through a close reading of the text, argues that while the former was more demonstrative, the latter was utterly honest and sincere.

Marar was a true Gandhian. On several occasions he cites Gandhian parallels while interpreting the episodes and characters. The humanist and pacifist in him comes to the fore in the article on the evolution of the war. When the war begins both the parties agree on righteous conduct. As it progresses they throw all thoughts of righteous conduct to the winds and resort to all kinds of deception. The epic poet's thesis, Marar asserts, is that hatred breeds hatred and that enmity cannot be contained by enmity.

Marar's place as a literary critic is pre-eminent and this treatise on the Mahabharata has stood the test of time.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Marar, Kala jivitam tanne (Art is life itself, Kottayam, 1965).

S.Ve.

BHARATA SHAKTI MAHAKAVYAM (The epic of Godmen-Tamil), the master piece of Suddhananda Bharati (b. 1890, Sivagangai) was written by him during a 25 year long silent meditation. This unique and pioneering spiritual allegory in Tamil was first published in 1948. A second revised and enlarged edition was published in 1969 by Suddhananda Nulagam, Madras, in 50,000 lines and 1015 pages. Though an English version was announced for publication in 1970, it is not available in print form.

In this ambitious spiritual work, the poet sings of the evolution of mankind, the continuing struggle of truth against falsehood, good against evil and light against darkness. Canto 1 begins with a deluge, the resulting void, and the beginning of human life in Bharat. Manu and Mati and Bharata establish the race of spiritual supermen conquering evil forces. Shuddha, son of Satyan and Indira, is trained in Yoga by Bharatamuni and in politics by Siddiman, a wise premier. Shuddha and Bharatamuni travel to Panchavati and meet Sage Shanta. During the travel, the premier tells Shuddha of the heroism of Shivaji. Sage Shanta warns Shuddha against Kali, brother of Satyan. Upon winning Kali by Yoga, Shuddha leaves for Siddhinagar. In Canto 2 Satyan marries Suddha to Gowri, foster daughter of Sage Shanta and crowns him the king of Siddhinagar and devotes himself to spiritual service, to humanity and Yoga. In his coronation speech, Shuddha wants one government, one militia, and one harmonious family of nations. Shanta gives a speech on Krishna and his gospel, Bhishma and the Mahabharata and leaves for the Himalayas to set up a spirititual centre for Shuddha. Satyan repels an attack on Siddhinagar by Kali and chases him to Danavam ruled by Mavali, an Asura. In Canto 3, Shuddha renounces his throne, vests the kingdom's governance with a council of wise men and goes in search of truth and peace that will bring bliss to mankind. Trials and ordeals trouble him in his quest. He meets the hedonists of Kamapuri, sees tantric orgies and escapes the clutches of Kami and Vami. He learns true Shakti worship, reforms the vamacharins, builds a Shakti temple and goes to Buddhapuri to study the life and teachings of Gautama Buddha, and unites in Dhamma the divided Bhuddists. He then proceeds to Jainapuri, studies the life and teachings of Mahavira, unites all Jains in pure meditation, moves to Christupuri, admires the constructive work of missionaries, studies the Bible, mediates and unites inter-divisons, goes to Masudipuri, studies Quran, admires the life of the Rasul, stops Hindu-Muslim quarrels and unites them in friendship and mutual respect. Later, he goes to Sikhpuri, studies Guru Granthasahib and the work of Guru Nanak. Then Shuddha lives with Zoroastrians in the Temple of Fire and studies the Gathas and finds Vedic ideas in them and then goes to Vedapuri. He meets Vaikuntamuni who proclaims himself as the incarnation of God, conquers revisionists, divisive elements, superstitutions, personality cults and reestablishes the truth of the Vedas, the God in man, one universe and one family of living beings. Then he goes to Sivagiri, meets Jnana-Siddha and learns from him pure Siddhanta Yoga. On their way to the Himalayas, Sage Shanta and Shuddha meet Ramana and Aurobindo, study their philosophical concepts, stay in the Ramalinga Temple where a new light dawns upon Shuddha. Then they visit Kangri Gurukul, Sivananda Ashram, Gita Bhavan, go to Uttarakashi, Badri, Kedar, Kailash and meditate there, attain God's grace and then go to Shuddha Yoga Samaj, where 400 sages have gathered to meet them. Shuddha trains them in Sama Yoga.

Canto 4 begins with the origin of Asuras, offsprings of Bhoga Rishi and Maya, the female demon. Mavali and Analan are the rulers of Danavam and Anavam, two Asura kingdoms. Mavali steals Sundari, daughter of Srikaram and marries her. His sister Mohi marries Kali, brother of Satyan. Mohi induces Mavali to conquer Bharat, a spiritual centre of humanity, as the first step to the domination of earth by the Asuras. Mavali is the terror of humanity. Sukra, a master scientist, invents atomic missiles to assist Mavali in his mass killings. Analan excels him in the manufacture of space ships to dominate the planets. Satyan and Bhoga enter Danavam as artists. With the help of Sundari, they meet Shakti, reincarnation of Gowri, and set up a Kala Mandir near the Diamond River, flowing from the Golden Hill. A radio contact is established with Shuddha doing tapasya in the Sama Yoga Samaj. He sends his yogic force to Shakti, Sundari, Satyan, Bhoga. The Kala Mandir radiates moral rearmament and spiritual awakening. The Kala Mandir gets the patronage of Analan too. The tyranny of Mavali is put down by the moralists of Kala Mandir and a people's government is established. Danavam declares independence under the leadership of Satyan and Sundari. Anavam too follows Danavam.

Canto 5 elaborates the spiritual conquest of Shuddha and the establishment of spiritual socialism all over the world. The Yogins of Shuddha lead an exemplary life according to Yoga Siddhi. They travel all over the country in batches to transform the life of humanity, infuse faith in God, teach Dharma, educate the masses in Yoga and sciences, unite mankind in psychic love, build right conduct and character, conduct marriages between well chosen couples, organize domestic life, provide work and living for families, administer people's welfare, teach Yoga, hold mass meditation and prayer, and organize Sama Yoga Samaj. A new life is born and a new energy generated in the nation. This spreads to Kalinagar, now renamed Satyapuri. Danavam and Anavam also join Siddhinagar and Satyapuri to establish spiritual socialism for the entire world, unite all nations under one administration and raise one world militia for the maintenance of peace everywhere, to bring about a heaven on earth and divinize human life.

The work, with its stupendous dimension (15,000 stanzas in 5 cantos) hovers between allegory and epic. The author has intended a fine story of the war of the divine and demonic forces in the modern world, and has made his muse sing the victory of the higher powers. It portrays India's supreme achievement in the past, its travails of the present, and its great and inevitable future as the queen of beauty, romance and spiritual splendour.

It brings within its scope the entire achievement of the human intellect, from the Vedic Age to the Atomic age; it manifests the immortal spirit in the collective life of humanity, and endeavours to build a spiritual socialism in which all live in yoga with the divine.

The hero of the epic Shuddha, is pure divine spirit personified. After a series of trials in life, and after practising all yogas and religions, he discovers the Divine Force (Bharata Shakti) and trains an assembly of yogins up in the Himalayas and makes them, through a course of mystic sadhana, power-houses and centres of that divine energy. These yogins meditate along with the hero and each of them realises a universal truth. All these truths are collected into a new Gospel of Pefect Life called Yoga

Siddhi. They live the truths and radiate them by modern means.

These trained yogins go out as messengers of love, peace and harmony, serve humanity under the direction of Shuddha, and achieve great things. The hostile, undivine forces trouble them for a while but vanish before the Bharata Shakti radiating through the yogins. Gradually, these perfect yogins establish a new socialised spiritual life on earth. Thus, the whole theme is the history of the inner spirit expressed in a dynamic life. It envisages the planes of human evolution. It does not follow any chronological order, for the hero is the immortal sporit itself which is beyond the limits of time and space. The work is composed in simple yet chaste Tamil, effectively expressing a whole gamut of thoughts and situations. The verses flow one after the other with grace and power and the work is a testimony to the spiritual and scholarly attainments of the author.

This epic of new humanity, an extended narrative poem on Utopia, is a library of great thoughts and yogic intuitions, and an omnibus biography of prophets and heroes. It was hailed as another Mahabharata by Mahatma Gandhi and as Voice of India by Sri Aurobindo. Madhu S. Vimalanandan, the Tamil literary historian and critic in his Tamil Ilakkiya Varalaru, hails this as the finest work in epic traditions. Here then is a fine example of Utopia as literature, which builds up a world picture rich in ideas characteristic for India's great cultural heritage.

S.S.
V.K.S.

BHARATA SINDHU RASHMI (Kannada). Modern Kannada literature has, during the last fifty years, twice falsified the uncritical assumption that the days for the composition of epic poems are long past, that modern life is too vast and complex to be comprehensively grasped and creatively interpreted in a single epic narrative. Kuvempu's epic, Ramayanadarsanam which appeared during the early forties has now been followed by V.K. Gokak's Bharata Sindhu Rashmi. The former retells the Ramayana story with only a few changes but with a difference in emphasis and philosophical implications. V.K. Gokak however, reaches out for a much wider canvas and more inclusive significance. Instead of depending upon the Mahabharata or the Ramayana for the story frame of his epic, he goes back to the dim Vedic times when the seers who sang the Vedas could see into the heart of things and symbolically express their deeper perception about life's processes and purposes. The present epic in twelve cantos, running into nearly twenty-four thousand lines, enunciates and illustrates the principle that beyond man's hopes and aspirations, beyond his struggles and achievements, there operates a self-fulfilling principle, a universal soul which in its own process works towards elevating and refining man's consciousness. It sublimates his egoism so that he is transformed into a channel and a medium for the universal will to fructify. Bharata Sindhu Rashmi is thus a philosophical poem exhibiting symbolically mankind's struggle seeking to evolve into a richer state of being in perfect harmony with the universal will and purpose.

The story of Visvamitra is used to elaborate this message of the potentialities of spiritual evolution. In recounting the story of his fights and frustrations, a large number of other characters, nearly two hundred, with their own backgrounds and relationship to the main narrative get devetailed so that the epic poem as it progresses unfolds an ancient and complex civilisation with all its secular and spiritual institutions, its social codes and cultural values. The main outline of the story however, stands out clear. Visvamitra, the son of Gadhi, fights in vain for the celestial calf and suffers humiliation at the hands of Vasistha; his attempt to raise Trisanku to heaven in human form is foiled by Indra; his effort to create another universe and another Indra is similarly frustrated; but in the end there is the dawn of a new consciousness, which his very frustrations bring about, that whatever power his penance brought him had to be used not in opposition to but in harmony with the larger divine will and purpose. Only when his ego is thus sublimated and he surrenders and identifies his will with the universal scheme of things does he achieve his fulfilment under the benign guidance of Vamadeva.

But the dimensions of the epic's significance are not limited to the personal fortunes of Visvamitra, the individual sage, however courageous and spectacular his fights and frustrations may be. Much more than an individual, Viswamitra in the present epic symbolises the emerging spiritual aspirations of mankind down from the Vedic times. His final fulfilment represents the realisation of the potentialities of human civilisation. Visvamitra, like the innumerable others that figure in the poem, is not a single individual but all of them represent the inchoate spiritual urges of the human race, the complex of the irresistible forces of history emerging and manifesting as the many faces of the divine will in action. The ups and downs in the lives of the seven sages, of Vasistha and Visvamitra, of Sudasa and Satyavrata (Trishanku), yield no meaning unless they are viewed in the larger perspective as varied expressions of an evolving consciousness. The story of Viswamitra thus becomes in the hands of the poet the story of man's spiritual evolution, the story of the rebirth of the individual through a total purification of all channels of perception, knowledge and understanding which is what the institution of the "yajna" (sacrifice) stands for.

BHARATAVAKYA–BHARATESHA VAIBHAVA

Bharata Sindhu Rashmi is an epic poem that delineates the evolution of the spiritual urges of mankind, its upward aspirations for a higher and ever higher state of being, the efforts, failure and frustrations and the dawn of a new consciousness that holds the hope of final fulfilment. It is an extensive re-interpretation of the Visvamitra story, supported not only by the author's long study and contemplation of our spiritual lore but also by his personal experience as a devout pilgrim on the path of realisation.

V.M.I.

BHARATAVAKYA(Sanskrit) is the benedictory song at the end of the play, by the main character. It is a compound word formed of Bharata, an actor and vakya, a speech, literally the speech of an actor.

In Sanskrit plays Bharatavakya is the concluding stanza of benediction, recited by the chief actor, as a member of the dramatic party but not in his dramatic role. Generally the Bharatavakya invokes peace, happiness, and prosperity on the ruling king, the learned Brahmanas, the people, and sacred cattle.

Bharata means a member of the dramatic party. The word is actually used in this sense by Bhavabhuti (Malatimadhava).

The phrase is not found in the fragments of Ashvaghosha's Shariputraprakarana, but the concluding verse uttered by the Buddha can be easily recognized as a Bharatavakya of the traditional type. In some of the plays of Bhasa (e.g. Svapnavasavadatta, Pratijnayaugandharayana, etc.) the phrase is present while in others (e.g. Madhyamavyayoga, Dutaghatotkacha, etc.) it is not.

Curiously enough, though the phrase Bharatavakya has been invariably used by all the Sanskrit playwrights right from Kalidasa, it is not found in the Natyashastra of Bharata or in any other classical work on Sanskrit dramaturgy. The phrase, popular with the playwrights, has been substituted there by a technical term, Prashasti, literally a praise, with exactly the same connotation. The Natyashastra defines a Prashasti as 'praise of a king or of a deity' Nripadevaprashastishcha prashastirabhidhiyate as the last of sixtyfour angas 'literally limbs' of a play. The definition of Bharata has further been elucidated by Sagaranandin as: "The conclusion of a poem (i.e. a play) drawn by saying 'let the king, the Brahmanas, the cattle, etc., be prosperous' is called a prashasti." (Natakalakshanaratnakosha, ch. 8). This elucidation fully suits the Bharatavakyas of majority of the Sanskrit plays.

S.M.

BHARATESHA VAIBHAVA (Kannada). Bharatesha Vaibhava is one of the classics of Kannada poetry by Ratnakaravarni, a Jaina poet of the later 16th century. It is a lengthy narrative in eighty cantos running into ten thousand verses. The poem, as the title implies, celebrates the royal grandeur and spiritual eminence of its hero, Bharatesha or Bharata, the elder son of the first Tirthankara, who even while he enjoyed the many-splendoured luxuries of monarchy never got so involved in them as to forget even for a moment his deeper spiritual urges towards sainthood. The way to sainthood according to the Jaina teaching is paved with renunciation and a total denial of life's pleasures; but Bharatesha by his example enunciates a doctrine of synthesis in which life's enjoyment is reconciled with renunciation. It is the principle of non-attachment in practice par excellence.

There is not much of a story to tell. Bharata sets out on his expedition of conquest, conquers everywhere, and in the final stage, encounters his own brother Bahubali. Contrary to all traditional versions of the story, the poet does not engage the brothers in a fight but, consistent with the design and purpose of his work, which was to elucidate the greatness of his hero, he makes him persuade and convert the other to perceive the futility of all fight and violence and the meaninglessness of temporal glory. He is thus made to achieve a victory far greater than victory in a fight. The deficiency in action is made good by descriptive detail which, without sacrificing propriety, builds up a picture of royal magnificence and reveals both the hero's outward life and inner self in a variety of contexts and relationships, as a brave monarch, a loving husband, a dutiful son, an affectionate friend and a humble disciple. It is a life lived on an exalted level of spiritual awareness which guides every single action and determines every single attitude of his. At no moment does he show himself as less than great so that what emerges from the meticulous and many-sided detail that gets into the portrait is a personality that could be nothing less than a dream realised of an ideal human being. Portraits of ideal kings like Rama, Krishna and Janaka are not rare in ancient writings but it is Ratnakaravarni's special achievement that he incorporates his concept of an ideal human being within the framework of Jaina religious teaching.

Apart from the synthesis and fusion of enjoyment and renunciation which the poem expounds and enunciates, Bharatesha Vaibhava as a poetic achievement is characterised by a few unique features. Since the work aimed at a full-fledged portrait of its hero, details of his early life as a youthful ruler, which no traditional account provides, had to be imagined and described. This the poet does with inimitable vividness. It is this quality of vividness which, at every stage, provides fresh views and insights into the hero's character and covers up the paucity of action. The descriptions sustain the length of the narrative–which is in essence nothing more than an elaborately painted portrait–and even the other characters that figure in the story serve only to highlight the traits of the central character. No other work of Kannada poetry relies so completely on vivid descriptive detail and by virtue of it succeeds in holding the reader captive. Another unique feature of the work is that it employs the sangatya metre, which is essentially a folk measure intended to be sung. It is the first and the only work of this length to have employed this metrical form and by doing so, ensured to it a literary status and dignity worthy of being the medium of epic poetry. He did for this form what Harihara had done for the ragale and Kumaravyasa for the satpadi. All in all, Bharatesha Vaibhava is undoubtedly a great work by a great poet who can claim a place in the company of the undisputed masters of an earlier age.

V.M.I.

BHARATESWARA BAHUBALI GHORA (Rajasthani) is claimed to be the first known Rajasthani work composed about in 1168 by Vajrasena Suri. It is a small poem of 48 verses describing the battle fought between two brothers, Bharata and Bahubali, and appears to have been used as a musical piece for Jaina temples. While discussing the date and merits of the work, various scholars have published the text in full as well as in parts in magazines. Nahata has opined that Ghora is a kind of word like 'Rasa', 'Phagu', 'Charachari', etc. But this should not be so, as the word stands for a battle as a synonym of 'Yuddha'. The text of this small but important literary work is very helpful in following the development of early Rajasthani word form derived from Apabhramsa. The story of the famous battle fought between Bharata and Bahubali has been variously described by poets in Sanskrit, Prakrita, Apabhramsa and other modern Indian languages. The present work states it in brief, mentioning the following facts–King Risabhadeva having installed Bharata on his seat of Ayodhya and after feudal land-grants to all other sons, retired from public life for meditiation and penance. He got the knowledge of salvation after a long period and Bharata got 'Chakraratna'.

Bharata returned after a victory-campaign, and finding that the 'Chakraratna' refused to enter the armoury, deputed a messenger to his brother, Bahubali, on the advice of his councillors, asking him to pay obesiance. He however, threw a challenge and preferred to fight. Both set on with their armies. At the beginning Bharata had to fight with a Vidyadhara, Anilavega, and kill him. It was then decided to finalise the issue by a duel between Bharata and Bahubali. The latter emerged victorious. Enraged at this Bharata attacked with his 'Chakraratna' but that was not effective. The incidence made such an impact on Bahubali that he renounced all worldly affairs and turned an ascetic. The poet has rightly described it as a mark of victory for Bahubali. The poem is a simple narrative devoid of poetic excellence. Its linguistic importance, however, is unquestioned. The story of Bharata and Bhubali has been Located diversely by different writers in the different parts of the country. Vayrasana Suri gives a new twist to the story which may appear to be a characteristic of the Rajasthani Jainism. Form this point of view also the work might appear to be interesting.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H.L. Maheshwari, History of Rajasthani Literature, Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi 1980; Vishvambhara, Vol.12,

Raw.S

BHARATESWARA BAHUBALIRAS (Gujarati) composed by Jain monk Salibhadra Suri is the oldest poem (1185) in Rasa genre. It portrays the struggle for power between two brother Bharata and Bahubali, two sons of Rishabhdeva, first Tirthankar of Jains. Bahubali the younger son, because of his physical strength and higher intellectual power,claimed that he was fitter than his elder brother Bharat. Bahubali's claim is upheld and Bharat out of jealousy gives him a deadly blow. Bahubali goes to the forest and practices penance and in the end attains complete bliss.

The poem is written with the object of depicting the futility of violence and pinpointing the advantages of a non-violent approach for obtaining absolute knowledge. The form of the poem is Raso, a narrative poem of song and dance. It is the first poem in Gujarati of the genre of Raso or Rasa, which is a peculiar form of mediaeval Jain poetry written with the object of preaching Jain religious concepts.

C.M.

BHARATESWARA BAHUBALI RASA (Rajasthani), happens to be the first known 'Rasa' poem and one of the earliest specimens of Rajasthani poetry. It was composed in 1184 by Salibhadra Suri, a Jain poet and religious preacher. It consists of 203 stanzas composed in various metres, the main being 'Rasa', 'Vastu', 'Soratha', 'Dhavala', 'Trutaka' and Chupai. These are all from the Apabharamsa tradition. The mention of the word 'thavani', at several places denotes the change of metre. The Sanskrit root of this word is 'Sthapani'. The 'Rasa' tells the well known story of Bharata and Bahubali, two sons of king Risabhadeva of Ayodhya, from two stepmothers. Bharata and Bahubali were separately installed at Ayodhya and Taxila by the king on his retirement. Bharata encourged by the presence of 'Chakraratna' in his armoury started on a victory campaign and asked Bahubali also to pay homage to him. Bahubali was an extra-ordinarily brave person and a great warrior. On his refusal to do so, a battle took place between them which ended in repentance and subsequent renunciation by Bahubali, though he had gained victory over Bharata in a duel. Though the work is meant to serve as a Jaina religious text, it can nevertheless be taken as a fine specimen of early Rajasthani heroic poetry of the 12th century. It also indicates the long standing tradition of such poems in Rajasthani during the post-Apabharamsa period which stands amply proved by the maturity and variety of description and the flow and appropriateness of diction. There are rich descriptions of elephants, horses and horsemen, army and the omens. All these formed essential ingredients of early medieval warfare and continued mostly till the 10th century.

The language is enriched by idioms, phrases and proverbs which may be traced out in later works as well as in common parlance. The display of rehtorics and prosodical mastery speak for the poet's worth. Such simple yet powerful poems are not to be judged vis-a-vis the voluminous works heavily laden with traditional poetic conventions produced during the late medieval period. The wortk was edited by Muni Jinavijaya and Laladasa Gandhi separately and published. It has also been pub lished in full in Ras Aur Rasavai Kavya (Nagari Pracharini Sabha, Varanasi 1959).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H.S. Sarma, Adikala Ke Ajanta Hindi Rasa Kavya, Harisa, Jaipur, 1961; Rajasthani Sahitya Ka Adi Kala, Parampara, Vol. 12, Jaipur, 1961; Ras Aur Rasavá Kavya, Varanasi, 1959).

Raw.S.

BHARATIDASAN (Tamil; b. 1891, d. 1964) was an eminent Tamil poet whose real name was Kanaka Subburatnam (Cuppurattinam). Hailed as the poet of revolt (Puraticikkavijnar), Bharatidasan has played a notable role in the development of modern Tamil poetry. He is one of the great Tamil poets of this century, next only to C. Subramanya Bharati. He was born to Kanakasabapati, (a merchant in Pondicherry) and Lakshmiammal. He had his education in Pondicherry. Bangaru Pattar, Tiruppulisami, and Periyasami were his teachers in Tamil. In 1908, he stood first in the Tamil Vidwan Examination. He knew English and French. He worked as a teacher in the Calve College at Pondicherry.

He met poet Bharati in 1908 and was very much attracted towards him and this led to his calling himself 'Bharatidasan' (the disciple of Bharati). In the year 1919, while he was a Tamil teacher in the Tirupuvanai Commune, he was imprisoned for fifteen months for acting against the then French Government. In the year 1921, he married Palaniyammal.

Starting his career as a nationalist and a believer in God, he brought out a booklet Sri Mayilam Subramaniyar Tutiyamutu (a hymn on Lord Subrmaniya of Mayilam, 1926) and Kadar irattinap pattu (a poetic piece on khadi and charka, 1930). Under the influence of Periyar E.V.R. Bharatidasan was soon converted into atheism.

Bharatidasan dominated the field of Tamil poetry for well over three decades since 1930. He was the editor of a poetry journal Sri Subramaniya Bharati Kavita Mandalam which was started in 1935, and later Kuyil (The Cuckoo, 1946) through which he gave vent to his ideas and feelings on various topics.

The first collection of his poems entitled 'Bharatidasan Kavitaikal was published in the year 1938, which was an immediate success.

Bharatidasan was the first and formost among the Tamil poets who portrayed the evils of society and the greatness of rationalism. Taking the cue from Bharati, Bharatidasan wrote in a simple and rhythmic style. He has more than fifty titles to his credit, which include poetry and drama.

Important among his poetic collections are: 'Bharatidasan Kavitaikal' (The poems of Bharatidasan Vol. I 1938, Vol. II 1949. Vol. III. 1955 and Vol. IV 1977), Azhakin Sirippu (The Smile of Beauty, 1944) Katal Ninaivukal (The Recollections of Love, 1944) and Tamil Iyakkam (The Tamil Movement, 1945).

Bharatidasan had taken keen interest in the development of Tamil music and propagated that Tamil songs alone should be rendered in the concerts of Tamil Nadu. 'Isai Amutu' (the Nectar of Music Vol. I 1942, Vol. II 1952) and Ten Aruvi (The Honey Falls, 1956) contain musical compositions in Tamil.

Apart from the collection of poems, Bharatidasan has written many short epics, story poems and plays. Among his short epics, Etirparata Muttam (The Unexpected Kiss, 1941) Kutumpa Vilakku (The Light of the Family in 5 parts, 1942) Paniyan Parisu (The Gift of Paniyan, 1943) are worth mentioning. In these and other short epics, Bharatidasan brings out the greatness of Tamil language and culture. Most of his characters are revolutionary; the themes are novel, the structure simple and the verses captivating. The ancient twin epics Silappadikaram and Manimekalai of the 2nd century A.D. were rewritten by Bharatidasan with a new and rationalist outlook under the titles Kannaki Puratci kappiyam (The Epic of Kannaki's Revolt, 1962) and Manimekalai Venpa (Manimekalai in venpa metre, 1962).

Bharatidasan was attracted to the stage and screen even as early as 1934. His first play 'Iraniyan' was staged in the V.P. Hall at Madras on 9.9.1934. At a time when plays of devotion like Prahalada were enacted on the Tamil stage, Bharatidasan depicted Iraniyan as the hero and Prahalada as a stooge to the Brahmins. This play was published in a book form under the title 'Iraniyan allatu Inaiyarra Viran' (Iraniyan or The Unparalleled Hero, 1939). Later Bharatidasan wrote many plays most of which were for reading. They include 'Nalla Tirppu' (Right Verdict, 1944), 'Patitta Penkal' (Educated Girls, 1948), Sera Tandavam (The Dance of Sera, 1949), Kazhaikkuttiyin Katal (The Love of a Bamboo Danseuse, 1951) and Pisirantaiyar (a play of Sankam poet Pisirantaiyar, 1967). Bharatidasan was posthumously awarded the Sahitya akademi Award for the play Pisirantaiyar in 1969.

Balamani allatu Pakkat tiruan' (1937), Valaiyapati (1952), 'Ponmuti' (1950) are some of the films for which he has written story, dialogues and lyrics. Even after his death some of his well known lyrics were used for film sequences.

Bharatidasan was also active in Pondicherry politics and was elected as a Member of the Legislative Assembly in 1954. He stands as a towering personality among the contemporary poets, by the imagination in his nature poems, the emotions in the songs on Tamil and the revolutonary ideas envisaged in his epics. There is a school of poets which follows the principles and guidelines initiated by Bharatidasan.

The poet was honoured by the successive Governments of Tamil Nadu. During the Second World Tamil Conference a life size statue was erected on the Marina in Madras. Every year a poet who belongs to the school of Bharatidasan is felicitated and presented with an award of Rs. 10,000 at the Bharatidasan Day Celebrations conducted by the Government of Tamil Nadu.

Bharatidasan has in all written more than 40,000 lines of poetry, most of which will echo in the ears of the Tamils for many generations to come.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Murukusundaram, Paventar Ninaivukal, Akaram, Sivagangai, 1979; Murukusundaram, Arumpukal, Malarkal, T.N. Akaram, Sivagangai 1980. S.S. Elango, Bharatidasan Kataip patalgal, Tamilmani Puttakap Pannai, Madras, 1978.

R.K.

BHARATI, DHARMAVIR (Hindi. b. 1926) is one of the leading modern Hindi poets, novelists and playwrights. He sprang into limelight with his novel Gunahon Ke Devata (The God of Sins) in which he has shown the progressive development of a man who fights his way through great odds. Here idealism is shown as a counterpart of realism.

Another novel of his Suraj Ka Satvan Ghora (The Seventh Horse of the Sun) is an experimental novel with a purpose. He exposes the existentialist view of the universe which has become so much a part of the thinking of the Hindi literary world. He has been an eminent short story writer too. His short stories lay bare the social inequalities and anomalies that stalk our every day life and make living a Herculean task, especially for one with modest means. Honesty and fairness have been first casualties in the present social set-up. In the field of poetry his Kanupriya (the beloved of Krishna) with its emotional intensity and symbolic use of imagery gave him a separate identity in 'Nai Kavita' movement. He is capable of exquisite tenderness of emotion and sensitivity.

His verse play Andhayug (The Blind Age, 1945) is the most outstanding of his literary creations. It is a powerful verse play which starts on the eve of the last days of the great ancient Indian battle of the Mahabharata and ends with the death of Krishna which leaves the universe totally dark and desolate, This is the effect of the war on the individual as well as on the society leaving behind an atmosphere of moral turpitude, hatred, greed, lust for power, false vanity and hypocrisy. It, thereby, projects the dehumanizing effect of war, which has its own relevance for the present time; war does not spare anybody, including Krishna, who loses his godly virtues by becoming a party to the violation of human principles of justice and fairplay. Though Dharmavir Bharati has designed it to be a 'tale of light through the actions of the blind', yet it ends with total collapse of all values with the death of Krishna. This duel role assigned to Krishna who fails as a god and yet remains a precursor of the dawn provides the play with its basic dramatic tension. Bharati gives to his play an effective dramatic setting making use of many techniques and devices of the old Indian drama. The use of several pairs of narrators and listeners at a time for exposition of the argument, linking together of different episodes, simultaneous and parallel action, constant yet smooth change of locale and several other devices are exploited quite imaginatively by the author. Its language has an unusually evocative quality combining poetic intensity with the spontaneity of the spoken word. It recreates the past without losing hold on its modern dimensions.

Bharati, after his Ph.D. (Siddha Sahitya) and a short start as teacher at the university of Allahabad, has been the editor of the leading Hindi Journal Dharmayug for nearly three decades.

I.C.

BHARATI, HRIDAY KOUL (Kashmiri; b. 1937), a well known Kashmiri short story writer, had his schooling in Sopore and received his college education in Srinagar; joined A.I.R. as a news reader in 1963 and resigned in 1974. A freelancer, he writes short stories, Radio and T.V. plays. Though he has earned a place for himself among the first rankers of language, he has yet to publish a collection of his short stories. His stories have appeared in different periodicals, mostly in Shiraza the journal brought out by the J & K Academy of Art and languages and Culture. Influenced by 'Nadim', Dina Nath, the doyen of contemporary Kashmiri poets, he had been a promising teenage writer during the golden age of progressivism in early fifties, when a lot of literary and cultural activities were carried on under the aegis of an organisation, the Cultural conference. But, he could not stay there long and the seeds of disillusionment had started germinating when he wrote the story 'Shikast' (The Defeat) and earned the displeasure of his seniors in the movement. The story is an avowal of the emptiness of life and the protagonist of the story defies life by accepting death. Beginning with this nihilistic attitude, Bharati graduated into modernism with his story 'Abnwsuk Ruler (The Ebonite ruler-Shiraza, 1967). The narrator-cum-protagonist of the story feels choked in the stifling atmosphere of the city, where multitudes live so close that there is no privacy left, yet so far away that they rarely communicate or come to know one another. If the jet black and smooth ruler is a symbol of the innocent beauty of the South Indian girl living next door, it also stands for the bleakness of the human existence. When 'Hamzad' (Shiraza Vol-3 No. 12) was published, Bharati had established himself as a writer, with a truly modern sensibility, capable of using his craftsmanship to give expression to this sensibility. The pigeon that pecks at the glass pane of the ventilator of the bank that is housed in the building opposite the bus stop, is his own self trying to peck at the reality of this world. The inner voice confronts him and its silence is followed by the death of the pigeon.

Bharati's art lies in the juxtaposition of images that are poetic in nature and interspersing them with bits of common place conversation. For his motifs, he draws on varied sources which range from Hindu mythology to world history of even world literature. For his symbols he can use anything, a lifeless object like a tennis racquet or a creature like a spider or even a scorpion. In 'Chakra Vehu' (The Wheel) Shiraza-Short Story Number, Ahmed Bin Isaq, the Nigerian architect's struggle in Biafara and his ultimate death at the hands of the mercenaries, is made lucid by a reference to Abhimanyu (one of the heroes of the Mahabharata) who is shown with the broken wheel, the only weapon left with him, trying to defend himself against his powerful enemies. With the advancement of Bharati's career as a writer, he has become more obscure which sometimes verges on the abstract. Sometimes, he creates a 'Kafkesian' atmosphere and merges sub-conscious with the conscious, 'Main Lash Te Cohpi Hund Sadre' (My corpse and and Sea of Silence-Shiraza-Vol. 13 No. I, 1976). The threat of a nuclear holocaust may be expressed by visualizing a world without the sun 'Sriyirus pagah' (The Sunless Tomorrow-Shiraza Vol. 14 No. 1877). His obsession with mirrors indicates his relentless search for identity in a world that is by no means rational. Scorpions and spiders frequent the stories, only to produce an element of grotesqueness and that is deliberate. Bharati's language is captivating and much is expected of this writer. A collection of short stories of the author is shortly being published.

R.L.R.

BHARATI PADALKAL (Tamil), is a collection of songs by Subramania Bharati, a patriot and a lyricist who has made a permanent impact not only on the literature of the Tamils but on the Tamil society and the social, economic, political and religious thought-patterns of the tradition-loving Tamils. A part of this impact is certainly traceable to the incidents of his amazing life, his total indifference to wealth, his feeling of brotherliness towards all creation and his abundant charm. But the greater part of his impact is certainly due to the songs composed by him, to the lyrics and serious epics which he found the time to compose during the course of his short and eventful life.

Bharati's poems are remarkable primarily for their genuine emotional content and the simplicity of their diction. Now in both these aspects, he was unique and was even regarded as a rebel; for poets before him and contemporaneous with him wrote poetry that was type-cast, poetry in which conformity to a traditional pattern was far more important than sentiment or message; and their diction was obscure and so pedantic that their works could not be understood without detailed commentaries. Bharati sang in the people's idiom using the objects of everyday life as the basis of his metaphor; and his work was wholly inspired by emotion-centred experience and was therefore demonstrated and rendered significant by genuine sentiment.

His songs on the national movement for liberation were the spontaneous outpourings of a generous soul triggered by the sufferings of a subject people at the hands of an insolent master; related organically to them are the poems on the condition of Tamil labour in the tea plantations of Ceylon and the sugar-cane plantations of Fiji and Mauritius. These poems are fiery, but being spontaneous without the poet consciously striving after effect, they constitute genuine poetry and can be read and enjoyed even today, though the issues they deal with may have become unreal.

Bharati's lyrics were composed on various subjects some of which were the charm of children, women's liberation, the glory of the Tamil language and literature, the advantages of industrialisation and educational reform. They are marked by Bharati's own characteristic fervour and felicity of expression. This class of poems is widely read and quoted in public meetings.

Bharati was deeply pious and in later years developed into a mystic, a yogi, a siddha purusha who loved to consort with gurus; he sang a large number of songs on various gods and goddesses and a few in a philosophical vein. His favourite gods were Lord Muruga and Krishna and his favourite goddess Kali, on whom he composed the most ecstatic poetry he ever wrote. There is more than one reference in these to the possibility of the earth taking on the hue of heaven through men upgrading themselves morally. There is less emphasis on orthodox rituals and more stress is placed on devotion and total surrender; his was the religion of the strong-minded devotee who saw himself as the junior partner in all endeavours working under the guidance of the wiser senior, god. He had no use of fear as the motivating factor used by the weak to instil piety in the field of religion. As everywhere else, Bharati operated with courage, a fiery self-confidence and a pervasive altruism.

A.V.S.

BHARATIYA KAVYAMIMAMSE (Kannada). T.N. Srikantiah's Bharatiya Kavyamimamse attempts to elucidate in outline the principal concepts of Indian poetics as they evolved from the earliest times. The first part of the book describes the historical development of these concepts and in doing this the main contributions of the principal schools of thought have been summarised. In a brief but inclusive survey of thought from Bharata to Bhoja, extending over more than a thousand years, from Rasa to Dhwani through Riti and Alamkara, the main developments and the specific contributions of individual rhetoricians have been elucidated. That the works of writers referred to in this historical survey are all in Sanskrit is no accident. Indian poetics is essentially Sanskrit poetics and though writings on the subject in regional languages could have added a few points of detail, their mainstay has been the writings of Sanskrit rhetoricians.

The present work however, does not content itself with the historical development of Indian (Sanskrit) poetics. It pinpoints its essential contribution to comparative poetics. Rasa (aesthetic experience), Dhwani (suggestion) and Auchitya (propriety) are the three seminal concepts of Indian poetics and these the author discusses in detail with remarkable clarity and precision and explains them with appropriate illustrations. What matters in a work of literary art is the elevating experience, the use of the suggestive power of the language in communicating this experience and a sense of propriety operating at every level from conception to creation. Though at different periods and in the opinion of different schools, definitions have varied and emphasis has shifted from one ingredient of poetry to another, the idea of a unified experience of delightful elevation has persisted all through the history of Indian poetics and found expression in different forms. Differences such as there were existed only on the question of how this experience is or could be achieved. The present work, instead of beating about the bush, goes straight to the heart of the matter and discusses the three concepts that enter into the making of all aesthetic experience.

Indian poetics has, by and large, dealt less with the process of literary creation and more with the created work itself but a number of perceptive observations by different writers on various aspects of the literary activity are available. The present work devotes a whole section covering nearly a third of the book to collecting these scattered observations and presenting a consistent account of the Indian point of view about the materials and the motivations of poetry, the principle of being attuned to reader response and the purpose which the whole endeavour seeks to serve.

The contribution of rhetoricians in Kannada has been added in an appendix. No other work on the subject in Kannada is so comprehensive and yet concise. On the evidence of the precise scholarship, insight, sensitivity and clarity of understanding which the writing reveals, it is possible to claim that no other book in other languages including English is comparable to the present work in giving an authoritative, sensitive and faithful interpretation of the main concepts of Indian poetics in a style that is dignified and delightful and with illustrations and appreciations that can be exemplary lessons in practical criticism. By any standard, Bharatiya Kavyamimamse is a masterly disquisition on the subject by one who combined in himself the meticulousness of precise scholarship with a capacity to respond sensitively to the subtler nuances of poetry.

V.M.I

BHARATIYA SAHITYA CHARITRAM (Malayalam) is a comprehensive study of Indian literature relating to twentytwo languages, in two volumes, edited and published by K.M. George, under the auspices of Kerala Sahitya Akademi, as part of its Silver Jubilee Celebrations. All the articles included in this book were first written in English by experts in each subject. The editor got the essays translated into Malayalam with the assistance of a team of scholars well versed in both the languages.

'Bharatiya Sahitya Charitram' means History of Indian Literature, but the English version is named Comparative Indian Literature, The works on Indian literature published prior to the present book dealt mainly with Sanskrit literature or were partial accounts of only certain aspects of Indian Literature. So the publication of this voluminous work as an integrated comprehensive history has fulfilled a long-felt need in the field of literary criticism. Here a generic approach to literary division has been accepted and within each genre or literary form, chronological surveys have been incorporated. The surveys give a continuity of literary evolution providing excerpts from great works and the gists of plots.

With the help of the exhaustive index, readers can get access to all important authors of Indian literature and some outstanding topics of cultual importance. Being a special history of all Indian languages and their literatures, designed and prepared to conduct comparative studies and research, this work seeks to discover a medium of national identity and cultural unity. Another speciality of the work is its readability and usefulness for laymen as well as for scholars. Unlike other common reference books and encyclopaedias which contain piece-meal accounts in a stereotyped manner, Bharatiya Sahitya Charitram is meant for continuous reading in addition to reference and critical studies.

There are over two hundred articles contributed by over a hundred and seventy scholars of international repute. In the first volume, after a brief section on the languages of India, there are sections on folk literature, traditional poetry, modern poetry, drama and novel. Under each such section surveys of literary achievements in the various languages have been presented. Each section commences with a general introduction to the topic giving pointers to the common areas and distinctive features of the various literatures. Care has been taken not to overplay the claims of individual languages and to view Indian literature in its totality. In the second volume, though the procedure is the same, the subject matters are different. This volume has six sections viz. short story, prose literature, biographical studies, literary criticism, schools of thought and literary organisations. After presenting ninety articles on six subjects related to fifteen major Indian languages, the book in the Appendix A gives a picture of the growth and development of the literatures of seven other languages also viz. Konkani, Dogri, Nepali, Manipuri, Maithili, Rajasthani and Indian English. The last portion of the volume contains a well prepared glossary followed by the synonyms in all the fifteen languages and photographs with life sketches of about hundred and seventy authors. Bharatiya Sahitya Charitram with one thousand six hundred pages is unique in many respects.

M.A.

BHARATIYA SAHITYASHASTRA (Marathi) is a comprehensive history of Sanskirt Poetics by G.T. Deshpande, an eminent and erudite scholar.

During the last 50 years, plenty of research has been done on Sanskrit literary criticism, especially by learned scholars like P.V. Kane, Sushilkumar De, Raghavan, Shankaran and others. Histories of the subject by Kane and De are comprehensive, but all this writing is in English. Some attempts by K.N. Watve and D.K. Kelkar were made to deal with the subject in Marathi. But a comprehensive, analytical study of different aspects of literature and problems of criticism discussed by various Sanskrit critics was not made so far. Deshpande's book fills this lacuna.

Divided in two parts, the first traces the development of Sanskrit literary criticsim through the various theories propounded by Sanskrit critics. From Bharata's Natya Shashtra to Jagannatha's Rasagangadhar it covers a period of 2000 years of its history. The second part deals with the threefold nature and power of word meanings (Abhidha, Lakshana, Vyanjana) 'theories of 'Dhwani' and 'Rasa' with ample illustrations, A thorough analysis of the phenomenon and process of 'Rasa' is the main core of this part.

The book bears ample evidence of author's keen intellect and critical acumen. But what is notable is the creative ability in criticism. Discussing various literary theories of 'Alamkara', 'Riti', 'Rasa' or 'Vakrokti' the author reveals that Bhamaha, Vaman, Anandvardhan or Kuntaka did not found different 'Schools' but contributed to additional aspects of literary criticism. He also shows relationship of Bharata's 'Lakshana' with the later theories of the rhetoricians. Though not thoroughly discussed he has similarly touched upon the relationship between 'Sphotvada' and 'Dhwani' and Kashmiri 'Shaivism' and Abhinavagupta's concept of beauty.

Author's indepth study of 'Nirukta', 'Purvamimansa' and 'Nyaya' has lent to his exposition clarity of thought and scientific method of dealing with this complicated theoretical subject.

But what makes the book highly readable is the author's style which is fluent, facile and attractive. A landmark in Marathi literature, it has the capacity to inspire scholars for comparative studies of Indian and Western poetics. The book received the Sahitya Akademi award in 1959.

I.S.

BHARATIYA SHIVACHANDRA (Rajasthani; b. 1853, d. 1914) was born at a village named Kannada in the erstwhile state of Hyderabad (Deccan), where his forefathers had migrated from their homeland at Didawana (Nagaura–Rajasthan), apparently for economic reasons. He was a highly educated person. Though he had served the erstwhile state of Indore in a responsible post, and also practised at the bar, his inclinations were naturally for his own business. Unfortunately he could not get much success in business too. The underlying reason for this might be his inner urge to go in for literary activity. He had developed interest in the Yoga in his advanced age, and devoted considerable time to it besides his regular hours of reading and writing. His work-Suryachakra vedha- bears testimony to the fact. This spiritual bent of mind led him to go on pilgrimage alongwith his wife. A few months after his return from the tour he was down with dysentry which ultimately took his life. Shivachandra was a multilingual writer with command over Sanskrit, Hindi, Marathi, Gujarati and Rajasthani languages. Besides his books written in Rajasthani, he wrote 17 in Hindi, 13 in Marathi and 3 in Sanskrit. His Marathi translation of Bhagavatgita was very much appreciated. A magazine named Vaisyapakaraka, then published from Calcutta, had the privilege of obtaining Bharatiya as its editor for some time (1904). Are list his works given below will show the range of his scholarship and literary interests.

His Rajasthani works are 1. Kesaravilasa (drama, 1900), 2. Budhapa-ki-Sagai (drama, 1906), 3. Phataka Janjala (drama, 1907), 4. Kanaka-sundara (novel, 1903), 5. Visranta Pravasi Vaisyopakaraka magazine, Vol. 3, Calcutta, 1904), 6. Bada Bazara, in the style of one act play–(Vaisyopakaraka Vol. 2 No. 12, Calcutta, 1905), 7. Motyan ki Kanthi (Necklace of Pearls) 8. Vaisyaprabodha (Enlightenment to the business community) 9. Sangita Manakunwara Nataka and 10. Bodha Darpana (Mirror of Knowledge). Of the above, nos. 5 and 6 are miscellaneous incomplete pieces and nothing is known of the subjects of nos. 7, 8, 9 and 10. Bharatiya has variously depicted his thoughts and ideals in his works, either directly in his own statements or through his characters and dialogues. He was a nationalist of the highest degree and realised it well that the ruling Englishmen were draining the wealth of India to their own country. He, there fore, advocated the use of home made cloth and other articles of use (Phataka Janjala, concluding verses 5-6). He was equally anxious to see that the country remained united and showed itself as one nation, irrespective of the diversities of language, religion, caste and regions. He was not only aware of the poverty of the masses due to the foreign rule, but also reprimanded the pseudo-leaders and workers of the social field who failed to appreciate the gravity of the problem. He supported the cause of Hindi as the sole national language and was of the firm view that no other language could take its place. The need for a national language for the overall welfare of the country was often stressed by him. (Introduction of Kanaka sundara). Despite this broad outlook,he chose to create literature in his own language Rajasthani. For this he had to face criticism from certain quarters (Introduction of Kanaka sundara). While reacting to this he explicitly made it clear that as he was concerned about the downfall of the Marawadi community, and as he was of the opinion that their condition could be bettered only through literature made available in their own language, he had decided to write in Rajasthani (Introduction to Kanaka sundara). While working for the good of his people he wanted them to provide education to the women, to shun the 'parda', to desist from wasteful expenditure, to cast off superstitions, and harmful conventions and to keep away from child marriage and old age marriage and dowries. (Introduction to Kanaka sundara and Kesara vilasa. His dramas proved very popular and ran into more than one edition. Some of his books were published many times. His dramas are realistic, with contemporaneous subject matter and living language of the people. Though he had the tendency to indulge in lengthy monologues to express himself thoroughly on the problem, he took due care in making his characters speak in their own language maintaining their literary standard at the same line. As for the technique, he felt more inclined towards western drama, but also occasionally used the Indian tradition. His one-Act plays (Kanaka sundara and Bada Bazar), if we could so call them, were the two first plays of the language. Contrary to the realistic approach in his plays, Bharatiya's approach to life in his novels is idealistic. There he talks of ethics and morality and preaches ideals.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Kiran Nahata, Shivachandra Bharatiya, Jaipur, 1970, Adhunik Rajasthani Sahitya, Purana Srota evam Pravritiyan, Jaipur, 1974.

Raw.S.

BHARATENDU HARISHCHANDRA (Hindi; b. 1850, d. 1885). The father of modern Hindi Literature, Bharatendu Harishchandra was born in Kashi on 9 September 1850. His father, Babu Gopal Chandra, was a famous litterateur of his own time. He composed poems with 'Giridhardas' as his pseudonym. He has forty books to his credit which include long epical poems, works on alliteration and aesthetic relish, a drama entitled Nahush and collection of lyrical poems. The first and foremost influence on Bharatendu's personality was that of his father. Bharatendu's lineage traces its relation to Seth Amichand, who, owing to his great wealth was reckoned to be the 'Kuber' of his times. Till his father's time, his family had enormous wealth and their life-style was typically aristocratic.

Bharatendu started composing poems when his father was alive. His father got him admitted to a Mahajani School for his education. There he learned English from Raja Shivprasad and regarded the Raja as his 'Guru'. He did study for a while in the Queen's College but after his father's death regular school education had to be discontinued and he studied Hindi, Urdu, Sanskrit, Bengali and English at home through private tuitions. Because of his precocity, he had become well-versed in around twenty to twenty-five languages in a very short period. He was fond of reading both light and serious literature in each of the languages he learnt.

Bharatendu had dedicated his life to literature, art and music. At that time there was no paucity of money and he used to organise poetic symposia and concerts at his place almost every evening. Lovers of poetry thronged these concerts which continued up to 10 p.m. every night. Non-stop poetry recitation and instantaneous award by Bharatendu on good poems were the salient features of these concerts. Thus, growing indifferent to earning money, he derived greater pleasure in distributing and dissipating his wealth. The manner in which he doled out his ancestral property could be attributed only to someone absolutely detached from personal wealth. These rackless monetary drains did result at the fag-end of his life, in making him suffer privations but he never had any remorse nor ever begged anything from anyone throughout his life.

Bharatendu was a gifted litterateur. He inherited the gift of poetry from his father but his prowess in the field of prose which also won him immortal fame, was the result of the two potent factors: need of the age and his heart-felt love for his country. Bharatendu entered the Hindi literary field after 'Ritikal'. In that period, Braj Bhasha poetry was very rich at the expression level but from the point of view of feeling and sentiment it catered more to an orthodox and stale style of love-lorn sensuality. Bharatendu did not change the perspective altogether, but he at once brought a welcome and a total transformation in the content. He abandoned the old style of sensual poetry of 'Ritikal' and established a firm relationship between poetry and the common man's weal and woe. He linked literature to contemporary society. By breaking the narrow walls of traditional poetry exemplifying figures of speech and classification of heroines, he opened new vistas for expression of patriotism and social awareness and brought in a blow of fresh air for poetry to breathe. Bharatendu's idea of nationalising was quite comprehensive and broad-based. The real awakening of the nationalistic feeling in Hindi literature actually manifests itself from Bharatendu onwards. The prominent trends of Bharatendu's poetry are: the agony of love in the religious poems; the urge for social reform and patriotism and the message of religious tolerance.

Besides poetry, Bharatendu also played a pioneering role in the development of Hindi prose. Prior to his entry in the Hindi literature prose writers were divided into two distinct camps. Raja Shivprasad supported Sanskritised form of Hindi. It was only Bharatendu who decided on the popular medium of expression for Hindi prose by choosing the golden mean between the two extremist styles. By writing his dramas in spontaneous simple language, he almost crystallised the stable form of Hindi prose. This effort of his earned him great renown. When the government honoured Raja Shivprasad by conferring the title of 'Sitar-e-Hind', the people-at-large adorned the poet Harishchandra with the title of 'Bharatendu'. In course of time, he became better known as 'Bharatendu' rather than Harishchandra. The extent to which his work popularised Hindi prose is really amazing when one considers the short time-span he achieved this end in. He edited and published about half-a-dozen magazines and periodicals. He produced eighteen original and translated dramas, thirteen history-oriented books, twelve poetry collections on 'Rajbhakti' and about forty five small and big essays on a variety of topics including some translations from the original Sanskrit or Urdu works. None else had made such profuse contribution to Hindi prose till then. He has one more unforgettable achievement to his credit for which Hindi literature shall always remain indebted to him. He selected promising contemporary writers, formed a circle of his own and inspired them to work in Hindi prose. Those who were inspired by Bharatendu to contribute to prose and poetry both include Balkrishna Bhatt, Pratapnarain Misra, Ambika Dutt Vyas, Badrinarayan Chaudhari 'Premghan', Thakur Jagmohan Singh and Radhacharan Goswami.

The description of Bharatendu's contribution to literature would be incomplete if one does not discuss in details his plays and his efforts to set up the stage for Hindi plays. Bharatendu authored all sorts of plays–mythological, historical, social and others and again chose the path of golden mean in writing his plays. Neither did he, like the Bengali dramatist, abandon abruptly the ancient style of Indian plays and followed the western style, nor did he allow himself to be entangled in the complexities of ancient dramatics. While creating his plays, he kept in mind the social relevance of the theme and the spectators who were supposed to witness it. With this purpose in view, he created about one and a half dozen plays–five translated from Sanskrit, one from Bengali and one from English besides the original plays. He gave due consideration to the stageability of plays besides their language and diction. Out of his original plays Satya Harishchandra (mythological) was quite popular. Written against the social background of the period, his two more original plays Bharat Durdasha and Andher Nagri are still equally relevant as they were at the time they were written, viz. about a hundred years ago. In his plays Chandravali and Nil Devi, the imagination and sentiments expressed therein have a unique combination. In his translations from Sanskrit plays viz, Mudrarakshas, Dhananjay Vijay, Karpur Manjari, Ratnavali, Bharatendu has given ample evidence of his poetic brilliance Vaidiki Hinsa Hinsa Na Bhavati and Vishasyavishamaushadham, are his satirical plays. Bharatendu has widened the horizons of creativity by introducing comical and farcical elements in these plays.

Bharatendu created the Hindi stage of his period. He popularised the plays by acting himself in them. During that period there were no arrangements for colourful curtains and lights but still Bharatendu managed with the help of petromax lantern and red and yellow lights. It was Bharatendu who generated an interest in the stage-drama and acting amongst the artistocratic class.

Bharatendu was not only a litterateur pioneering a new era but was also a high class social reformer, Hindi propagandist, patriot and popular leader. He was honoured both by the people and the government. The English rulers-too, were admirers of his talent and looked up to him with respect. Bharatendu neither tried nor ever wished any governmental recognition and honour. Whenever such an occasion arose, he politely declined all such honours.

Vi.S.

BHARAVI (Sanskrit), author of the Kiratarjuniya, one of the five major Mahakavyas in Sanskrit, is mentioned along with Kalidasa in the Aihole inscription of the Chalukya king, Pulekesin II. dated 634 A.D. A line from his poem is quoted by Prabhakara in his Brihati (1600). According to the Avantisundarikatha of Dandin, Bharavi was a friend of Dandin's great grandfather Damodara, and was patronized by the King Durvinita of the Western Ganga dynasty, and later by Pallava king, Simhavishnu. According to an inscription Durvinita composed a commentary on the fifteenth canto (chitrakavya) of the Kiratarjuniya. Bharavi may be assigned to the middle of the 6th century A.D. According to popular traditions he was very poor. He has sobriquet Chattva Bharavi because of the poetic fancy conceiving the flower dust flown up by the wind to a golden umbrella. He is famous for the brevity and depth of his style (arthagaurava). The Kiratarjuniya in 18 cantos describes the circumstances that led to Arjuna's penance, his actual penance and obtaining weapons from God Shiva. Valour is the main rasa.

K.K.R.

BHARTRIHARI (Sanskrit), a grammarian, philosopher and poet is the most outstanding writer on the philosophy of language and the best exponent of the sphota theory. Tradition says that he was a king, a brother of King Vikramaditya or Shudraka, and that he gave up his wordly life and became a recluse. The statement of the Chinese traveller Itsing (650 A.D.) that Bhartrihari died forty years earlier and was a contemporary of Dharmapala, must be based on legends, and being self contradictory has also to be rejected. Quotations from Bhartrihari's Vakyapadiya in Dignaga's Traikalikapariksha and his influence on Dignaga's theory of language prove that Bhartrihari cannot be later than the Buddhist writer. The Jaina writer Simhasurigani says that Bhartrihari was a student of Vasurata, pupil of Vasubandhu (400 A.D.) Thus Bhartrihari has to be assigned to 450-500 A.D.

Among the works of Bhartrihari are (1) the Tripadi or Mahabhashyadipika on the first three padas of book I. of the Mahabhashya; only a fragmentary manuscript is available, (2) Vakyapadiya or Trikandi in three chapters, Brahmakanda, Padakanda and Prakirnakanda on the philosophy of language with special reference to Sanskrit ,(3) Vritti or commentary on chapters one and two of the Vakyapadiya, (4) Shabdadhatupariksha, a last work known only through later references. Some old tradition identifies Bhartrihari with the poet Bhatti, but this does not seem probable. The poet Bhartrihāri, author of the three popular Shatakas on Niti, Shringara and Vairagya, is generally identified with the grammarian. This is quite probable, for the indtroductory verse of the Nitishataka (dikkaladyanavachchhinna) is quoted by Somananda in his Shivadrishti (2.93, Kashmir Series of Texts and Studies), as from the Dhatusamiksha of Bhartrihari. The verses of the three Shatakas reveal a deep thinker and a philosopher of life.

According to Bhartrihari our entire knowledge is interpenetrated with language, and language is the only key to knowledge. He identifies the speech principle (Shabdatattva) with Brahman, which through its shabda and artha aspects, manifests itself into the phenomenal world of ideas and things, on the basis of its own powers like Time. He speaks of different layers in the manifestation of Speech; the Absolute Brahman is the Speech principle at the para stage, about which nothing can be said. The next stage is the pashyanti which is identified with the pratibha or intuitive flash of insight at the meaning level, and with the unitary, unmanifested speech, or the vakyasphota. The next is the madhyama stage with the full expression in the mind, with the difference in sequence, etc., the last stage is vaikhari, the speech uttered by the speaker and heard by the listener.

According to Bhartrihari's sphota theory, what the speaker utters and the listener hears is the sentence as a whole, the Vakya-sphota; the division of the sentence into words and the words into phonemes have no absolute reality, but are abstracted from the sentence, for help in understanding the utterance. Those who know the language will speak and hear only complete, meaningful sentences, the Vakya-sphota. Thought and language are the expressions of one deep spiritual impulse to know and to communicate.

Bhartrihari's verses are very popular even now–the Nitishataka on politics and ethics, Shringarashataka on passionate love and Vairagyashataka on renunciation. Renunciation and enjoyment are described and discussed by the poet with detachment. Each verse is a unit in itself, compressing much complex thought and feeling.

K.K.R.

BHASA(Commentary) (Punjabi). In Punjabi letters this term is not current. There is a long tradition of tikas, meaning compositions in which a poetic text is published with every line followed by its meaning in prose, including a brief comment wherever considered necessary by the tika-kar.

S.S.S.

BHASA

BHASA (Sanskrit), the celebrated Sanskrit dramatist, was assigned different dates by different scholars. He may be taken to have lived towards the close of the centuries before Christ or in the beginning of the Christian Era. Kalidasa's reference to him is the earliest. Kalidasa speaks of Bhasa's fame. According to Bana, Bhasa's plays had three characteristics. They dispensed with the benedictory verse on the stage. Instead the Sutradhara or the stage-manager enters as the first happening on the stage, at the end of the nandi (perhaps carried out in the green room). Secondly these plays had several characters. Thirdly there were many episodes in these plays. Others, besides Bana had also referred to Bhasa. And his verses were quoted in anthologies. But plays themselves had disappeared till their manuscripts were discovered in 1909 in a Kerala Brahmin home named Manalikkara Matham near Trivandrum in Kerala by the late T. Ganapati Shastri, then Curator of the Maharaja's Palace Library. The first discovery was of ten plays and a fragment written in Malayalam on 105 palm leaves. Subsequently Shastri discovered two more plays and the thirteen plays of Bhasa ended their undetected existence. Almost simultaneously one of these plays was discovered in Mysore by R. Narasimhachar, Head of the Archaeology department there.

The thirteen plays of Bhasa are: (1) Dutavakyam (The Words of the Ambassador); (2) Karnabharam (Karna's Duty); (3) Dutaghatotkacham (The Embassy of Ghatotkacha); (4) Urubhangam (The Breaking of the Thighs); (5) Madhyamavyayogam (A Play on Madhyma); (6) Pancharatram (The Five Nights); (7) Abhishekanatakam (A Play on the Coronation); (8) Balacharitam (The Story of the Boy); (9) Avimarakam (Avimaraka); (10) Pratimanatakam (The House of Statues) (11) Pratijnayaugandharayanam (The Vows of Yaugandharayana); (12) Svapnavasavadattam (Vasavadatta in a Dream); (13) Charudattam (Chrarudatta).

The first six are based on episodes in the Mahabharata. 7 and 10 are Ramayana plays. 11 and 12 are based on legends. 9 and 13 are social romances.

The plays were most probably composed in the order in which they are given above judging from internal evidence (see Pusalkar: bibliography). These plays vary in structure. The first five are one-Acts. The Pancharatra has three Acts. It belongs to the class of dramas called a samavakara. (7), (8), (9), (10) and (12) are natakas. (11) and (13) are prakaranas.

In the Dutavakya Krishna pleads the Pandava case ruitlessly before the Kauravas. Karna's reputed generosity is tested in Karnabharam. He gives away his magic earstuds and armour to Indra well knowing that parting with them would make him vulnerable in war. In Dutaghatotkacha, Ghatotkacha, son of Bhima, pleads to the Kauravas to be generous to the Pandavas; but in vain. In Urubhanga, Bhima breaks Duryodhana's thighs and kills him. Madhyama, the middle one is both Bhima and the second of a Brahmin's three sons in Madhyamavyayoga. The boy was to be offered as the fast breaking meal of a demoness by name Hidimbi. The one to take him to her was Ghatotkacha, her son. At this stage Bhima intervenes and offers to go with Ghatotkacha. And what was Hidimbi's embarrased surprise when she found that the man who had come with her son to be her meal was her own former husband and her son's father. Pancharatram is the story of an encounter between the Kauravas and the allies of the Pandavas in the country of the Viratas. In the Abhishekanataka Rama's coronation is dramatised. Balacharita is the story of Krishna killing the demons. Avimaraka is the story of the love between princess Kurangi and Avimaraka altered as a Pariah due to a curse which happily is lifted at the end leading to the marriage of the lovers. Pratimanataka is the early story of the Ramayana. There is a House of Statues in the play. Hence its name. Pratijnayaugandharayana and Svapnavasavadatta are plays on the fortunes of King Udayana of Vatsa and his love for his queen Vasavadatta. Yaugandharayana, Udayana's shrewd minister is a key figure. Charudatta is a social play on the love of the honest and impoverished merchant Charudatta and the opulent and good-hearted courtesan Vasantasena.

Bhasa is a playwright with considerable originality. While borrowing themes from the epics he makes variations in order to make them dramatically suitable. He also invents episodes like one of the statue house in the Ramayana play. Epics, mythology, legends, history and social life were all adopted by him for his work. No other playwright in Sanskrit has written so many plays on so wide a range of subjects. His play on the impoverished trader Charudatta and the high-minded courtesan Vasantasena is reputedly the first play on social life in Sanskrit. The other play, Mrichchhakatika (The Clay Cart) by Shudraka on the same theme is acceptedly influenced by the earlier Bhasa work.

The Bhasa plays are noted for their speedy action and movement. Many of the characters, themselves, are heroes of action. Such are the legendary heroes like Arjuna, Bhima, Rama and so on. He shows originality in endowing even the traditionally wicked heroes like Duryodhana and Ravana with redeeming qualities.

Mention has been made earlier of the technical originality in the Bhasa plays. Of even greater importance is his nonconformism in the concept of the play. Bhasa allows on the stage several actions and events which traditional dramaturgy bars from there. One such is death. We have in plays like Balacharita and Urubhanga characters dying on the stage. Indeed Urubhanga is singular in that the play ends with the death of its chief character Duryodhana. This play thus sets aside the Indian dramatic rule that a play shall not end in a tragedy.

The action-orientation of the Bhasa plays also precludes too long and imaginatively enriched versification. Consequently the verses in these plays show not so much poetic imagination as a grasp on and expression of realism and a concern for the wisdom and morality of life. Concerned with action and movement in his plays the playwright is pithy, realistic, precise and moralistic in his verses. Indeed in his later plays the proportion of verses to dialogue goes down. We find also the peculiar feature of the dramatist breaking up verses and making these parts dialogue-pieces in the mouths of characters in a scene.

It was inevitable that an early dramatist with such massive talent, dramatic insight, range of themes and moral concern exercised much influence on his successors. His powerful and realistic portrayal of character, pithy and meaningful dialogue, delineation of sentiment as a structural and evocative unit, importing of essential nature in image-rich language, moral passion, and richness in episodes have enriched the world of later dramatists. Not even Kalidasa was free from this influence, not to speak of Bhavabhuti, Shri Harsha and of course Shudraka.

Very little is known about the personal history of Bhasa. The extant manuscripts of the plays do not even mention his name and what little we can reconstruct on his life and personality has to be done on the basis of his plays and references to him in works by others. The surmise that he belonged to a late B.C. or early A.D. period may be accepted, though as mentioned earlier other views have also been expressed on the subject. Pusalkar is of the view that the King Rajasimha mentioned in the epilogues of the plays was a ruler who belonged to the pre-Mauryan Nanda dynasty or Chandragupta Maurya himself. Bhasa was probably a court-poet of a king who used to be present at the staging of the plays. The dramatist was a devotee of Vishnu as can be gathered in his constant references to Him in the prologue verses and the obvious worshipful tone of his references. He had accepted the Hindu view of life though he perhaps mentally protested against the caste restrictions and sometimes chose to place merit above caste. He believed in the duty of wives to be devoted to their husbands. To him the intactness of family affection was sacred and was achieved by respect for the elders. Buddhist mendicants or Shramanakas were around when he lived.

There are many controversies on Bhasa, his time and place and personality. Some scholars say that Bhasa was a Keralite. Agreement in technique with other known Kerala Sanskrit plays and other factors have led to the Kerala thesis. The Chakyars of Kerala have for a long time enacted parts of these plays. Besides, the plays were discovered in Kerala. The Kerala thesis is opposed by other scholars equally strongly. Are the plays now discovered adaptations or compilations? Some say, yes; others say, no, they are genuine Bhasa plays. In the meanwhile the plays and their author continue to occupy a unique place in the history of Sanskrit drama. More than eighty editions—some presenting individual plays, others collections—have appeared since 1909. Numerous monographs and articles have also appeared.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.D. Pusalkar, Bhasa—A Study (Delhi, 1968): C.R. Devadhar, Plays ascribed to Bhasa–Their Authenticity and Merits (Poona, 1927); T. Ganapati, Shastri, Bhasa Plays-A Critical Study (Trivandrum, 1925).

K.P.T.

BHASHA BHAGAVADGITA (Malayalam) is the first translation of the Bhagavad Gita. The author is Madhava Panicker, the most eminent among the three Niranam poets. The text indicates that the poet did the translation with the blessings of Krishna, the presiding deity of the temple at Malayankeezh near Trivandrum, which is far away from the poet's native place. As stated by most literary historians, Madhava Panicker was residing at Malayankeezh as a tenant of the temple trustees at the time of the translation. There is also general agreement that the work was written between 1350 and 1450.

The poem is very significant from the language point of view. It almost laid the foundation for the modern Malayalam language. The poetic language Manipravalam was till then following the grammatical peculiarities of Sanskrit. Barring certain regional and contemporary peculiarities of the language, Bhasha Bhagavadgita can be said to be quite modern. The great contribution of the Niranam poets in general is that they found 'Manipravalam' without Sanskrit endings and the Dravidian metres used in 'Pattus' most suitable for Malayalam poetry.

The Niranam poets introduced revolutionary changes in poetic themes as well. Never before them had anyone selected so many episodes from the epics and dealt with them with such seriousness of purpose as they did in their works. Madhava Panicker's work has a profound theme and deals with it in a grand style, thus directing poetry to the course it was to take in the Bhakti movement later perfected by Thunchathu Ezhuthacchan.

It is the first ever translation of the Gita from the Sanskrit original into any language. The translator has condensed certain portions without affecting the grandeur of the work. He threw open to the ordinary man who did not know Sanskrit, the gates of a world of profound philosophy. So great was his success that none of his immediate successor poets dared translate the Bhagavadgita completely.

The translation has, as its introduction, six quatrains contributed by the poet. It also closes with a few original songs in which the poet praises the magnificence of the Gita. In translating the text Madhava Panicker has shown his originality. In some places, new relevant ideas have been added while in others new elucidations and explanations based on ancient commentaries have been incorporated.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Anandakkuttan (ed.), Madhava Panickarude Bhasha Bhagavadgita (1958)., N. Krishna Pillai, Kairaliyude Katha (1975).

K.V.R.

BHASHAGITASANGRAHA (Maithili). The name Bhashagitasangraha was generally applied to any collection of poems written in modern vernacular. In the libraries of Nepal, Haraprasad Sastri and P.C. Bagchi named one such collection: another copy of the same collection was found by Jayakanta Mishra who called it Bhashagita.

More commonly the name signifies today another collection of poems which contains not only Nepalese poems but poems from Mithila proper which Jayakanta Mishra had called by mistake Kamshanarayana Padavali and Ramanath Jha published in 1967 as Bhashagitasangraha. It contains 146 poems of about 24 poets including Vidyapati. It is preserved in the Rashtriya Library acquired from Rajaguru Hemaraja Sharma. It is a neat manuscript in Tirhuta. Its compiler's name is not given. Its importance is great because it contains, after Lochana's Rajatarangini, the most authentic pieces of several old poets as well as helps us identify many of them. In particular this collection of medieval poetry reveals the work of Govinda Thakur whose poems were at one time taken to be written by Govindadas Jha.

The volume was published from the Patna University, Patna.

J.M.

BHASHA: ITIHAS ANI BHUGOL (Marathi) is an important book written by N.G. Kalekar discussing various aspects of language. The book received the Sahitya Akademi Award of the year 1967.

The lectures delivered by the author to the Post-Graduate students of the Marathwada University in 1963 are compiled in this book. Alongwith the four lectures of this series an article entitled 'Boundaries of Languages' is also included in it. The book was published in 1964.

History and Geography of a language are the subect of this book and hence the diachronic and synchronic study of a language is attempted in it.

History of a language can be studied on the basis of the written documents in it. The language undergoes a slow but gradual change in the phonetic, morphological, syntactic and semantic areas. These changes can be studied by the linguistic items found in the written works of the past and the present. The comparison of the past and present linguistic items enables one to conjecture even the earlier ones of the language as hypothetical. The comparative study of the same language in relation to different periods is known as the Historical Method, while comparative study of the related different languages of the same period is called Comparative Method. The author explains the difference between these two methods with illustrations cited from Marathi, Gujarati, Hindi, Bengali, Kannada, Telugu, Malayalam and Tamil languages.

The regular and the irregular phonetic changes in a language, the linguistic as well as the extra-linguistic reasons behind the phenomena of linguistic changes are discussed. The influence of the foreign language on a particular language plays a vital role in it in respect of changes that come over due to their mutual contact. The internal comparison between the linguistic forms belonging to two or more different periods establish a set of rules. Alongwith these rules the internal reconstruction of the linguistic forms set by using the comparative linguistic method is also dealt with.

In the second half of the book the geographical aspect of the language is dealt with. The topics like the nature of language and dialects, standard language, standard dialect, regional and social dialects of a language are described. The reasons leading to the creation of different dialects, the importance and the technique of the dialect-studies, the liberal and healthy attitude expected from the society towards the dialect-issue are considered in two chapters, while the regional boundaries of the language is the subject of the next one.

The information about the survey of French dialects and the linguistic Survey of India by G.A. Grierson given here is really useful.

These are the aspects which cover the range of geographical study of a language.

The author's style of expressing, his thoughts on such a scientific subject is simple and elaborate. In this respect it is in striking contrast to other books on the same science in Marathi.

M.J.

BHASHA KAUTALIYAM (Malayalam) is a commentary on the Arthashastra of Kautilya. The identity of the commentator is not known. The Sanskrit scholar Ganapati Shastri points out that the Malayalam commentator has followed the Sanskrit commentary Pratipadapanchika of Bhattaswami. K.N. Ezhuthacchan agreed with him.

Manuscript copies of the Bhasha Kautaliyam are available in the Oriental Manuscripts Library, Madras, in the Oriental Institute of the Thirupaty Venkateswara University and in the Manuscripts Library, Trivandrum. As all of them are identical, most probably all these copies have been taken from a single source. All the extisting copies contain commentaries only on the first seven 'adhikaranas'.

The author of Bhasha Kautaliyam cared only to write the commentary without bothering even to quote the original verses in his book. It seems certain from the commentary that the author is a Malayali who possessed adequate knowledge of his mother tongue.

It is difficult to date the work. C.L. Antony and Ilamkulam Kunjan Pillai, who have studied the language of the work, have established that Malayalam started functioning as an independent language during the 9th century. Therefore it was probably written during the 12th century, or between 1150 and 1250.

Bhasha Kautaliyam was written with the obvious purpose of giving some guidelines to those who knew Sanskrit well. The book, which contains numerous complicated sentences, is a hard nut to crack. Its diction is also a mixture of Sanskrit and Tamil.

No wonder there are people who condemn the work. It is also the earliest prose work in Malayalam.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: K.M. George (ed.) Sahitya Charithram Prasthanagalilute:, Ilankulam Kunjan Pillai, Kerala Bhashayute Vikasaparnagalilute., Ulloor S. Parameswara Iyer, Kerala Sahitya Charitram, Vol. 1.

K.V.R.

BHASHAPOSHINI SABHA (Malayalam). 'Kavi Samajam' (Association of Poets), started in August 1891, was the first literary association in Kerala. It was renamed Bhashaposhini (that which enriches language) in November in the same year. Kandathil Varghese Mappilai, founder editor of the Malayalamanorama, was the motive force behind this organisation. Kerala Varma Valiya Koyil Thampuran, the father of modern Malayalam prose, was the President of the Association and he continued to be the President until his death. It was the intention of the organisers to build up the Association on the pattern of Bharata Mahajana Sabha (Indian National Congress). Therefore, to democratize the Association prominent literary men from the erstwhile Malabar, Cochin and Travancore States were elected to représent the whole of Kerala. A council of literary men representing all these regions was also constituted to examine the works produced in these regions and suggest ways and means to improve and standardise the language used in them.

The first conference of the Bhashaposhini Sabha was held at Trichur in Central Kerala in 1892 and the aims and objectives of the Association were defined. The resolutions adopted in the Conference laid stress on the following:

1. to standardise the language throughout Kerala
2. to encourage the development of prose
3. to start a journal to serve the purposes defined by the Association
4. to encourage writers by giving awards
5. to organise literary conferences
6. to spread modern education by starting schools and publications.

Thus Bhashaposhini, the journal, was started in 1892 (4 numbers annually) under the editorship of Kandathil Varghese Mappilai, It continued for three years, and in 1895 it was amalgamated with Vidya Vindodini under the editorship of C.P. Achuta Menon, a leading literary critic of that time. But in 1897 it was again started separately and the journal ran for forty-two years without a break.

The Bhashaposhini was one of the first leading literary journals in Malayalam. Writers like Vallathoi Narayana Menon, Kumaran Asan, Ulloor S. Parameswara Iyer, Sahitya Panchananan P.K. Narayana Pillai, G. Sankara Kurup and others had their early writings published in the colums of Bhasha poshini. This journal shaped the sensibility of an entire generation. It encouraged imaginative as well as informative writing. Thus the journal became an organ of literary renaissance in Malayalam and the Bhashaposhini Sabha a model of literary organisation in Kerala.

P.V.V.P.

BHASI, THOPPIL (Malayalam) is a dramatist belonging to the progressive school. He studied Sanskrit and Ayurveda. He joined the Communist Party and was an activist of the underground movements for about five years from 1948. He was elected to the Kerala State Legislature on the Communist party ticket and was a member of the Legislative Assambly for some time. He organised the powerful theatre group, Kerala People's Arts Club, in association with party comrades. His play Ningal Enne Communist Akki (You made me a Communist, 1952) was a great success on the stage and was, to some extent, instrumental in popularising the Communist Party and its ideology and programmes among the masses, during the fifties. He won awards from the Sangita Natak Akademi, New Delhi and the Kerala Sahitya Akademi. He is associated with Malayalam films as a Director and writer of screen plays. He works including Sarvekkallu (Survey Stone), Mutiyanaya Putran (The Prodigal Son), Muladhanam (Capital), Putiya Akasam Putiya Bhumi (The new sky and the new earth), number more than a dozen. His plays, though generally propagandistic in nature, neverthless reflect the stress and strain of contemporary life through poignant dramatic situations, weil-carved characters and racy dialogue composed in a colloquial style.

K.R.N.

BHASKARA KAVI (Telugu; 13th, 14th century). Very little is known about Bhaskara Kavi, after whom the Telugu Ramayana is named. However, there is ample evidence to prove that he lived during the reign of Sahini Marana, a Brahmin officer in charge of horses, who after the fall of the Orugallu empire, declared independence and became a king. There is historical evidence to show that Bhaskara Kavi dedicated his Ramayana to him. It is even said that Sahini Marana, having heard that this Ramayana was being translated into Telugu by Errapragada, the poet laureate of the Reddy kings, encouraged Bhaskara Kavi to expedite writing so that it could reach the people much earlier than that of Errapragada.

Bhaskara Kavi, who wanted the work to be completed soon, seems to have entrusted the writing of some kandas of Ramayana to his son Mallikarjuna Bhattu and Kumara Rudradeva, the son of Sahini Marana. From the prose written at the end of different Kandas, it can be concluded that Bala, Kishkindha and Sundara Kandas were written by Mallikharjuna Bhattu, Ayodhya kanda by Kumara Rudradeva and Aranyakanda by Bhaskara Kavi. Yuddha kanda was written by two persons, Halakki or Hulakki Bhaskara and Ayyalarya. Ayyalarya stated that the earlier part of Yuddha kanda was written by Halakki Bhaskara (upto 1133rd stanza) and that he completed the rest.

Various opinions are expressed about the identity of Bhaskara Kavi. One such is that Bhaskara Kavi is no other than Mantri Bhaskara, the grandfather of Tikkana. Tikkana lavished praise on his grandfather Mantri Bhaskara. This school of critics opines that it is Mantri Bhaskara who wrote it had that Tikkana did so because his grandfather Mantri Bhaskara had already written it. As he was the grandfather of Tikkana, he must have been alive some time between the periods of Nannechoda and Palkuriki Somana. Hence the language of Mantri Bhaskara must be akin to the language of either of the two which means that it must look older than the language of Tikkana. However, there are many stanzas in the Aranya kanda of Bhaskara Ramayana that resemble those of Tikkana. Besides, the author of these stanzas seems to have deliberately imitated Tikkana. Hence it can be concluded that they were written by a later poet and not by a poet earlier than Tikkana. This fact invalidates the argument that Mantri Bhaskara is the author of Bhaskara Ramayana.

The elimination of Mantri Bhaskara leaves two persons in the field. They are Halakki Bhaskara and Bhaskara Kavi. The question now is whether both are one and the same or different. At the end of the Aranya kanda it was stated that it was written by "Sakala Sukavijanavinutha Yasaskara Bhaskara," whereas the writer of the first part of Yuddha kanda is referred to as 'Halakki Bhaskara' by Ayyalarya. Opinion is divided among critics on this issue. Some feel that they are two different persons, whereas P. Lakshmikanthan believes that both the names refer to only one individual and that Bhaskara Ramayana was named after Halakki Bhaskara only. He draws a comparison between the style of Aranya kanda and the style of the first part of Yuddha kanda and says that they are almost alike and that this resemblance proves that they were written by one individual. Lakshmikantam silences his critics saying that if any difference seems to be there between the style of Aranya kanda and the style of the first part of Yuddha kanda, it is not because it is the work of two authors, but because of the Rasa in the two kandas. This argument seems to be as logical as it is sound.

From the preceding lines we may conclude that Bhaskara Kavi must have been a contemporary of Sahini Marana. Moreover, Somarajeeya states that both Sahini Marana and Halakki Bhaskara were there in the court of the second Prataparudra who ruled Orugallu between 1295 and 1321. It may therefore be concluded that Bhaskara Kavi must have been alive round about that period, namely the later half of the thirteenth century and the first half of the fourteenth century. However, nothing is known about the life and other works of Bhaskara kavi.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Arudra, Samagra Andhra Sahityamu. Pingali Lakshmikantham, Andhra Sahitya Charitra, published by A.P. Sahitya Akademi (Hyderabad)., Venkatavadhani, Andhra Vangmaya Charitramu., Jan.S.

BHASKARA PANICKER P.T. (Malayalam, b. 1922) holds the degrees of B.Sc. and B.T. He is a native of Palghat District. From 1946-48 he was a high school teacher. In 1948 he threw himself into the Communist movement and became in time an underground activist of that party, for which he was arrested and imprisoned. After being released, he had a second spell of teaching, now in various schools; from 1954-57 he was president of the Malabar District Board. In 1958 he was appointed private secretary to the Education Minister, Kerala, and continued in the same capacity for about two years. After serving as a member of the Kerala State Public Service Commission for six years, he retired in 1965.

A prolific writer, he has been propagating scientific knowledge, secularism and a generally rational outlook as part of his cherished mission in life. His target is the child and the layman and he always has at his command, a style and vocabulary suitable for his purpose. His works include Sayansinte Kathakal, Sastraparichayam, Kuttikalude Phyics, Nakshatra Sastram, Grihantarayatra, Kuttikalude Marxism, Manushyan Chandranil.

His service as editor of the Encyclopaedia Viswavignana Kosham in nine parts is significant.

K.S.N.

BHASKARABHATTA BORIKAR (Marathi; early 14th century) was one of the early Mahanubhav poets who wrote longer poems, both narrative and discursive. He was from village Bori in Marathwada. He was an erudite scholar and a powerful speaker, the qualities which won for him many a verbal bout. The Smritisthala describes graphically how the whole village was enraptured by his discourses on the Bhagavata Purana. Of the two major works of Bhaskara the Shishupalavadha tells the story of the killing of Shishupala by Lord Krishna. It was written round 1313 though scholars like Aradhya Muralidharashastri regard it as belonging to the pre-Jnanesvara period. The poem contains 1087 verses in the ovi metre and is given to Krishna-bhakti. Baideva, the second Acharya of the Mahanubhav sect, is said to have expressed his opinion of this work in the words: "It is a nice piece, but not suitable for those who have renounced the world." What made him say this is the emphasis the poem lays on the secondary episode of Rukmini in love with Lord Krishna, giving scope for the expression of the amorous sentiment in which the poet Bhaskara excels. His poem obviously lacks in proportion when it covers the main story of the assassination of Shishupala by Krishna in about one–fourth of its total length. There is a certain charm, however, about this narrative which contains the playful arguments between Krishna and Rukmini. The poem is also full of poetical descriptions of nature which clearly show the influence of similar ornamentations in classical Sanskrit poetry. But the Mahanubhav sect to which Bhaskara belonged is renunciative in spirit and his present poem is certainly a misfit in its literature. He, therefore, corrected himself on hearing the opinion of Baideva and as if to compensate for the blemish wrote the Uddhavagita which condenses the 1300 and odd verses of the 11th skandha of the Bhagavata into 827 ovis. As the title shows, it is the Gita as told by Krishna to his devotee, Uddhava, and contains in a nutshell the ethical teachings of Chakradhara who was himself an incarnation of Lord Krishna according to the Mahanubhav belief. Compared with a similar work ot Ekanath (16th century), however, the Uddhavagita stands much lower in the scales of style and content. Yet it has the honour of being the first commentary in Marathi on the Bhagavata, or rather on a section of the Bhagavata. Bhaskara is also the author of a versified Pujavasara which describes the daily routine of Chakradhara, the founder of the Mahanubhav sect. He became the third Acharya of the sect and the credit of synthesising the philosophical sayings of Chakradhara and the ideas as expressed in his Llacharitra goes to him. He may not be a great poet, but he was not only the first commentator of the Bhagawata but also capable of writing in various modes–both on love and bhakti.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: V.B. Kolte, Bhaskarabhatta Borikar.

S.G.T.

BHASKARAN NAIR, K (Malayalam; b. 1913, d. 1982) was a critic better known for his scientific writings in Malayalam. He obtained a doctorate in Zoology from the University of Madras and was a teacher in Zoology for about twenty years at the University College, Trivandrum, where he later became Principal for some eight years from 1960. He was the Director of Collegiate Education in Kerala and in that capacity, was the ex-officio Secretary of the Kerala Sahitya Akademi. He stands for moral and aesthetic values in literature and feels that a writer should always aim at an enrichment of human personality. He does not believe in the dichotomy between science and spirituality and points out that a proper understanding of science and its methodology will only help man in his quest for spiritual values. His works include Kalayum Kalavum, Dhanyavadam, Samaskaralochanam, Adhunikasastram, Parinamam and others. He has also written two books on his travels in America and Germany and a few popular books for children.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: K.M. George (ed.), Pampatiram.

K.R.N.

BHASKARAN, P. (Malayalam; b. 1924) is a major poet of the progressive school. He could not complete his college education due to his involvement in political activities. Later he joined the Communist Party and went to jail. He was on the editorial staff of the party daily Desabhimani. He left active politics after some years and concentrated on cultural and literary activities. He edited the literary weekly Jayakeralam, joined All India Radio as a Staff Artist and entered the film world. He directed and composed songs for a number of Malayalam films, some of which have won official acclaim. Presently, he edits the weekly Dipika. He is the chairman of the Kerala Sangitanataka Akademi. One of his earlier poems 'Vayalar Garjikkunnu' (Vayalar Roars) which dealt with the workers' revolt under Communist leadership at Vayalar, a coastal village in Alleppey District in 1946, became immensely popular, and was banned by the then Government. The poet in Bhaskaran gradually got disillusioned with politics and consequently his later poems reflect his concern for human problems from a humanistic perspective. Basically he is romantic and the theme he selects and the style he adopts follow the romantic path. He has to his credit more than fifteen anthologies of his poems, the more important among them being Satrattil Oru Ratri (A night in the tavern), Mulkkiritam (The Crown of thorns), Orkkuka Vallappozhum (Remember me, once in a while), Ottakkampiyitta Tamburu (The single-stringed Tamburu), the last of which won the Kerala Sahitya Akademi award.

K.R.N.

BHASKARARAYA (Sanskrit) well known authority on Shrividyatantra and Mantrashastra, is the author of several commentaries and independent works, like Varivasyarahasya, a classic treatise on the secret of worship as elaborated in the Shakta Agamas. Saubhagyabhaskara is his commentary on the Lalitasahasranama, Saubhagyachandradaya, commentary on Saubhagyaratnakara of Vidyanandanatha, Guptavati commentary on Durgasaptashati, and Setubandha commentary on a portion of the Vamakeshvaratantra which is considered the supreme authority on the religion and philosophy of Shrividya. Bhaskararaya was the son of Gambhiraraya. The Mahratta ruler of Tanjur gifted him a village called Bhaskararajapuram. Most of his activities were in South India. He lived towards the close of the 17th century and the first half of the 18th century.

K.K.R.

BHASHYA (Sanskrit) is a genre of writing, denoting learned commentary on the text of a well-known work. Derived from the root bhash (bhasha vyaktayam vachi), to tell, to speak distinctly, also to describe, with the suffix-nyat in the instrumental sense, the word has the primary meaning of 'through which something is explicitly stated'. Unfortunately, we do not find any early use of the word in this sense. The word occurs in the Vajasaneyipratishakhya (I.19) in a different sense, viz., 'a work written in the common speech' (in contrast to one in the Vedic speech) or 'a secular work' (in contrast to revealed literature, i.e. a Vedic text). Most probably, this connotation has some etymological relation with 'bhasha' which meant till the time of Panini, the spoken Sanskrit. Since very early times, bhashya has been used to denote learned commentaries on original works of any branch of technical learning (shastra). Generally bhashyas were written on authoritative works to which has been accorded some sense of sanctity by the people. Almost every Vedic text or sutra work has got a bhashya written on it by a scholar of recognised merit.

The word bhashya' was used in the sense of a commentary as early as the Mahabharata, but it is interesting to note that it is not found in Valmiki's Ramayana though 'sutra', 'vritti' and 'sangraha' occur there.

The most venerable of all the bhashyas is one written by Patanjali (2nd century B.C.) to explain the Ashtadhyayi of Panini and the Vartikas thereupon by Katyayana also with a view to defending the former from the adverse criticism of the latter, at several places. The respect enjoyed by this bhashya, during the last two millennia can be understood from its universally accepted title Mahabhashya i.e. the Great Bhashya.

The Parasharapurana formulates the definition of a bhashya as: 'A commentary which explains the words of a sutra with words compatible with the text and also explains its own words is a bhashya.' This definition seems to be based on the very features of the Mahabhashya and is too narrow to cover innumerable Vedic texts and philosophical works. Haradatta, the commentator on the Kashika, presents a more rational definition: Bhashya is a work which solves the problems raised by adversaries, in respect of a text (akshepasamadhanaparo grantho bhashyam).

Among the celebrated bhashyas, mention may be made of Shabarasvamin's bhashya on the Mimamsasutra, Vatsyayana's bhashya on the Nyayasutra, Shankaracharya's bhashya on the Brahmasutra, (also of Ramanuja, Madhva, Vallabhacharya and Nimbarka on the same text), Vyasa's bhashya on the Yogasutra of Patanjali, and Sayanacharya's bhashyas on almost all the main Vedic Samhitas, Brahmanas, and Aranyakas.

S.M.

BHAT, VISHNU GOVIND (Kannada; b. 1923). Educated at Honnavar, Sangali, Poona and Kolhapur; an M.A. from Bombay University, he has published 9 collections of poems: Palayana (The Escape, 1946) Kavya Vedane (Poetry of Pain, 1951). Tuntana Padagalu (Verses of a mischief maker, 1951), Aranya Rodana (Cry in wilderness, 1957), Kishinde (Narrowed space, 1958), Jadimale (Torrential Rain, 1958), Murti (The icon 1964) and Atma Gita (Song of Myself, 1970).

V.G. Bhat has given his poetry an ironic edge to lash out at orthodox concepts. For example in a famous poem called Atma Shadane (Search for the Soul) he finds the soul, about which the ancients have talked so much, in the Kittel Dictionary, on page No. 153. That is very typical of V.G. Bhat. His conviction is that it is possible to live without submitting oneself to any ideology or religious faith. He has also published four collections of Prose Pieces. Sahyadri (Short stories and sketches, 1947) Pedda Nakathegalu (Stories of a fool, 1952), Buruki (the veil, 1947) and Uttara Kannada Jivana Chiragalu (sketches of life in North Kanara, 1948).

Su.N.

BHATI NARAYANA, SINHA (Rajasthani; b. 1930) occupies a very important place among modern Rajasthani poets. He began his poetic career with the publication of his first work of nature-poetry-Sanjha in 1954. His description of evening as a natural phenomenon seems to be influenced by the 'chayavadi' poetry then prevalent in Hindi. However, it carries much of local colour by the way of its own geographical peculiarities and cultural and romantic descriptions. In 1955, (2nd edition-the 1st edition is reported to have been published earlier) he attempted a translation of Kalidasa's Meghaduta which though it presents a fluent reading, does little justice to the original as a translation. It is strange that a poet not conversant with the language of the original should go in for a translation. It should better be termed as an adaptation. The net work in chronological order is Durgadas (1956), an appreciative poem in free verse in the praise of the Rajput hero, who had a successful strategic struggle with the Mughal emperor Aurangazeb. This small work is a fine piece of heroic poetry with traditional background. Paramavir (1963) comes next. It is composed in the 'Duha' metre (86 'Duhas' in all) as a posthumous eulogy on Major Saitansinha who lost his life at Gusula in Ladakh during the war with China in 1962. The title Paramvir of the book stands for the title given by the Government to the deceased Major. The composition falls in line with the bardic (Charana) writings traditionally being written in this very style. Olun (1964) is another work in 'Duha' (12 in all) describing the pangs of separation from the object of one's love and affection. This is altogether romantic in approach and tells of the emotions of a young beloved separated from her husband. Jivanadhana (life's wealth, 1965) is a collection of the poet's 25 poems on different topics. It has been possible to know the poet better by the wide range of thought-content, variety of subjects, various styles of expression and the suitability of a diction at his command, through these poems. Kalapa (lamentations, 1973) is an experiment in independent three-stanza poems (80 in all) which may serve as counterparts to the saintly 'padas' in the devotional poetry. As stated by the poet himself in the preface, these poems are inspired by the moral crisis of the age, and the frustrated, irrelevant and incoherent expressions of the younger poets in the name of art. Miran (1976) contains the story of the immortal saint-poetess told with a new approach and with ideas relevant to modern times. The poetess, completely dedicated to her spiritual lord as she was, is depicted here as expressing herself on social and economic problems. The poet has touched new poetic heights in this work. His latest work Barsan ra Digoda Dungara Langhiyan (on crossing the lofty mountains of age, 1980) is again a romantic poem (100 stanzas). Every stanza is independent and presents a picture of the bygone days of his personal life. The imageries are too intricate, as is usual with him. It carries a sexual appeal, too pronounced to be concealed artistically. Besides these creative works he has edited two prose works of 18th and 19th centuries—Marawada ra Paraganan ri Vigata by Munhata Nainasi in three parts (Jodhpur, 1968, 69, 74) and Maharaja Mansinha ri khyata (Jodhpur, 1979). He has been editing since 1956 a quarterly Journal, Parampara, published by the Rajasthani Sodh Sansthan, Copasani, Jodhpur of which he is the director-incharge. His doctoral thesis Dingala Gita Sahitya (Jaipur, 1971) contains all available information about the commemorative songs in Dingala. He has won awards from various literary institutions for his books such as Kalapa, Miran, etc. Barsan ra Digoda Dungara Langhiyan, got the Award in 1981 from the Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi.

Raw.S

BHATKHANDE, VISHNU NARAYAN (Marathi; b. 1860, d. 1936). Two Vishnus from Maharashtra ceaselessly struggled to bring about a renaissance in North Indian (Hindustani) music. One was Vishnu Digambar Paluskar and the other Pandit Vishnu Narayana Bhatkhande.

Vishnu Bhatkhande's father Narayanrao was a good player of the Swara Mandala instrument. Young Vishnu caught this spirit quite early in his life. Even as a boy he could very ably play Bansari, the Indian flute. But the father rightly insisted on his finishing his studies first. So he very earnestly started his academic studies and obtained B.A. and LL. B. degrees. Soon after that he passed the High Court pleader's examination and started practising law at the Bombay High-Court. Vishnu became a successful High Court pleader. Subsequently Bhatkhande became the trustee of the Sukhathankar's family estate and one of the two young Sukhathankar wards, Bhalchandra, a famous solicitor in his own right, became a trusted friend and associate of Bhatkhande and helped him in his attempts to publish books about Indian Music and arrange different music conferences. Bhatakhande lost his wife and the only child, a daughter, and became almost a recluse. Bhalchandra took him to his own residence, where he lived till his death.

The Gayana Uttejaka Mandali, founded by some Parsi enthusiasts of Indian music in 1870 played a very important role in Bhatkhande's musicological career. Quite at an earlier stage of his career, he was associated with this institute. He prefected his technique of Sitar playing and learnt the intricacies of vocal music while doing leg-work there. The actual rendering of the Ragas was strangely quite uniform in various traditional houses of Hindustani music called the Gharanas. But where its theory or shastra was concerned, i.e. where the rules of a systematic arrangement were concerned, the musicians differed considerably from each other. Bhatkhande critically studied these Sanskrit texts and soon perfected this classification of 'Ragas' into different 'Thatas' and composed his very prestigious work, Shrimal-Lakshya Sangitam, in Sanskrit slokas. He published it under the pseudonym of Chatura Pandit. After Sangita Ratnakara of the 13th century, scholars and students once again got another basic text-book in Sanskrit at the beginning of the 20th century (1909-10)

In 1912, Bhatkhande started a monthly publication called Lakshana-Gita-Sangraha. However only three numbers of this periodical were published. His famous work is Hindustani Sangita Paddhati. It consists of four volumes and 2500 pages. Vol. I. was published in 1909-10. Volume II, a more ambitious publication, was published in 1912-13. Volume III was published in 1915-16. The last and the largest volume, Vol. IV, with 1,120 pages was published in 1932. He has also edited about 30 works on musicology.

In 1912, Bhatkhande started the publication of a monthly series of booklets about Indian music. It was titled Raga-Malika. About 23 or 24 such numbers were published. By this time Bhatkhande had started a series of text books for the teaching of Hindustani music. This series was titled Kramika Pustaka Malika. This series was a successor to the Gita Malika. The Gita Malika was abandoned abruptly, for the simple reason that all that was being published in the Gita Malika was included in the new series of text books.

The Abhinava Ragamanjari and the Abhinava Tala-manjari were two other works, written by Bhatkhande. They were composed in Sanskrit. Besides these, a number of ancient and modern Sanskrit works were edited by him. Two English monographs form a part of the list of his published works. But it is his Hindustani Sangita Paddhati that is considered an epoch-making work. Its sheer magnitude and expanse is simply stupendous. The Paddhati is now universally accepted as a pioneer work and a perfect guide for serious students of Indian music. It was written in Marathi (as were so many other books of Bhatkhande). The author wanted to bring back to Marathi its legitimate pride of place in the realm of Indian music, which it enjoyed in the days of the Yadava rulers in the 13th century. Sangita Ratnakara was written under the patronage of the Yadava Kings of Maharashtra. Pandit's wishes were truly fulfilled when his Marathi works were also accepted as authoritative treatises on North Indian Music.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: S.N. Ratanjankar, Pandit Vishnu Narayan Bhatkhande (A biographical and appreciative book), the Maharashtra Govt.'s Press, Bombay., S.N. Ratanjankar, Pt. Bhatkhande (A biographical and critical study, English), National Book Trust, New Delhi.

N.G.J.

BHATT, BADRINATH (Hindi; b. 1881, d. 1932) was the son of Rameshwar Bhatt, a renowned Sanskrit scholar, and a resident of Gokulpura, Agra (U.P.). Badrinath Bhatt got his early education in Agra. Afterwards he learnt Sanskrit, Bengali, Urdu and English through his own efforts. During the last days of his life, he became a lecturer in the department of Hindi, Lucknow University. He wrote some poems also but he is better known for his dramatic works and essays. His literary personality was made up by the contemporary movements of social and national renaissance in India. Throughout his life he opposed the static conventions of 'ritivad' and aspired to strengthen the romantic trend that expressed the yearning for freedom of the individual. His poems written in new poetic forms started appearing in magazines by 1914. Instead of the traditional 'Savaiya' and 'Ghanakshari', he tried his hands with 'Lavani' and 'Kajari' metres of folk songs. In order to polish his prose, he wrote satirical essays like 'Sabha ki Sabhyata'. His essays 'Hamari Kavita ki Bhasha', 'Hamare Kavi aur Samalochak' present his attitude towards modernity. In the main field of his creative works. Badrinath can be regarded as a vital link between Bharatendu Harishchandra and Jaya Shankar 'Prasad'. He tried to find a new base for the Hindi drama but his work did not attract as much attention of the Hindi critic as it should have done. His drama Kuruwan Dahan (1912) represents the best form of effort which the Hindi drama was making in order to free itself from the ludicrous element of the Parsi theatre. This play is the Hindi adaptation of Sanskrit drama Venisamhar, yet it is more of an original writing than merely a translation from Sanskrit. He wrote two mythological plays Ban Charit (1921) and Tulsidas (1922). Inspired by national cultural awakening, he wrote two historical plays, viz. Durgavati (1925) and Chandragupta (1927). Bhatt did a great deal of work in the field of farce. Most popular of his farcical plays are Chungi ki Ummidwari (1919) Labad Dhondhon (1926) Vivah Vigyapan (1929). Contemporary problems are depicted here through the medium of humour and satire.

The impact of western dramatist Moliere is clearly discernible in these plays. Their main characteristic is the precision, poignancy and suggestiveness of the dialogues. The plot and characters are mutually complementary to each other. Thus the contribution of Badrinath Bhatt to the development of drama is very great, historically very important and artistically significant.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Dhirendra Verma, (ed) Hindi Sahitya Kosh, Part II, Gyan Mandai Ltd., Varanasi, 1963; Ramchandra Shukla, Hindi Sahitya ka Itihas, Nagari Pracharini Sabha, Varanasi, 13th edn.

K.P.

BHATT, BALKRISHNA (Hindi; b. 1844, d. 1914) was an author, journalist and one of the makers of modern Hindi prose. He was born at Allahabad in a Malviya family. His father was Beniprasad Bhatt, and mother Parvati Devi. While spending his childhood at his maternal grandparent's residence, he first learnt by heart one canto of Amarkosh and thereafter, another from Siddhant Kaumudi, the celebrated works of Sanskrit lexicography and grammar. Observing the increasing influence of the English language, his learned mother got him admitted 1860 to the Yamuna Mission School, where he studied upto the Entrance examination. In 1869, he was appointed a teacher at that very school but later, on account of a religious controversy, he resigned in 1874-75. He studied Sanskrit, Bengali, Persian and English at home. From 1885 to 1888 he acted as the Principal 'pandit' (teacher of Sanskrit) at the C.A.B. School. In 1889, he was appointed the principal teacher of Sanskrit at the Kayasth School and later, a Professor at the same school. In 1908, the Director of the Education Department demanded explanation regarding Bhatt's highly revolutionary speech at Allahabad against Tilak's imprisonment. Bhatt, a man of self-respect, handed over his resignation. From September, 1877 to February, 1910 Bhatt edited a monthly newspaper Hindi Pradip. The paper made a great contribution towards the development of Hindi language and literature as well as towards sustaining the flame of patriotism. From March, 1910 to November, 1913, he served at the Hindi Shabdasagar, dictionary department of the Nagari Pracharini Sabha at Varanasi.

Bhatt is also famous as the most competent essayist of the Bharatendu era. About 1,000 essays written by him were published in the Hindi Pradip, which cover social, religious, political, literary, psychological and other subjects.

His two complete novels are Nutan Brahmachari (1886) and Sau Ajan Ek Sujan (1890) in which the emphasis is on the development of character; They have also a didactic element. Bhatt was the next most prolific writer of plays after Bharatendu. Damayanti Swayamvar (1892-98) in 10 acts, is arranged in the Sanskrit dramatic style. Through the character of Damayanti the image of an ideal Indian woman has been presented.

Venusamhar or Prithucharitra (1909), with its theme based on pauranic tale of King Venu, is composed in 3 acts. In this play are depicted the agony of the subjects of King Venu, writhing under his oppressive rule, through the curse of a sage. The play aimed at inspiring patriotism and independence.

Nayi Roshni ka Vish (1884-85), dramatises the evil consequences of following the Western way of life.

The prose of Bhatt is compact and replete with undertones. He leaned towards the Tilak faction in his political ideology and was an ardent seeker of national identity. All his life he was a fighter, sometimes a lonely one against political and economic exploitation by the colonialist, against social evils and blind superstitions and against mental slavery to the west. He inspired a whole generation of journalists with idealism and the spirit of self-sacrifice. He died in penury, but was always held in great reverence.

FURTHER WORKS: England, Englandesvari aur Bharat Janani, (1878); Do Dur Desi, (1878); Ek Rogi aur Vaidya, (1879); Patit Pancham, (1888); Achar-Vidambana, (1899); and the following are some of his Historical and Pauranic plays. Brihannal, (1881); Sita Vanvas, (882); Michael Madhusudan Dutt, Devidatt Shukla (ed.); Bhatt Nibandhamala, Allahabad (1886).

*BIBLIOGRAPHY:*Madhukar Bhatt(ed.), Bhatt · Nibandhavali, Varanasi, (1947); Madhukar Bhatt, Balkrishna Bhatt, Personality and Works, Varanasi, (1972); Rajendraprasad Sharma, Father of Hindi prose, Balkrishna Bhatt, Agra (1958).

Shas. S.

BHATT, HARIHAR (Gujarati; b. 1895, d. 1978) was born in Vekaria in Saurashtra and educated at Savarkundala. After his graduation in Bhavnagar and Bombay, he started his career as a school teacher in Akola in Maharashtra. Soon he responded to Gandhiji's call of non-cooperation and resigned from the Government service. He then joined Satyagrah Ashram at Sabarmati as a teacher. He served as a Professor of Astrology in B.J. Institute of Learning and Research in Ahmedabad. He was the director of the Observatory at Ahmedabad.

Hridayrang is the only collection of his 21 poems published in 1934. His poem 'Ek ja de chingari, Mahanal' is highly celebrated in Gujarati literature. His poems are influenced by Gandhian ideology and exhibit his love for the poor and the down-trodden.

D.P.

BHATT, HARISHCHANDRA BHAGWATI SHANKAR (Gujarati; b. 1906, d. 1950) was a lyrical poet and a scholar of art, literature, history and culture. He was the first to introduce to Gujarati readers great European writers like Rilke, Baudelaire, Hungarian poet Brezina, Polish poet Vaicheh Banka etc. In his poems we find the impact of those poets in subject matter as well as style. He inspired the post-independence Gujarati poets to dive deep into contemporary European literature.

His three poetical works Saparnun Sakhya (Friendship while travelling, 1940), Kesudo Sonerun Ane Kojagri (Kesudo, Sonerun and Kojagri flowers, 1945) and Swapna Prayan (Travel in dreams, 1959) established him as a poet of repute of the second quarter of the twentieth century. His poetry is also influenced by Balvantrai Thakore, leading poet and critic of the twentieth century. Harishchandra's petry touches a wide range of subjects and his speciality is in the note of universalism in his poems. In lyrics, there are couplets, sonnets, songs, descriptive poems and devotional poems. His approach was aesthetic and hence his love for modernity did not make him averse to oriental classical literature. On the contrary we find in him a happy blending of the two.

C.S.

BHATT, MANISHANKAR RATNAJI, KANT (Gujarati; b. 1867, d. 1923), well-known as a poet, was born in a small village Chavand in Bhavnagar district. He matriculated in 1884 from Rajkot and graduated in 1888 with logic and moral philosophy as special subjects.

He took the career of a teacher at Surat in 1889 after his graduation. In the year 1890 he moved to Baroda to be a teacher of literature and joined Kalabhavan as Vice-Principal. Thereafter he was appointed the Principal of the training college at Baroda. He wrote Shikshanno Itihas (1895) during his stay at Baroda, before he left it in 1898 for Bhavnagar to join the education department of the state. He also served as a lecturer at Shamaldas college, Bhavnagar for a short while. At last he was appointed by the king of Bhavnagar state in his court, where be served till retirement.

He was converted to Christianity in 1898 after a long, conflict. The event of his apostasy was much discussed in the society and as a result he was boycotted from his caste. By and by he came out of the impact of the Christian thought and returned to Hinduism and accepted Arya Dharma again.

His main contribution to Gujarati literature is his poetry. He wrote his first poem in 1883. He was influenced both by Sanskrit and English literature. Milton, Burns, Wordsworth, Shelley, Byron, Keats, Tennyson and Browning were his favourite English poets. Purvalap (1923) is the only and posthumous collection of his poems. It is a landmark in the history of Gujarati poetry as it excels in emotion and expression, in thought and theme. His best and original contribution is in the form of Khandkavya of which he is an innovator too. Vasantivijay, Atijnan, Chakravakmithun are his best known khandkavyas. His mastery over metre, classical language, and apt use of rhythm lend external beauty to his poetry while his genuine emotion, mature thinking and profound vision are the internal beauty of his poetry. To go through his poems is an aesthetic experience. His faith in religion and in the supremacy of Destiny is the driving force of his poetry. Though one can experience Truth, Goodness and Beauty (Satyam, Sivam and Sundaram) in his poetry, it ends in pathos which is the extract of the experience of his life. His lyrics are marked with niceties of expression and emotional depth.

He has contributed to prose also. Dukhi Sansar (1915) and Be Natako (1924) reveal his dramatic talent. He has written some dialogues, which are published in Kalapi-Kantna Samvado. Kumar ane Gauri (1910) and Hiramanekni ek moti khan are marked with his creative prose. He edited two periodicals namely British ane Hindi Vikram (1914-1919) and The Heart of India (1915). All his original works as well as translations in prose bear testimony to his accomplishments in prose-writing.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Aniruddha Brahmbhatt, Bhragurai Anjaria, Kant Vishe., Manishankar Bhatt, 'Kant'; Ramanlal Joshi, Samanter; Sundaram, Arvachin Kavita.

D.P.

BHATT, NANABHAI (Gujarati; b. 1882, d. 1961). Though known as Nanabhai, his real name was Narsinghprasad Bhatt. He was an educationist. Dakshamurti at Bhavnagar and Gramdakshinamurti at Ambala represent his vision and educational philosophy. He was the editor of Chhatralaya (Student's hostel) and Kodiyun (Earthen lamp) monthlies and Dakshinamurti quarterly which he started to propagate his educational ideas and works done by his institutions to fulfil his vision. He was Education Minister of Saurastra and nominated member of the Rajya Sabha. In 1960 he was awarded the title of Padmashri in acknowledgement of his services in the field of education.

In his Ramayanna Patro (Characters of Ramayana, 1934 to 1944) and Mahabharatana Patro (Characters of Mahabharata) he has interpreted important characters of the epics, having analysed the working of the mind of those characters, sometimes through narration, sometimes through monologues and sometimes through dialogues and thus we find variety of styles. It is for the first time that characters of epics are interpreted and analysed. The books are specimens of beautiful prose.

In his Hindu Dharmani Akhyaikao (Tales from Hindu Religion, 1928-1933) he selected some of the tales from mythology and retold them having adopted narrative style of folk literature. In Shrimad Lok Bhagavata (1945) he has narrated the Bhagavata epic in folk style. Drastant Kathao (1947) is a selection of tales from mythology which have been told by way of illustration to explain the significance of religious and ethical conduct.

Ghadtar Ane Chantar (1954), his autobiography, comes next to Gandhiji's autobiography as regards his devotion to truth, honesty and humility. Some of his pen-pictures are very well drawn.

Gruhpatine (to the Hostel Superintendent, 1934); Kelavnini Pagdandi (1946) are collections of his articles on his educational philosophy and his experiments in the educational field.

Be Upnishado (two Upanishads), Bharatiya Sanskruti Shun Chhe (What is Indian culture?) and Pathariman Padyan Padyan (while lying in bed, all 1961) are his other well known books. The first book lucidly explains the contention of two Upanishadas, the second gives the reader a true idea of Indian culture and the third is a collection of his essays on religious thought.

Ma.S.

BHATT, UDAY SHANKAR (Hindi; b. 1898, d. 1969) was an eminent Hindi poet, playwright and novelist. While teaching at the National College, Lahore, Bhatt came in contact with the famous revolutionaries of Punjab such as Bhagat Singh, Sukhdev and Yashpal. After Independence, he joined All India Radio as a Producer.

His first poetic composition Takshashila was published in 1928 and was followed by many poetic works, of which prominent are Raka (Moonlit Night, poetic anthology, 1930), Visarjan (Renunciation, poetic anthology, 1931), Mansi (Narrative poetry, 1933), Amrit aur Vish (Nectar and Poison, 1944). These works were influenced by the 'chhayavadi' poetry of the time. Later, he published Vijaypath (Road to victory, 1950), Antar-Manthan (1960), subsequently renamed as Kaunteya Kanika (1961), Ityadi (1961), Mujh Mein Jo Shesh Hai (That which remains in me, 1965).

A prolific playwright, he wrote historical, mythological as well as social plays. His prominent historical plays are Vikramaditya (1929), Dahar Athava Sindh-patan (Dahar or Fall of Sindh, 1930), Muktidut (Messenger of Freedom, 1944), Shak-Vijaya (Shak Victory, 1948). His famous mythological plays are Vidrohini Amba (Rebellious Amba, 1931), Sagar-Vijay (Victory of Sagar, 1932) and Nahush-Nipat (Death of Nahush, 1961). Kamla (1935), Antahin Ant (Endless End, 1938), Naya Samaj (New Society, 1955) and Parvati (1958) are his other plays based on different social themes.

Bhatt's poetic talent found a suitable outlet in his Giti-Natya (lyrical play) e.g. Matsyagandha (1934), Vishvamitra (1935), Radha (1936) and Ashokvana Vandini (Captive in the Ashoka Forest). Besides, he wrote many one-act-plays. Some of his prominent collections are: Adim Yug (Primitive Age, 1935-36), Stri Ka Hriday (Woman's Heart, 1940), Samasya Ka Ant (End of the Problem, 1947), Kalidas (1948), Dhumashikha (1950) Andhakar Aur Prakash (Darkness and Light, 1952), Parde Ke Pichhe (Behind the Curtain, 1954), Aaj Ka Admi (Man of Today, 1959), Javani (Youth, 1959). In these one-Act plays, he touched upon various mythological, historical and social themes, revealing the fallacies of the age.

With the publication of his novel, Sagar, Lahren Aur Manushya, he shot into fame as a novelist also. This novel depicts vividly the life of fishermen of Varsova, a village of Bombay coast. His earlier novels Vah Jo Main Ne e Dekha (What I saw, 1940-45), renamed as Ek Nid Do Panchhi (One Nest and Two birds), Naye Mod New Turns, 1948) renamed as Dr. Shefali, Lok-Parlok (This world and the other one, 1955), Shesh-Asesh (About the life of the different sects of Sadhus, 1958) were also well received. Do Adhyaya (Two Chapters, 1962) is his later novel. He wrote many essays also, a collection of which was brought out under the title Sahitya Ke Svar (The Voices of Literature, 1961).

Bhatt's works bring out the conflict between the traditional and the modern values, which often turns from the outer to the inner one and shatters the character completely. Many of his heroines, though highly educated and economically independent, look to their husbands for sustenance.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Bankebihari Bhatnagar, Udayashankar Bhatt: Vyakti Aur Sahityakar (Delhi, 1965); Jayanath Nalin, Hindi Natakkar; Manorma Sharma, Natakkar Udayashankar Bhatt (Delhi, 1963); Nagendra, Adhunik Hindi Natak; Ramcharan Mahendra, Hindi Ekanki: Udbhav Aur Vikas.

Ran.R.

BHATT, VALLABHA (Gujarati; b. 1640, d. 1751) was a popular poet of Gujarati. He was a Brahmin of the Mevada sub-caste which as the name indicates, had migrated from the Mevada region of Rajasthan to Gujarat. Vallabha was born in a suburb of Ahmedabad and died at the ripe old age of 111. The name of his father was Haribhatta and that of his mother Phulakorabai. Vallabha was a devotee of Shakti or mother goddess and his name is remembered with respect along with his twin-brother, Dhola at the time of religious ceremonies in some of the ancient shrines of the goddess in Gujarat. Vallabha has composed a number of garabas or devotional songs to be sung while dancing in a circle. These garabas are mainly in the praise of the goddess and are recited or sung especially during Navaratri festival. They are full of ornate descriptions and supply valuable historical and cultural data. According to tradition, the Ananda-no garabo (garabo of joy) was composed by Vallabha in 1653 at the tender age of 13; some of his other garabas bear the date of 1710, 1714, 1723, 1734 and 1736 while the rest of his numerous compositions are undated. Vallabha has composed a large number of devotional lyrics in praise of the mother goddess.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Manjulal Majumdar, Vallabha Bhatta-ni Vani (Ahmedabad, 1962)., Ramanarayan V. Pathak, Nabhovihara (Ahmedabad, 1961).

B.J.

BHATTA, KILABHAI GHANASYAMA (Gujarati; b. 1868, d. 1914) was a Gujarati translator and scholar of Sanskrit literature. Though he had studied only upto matriculation and was working in a drab place like the police court in Bombay as an interpreter, Bhatta developed into an ardent student of Sanskrit language and literature. After the first flush of the Western impact had subsided, the writers of the day were attracted towards Sanskrit literature. As a result translations of many Sanskrit works were undertaken. Bhatta has to his credit translations of three Sanskrit works: Parvatiparinaya (1891), a play by Bana Bhatta; Vikramorvashiya (1898) and Meghaduta (1913), both by Kalidasa. Amongst the three, his translation of the Meghaduta is the best and the most popular.

Bhatta also wrote some poems in Gujarati, but they were never collected in the book form.

D.B.M.

BHATTA, MOTIRAM (Nepali; b. 1866, d. 1896) received his early education in Benaras where he studied Sanskrit and Persian and later English too. He founded there the Bharat Jiwan Press and brought out the literary periodical Gorkha Bharat Jiwan and published Nepali books including the Ramayana of Bhanubhakta. Motiram who became intimately friendly with Bharatendu Harishchandra was greatly inspired by the latter's example to work for the development of Nepali literature.

Kavi Bhanubhakta Acharyako Jiwan Charitra (Life of Poet Bhanubhakta Acharya), published in 1891, is his most valued work in prose. The book set the trend for biographical writing and critical evaluation.

His other important prose works include the plays Priyadarshika Natika Shakuntala, Padmavati and Vidya Sundar, all transcreations rather than translations.

At Benaras he led a group of literature-minded Nepali youth. They undertook writing poetry of the Samasyapurti type which consisted in composing verses each of which fittingly ended with a given verse-line or half-line so as to exhibit one's poetic virtuosity. Incidentally Shringar (eroticism), a trend that had been running vigorously since about 1850 and lasted for about seventy years, came to be, by and large, the subject-matter of such poetic exercises. Motiram was looked upon as the pacemaker of this mode of writing which culminated in Sukti-Sudha (1967) edited by Shyamjiprasad Sharma.

Motiram's more important poetic works are: Gajendra-Moksha, Prahlad Bhakti Katha, Usha Charitra, Manodweg Prawaha, Panchak Prapancha Ra Tijko Katha, Pik-dut, Bhramar Git and Kamal-Bhramar Samvad.

He was one of the earliest writers of ghazal in Nepali. His plays too are interspersed with ghazals.

The importance of Motiram Bhatta in Nepali literature can well be gauged from the fact that some critics have named the post-Bhanubhakta period coming down to the First World War as the Motiram Age.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Naradev Pandey, Kavivar Motiram Bhattako Jiwani, 1938., Rammani Risal, Nepali Kavya Ra Kavi, 1974.

B.R.

BHATTA TAUTA (Sanskrit) referred to as Tota and also with Bhatta as honorific title, was an eminent literary critic and an exalted Brahmin (Dvijavara). He is the author of the lost Kavyakautuka (poetic curiosity or delight) mostly in verses as available citations indicate. Abhinavagupta wrote a commentary (now lost), called Vivarana on Kavyakautuka. He was primarily known as Abhinavagupta's teacher (Guru/Upadhyaya) in dramaturgy, He exercised considerable influence on Abhinavagupta and through him on the final evolution of the theory of rasa (aesthetic experience). Abhinavabharati seems to be a summary of his oral exposition of the Natyashastra on his own admission, with occasional difference of opinion on certain issues.

Bhatta Tauta (950-1000) is credited with having propounded the following important views, inter alia, that–

(1) the aesthetic experience of the hero, the poet and the aesthete is essentially the same, (2) shanta rasa (experience of tranquillity) is the highest of all rasas and it leads on to spiritual emancipation, (3) aesthetic experience arises from poetry only when it is directly visualized through the mind's eye by the aesthete, (4) the nature of rasa is delight, and (5) when karuna (tragic) is not subservient to vipralambha (love of those in separation) it is possible to realize it in all beings.

Na.R.

BHATTA, VISVANATHA MAGANALALA (Gujarati; b. 1893, d. 1968) was a Gujarati literary critic. Having obtained his school education from Amareti, Saurashtra in 1920 he graduated from Shamaldas College, Bhavnagar. He gave up further study to join the civil disobedience movement. In 1924 he took to teaching in a school at Bharuch, Gujarat and devoted the rest of his life to teaching in various schools and colleges.

As a literary critic, Bhatta was more inclined towards the romantic school of criticism. He had a firm grasp over Western literary theory and tried to apply the same to some leading authors and works of Gujarati literature. While evaluating a work, he considered the total experience it offered to the reader, and did not lay undue emphasis on any one aspect of the work. He was quick to recognise merit, but was equally determined to point out flaws and failings of an artistic work.

Bhatta's critical articles are found in four of his works. They are: Sahitya Samiksha (1937), Vivechanamukura (1939), Nikasharekha (1945) and Puja ane Pariksha (1962). The articles contained in these four books include author studies, period studies, form studies, work studies and theoretical discussions. His articles may seem, at times, rather long drawn and discursive, but this is mainly due to his insistence on giving a total picture and that too with all the supporting evidence placed before the reader.

Sahityano Svadhyaya, Vol. I (1963) is neither a simple translation nor an entirely original work. It is based on Introduction to the Study of Literature by Hudson. Here he has tried to apply the principles of criticism propounded by Hudson to some Indian, particularly Gujarati, works. The task of applying principles derived from one set of literary works to another set much different from the former was not an easy one. The author has been able to achieve success to a certain degree in his task but unfortunately the second and concluding volume of this work was never published.

Vira Narmada (1933) is a biography cum-evaluation of Narmadashankara Dave, the pioneer of modern Gujarati literature. Bhatta has also edited selections of Narmadashankara's prose and poetry. His Nibandhamala is an authentic anthology of the Gujarati essays. He also has to his credit Paribhasika Sabdakosha (1930, rev. edn. 1968, by Raghuvira Candhari), a dictionary of technical terminology. He has also translated some short stories and novels by Bernard Shaw in Gujarat.

D.B.M.

BHATTAKALANKA (Kannada; 17th century), a Kannada grammarian, is one of the three grammarians who have written about old Kannada. He belongs to the 17th century whereas the other two, Nagavarma II and Kesiraja, belonged to the 12th and 13th centuries, respectively. Bhattakalanka was a Jain and he was a disciple of Akalankadeva belonging to Haduvalli (Sangitapura) situated in South Kanara. Bhattakalanka was proficient in Sanskrit, particularly in the field of Sanskrit grammar. He was also well acquainted with Prakrit and Magadhi. Although Nagavarma II and Kesiraja had written authoritative grammars in old Kannada, Bhattakalanka undertook to write another grammar as he felt that there was some contempt and callousness towards the capacity of Kannada language among the Sanskrit scholars of the day. One can infer this from Bhattakalanka's emphasis on the importance of Kannada and its rich literature comprising both poetic and technical works. Hence it seems he decided to write an exhaustive work on grammar dealing with the several aspects of Kannada language by following the pattern set by eminent Sanskrit grammarians. What Nagavarma had done in a limited way in his Karnataka Bhasabhusana, Bhattakalanka has achieved in a broader span.

Bhattakalanka's grammar known as Karnataka Sabdanusasanam consists of 592 sutras divided into four chapters called "padas". Each Sutra has a Vritti followed by a lengthy commentary. Some of the scholars are of the opinion that these sutras were written by another scholar prior to Bhattakalanka, and the credit of writing Vritti and commentary goes to Bhattakalanka. However, it is now generally accepted that Bhattakalanka is the sole author of the work and the apparent variations which are noted by the critics on the work are supposed to be due to the possible interval of time taken by the author to write them. Bhattakalanka has followed the Sanskrit grammarians more closely than the earlier Kannada grammarians. M.V. Sitaramaiah, who has made a comparative study of the old varieties of Kannada grammar, points out that Bhattakalanka has borrowed about 15 sutras from Kesiraja'as Sabdamanidarpana and just one or two sutras from Nagavaram's Karnataka Bhasabhusana. He has taken pains to show how profusely Bhattakalanka has borrowed sutras from Sakatayana, Panini, Saravarma, Pujyapada and a few other Sanskrit grammarians. Evidently Bhattakalanka is more indebted to Sanskrit grammarians than to Kannada grammarians. As a result of this, his grammar has grown in bulk and contains elaborate explanations in his commentary. The sutras are as crisp as Panini's sutras. The Vritti is just a note called Bhasamanjari which aims at the salient contents of the sutras. The commentary known as Manjari Makaranda is sufficiently lengthy and comprehensive.

The first 'pada' (chapter) consisting of 101 sutras deals with the technical words used in the grammar, alphabets of Kannada, signs pertaining to nouns and verbs, classification of numbers, indeclinables, etc. It is almost like an introduction to the whole work. The euphonic combinations are also included in this division. The second 'pada' which begins with Sutra 102 runs up to 290. This is devoted to the gender classification of nouns. Both the words borrowed from Sanskrit and the indigenous words belonging to Kannada are considered in detail. Among the borrowed words, 'Samasamaskrita' and 'tadbhavas' are dealt with separately. The case suffixes are treated exhaustively. Some of the other points which were just referred to in the previous chapter are explained in detail. The third 'pada' (Sutras 291-441) deals with the different kinds of compound words. The treatment of reduplication and the explanation of 'pluta' (the lengthening form of an alphabet extending beyond two matrās) is interesting. The secondary nominal bases with relevant suffixes are an important topic of this division. The fourth 'pada' (Sutras 442-592) is solely devoted to verbal roots and the formation of verbal nouns. A glance at the contents of these chapters reveals how Bhattakalanka has followed a different course from his predecessors in dividing the matter. As regards the examples quoted in the work from the Kannada poets, Bhattakalanka does not fulfil our expectations as Kesiraja does. His works apparently may look more like a grammar of Sanskrit than Kannada but this does not necessarily signify his lack of interst in the language of his native land. Being a profound scholar in Sanskrit, he has quoted a few examples from Sanskrit poets M.V. Sitaramaiah however justifies this paucity of examples in the work by pointing out attention to the fact that Bhattakalanka was more concerned with the form of words than with the lengthy quotations. He has also used some of the authentic Sanskrit statements in the commentary. On account of this Bhattakalanka's commentary has been recognised as a great monument to the grammarian's deep scholarship. Though Kesiraja was also confined to tradition, he had the inclination to point out the individuality of Kannada language whenever the occasion permitted him. As Bhattakalanka was too much occupied with Sanskrit grammar, he has missed this aspect, However, one has to admit unhesitatingly that his love and respect for Kannada language are in no way less than Kesiraja's. As a matter of fact, it is the main inspiring force which has guided him to undertake such a stupendous task which he has executed most creditably. The credit goes to Bhattakalanka who has placed Kannada grammar also on a par with Sanskrit.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: B.L. Rice, Karnataka Sabdanusasanam (1890); D. Padmanabha Sarma. Karnataka Sabdanusasanam, 1968; M.V. Sitaramaiah; Prachina Kannada Vyakarangalu (1979). R. Narasimhacharya. Bhattakalanka Deva Sabdanusasanam (1923); S.S. Basavana and Kundalagiri Acharya, Karnataka Sabdanusasana Prakasike (1941); V. Sitaramaiah, Vyakaranagalu (1977).

G.V.R.

BHATTANARAYANA (Sanskrit) is the author of the famous Sanskrit play Venisamhara, 'Braiding the Hair' (of Draupadi) in six Acts dealing with the story from the Mahabharata, and bears the title (Kavi) Mrigaraja (lion among poets). Sometimes he is called Nishanarayana because of a beautiful description of the night by him. No definite information about his personal life is available. Perhaps, he belonged to Shadilya family of Brahmins and followed Vaishnavism, probably its Pancharatra branch (tennets of which are alluded to in a verse of Venisamhara). He was first quoted by Vamana about 800 A.D. and must have flourished earlier than the 9th century, since Anandavardhan refers to him more than once. Usually identified with the Bhattanarayana, who, as the Bengal trandition records, migrated, with four other Brahmins, from Kanyakubja (Kanauj) to Bengal at the invitation of Adisura (the founder of Sena dynasty) and settled there, amassed much land and founded a small royalty (the famous Tagore family claims its descent from him). Another tradition makes him first a student of the famous Buddhist philosopher Dharmakirti, and then his opponent and co-author of Rupavatara.

Avantisundarikatha, ascribed to Dandin refers to him as an author of three works. Anthologies quote in his name many verses not found in Venisamhara. A little known version of the Purvapithika of Dandin's incomplete Dashakumaracharita is also written by some Bhattanarayana.

Venisamhara dramatises in six Acts some incidents from the Mahabharata, presumably leading to Bhima's avenging the famous insult of Draupadi and braiding her hair which she had kept loose since her insult to remind her husbands of it. The atmosphere throughout the play, therefore, is one of uncouth horror, grim pathos, rantings and declamations so natural to a story of primitive war. Author's imaginative power in evoking these feelings and excellent command over diction and metres are unquestionable. But "the plot is clumsily derived, the situations are often incongruous, the scenes are disconnectedly put together, and the incidents do not inevitably grow out of one another". The play opens with the indignanat Bhima impatiently awaiting the result of Krishna's mission for peace and elated at the news of its failure and at having an opportunity now to avenge Draupadi's insult. Duryodhana, in Act II, should go to congratulate the slayers of Abhimanyu, but tarries long in the company of his queen Bhanumati, counters many ill-omens, and tries to show bravado at the news of Arjuna's vow to kill Jayadratha. In Act III, Ashvatthaman, much grieved at his father's ignominous death at the hands of Dhrishtadyumna, would rout out the enemies by commanding the Kaurava armies, but the commandership is already promised to Karna. This sparks off a hot exchange of abuses resulting in Asvatthaman's vow to renounce arms, by which time, it is reported, Bhima has crushed and drunk the blood of Dushasana. Act IV contains an elaborate description of the valorous fight and fall of Vrishasena, the son of Karna whose final message spurs Duryodhana in Act V to move to the battle field, and to his death, in spite of his heavily injured condition and of insistent entreaties of Dhritarashtra, Gandhari and Vidura to reconcile. In Act V, after some misapprehensions, Bhima, besmeared beyond recognition with the blood of Duryodhana, first creates some consternation, then braids Draupadi's hair and completes the victory of Yudhisthira. The plot, it can be seen, has no conflict, no dramatic unity. Its construction is bad, Duryodhana is given much more footage, in fact, he occurs in Acts II to V, while Bhima occurs only in the remaining two, thus creating a serious imbalance in the play. Characterisation is, of course, vigorous. Bhima is a "wild, blood-thirsty and boastful bully"; Arjuna is his "worthy second in rant and fury". Duryodhana, the victim of the piece, shows bravado but is apprehensive and suspicious. But the meanness and jealousy of Karna, the offended anger of Asvatthaman, the duplicity of the weak Dhritarashtra, the bitterness of Draupadi are not properly developed. Many violent situations, offered by the epic-theme, but not sanctioned on the stage, are described in long narrative digressions in poetic but undramatic style. Bhattanarayana may not have a story sense of dramatic form and situation, but he has some graces of poetry, power of crude and furious descriptions, of impressive sonorous diction, of vivid depiction of detached scenes and situations, and of vigorous characterisation. The play is one of the earliest and best specimens of declamatory type of heroic plays. Very popular in traditional dramaturgy, it closely corresponds to dramaturgic rules.

R.N.

BHATTANAYAKA (Sanskrit), a vehement critic of the dhvani doctrine, was one of the most important interpreters of the rasa doctrine. His work named Hridayadarpana is not extant, and therefore his views on aesthetics have to be culled from quotations given by Abhinavagupta and others. From the criticisms on Bhattanayaka found in the Lochana, it is clear that Hridayadarpana was mainly intended to attack Anadavardhana's dhavani doctrine. Though he has an original interpretation of the rasa-sutra of Bharata, he does not seem to have commented on the Natyashastra. Bhattanayaka attacks Anandavardhana and is in turn attacked by Abhinavagupta; so he must have flourished towards the close of the 9th and the beginning of the 10th century. It is likely that he is identical with Bhattanayaka mentioned by Kalhana as having flourished in Kashmir under Shankaravarma, successor of Avantivarman (patron of Anandavardhana).

According to Abhinavagupta, Bhattanayaka attacked the earlier views on rasa-realization by Lollata and Shankuka; rasa cannot be produced as an effect, since the causes namely the vibhavas, etc., are unreal, it cannot be inferred that the hero does not really exist on the stage, and the unreal feelings cannot be a matter of inference. The potential feelings, if awakened, will have difference in degrees which is against the nature of rasa. Bhattanayaka rejects the theory of suggestion of rasa advocated by Anandavardhana. According to him, rasa realisation can be explained on the basis of the role of universalization or sadharanikarana in aesthetic experience. The spectator should not be conscious of any personal, private involvements while enjoying a piece of art; though actively participating in the situation, and not at all being indifferent to it, the spectator is so thoroughly absorbed in the emotional situation depicted and so fully immersed in the aesthetic experience to the exclusion of everything else, that he is not conscious of any personal considerations pertaining to himself. This sadharanikarana is brought about by a special function of poetry or drama which he calls bhavakatva or bhavana, a term taken from the Mimamsakas. Poetic language has three functions: (a) abhidha which gives the literal meaning, including the secondary figurative meaning, (b) bhavana which effects the universalization by the introduction of gunas and alamkaras in the case of poetry and through the four types of abhinaya in dramas. This has rasa as its object. (c) bhojakatva, the power of making the spectator enjoy the rasa revealed by the bhavanavyapara. Bhojakatva is not the appreciative activity of the reader or spectator, but the function of poetic language which attracts and grips the reader's attention and makes the passive reader enjoy the aesthetic charm. The nature of aesthetic experience is a sort of contemplation dissociated from all practical interests, and leading to a composure or calmness through the preponderance of the sattva-guna to the exclusion of rajas and tamas. This is comparable to Brahmasvada, and preferable to it, since it is easier to attain. Though Abhinavagupta discarded Bhattanayaka's views on bhavakatva and bhojakatva, he accepted the views of sadharanikarana, which he explained as part of his abhivyaktivada.

K.K.R.

BHATTASALI, NALINIKANTA (Bengali; b. 1888, d. 1947) was an eminent historian and archaeologist.

He passed the Entrance Examination of the Calcutta University in 1905 with a scholarship. Passing B.A. Examination in 1909, he obtained his M.A. degree in History from the same University in 1912. After serving as the Headmaster in a High School for some time Bhattasali got an appointment as a lecturer in History at the Victoria College, Comilla (now in Bangladesh). Even as a student Nalinikanta had made his mark as an historian and archaeologist by publishing articles on history and antiquities of ancient Bengal which drew the attention of many distinguished scholars including Sir Asutosh Mukherjee, the then Vice-chancellor of the Calcutta University. When in 1914, a museum was sponsored at Dacca under the auspices of the Government of Bengal, Bhattasali was appointed its curator at the behest of Sir Asutosh. The museum starting from scratch turned out to be one of the best museums of Bengal with rich and rare antiquities through the untiring efforts of Nalinikanta Bhattasali. He nurtured the institution with extreme devotion and died in harness in the very Museum building after serving it for 33 years. During this period, for sometime, he also worked as a lecturer in history in the Dacca University.

Bhattasali won the Griffith prize of the Calcutta University for his thesis on the Coins and Chronology of the Early Sultans of Bengal which was published by the Cambridge University in 1922. In 1934 he received Ph.D. degree of the Dacca University. His efforts in collecting coins, inscriptions and sculptures of ancient Bengal for the Dacca Museum and his own studies on them have provided the scholars with rich source material till then unavailable.

Bhattasali, besides publishing his studies in English, used to contribute to various Bengali periodicals. He was also adept in writing dramas, poems and short stories.

FURTHER WORKS: English: Catalogue of Coins in the Dacca Museum, (2 Vols, Dacca, 1936). Iconograph of Buddhistic and Brahmanical Sculptures in the Dacca Museum (Dacca, 1929). Bengali: Ramayana—Krittibas (Adikanda) (ed., Dacca University, 1939, Gopichandrer Sanyas (ed.), Dacca, 1926-27, Virvikrama (Drama), Dacca, 1915, Hasi O Ashru (Short stories), Dacca, 1916, Murkha Sattak, Dacca, 1943.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.B.M. Habibullah, (ed.) Samakalin. Vol. 15, No. 4, 1967. N.K. Bhattasali Commemoration Vol.

G.S

BHATTATHIRIPAD, M.P. (Malayalam; b. 1908) is popularly known as Premji. He was educated in the traditional way and achieved great scholarship in Sanskrit. Impressed by the revolutionary ideas of the period, he engaged himself in the movement for social reform along with V.T. Bhattathiripad and M.R. Bhattathiripad. Being interested in the Progressive Literary Movement he wrote many revolutionary poems and some political songs under the pen-name 'Premji'. He wanted to educate the Nambuthiri women and to lead them from the kitchen to the world outside. With this aim, he wrote the well known play Ritumati (Girl who has attained puberty), which took the society by storm. He wrote plays and presented them on stage, and also acted in other reat social dramas. This led him to the film world. He has appeared in many films in different roles. His other main works are Sapatni and Arute Aikya Keralam? (Whose united Kerala?), both short kavyas, and Premji Patunnu (Premji sings, 1968), a collection of short poems of commendable individuality.

K.V.R.

BHATTATHIRIPAD, M.R. (Malayalam; b. 1908) is popularly known as M.R.B. He was born in a Nambuthiri family not a very affluent one. He got nominal education in vedic scriptures and Sanskrit. Imbibing the spirit of the national movement he noticed the despicable conditions of his own society, particularly of the women. Women were the pathetic victims of orthodox beliefs and the social revolutionary in M.R.B. wanted to liberate them. He started his activities of social reform along with V.T. Bhattathiripad and M.P. Bhattathiripad. He himself married a widow, when widow marriage was considered to be taboo. He also worked enthusiastically in the Purogamana Sahitya Prasthanam (Progressive Literary Movement) also. To accelerate the social changes, he wrote two plays, Ente Omana (My Darling, 1927) and Marakkutakkullile Maha Narakam (Hell inside the Palm-leaf Umbrella, 1927) and they were well received. His short stories have been collected under the title Mazhavillu (Rainbow). Valkannati (1931) is his famous novel. His travelogues, particularly those dealing with his journeys and meetings with the eminent poets and other literary men of Kerala, are highly poetic and they remain a class by themselves. Mukhachayakal (Facial Features, 1954), Mula Pottiya Vittukal (Sprouted Seeds 1956), Kinaviloru Yatra (A Journey in Dream), Kavi Saparya (Worship of Poets, 1962), Tamarajitalukal (Petals of Lotus, 1967) and Ilakal Puvukal (Leaves and Flowers, 1969) are collections of these travelogues. Valappottukal (Pieces of Bangles, 1968) contains stray poetic thoughts and sparkling comments on life.

K.V.R.

BHATTATHIRIPAD, V.T. (Malayalam; b. 1896, d. 1982) was perhaps the greatest modern social revolutionary and man of letters who successfully led a reconstruction of the Nambuthiri community. He was born in Mezhathur in a poor Nambuthiri family which could not provide him with the goods of modern education. Soon after being initiated into the Vedas, he was constrained to work as a temple priest for some time. Before long he joined first the Yogakshema Sabha, an organisation meant for the uplift of Nambuthiris, and then the freedom struggle. But he severed himself from politics which had disillusioned him and applied his heart and soul to the movement for social reforms. Nambuthiri women had long been smarting under the age-long, evil social customs such as the purdah system. Young girls were often married to old widowers and widow re-marriage was a taboo. V.T. Bhattathiripad set his face against all this, and led the way by marrying from another community and giving his widowed sister-in-law to M.R. Bhattathiripad, who was himself a reformer and litterateur. He called upon women to come out of the kitchen, throwing away their customary umbrella, and published a pamphlet exhorting his fellowmen to burn down temples which had become the citadels of orthodoxy. All this raised many an eyebrow and he was declared an outcaste. Undaunted, he went on fighting, contributing inflammatory articles to Unni Nambuthiri, a magazine started in 1927, and staging throughout Kerala, his own revolutionary play, whose title meant 'From the kitchen to the stage'. Udbuddha Kerala, started in 1937 under his editorship, also served to carry his message far and wide by bringing out his heterodox views through short stories and articles of a highly finished form.

Rajanirangam (short stories, 1928), Atukalayil ninnu arangattekku (1930), Pomvazhi (short stories, 1946), Vetivattam (Essays, 1970), Kannirum Kinavum. are some of his major works. The last one is a moving autobiography which has won wide admiration.

The last few years of his life which Bhattathiripad quietly spent in his native village produced the impression of a volcano being at rest after a furious eruption. The degeneration which he saw setting in the social, political and cultural atmosphere of the country saddened him to the core. The age of great men, he said, was over and the morale of public men was entirely lost; caste, money and power were of primary value once more.

K.S.N.

BHATTACHARYA, ASUTOSH (Bengali; b. 1909, d. 1984) was an eminent Bengali scholar. He received his M.A. and Ph.D. degrees from Dacca University. After serving the Dacca University for a decade, he joined the Anthropological Survey of India and worked directly under Verrier Elwin. From 1955 he taught in the University of Calcutta and retired in 1974 as Tagore

Professor of Bengali. A widely travelled man, he visited Europe, America and the Far East, delivering series of lectures on different aspects of traditional Indian culture. Bangla Mangal Kavyer Itihas (History of Bengali Mangal Kavya, 1939) is his magnum opus which is still considered to be an indispensable book for studying medieval Bangali literature. But his late achievements are in the field of folk-literature and folk-culture, and he is now an accepted authority on these subjects. He has published Banglar Lokasahitya (Folk literature of Bengal, in 6 Vols. 1954-72), Banglar Lokashruti (Folk songs of Bengal, in 5 Vols. 1961-66) and Banglar Lokanritya (Folk dances of Bengal in 2 Vols. 1976, 1982). He is the founder President of the Research Institute of Folk Culure.

FURTHER WORKS: Bibliography of Words (Calcutta, 1979).

A.R.

BHATTACHARYA, BAIKUNTHANATHA BHAGAVATA (Assamese; b. 1558, d. 1638) popularly known as Bhattadeva, is acknowledged as the father of Assamese prose. It was a very bold decision taken by him to use prose as a medium of literary expression when nobody could conceive of employing spoken language in religious writings discarding the accepted medium of verse. He belonged to an erudite Brahmin family of Kamrup district. His father's name was Chandra Bharati and his mother was Tara Devi. After finishing the traditional learning he approached Damodaradeva for religious initiation. Since the day of his initiation he became the most trusted disciple of Damodaradeva. It is narrated in the biographies of Damodaradeva that at the time of his departure from Kamrup to Cooch Behar at the bidding of King Parikshitnarayana, he requested Baikunthanatha to render the entire Bhagavatapurana into simple prose so that the common man could comprehend the meaning. In deference to the wish of his spiritual guide, Bhattadeva translated, rather summarised, bookwise and chapterwise (Skandhas and Adhyayas) the entire Bhagavata without deleting any chapter. For the purpose of giving expression to a highly philosophical and deeply devotional scripture he succeeded in moulding an elevated prose style on the basis of the language used in religious verses. The percentage of Sanskrit words in his prose is no doubt higher than the actual spoken words, but that could not be helped in rendering scriptures like the Gita and Bhagavata into the local language. After completing the Bhagavata he translated the Gita and Bhaktiratnavali into elegant prose. He also compiled a book of devotional verses in Sanskrit gleaned from the Upanishads, Puranas and Samhitas illustrating all the elements of Bhakti. This work, Bhakti-Viveka reveals extensive knowledge and erudition of Bhattadeva, from the vedic to the puranic literature. Bhattadeva succeeded Damodaradeva as the head of Patbausi satra at Barpeta and later established Vyasakuchi satra where he spent his last days. Some minor works like Saranamalika and Prasangamala are also ascribed to him.

S.S.

BHATTACHARYA, BHABANI (English, b. 1906) is a major Indo-Anglian novelist. He graduated with Honours from Patna University in 1921 and proceeded to England where he obtained the Ph.D. degree from the University of London in 1934. His first publication was The Golden Boat (Bombay, 1956), a translation of selected poems of Rabindranath Tagore. So Many Hungers, published in 1947, brought him instant recognition as the novel projected the elemental tragedy of the 1942 Bengal Famine. After a short stint in the Foreign Service, Bhattacharya became an Assistant Editor of The Illustrated Weekly of India, and was later associated with the Ministry of Education for some time. He received the New Zealand Universities Award in 1962, and the Sahitya Akademi Award for English in 1967. Widely travelled, he is at present visiting Professor in the University of Hawaii.

The stark realism of So Many Hungers gave place to a study of the confrontation of city and village in his second novel, Music for Mohini(1952). It is a battle between the forces of superstition and sophistication, the old and the new symbolised by Jayadev's mother and his wife, Mohini. He Who Rides a Tiger (1954) returns to the theme of the Bengal famine but the earlier wrath has given way to bitter satire, and the situations acquire farcical colour. Kalo the blacksmith, a victim of the famine, transforms himself with the help of a contrived 'miracle' into Mangal Adhikari, the Brahmin, and thus takes revenge on a society that had spurned his attempts to eke out an honest livelihood. A Goddess Named Gold (1960) is a triumph of symbolistic art. On the surface, it is a childish story with the child-like Mira caught between the business acumen of Seth Samsundarji and the sterling idealism of the wandering minstrel. But the real theme is the cancer of corruption, and the implied warning is that something should be done very soon to restore the moral health of the nation.

Shadow from Ladakh (1966) turns our attention to a major problem of free India: the issue between the Gandhian inheritance and Western technology and materialism. Bhaskar, a brilliant engineer trained in America, would like to acquire the land adjoining his steel plant, and this involves the taking over of Gandhigram, a community of Gandhians led by Satyajit. Meanwhile the Chinese invasion casts an immense shadow over India. Bhaskar's love for Sumita, his decision to expand the steel plant and Satyajit's hunger strike together create the novel's tension which is, however, resolved by the unilateral withdrawal of the Chinese. As for the problem of Gandhism vs modern industrialisation, Bhattacharya leaves it to the reader's individual judgement.

A Dream in Hawaii (1978), Bhattacharya's latest novel, takes the scene of action beyond India's borders to Hawaii. Spiritual and sex hungers criss-cross to produce an interesting novel, but there is a definite failure of inspiration. Bhattacharya depends overwhelmingly on the pot-boiler style of today and Swami Yogananda's journey into the self is smothered in irrelevances.

Taken as a whole, Bhattacharya's achievement as a novelist has had a purposeful thrust relevant to the India of today.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Dorothy M. Shimer, Bhabani Bhattacharya, Twayne, New York (1976); K.R. Chandrasekharan, Bhabani Bhattacharya, New Delhi (1974); K.R. Srinivasa Iyaengar, Indian Writing in English, 2nd edition, Bombay (1973).

P.N.

BHATTACHARYA, BIDHAYAK (Bengali; b. 1910), a well known Bengali dramatist, started his career as a clerk in a newspaper office. Later he entered the stage as a playwright during the thirties. He was also a sort of an actor and acted in some of his own plays. He was once popular with all classes of spectators patronising the professional stage of north Calcutta. Just as Girishchandra in his day understood what the public wanted from a dramatist, he also in his time was able to gauge the likes and dislikes of his theatrical patrons and shaped his dramas accordingly. But dramatic quality of a high order or, for that matter, literary worth of an enduring character was not to be found in his works. This accounted for his loss of popularity at a later date. He was awarded a gold medal by the Calcutta University in 1979, on the occasion of the centenary of the Star Theatre.

Of his plays Matir Ghar (Mud House, 1939), a work full of melodrama and sob-stuff and yet very catchy, is the most popular, while his Bish Bachhar Age (Twenty Years Before, Pitaputra (Father and Son, 1954), Kshuda (Hunger, 1957), Kannahasir Pala (A Drama of Tear and Laughter, 1960), etc. have different degrees of popularity to their credit. He is also the author of two novels, Sri Samiran Sen (1938) and Ogo Pushpadhanu (Oh, Cupid, 1940).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Ajitkumar Ghose, Bangla Nataker Itibritta, (Calcutta); Ashutosh Bhattacharya, Bangla Natya Sahityer Itihas, (Calcutta).

N.C.

BHATTACHARYA, BIDHUSEKHAR SHASTRI (Bengali; b. 1879, d. 1958) was born in the district of Maldah in West Bengal. An erudite Sanskrit scholar of the traditional school, he had his early education at Varanasi from where he passed the 'Shastri' examination.

He joined Vishva-Bharati, Shantiniketan as an Adhyapaka in Sanskrit, and finally held the Chair of the Adhyaksha, Vidya-Bhavan, the school of higher research founded by Rabindranath. At the instance of the poet, he devoted himself to the comparative study of the Vedic and Buddhistic scriptures and learnt, apart from English, Avesta, French, German, Tibetan and Chinese. It was he who paved the way for deciphering the now extinct valuable Sanskrit texts from the Tibetan translations.

Paliprakash Vyakarana, Yogachara Bhumishastra, (Vol. I) by Asanga, Bodhicharyavatara, Nagananda Nataka (along with Tibetan text), Gaudapadiya Agam Shastra, Ashoka Nirdeshita, Bauddha Pathavali, Chatuhshatak by Aryadeva (Vol. II), Madhyanta Vibhage Bhashya Tika (in collaboration with Professor Tucci), Mahayana Vinshak of Nagarjuna, Upanishat, Vivaha Mangal, Ishvarabhanga Karika by Kalyan Rakshit–were some of the eminent works edited or written by him.

The University of Calcutta, where he held the Asutosh Professorship of Sanskrit for a period, conferred upon him the honorary degree of D. Litt., while Vishva-Bharati also adorned him with their highest honour, the degree of Deshikottama.

B.D.

BHATTACHARYA, BIJAN (Bengali; b. 1917, d. 1976) was a playwright. He received his first inspiration from his father Kshirodbehari, a Shakespearean scholar and a connoisseur of art and music. His college education at Calcutta (1930-32) was cut short by his joining the Non-Cooperation Movement. Later he joined the Communist Party of India (1942). He was associated with the Leftist movement and wrote features and stories for their papers. One of the sponsors of the Anti-Fascist Writers Association and Progressive Writers Association, he also founded the Indian Peoples Theatre Association (1944).

IPTA was started with the staging of Bijan's epoch-making drama Nabanna which instilled a new life in Bengali dramatic literature. Instead of looking to the history and legends for subjects of the drama, he depended on his own experience gathered from the life and problem of the common people.

In 1948 Bijan left IPTA and went over to Bombay to write scripts for the film companies but came back in 1950 to start the Calcutta Theatre. In 1970 he formed another theatre unit, Kabach-Kundal.

He married Mahashweta Devi, a Bengali novelist with whom he shared the same political ideology.

Bijan Bhattacharya received honours from Sangit Natak Akademi, Calcutta University and West Bengal State Akademi.

Some of his dramas are Marachand (1946), Kalanka (1946) and Gotrantar (1960).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Ajit K. Ghosh, Bangla Nataker Itibritta, 5th edn 1970; Ashutosh Bhattacharya, Bangla Natyasahityer Itihas Vol. 2; Charitabhidhan, Supplementary Volume (Sahitya Samsad 1982).

B.D.

BHATTACHARYA, BIRENDRAKUMAR (Assamese; b. 1924) was born in Dina, a village near Jorhat, the headquarter town of Sibsagar district. His father, Shashinath Bhattacharya, served in a tea garden of upper Assam. Having passed the Matriculation examination from Jorhat Government High School in 1941 with competitive scholarship, he got himself admitted into the I.Sc. class of Cotton College wherefrom he passed the B.Sc. examination in 1945. Then he went to Calcutta for higher studies, but due to some difficulties he could not proceed further, instead he preferred to acquire knowledge of journalism by associating himself with some daily papers of Calcutta. Towards the beginning of fifties (1950-1951) he went to Ukhrul of Naga hills inhabited by Tankhul Nagas where he served as a school teacher for more than a year. Some of the characters of his Akademi-winning novel Iyaruingam are prototypes of a few personalities of the area.

He came back to Gauhati and assumed the editorship of the leading literary magazine Ramdhenu (Rainbow) in 1952. Under his editorship the magazine became very popular. In fact, Ramdhenu ushered in a new era of Assamese literature by introducing new trends in poetry and novel. The magazine continued under his editorship till the early years of the sixties. In 1964 he became the editor of Navayug (New Era), a weekly magazine-cum-newspaper which also became highly popular, especially with the younger generation of writers for introducing some new features. The magazine being a proprietorial concern, was wound up after a few years. Since then Bhattacharya has been working as a free-lance journalist and literateur. For the last few year, he has been working as a lecturer in the Department of Journalism, Gauhati University. In the meantime, he obtained his M.A. and Ph.D. degrees from Gauhati University.

Bhattacharya is a poet, a short story writer and above all a novelist of repute. He has also contributed some thought-provoking articles, both in English and Assamese in local papers as well as in magazines published outside Assam. His first novel Rajpathe Ringiyai (The Call of the Highway, 1958) predominated by his political views proved a failure as a piece of creative literature, but his next novel Ai (Mother, 1960), which shows the disintegration of village economy and the benign influence of a mother on the village folk, achieved considerable success. The next novel Iyaruingam, depicting the uneasy political and social conditions of the Naga hills immediately after independence fetched him the Akademi award in 1961. Since then he has brought out a series of novels, viz. Shataghni (1964), Mrityunjaya (1966), Pratipada (1971), Kabar Aru Phul (The Grave and the Flower, 1972), Ranga Megh (The Red Cloud, 1976) and Daini (The Female Spirit, 1980). Mrityunjaya, based on the August revolution of 1942, depicts the dare-devil patriotism of a few young men in their attempt to throw away the shackle of the British imperialism. It placed Bhattacharya in the fore-front of Indian novelists: the work was considered worthy of the Jnanpith award in 1979.

Two collections of short stories viz. Satshari (Necklace, 1967) and Kalang Ajio Bay (Still flows the River Kalang, 1961) established him as an efficient portrayer of fleeting as well as enduring passions and emotions of the people belonging to the lower middle class society and the exploited peasants and workers. Bhattacharya espouses an egalitarian society. Though a progressive writer in outlook, he is not an iconoclast. His literary personality exudes humanism, humanitarianism and equalitarianism. He is not in favour of totally discarding old values, rather he is in favour of a synthesis between the lasting old values and the newly emerging social and scientific values of life. Mahatma Gandhi, Jayaprakash Narayan, Rammanohar Lohia and Tolstoy are some of the personalities who exerted some influence in shaping his life. He has been the Vice-President of the Sanitya Akademi since 1983.

T.G.

BHATTACHARYA, HARIDAS SIDDHANTABAGISH (Bengali; b. 1876, d. 1961), a noted writer, was born in the village of Unashia in Faridpur district (East Bengal). He learnt Sanskrit in a Chatushpathi and after passing the 'Upadhi' Examination in Kavya, Vyakarana and Smriti, he became a teacher of a Chatushpathi. He wrote a book named Smritichintamani, which deals with important aspects of the Smriti-shastra. Besides this, he wrote a book on rhetoric named Kavyakaumudi and a number of Sanskrit poems and dramas. But his best and the most popular work is the Bengali translation of the Mahabharata with his own commentary in Sanskrit which was completed in one hundred and fifty nine volumes. The West Bengal Government awarded the Rabindra Prize to him in 1961. He became the Vice-President of the Bangiya Sahitya Parishad for one term.

Su.M.

BHATTACHARYA, HIREN (Assamese; b. 1932) is one of the most prominent of the Assamese poets, belonging to the new generation of the anti-romantic modern poets of the post-independence period. Since the sixties he has started writing poetry in various journals, but his poetry appeared in book form only in the seventies. To him poetry is not a pastime or an imitative intellectual exercise but his whole being. Significant feature of his poetry is a deep sense of humanism, pure and simple. Going beyond time and space he feels one with all revolutionary souls of the world. Besides patriotism and revolutionary philosophy, he has taken the theme of love for many of his poems which are simple in expression, although deep in the exploration of emotions.

Unlike that of other poets, the verse-style of Hiren Bhattacharya is inimitable. There is a lyrical flow pervading all his poetry. An apt use of indigenous words and condensed thought and lucidity of expression with appropriate metaphors and exciting emotions constitute his superb verse-style. A fine sense of rhythm and the lyrical flow places his poetry in the neighbourhood of songs.

The poet, who is still busy producing poetry, has published so far four books of poetry and two books of songs. And some of his songs have been broadcast through the All India Radio, Gauhati. His books of poetry are: Mor Desh Mor Premar Kavita (My Country, My Love Poems, 1972), Bivinna Dinar Kavita (Poems of Different Days, 1974), Kavitar Roand (The Sunshine of Poetry, 1976) and Sugandhi Pakhila (The Fragrant Butterfly). His books of songs are: Tomar Banhi (Your Lute) and Tomar Gan (Your Songs, 1976).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Satyendranath Sarma: Assamese Literature.

Pu.S.

BHATTACHARYA, JAGADISH (Bengali; b. 1912) was born in Maulavibazar in Sylhet district. Poet, professor, literary critic and editor, he took his M.A. in Modern Indian Languages (Bengali), Calcutta University. He is an eminent Professor of Bengali, specially of Tagore literature and taught in Bangabasi College, Calcutta where he became the Head of the Department of Bengali (1957-70) and Principal, College of Commerce (1970-78). He was also a member of the Senate and Academic Council of Calcutta University (1954-61) and has been the President, Bangiya Sahitya Parishad since 1983. He was appointed Hirankumar Basu Endowment Lecturer, Calcutta University in 1958, and awarded Sarojini Basu Medal for the best research work in Bengali Language and Literature in 1978, (Calcutta University). He was a recipient of Tarasankar Memorial Prize in 1972, Prantosh Ghatak Memorial Prize in 1975, Prasad Memorial Prize in 1982, Sisirkumar Prize of Amrit Bazar Patrika in 1983, Ramkumar Bhawalka Prize of Bharatiya Bhasha Parishad in 1980-81, and the title, 'Rabindra-Tattvacharya' from Tagore Research Institute, Calcutta, in 1984. He made his debut as a modern poet in Bengali with his book of verse Ashtadashi in 1933, followed in succession by Kshana-Shashvati (1942), Blackboard (1942), Ekti Alor Pakhi (1972), Premke Mrityuke (1975) and Lokayata (1976). One of the front-rank literary critics in post-war Bengali literature and one of the very few to apply new criticism, specially textual criticism, on major Bengali poets, like Michael Madhusudan Dutt and Rabindranath Tagore, his books on literary criticism include Rabindra-Kavya-Godhuli (1942), Soneter Aloke Madhusudan O Rabindranath (1958), Kavimanasi Vols I & II (1962-70), Rabindranath O Sajanikanta (1973), Bandemataram (1978), Rabindra-Kavya-Shatak (Volumes in progress I & II & III), etc. Besides editing the series of Shreshtha Galpa (best stories) by important writers of modern Bengali short stories and three volumes of stories of Tarasankar Bandyopadhyay, he is the founder-editor of a neat literary quarterly Kavi O Kavita being published since 1966. During the war-years he published many humorous and satirical poems under the pen-name 'College-Boy', but soon he switched over to literary criticism. His magnum opus Kavimanasi is a unique contribution to Tagore criticism which throws searching light on the multi-faceted genius of Tagore, revealing subtlety and psychological nuances in many of his writings, specially poems, which prudery and inhibition hitherto forbade critics to notice publicly. Another work which distinguishes him prominently is the literary quarterly Kavi O Kavita which since 1966 has set up a model of fairness, frankness and nonpartisan outlook in literary journalism. As President of Bangiya Sahitya Parishad, he has initiated a new phase in the life of this great research centre and raised it to the stature of an institution of national importance.

Ja.C

BHATTACHARYA, JATINDRAMOHAN (Bengali; b. 1908). A reputed scholar in Bengali, Assamese and Sanskrit, he hails from the village Singerkach in the district of Sylhet (now in Bangladesh). His father Jaminikanta was a Mirashdar (a type of landowner), his mother was Mokshada Devi whom he lost at the age of one. Jatindramohan's early education was in the village pathshala. He matriculated from Shillong Govt. High School (1925) and graduated from Murarichand College, Sylhet (1929). He took his M.A. in Bengali with a first class from the University of Calcutta (1931). Jatindramohan worked as a Ramtanu Lahiri Research Assistant (1933-1941) and also as an Assistant Lecturer in Bengali in the University of Calcutta (1939-1941). Then he worked successively in Murarichand College, Sylhet (1941-1943), and Cotton College, Gauhati (1943-1964), where he became (1952-1964), the Head of Bengali Department. Then Jatindramohan joined the P.G. Bengali Department of Gauhati University as the Reader-Head in 1964 and worked in that capacity for six years (1964-1970) before he came down to Calcutta to serve Jadavpur University Bengali Department as a U.G.C. nominated retired teacher (1971-1974).

Jatindramohan has had a long career as a researcher and writer. He has published 26 titles and a few more are ready for the press.

He has edited a good number of Bengali and Assamese works. Among them the following may be specially mentioned: Manasa Mangal Kavya by Kettakadas Kshemananda (1943), Vaishnava Padavali by Gopal Thakur (1945), Purana Bodhaddipani, by Krishnachandra Shiromani (1947), Vaidyanath Mangal by Dwija Sundar (1951), Vaishnava Padavali by Raishekhar (in collaboration with Dwareshchandra Sharmacharya, 1955), Assam Buranji or History of Assam, by Holiram Dhakial Phukan (1962), Ramnavami Natak, (first Assamese social drama), by Gunaviram Baruah (1965).

He has collected and edited Banglar Vaishnava Bhavapanna Mussalman Kavi–a collection of songs by Vaishnavite Muslim poets of Bengal in 1949 for which he earned Khujasta Akhtar Banu Surawardy Gold Medal for 1947 from the University of Calcutta. Jatindramohan earned Griffith Memorial Prize for 1937 from the University of Calcutta for his thesis–The History of Bengali Lexicon, from 1743 to 1867 A.D., published by the University of Calcutta in 1970. He has also published a Descriptive Catalogue of the Bengali MSS kept in the Asiatic Society, Calcutta (1977) and a Catalogus Catalogrum of Bengali manuscripts, Volume I in 1978, which is a reference catalogue of about 40 thousand Bengali Manuscripts preserved throughout the world. He has also prepared a Catalogus Catalogrum of Assamese Manuscripts (now under print).

Jatindramohan has also been awarded Sarojini Basu Gold Medal for 1980 by the University of Calcutta for best research in Bengali language and literature. He was awarded D. Litt (Honoris causa) by the Rabindra Bharati University in 1985 in recognition of his life-long service to the cause of higher education and reseach in Modern Indian Languages.

Jatindramohan Bhattacharya has recently gifted his life-long collection of books and manuscripts to the National Council of Eduction, Jadavpur. In a fuction held on May 11, 1984, he handed over more than eight thousand manuscripts in Sanskrit, Bengali, Assamese, Hindi, Manipuri, Persian, Arabic and Sylhet Nagari, and more than 10 thousand volumes of printed books, and more than 12 hundred kinds of journals, along with many documents and letters. This valuable collection has been named Jatindramohan Sangrahashala to be used by researchers and scholars. Jatindramohan has donated a large sum of money from which one scholarship for research and one endowment lectureship have been created. This singular gift has come as a fitting finale to his life long service to the cause of researches in humanities.

A.M.

BHATTACHARYA, JATINDRAPRASAD. (Bengali; b. 1890, d. 1975) was a well-known Bengali poet. Though he wrote under the influence of Tagore, he was indebted more directly to the post-Tagoreans like Satyendranath Dutta and others from the Bharati group of writers. His books of verses include Marmagatha (1914), Ramdhanu (1926) and Hasir Halla. Jatindraprasad captured the Swadeshi mood of his age, like many of his contemporaries and called upon the youth of his country to sacrifice their precious life for the noble cause of independence of the motherland. Some of his poems are full of bantering remarks about our youth for their narrowness of outlook and incapacity to cope with the fast-changing nations of the world. He parodied some poems of Dwijendralal Ray, a fine writer of comic songs during the late 19th century. He was also known by his pen name 'Dildariya Sharma'.

U.M.

BHATTACHARYA, KAMALAKANTA (Assamese; b. 1853, d. 1936) was a senior person among the modern Assamese poets of the older generation who lived under the British rule. The poet who was engaged in the business of timber and elephant, was very patriotic at heart. He wrote a series of patriotic poems, giving vent to his fiery thoughts and feelings. An analysis of his poetry reveals three distinct characteristics–digging out from the grave of oblivion the glorious past of the nation, whipping on the slavish generation suffering from an inertia and inspiring the struggling nation with a radiant optimism towards the future. The proverbial expression–the pen is mightier than the sword—proved true in the poetry of Kamalakanta, and his pen was really mightier than the British bullet and bayonet. An overflow of powerful patriotic feeling took its own course, and there was, therefore, a lack of artistic care in the versification of his poetry. So in the age of romanticism when his contemporaries were primarily concerned with the finished verse-form and the flight of imagination, Kamalakanta was a definite exception.

Kamalakanta had a long poetic career. His books of poetry are : Chintanal (The Fire of Thought) (Part One, 1890), Chintanal (Part Two, 1922) and Chinta Taranga (Waves of Thought, 1933).

Kamalakanta, popularly known as 'Agnirishi' (Fiery Hermit) was also a powerful prose-writer of the time. His essays are deep in philosophical ideas, rich in patriotism and dignified with the apt use of Assamese idioms. A series of articles with the title Gutidivek Chintan Dhou that appeared in the magazine Bahi and a book entitled Kah Pantha (1934) testify to his philosophical depth and fine prose-style. A few prose works entitled Magnum Opus, Ashtabakra Samhita, etc. have been lost, and a few others Tupir Dokan, Kachari Jatir Buranji and Mor Manat Napara Katha have not yet been published.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Dimbeswar Neog, New Light on the History of Asamiya Literature (Gauhati, 1962); Maheswar Neog, Asamiya Sahityar Ruprekha (Gauhati, 1962).

Pu.S.

BHATTACHARYA, KAMALANANDA (Assamese; b. 1894, d. 1951) was an actor and playwright. Born in Nowgong, he plunged into the freedom struggle and gave up studies before graduation. Bhattacharya was intimately associated with the Nowgong Dramatic Club. He has to his credit four plays–Nagakowar (The Naga Prince, 1936), Avasan (The End, 1936), Chitrangada (1956) and Savitri (1956). Nagakowar is a historical play dealing with the life of the Ahom prince, Kansung, the son of a banished Ahom queen. Based on revenge motif, it is a long play with a large number of scenes of thrill and horror. There are as many as nineteen deaths and murders. But the language of the play has a poetic quality and this has helped to some extent in mitigating the horror. Bhattacharya's other plays deal with puranic anecdotes. Avasan deals with the death of Krishna and the end of Yadu dynasty. Chitrangada, a three-Act play deals with an episode of Arjun and Chitrangada. There is a tragic touch throughout the play. The poetic appeal which is present in all the plays of Kamalananda has done much in creating the tragic atmosphere.

S.B.

BHATTACHARYA, KRISHNAKAMAL (Bengali; b. 1843, d. 1932), son of Ramkamal Bhattacharya, taught in the Presidency College, Calcutta from 1860 to 1873. After passing the B.L. Examination, he became a lawyer of the Calcutta High Court and the Howrah Court. In 1884 he was appointed Tagore Law Professor at the Calcutta University. He served Ripon College from 1891 to 1903 as its Principal.

Krishnakamal was an atheist. He was an admirer of Comte's Positivism. He also had a remarkable literary talent and wrote two books, Durakankshar Britha Bhramana (1857) and Vichitravirya in Bengali, which became famous. He translated Paul and Virginia in Bengali under the title Paulabharjini. He was the compiler of Hindu-Shastra (Vol. IV) edited by Rameshchandra Dutt. He used to write in a lucid and charming style.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Bipinbehari Gupta, Puratana Prasanga (Vol. I) (Calcutta, 1913); Brajendranath Bandyopadhyay, Krishnakamal Bhattacharya (Sahitya-Sadhaka-Charitamala, Vol.II, Calcutta, 1956).

Su.M.

BHATTACHARYA, MANIKCHANDRA (Bengali; b. 1889, d. 1965) was once a very popular novelist and short-story writer who spent the major part of his life in Bihar. He belonged to the 'Bhagalpur group' of writers who were settled in Bhagalpur, Muzaffarpur and other parts of Bihar. This group may also be identified as the followers of Saratchandra Chatterjee who himself had spent some years at Bhagalpur. To this group belonged some powerful writers like Surendranath Ganguli, Anurupa Devi, Nirupama Devi and others. Manikchandra Bhattacharya also belonged to this school. Most of his writings appeared in Bharatbarsha, Bangavani and particularly in Manasi O Marmabani.

Besides his own writings, Manikchandra translated some stories of Tolstoy. Some of his short stories which deserve mention are : Marjana (Pardon), Niyati (Fate), Shankhari (Conch-bangle maker), etc. Most of his stories bear some moral, some having a touch of humour. He was very much conscious about plot-construction, particularly coup de grace, and wove his ideas into the fabric of his artistic vision. His anthologies of short-stories include Hasi O Ashru (1918), Kalo Bou (1923), Patharer Dam (1923), Premer Mulya (1924), Milan (1939), Badhu (1940), etc.

As in his short-stories, so also in his novels, he draws upon middle class sentiments. Among his novels most notable are: Chiraparadhin (1920), Apurna (1924), Ashrunirjhar (1925), Prashanta (1925), Adrishter Khela (1930), Svayamvara (1933), and Smritir Mulya (1934).

He cannot, however, claim any originality either in theme or style. In stories, he imitated Prabhatkumar Mukherjee. Saratchandra's novels were his model. Above all, as a writer he was conventional and moralistic. Since he had unshaken faith in traditional values of his society, he could never achieve modernity in his creation.

Yet he will be remembered for his life-long passion for Bengali Literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: S.K. Das, Bangla Chhotogalpa, 1963.

Pr. K

BHATTACHARYA, NARAYANCHANDRA (Bengali; b. d. 1927), novelist and short-story writer, was also known as Pandit Narayanchandra Vidyabhushan for translating Hemchandra's classical dictionary Chintamani in Bengali. But he was chiefly known as a writer of novels and short stories in which two genres he was most prolific. Deeply influenced by the novels of Bankimchandra and those of his disciple Damodar Mukherjee, the latter of whom he had adopted as his literary mentor, the Pandit turned out fictional pieces one after another in quick succession, possibly in an urge to make a living out of it. He had a very easy and facile style but his themes were, generally speaking, more or less of a traditional pattern although he was not averse to the idea of treating contemporary social problems in his works. But whether traditionally inclined or not, he was very popular with his readers because of his art of story-telling.

Of his scores of novels and short story collections the following titles deserve mention : Nababodhan (The New Awakening, an imaginative novel with a historical base, 1906), Manir Bar (Mani's Groom, 1917), Ghar Jamai (A Bridegroom living in his Father-in-law's House), Sukher Milan (A Happy Union), Uttaradhikari (The Inheritor), Tyajyaputra (The Disowned Son), Kathakunja (The Bower of Tales, etc. For two years (1906–08) he edited a monthly journal named Swadeshi.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Ashok Kundu, (ed.) Bangiya Sahityakosh, 11th Part, 1979, Calcutta; Samsad Bangali Charitabhidan, Calcutta.

N.C.

BHATTACHARYA, RAMESHWAR (Bengali) was an 18th century poet. He composed the finest piece of Shivayan, a long narrative poem in praise of Lord Shiva. The narratives of the domestic life of Shiva and his consort Parvati, figure in Mangal Kavyas composed in the 15th and 16th centuries. Shivayan, or Shivasankirtan or Shivamangala is the generic name of these poems in which Lord Shiva is presented in local colours. Separate narrative poems on Shiva were composed not earlier than the later part of the 17th century, e.g. Kavichandra's Shivayan, composed during the last quarter of the 17th century. Rameshwar completed his Shivayan in 1710-11 in which Lord Shiva is depicted as a member of a lower-middle class Bengali family and, as such, we get a very sympathetic picture of the poverty-stricken life of the comman man. In his work Rameshwar has used not only legends of Shiva known in Bengali, but has skillfully incorporated materials from Padmapurana, Bhagavatapurana, Nandikeshwar purana and Dharmapurana. The poverty of Shiva's family, his quarrels with his consort Gauri and his desperate attempts to mitigate the hardship have been described in a simple style meant to attract simple peasants and their families. One also finds an interesting account of the life of the poet, his relations and of the years of composition of this work. The biographical part of course follows contemporary tradition. A devout Sanskrit scholar and metaphysician, his vocabulary is rich and varied, marked by alliteration and use of short simple vernacular words, but remarkably free form vulgar and crude expressions. His style is certainly not as artistic as that of Bharatchandra but good taste and lucid expression gave him a special standing. Composed in 'payar', a simple metre, Rameshwar earlier had produced a Satyanarayan Panchali, a work which bears the characteristic features of oral literature. He had also proficiency in Sanskrit and Persian. Manuscripts regarding his times are to be found in the Ramakrishna Mission Library, Midnapore, West Bengal.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Gopal Haldar, Bangla Sahityer Ruplekha, (Calcutta, 1954); Priyanath Jana, Bangiya Jibankosh, Part-I, (Calcutta, 1975).

A.D.C.

BHATTACHARYA, SANJAY (Bengali; b. 1909, d. 1969), essentially a poet and a distinguished one at that, had his schooling and college education in his home town, Comilla, (now in Bangladesh) and did his M.A. from the Calcutta University in 1944. Founder–editor of the journal Purbasha which from a humble beginning in Comilla turned out in later years to be a first-rate literary magazine of Calcutta, drawing around it in the process many of the front-rank poets, novelists, short story writers and essayists of Bengal, even including Rabindranath as its contributor. He first attracted notice by his book of poems Sagar (The Sea, 1937). Some of his later-day poems received due admiration of Tagore. Besides being a poet and an able editor, Bhattacharya also wrote quite a number of novels more or less on an experimental basis, following the modern Western techniques of fiction-writing known as 'Stream of Consciousness' and 'Internal Monologues'. But these proved to be more in the nature of a novelty than real artistic creation.

His books of poems include, besides Sagar, Prithibi (The Earth, 1940), Sankalita (Collected Poems, 1942), Prachin Prachi (The Ancient East, 1948), Jaubanottar (Post-youth Poems, 1948), Aprem O Prem (Non-love and Love, 1952), Padavali (The Padas, 1953), Mahakavya (a symbolical dramatic poem, 1958), Uttar Panchash Post-fifty, 1963), etc.

Among the novels more prominent are : Maramati (The Waste Land, 1941), Britta (The Circle, 1942), Dinanta (The End of the Day, 1943), Kasmai-Devaya (To which God–?, 1944), Ratri (Night, 1955), Kallol (Ripples, Srishti (Creation, 1955), Smriti (Recollection, continution of Srishti, 1958), Mauchak (The Beehive, 1961), Mukhosh (The Mask, 1965), Prabesh-Prasthan (Entrance and Exit, 1965), etc. Of these Maramati is decidedly the best. He was also a critic of distinction, a historian and a prosodist.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Old files of Purbasha monthly and Chaturanga quarterly, Calcutta; Saroj Dutta, Sanjay Bhattacharyya, Calcutta, 1972.

N.C.

BHATTACHARYA, SUKANTA (Bengali; b. 1926, d. 1947) was a very promising Bengali poet of the post-Tagore period who died of consumption at an early age. Being a member of the Communist Party, he wrote poetry for the underdogs of the society depicting their continuous struggle against exploitation and injustice. His powerful poetry gets all the vigour from the struggling down-trodden and their hope of turning the capitalistic system into a new social order. His family environment was not very much in tune with his mental development and Sukanta had to go through all the sufferings of an Indian middle-class family during the war and famine of the forties.

Of course he was not the first poet to come out with the voice of revolution in Bengali poetry. In the late twenties and thirties Bengali poetry felt the impact of the Soviet Revolution, and poets like Tagore, Nazrul Islam, Premendra Mitra, Bishnu Dey, Samar Sen and Subhash Mukhopadhyaya felt for the masses and protested against colonial exploitation and torture. But it was Sukanta who picked up as the subjects of his poetry particular types of people of the labour class like a postal runner or some such common man. He was stunned to see his beloved mother-land torn and shattered under a foreign rule. Some of his poems in Chharpatra (1948), his first important collection, sparked off some brilliant imagery hitherto unknown to the reader of Bengali poetry and enthralled the hearts of the millions by their sincere out-bursts of feeling and robust imagination.

His first poem appeared in Shikha, a magazine for children, edited by Bijankumar Gangopadhyaya. His books of verses include Chharpatra (1948), Ghum Nei (1950), and Purbabhas (1950), Mithe Kare (1952). His other works include Abhijan (1946), and Hartal (1962). Abhijan includes two short poetic dramas Abhijan and Suryapranam. Gitiguchha is a collection of his songs which had a human message, a protest against suffering. All his writings were posthumously collected and published in book forms. He was the editor of the children section, Kishore Sabha, of Swadhinata, a daily newspaper, now defunct. Sukanta edited a volume of poetry entitled Akal on behalf of the Anti-fascist Writers and Artists Union. Some of his best-known poems were set to tune by Salil Choudhury, a noted composer, and were sung by Hemant-kumar Mukhopadhyay, a distinguished singer.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Anunoy Chattopadhyaya, Jibanshilpi Sukanta (Calcutta, 1979); Nikhil Pal, Sukanter Samajchetana (Calcutta, 1975).

U.M.

BHATTACHARYA, SURENDRAMOHAN (Bengali) was a prolific writer of varied interests who wrote in the first quarter of this century. A staunch believer in conservative Brahminical values, he had natural leanings towards the mysteries of rebirth, hypnotism, the yoga philosophy, esoteric experience and the like, and he instilled those elements into his stories, long and short, in such a manner that he amassed a popularity unrivalled in his time. Mainly an author of fictional prose, he produced some seventy volumes of novels and anthologies of stories, many of which were best sellers. From the last quarters of the 19th century he wielded a facile pen almost upto the middle of the present one, touching various serious topics like Janmantar Rahasya, Rasatattva O Shaktisadhana, Radha Krishna Tattva, Diksha O Sadhana, Preta-tattva, Brahmacharyya-Shiksha, Brahma Samhita O Bhaktivada, Dakini Vidya, Tirtharaj Brahmaputra and many others. And these themes conformed, to some extent, to the growth and development of many a plot in the fictional writings also: Chhinnamasta is a social story, Preta-Tarpan is a historical novel, Narakotsav and Satir Patipuja are entertaining stories. The titles themselves speak of the content and mood of the creative works. Others are mostly absorbing love stories contributing to varied Hindu ideals, moral or amorous. The author was no less interested in compiling scriptual texts leading to perform-ance of various Hindu rites.

Some of Surendramohan's more popular fictional works are Kanthahar (1888), Laharmala (1890), Kanak Pratima (1890), Surasundari (1891), Bhikarini (1900), Mayavini (1902), Prema-Unmadini (1902), Gopan Chum-ban (1903), Sonar Parijat (1906), etc.

Gop.R.

BHATTACHARYA, TRAILOKYA (Assamese; b. 1936) is a renowned short story writer and novelist of Assam. He had his primary and secondary education in local schools and obtained the B.A. degree from Anandaram Dhekial Phukan College, Nowgong in 1964. Bhattacharya studied philosphy for his M.A. in the University of Gauhati in 1966. Besides his mother tongue, he has working know-ledge of Bengali, Hindi, Sanskrit and English. He was acquainted with the major literary creations of the world even while he was a school student and tried to compose poems at that time. Later on he switched over to short story and wrote 'Doctor-babu' in his college magazine of 1962. Deep love for nature and country life dominated his creations up to 1965 in which year 'Shilalipi' (Inscription), a detective short story marking the second phase of his literary career was published in Navayug, a literary weekly edited by Birendrakumar Bhattacharya. Thence-forth he turned his attention to short stories based on history; and 'Maidam' (the grave), the first of the kind was published in Monideep, a monthly magazine edited by Nilmani Phukan in 1966. Bhattacharya's novelette Bud-dhadevar Mrityu (Death of Lord Buddha) based on the Chinese aggression of 1962 was published in Navayug. He was hailed by the reputed critics as a writer of distinction after the publication of the historical novel, Sanchipatar Puthi (Book of Sanchi Leaves) which won the first prize in the competition: 'In search of new writers' sponsored by Sahitya Prakash, Gauhati in 1973. Incidentally the book started the third phase of his literary career. This was followed by another historical novel Charaideo in 1978. Over and above these, more than hundred short stories of Trailokya Bhattacharya have been published in various magazines of Assam. Some of his articles on the burning questions of his native state amply reveal his keen interest in, and analytical approach to the problems. A few of his radio-dramas have been broadcast from All India Radio, Gauhati. Deep insight, subtle delineation of characters coupled with vivid and minute description of incidents are the marked features of his literary creations. With these attributes Bhattacharya has been able to establish his reputation in the genre of literary fiction at a very young age.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: S.N. Sarma, Asamiya Upanyasar Gatidhara (Gauhati, 1976).

Sat.B.

BHATTI (Sanskrit). The name Bhatti itself has posed a problem before the scholars who have put forth different views regarding the correct name of the poet. Some identify him with the poet Vatsabhatti who during the Gupta period composed the Mandasor inscription. This is refuted by Keith and others on the ground that the inscription has some grammatical flaws which cannot be attributed to Bhatti, who wrote his poem particularly to illustrate grammatical rules.

A tradition identifies Bhatti with Bhartrihari thinking Bhatti to be a prakritised form of Sanskrit Bhartri. He is also spoken of as a son or a half-brother of Bhartrihari. But this tradition also does not hold water as there is nothing except the name to justify such identifications.

S.K. De therefore rightly concludes that Bhatti cannot be identical with Vatsabhatti or with Bhartrihari (poet-grammarian).

Bhatti himself informs us at the end of this poem (xxii 35) that he composed his poem at Valabhi (modern Vala in Saurashtra) during the reign of King Shridharasena. Now it is difficult to ascertain a definite period of Bhatti from this reference as there ruled in Valabhi four kings-Dharasena by name, during the period from 495 to 641 A.D. Five brahmins having the name Bhatti have been referred to in the inscriptions as recipients of gifts by these Valabhi kings. Out of these five only one is an inhabitant of Valabhi. But as the name of his father is given as Bhattaguha, he cannot be identical with the author of Bhattikavya, whose father's name was Shridharasvami or Shrisvami. Bhatti the recipient of gift from King Dhruvasena, the third, the son of King Dharasena, cannot be our Bhatti as the former is spoken of as a son of Bappa. Bhagavanlal Indraji connects Bhatti with Dharasena, IV on the basis of the adjective 'narendra' used by Bhatti to his king who was a chakravarti. But as the word 'narendra' denotes only a king and not a sovereign king, this identification is not acceptable. Thus Bhatti's connection with Dharasena-I and IV is automatically ruled out. Consequently the Bhattikavya can be placed between the period of Dharasena-II (570-575 A.D.) and of Dharasena-III (620-628 A.D.) i.e. roughly between 570 to 625 A.D.

According to a belief Bhatti was a tutor of the princes of King Dharasena-II, and he wrote his poem to teach them grammar through the medium of poetry.

His Bhattikavya is a typical example of Shastrakavya and has been extensively used as a tool for learning Sanskrit grammar mainly alamkara because one of the main objects of his work is to arrange illustration for grammatical constructions. His kavya also provided a model for Puranic version of the Ramayana.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Bholashankar Vyas; Sanskrit Kavi Darshan. S.K., De, A History of Sanskrit Literature,.

Ar.J.

BHATTI, ABDUL RAUF (Sindhi; b. 1682, d. 1752) was a devout muslim poet of Sindh well known for his devotional songs termed as Mauluda and Madahu sung in praise of prophet Hazrat Muhammad. During his second visit in 1752 to Mecca the poet expired there.

Abdul Rauf's Mauluda songs are very popular throughout Sindh due to their variety of theme, poetic art of expression and melodious arrangement of words. He is the first poet who has not only composed a large number of Mauluda songs in Sindhi, but also in Persian metres. N.A. Baloch has compiled seventy seven Mauluda songs of Abdul Rauf Bhatti in a book entitled Mauluda (1961).

M.K.J.

BHATTIKAVYA (Sanskrit). The composition of the poet Bhatti, popularly called after him as Bhattikavya is a pioneering Shastrakavya. In the course of narrating the well known story of Rama it has introduced the grammatical especially Paninian forms, figures of speech, bio-lingual diction, and usage of roots and tenses in series. Themewise the poem is called also Ravanavadha, Ramakavya and Ramacharita.

The name of the poet is variously known as–Bhatti, Bhattasvamin, Bhartribrahmana, Svamisunu, etc. Some manuscripts of the kavya, as well as some commentators mention the author as Bhartrihari. On this basis earlier scholars, like Rudolf Roth and Otto Bohtlingk identified Bhatti with Bhartrihari, author of Vakyapadiya and Shatakatraya. The incorrectness of this view-point has been shown by later scholars, like K.T. Telang, Hoernle, A.B. Keith and R.C. Majumdar. Bhatti mentions in XX. 35 his patron Dharasena, who has been identified with Shridharasena II, the ruler of Valabhi in the late 6th century. There is similarity in expression and idea of two verses occurring in Bhamaha's Kavyalamkara (I.20) and Bhattikavya (XXII. 34) about the terseness of Shastra-kavyas requiring a commentary for its proper understanding, and thereby delighting only the high-browed critic. This fact, along with the less number of figures illustrated in the kavya would support the priority of the kavya to the above alamkara treatise.

The main subject of Bhatti was to write a poem for illustrating the rules of the Panini grammar. Besides grammar, he has also illustrated in the 10th canto 52 alamkaras (figures of speech) of sound and sense. His erudition is revealed through the 13th canto containing verses that can be explained by the rules of both Sanskrit and Prakrit (Bhasha-sama). Although essentially a Shastrakavya of the 6th century, the Bhattikavya is cast in the mould of the Mahakavya, as enunciated by Bhamaha and Dandin. Owing to its poetic merits it has been considered as one of the five chief Mahakavyas by literary critics.

In 1650 verses spread out in 22 cantos the Bhattikavya recounts the story of Valmikiramayana till the Yuddhakanda. Besides condensing the original story to suit his requirement Bhatti has introduced some new ideas in his narration like Dasharatha being depicted as a Shaivite.

The Bhattikavya has been a source of inspiration to poets like Bhattabhima, Hemachandra, Vasudeva and Halayudha who adopted new trends in illustrating grammatical sutras or dhatus (roots). Even later poets like Shri Harsha (author of Naishadha) who combined Shastric trend and poetic mode are indebted to Bhatti.

The work has been printed from Bombay, Benares, and Calcutta. There are more than 20 commentaries on the kavya, of which the Jayamangala is the oldest and best known. The well known Mallinatha has of course written a lucid commentary called Sarvapathina. There is a useful study on the Kavya by S.P. Narang (New Delhi-1969).

S.S.J.

BHAUBANDAKI (Marathi) is a historical drama by Krishnaji Prabhakar Khadilkar based on the feud in the Peshwa family in the 1770s when Raghunathrao Peshwa (Raghoba Dada), uncle of the ruling young weakling Narayanrao, made a bold bid for Peshwaship by having his nephew murdered. Twelve Maratha noblemen, known in history as Barbhai (Twelve-Comrades), came together and saved the Peshwa dynasty by proclaiming Savai Madhavrao, juvenile son of the murdered Narayanrao, as the successor. They were helped by Nana Phadnavis, the brain trust of Maratha rule, the general Sakharambapu and other leading noblemen.

Like mythological drama Kichak Vadha, Khadilkar. makes this play also a political allegory with a contemporary significance. The judge, Ram Shastri Prabhune, is the objective correlative of Lokmanya Tilak, who was then undergoing a six year transportation term in Mandalay prison in Burma. Through characters like Nana and other noblemen, the dramatist expounds effectively Tilak's political philosophy and his selfless, bold and dedicated service to the nation. Nana succeeds in consolidating the Peshwa rule by a regency council that seeks to bring order out of an almost certain threat of chaos. In its political objective the drama succeeds eminently. It shows the evils of political power being concentrated in the hands of one person or under an incompetent dynastic rule with the entire people in the state reduced to a state of abject dependence. The juvenile, lawful heir to the throne and the twelve noblemen (who could be called upholders of democratic rule) are honoured at the end of the drama, and it is on this optimistic note, which has a contemporary significance, that the drama ends.

In powerful character-sketches of the ambitious Raghoba dada and his scheming wife Anandibai (who remind us of Shakespeare's portrayal of Lord and Lady Macbeth, with the young indecisive Narayanrao being a faint copy of Hamlet) the dramatist explores the spiritual essence of towering personalities who use their talents for evil. They are set in vivid contrast to the nobility, statesmanship and sense of justice shown by Ramshastri Prabhune, Nana Phadnavis and Sakharambapu and others. The comic scenes with low buffoonery mar the seriousness of the main theme and almost prevent concentration on it. The play is an effective illustration of Khadilkar's dramatic power. Notwithstanding powerful competition of the musical stage, it succeeded in retaining its popularity as one of the most significant prose stage masterpieces.

A.K.B.

BHAUSAHEBANCHI BAKHAR (Marathi) is an old important narrative of the famous 'third Battle of Panipat' fought between the Marathas and Ahmedshah Abdali (1761). Bakhar is the derivative form of the Persian word 'Khabar'. Of the several available Bakhars in Marathi which are either narratives or brief histories, this is supposed to be the best in style and reads like a novel.

The exact date of writing and the authorship of this valuable narrative is bedevilled by controversy, with its half a dozen versions. But according to K.N. Sane who after a comparative study of all the versions prepared the final one, the narrative was written not long after the event, by one Krishnaji Shamrao, who witnessed it, as the detailed descriptions of the battle suggest.

The author's tilt towards some characters and favourable remarks about them indicate that he must have been connected in some way with the Scindia family either as a courtier, an official or a Vakil.

This great battle with a tremendous loss of men and material, proved catastrophic to the Marathas. The narrative is written in the form of a newsletter in reply to a query by someone not present and wanting to know about the rise of Najibuddhaula from the status of a simple solider servant to that of a nobleman–Nawab, and the fall of Bhausaheb. The narrative begins with Raghoba's last northern campaign, which caused a great financial loss (of 80 lakhs) to the Peshwa's exchequer, the last invasion of Abdali, for which not Raghoba but Bhausaheb is sent to fight and covers Dattaji Scindia's skirmishes with Abdali and the whole gamut of subsequent events which led to the final battle at Panipat.

The writer seems to be a knowledgeable person, intimately acquainted with political affairs, inner tensions and undercurrents, inside stories and relationships between various personalities who participated in that tragic drama. Except for a few minor errors, the writer's knowledge of contemporary history is thorough. His narration of Jayappa's treacherous murder by Rajputs at Kumbheri, Surajmal Jat's double-dealing, Najibuddaula's deceitful strategy in playing with Dattaji, siege of Shukratal, Dattaji's skirmishes with Abdali in Punjab ending with the battle at Delhi's Rajghat after the former's death, campaign undertaken by Bhau, Scindia-Holker feud, rivalry between Maratha Sardars, Bhau's vain efforts to woo Shuja to his side, his victories at Delhi and Kunjpura and the final battle, all are authentic on the whole. The graphic and lively descriptions of battles seem to be the writer's speciality. As such it could be called the first Marathi historical novel in a native form, written a century before the advent of its English variety.

The writer's portrayal of the key characters, like Bhau, Malharrao, Dattaji, Najib, Surajmal Jat, Shuja, Balwantrao and several others, is lively and realistic. Their dialogues in crisp and forceful language, writer's witticism and anecdotes with occasional superb touches, his interesting style of narration-all go to make it a forceful literary piece, without subtracting from its historical value.

I.S.

BHAVA (Sanskrit) literally means any state of mind or body. In literary and dramaturgic parlance, it refers to mental state, emotion, thus characterising the 'emotive world', as I.A. Richards puts it. It is causative of 'bhu' (to be) having two meanings: (i) to cause to be, (ii) to pervade, affect (like fragrance). Bharata says: '(In a play), that import which, brought in by a vibhava (determinant), is realised through anubhavas (consequents) in the form of verbal, physical and emotional acting, is termed Bhava. Since it causes the poet's internal import to be realised through all types of acting, it is called Bhava.' Thus mental states depicted in a poem or a drama are called Bhavas because they bring out the poetic import, cause rasa to be an accomplished fact as well as pervade the minds of the connoisseurs. In this way, Bhava relates itself to all the three stages of a literary composition: the poetic imagination, the poem and the connoisseur.

There are 49 Bhavas, according to Bharata, which include (i) 8 sthayibhavas (permanent mental states) (ii) 33 sancharibhavas (transitory mental states) and (iii) sattvaja or sattvikabhava (spontaneous manifestations of powerful feelings)

As to the relation of bhavas and rasas, some believe that they bring each other about, others that rasas give rise to various bhavas like a seed growing into a tree, flowers and fruits. Bharata disagrees. According to him bhavas cause rasas, sthayibhavas develop into rasas, sancharibhavas transitorily colour them and help them into being. Thus, bhavas develop into rasas.

Dhananjaya, as interpreted by Dhanika, defines bhava as that state of the connoisseur's mind which is pervaded by the joys and sorrows of the dramatis personae.

Abhinava reaffirms that bhavas, which are nothing but congenital impressions of experiences of previous births, are dispositional in nature and, therefore, exclude vibhavas and anubhavas which are gross and outward.

Under bhava, Mammata includes suggested sancharibhavas and the sthayibhava called rati (affection) when it is not for the beloved, but for a deity or a preceptor or a child, etc., Vishvanatha includes a sthayibhava developed imperfectly and therefore, not reaching the stage of rasa; some others (quoted by Jagannatha) include rasabhasa (semblance of rasa), i.e. improperly directed sthayibhavas (e.g. Ravana's entreaties to Sita).

Bhanumishra reveals originality of thinking. He redefines Bhava as psychic disturbance conducive to rasa (rasanukulo vikarah) and divides bhavas into internal and external, the former comprising of sthayibhavas and sancharibhavas, the latter of sattvikabhavas which we must admit, are both psychic as well as external.

Many rhetoricians, like Rudrata, Rudrabhata, Lollata, Bhoja, etc., consider the division of bhavas into sthayibhavas, etc., as artificial and untenable. If relishability is the charactristic of rasa, and if all bhavas possess that quality, all of them should be considered as potential rasas.

But Bhoja, after arguing that all bhavas can become rasas, reduces them again to the state of bhavas from the viewpoint of his novel theory of ahamkarashringara.

Everyone possesses a love of self or an Ego-consciousness. Atmarati or ahamkarashringara is the germinal stage, the substratum. This self-love exhibits itself as love for outward objects. When it comes into contact with them, it is born thousandfold into a world of bhavas, all enjoyable to man through the presence of ahamkara. It is at this stage that bhavas, nourished by sancharibhavas, reach the stage of rasa. Yet they are all bhavas in relation to the basic ahamkarashringara which is the only rasa par excellence. In the third and final stage called preman all the scattered bhavas synthesize once again in the basic ahamkara. In this state, every bhava is a kind of love (preman), a kind of love of atmabhiman-ahamkarashringra.

Ahamkara is the first bhava which developing into rasas (yet remaining as bhava in relation to ahamkar-ashringara) forms the middle, and preman the final stage of ahamkarashringara.

As a corollary of the above, Bhoja contends that bhavas arise from rasa; that each of them has five stages of development: janma (rising), anubandha (continuity), pravriddhi (full growth), samvritti (contraction) and anuv-ritti (after-state), that all the 49 bhavas can be called sattvika since they are born of sattvamanas (tranquil mind), that all the types of bhavas are interchangeable; that any bhava can become either rasa or sancharibhava as the situation requires; that, therefore, the distinction between them is only of degree, not of kind; and that, since man's activities in his state of practical life (vyava-haradasha) for achieving the four goals (purusharathas) are manifold, the resultant bhavas also must be manifold, not just 49 as Bharata contends. Interesting also is his distinction between rasa and bhava respectively as vakyar-thabhinaya and padartha, i.e. enactment of the import of the complete sentence (verbal structure of a play) and that of some words (a part of it)., the former being depicted in the principal dramatic forms the rupakas, the latter in minor forms the uparupakas.

To sum up: the three main aspects of Bhava are (i) the congenital instinct or vasana, that which causes something to become, i.e. bhavana, and the external manifestations of it, i.e. sattvikabhavas. Modern psycholo-gy would call them instincts or dispositions, emotions, and their physical expressions.

(2) a figure of speech, recognised by Rudrata and Bhoja, in which a second meaning is suggested, e.g. "O mother! how will the day pass like this? Shall I go and fetch something to eat?" Here, the woman's eagerness to go to meet her paramour can be perceived.

(3) according to Bharata, a kind of natural, effortless grace of damsels.

(4) according to Bhoja (a) first of the four stages in the development of love, the other three being bhavajan-ma, bhavanubandha, bhavaprakasha; (b) one of the 64 kinds of love (kama); (c) one of the twelve mana-arambhanubhavas, i.e. expression indicating psychic movements.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: R.C. Dwivedi (ed.) Principles of Literary Criticism in Sanskrit.

R.N.

BHAVABHUTI (Sanskrit) states in the prologues of his two plays that he was born in a Brahmin family, which belonged to the Taittiriya branch of Black-Yajurveda. Their gotra was Kashyapa and the family name Udum-bara. Fom the epithet charanaguravah used for the family it may be surmised that they conducted a Vedic school for instruction in the particular Vedic branch or they were teachers of that branch. The family was very devout, observed religious vows, performed soma sacrifices and maintained perpetually the five ritual fires. Vedic learning and pious disposition had won the family a position of great honour in the society.

In this family was born one Mahakavi who performed Vajapeya sacrifice. Bhavabhuti was his fifth descendant. His grandfather was Bhatta Gopala who was respected for his learning and pure conduct. Bhavabhuti's father Nila-kantha too was renowned for his holiness. Bhvabhuti's mother was Jatukarni.

Bhavabhuti has also been identified by some with Umbeka, a Mimamsa writer. His native place is Padma-puri, identified by some with Pavaya in Madhya Pradesh and by other with Padmapura in Maharashtra. He was patronised by Yashovarman, a king of Kannauj (725-752 A.D.) and he has been praised by another poet at Yashovarman's court, Vakpatiraja. So his dates are approximately the end of the 7th and the first half of the 8th century.

It appears that Bhavabhuti left his native place Padmapura and went to Padmavati in pursuit of his literary career and finally obtained an honoured place in the court of King Yashovarman. The migration may have been occasioned partially by the political conditions of the time. During the 7th and 8th centuries, Kashmir was ruled by Lalitaditya and Kanauj was the capital of an equally powerful ruler Yashovarman. But Vidarbha was under the sway of Nannaraja of Rashtrakuta family. These rulers were vassals first of Kalachuri kings of Mahishmati and later of Pulakeshin II of the Chalukyas of Badami. Padmavati or Padampavaya was under the rule of Naga kings of Bharashiva family. The absence of a sovereign rule in Vidarbha at this time may have led Bhavabhuti to leave his native place and seek his fortune at Padmavati which may have been a prosperous one before he went over to Kannauj.

The social conditions were favourable and encourag-ing to literature. King Yashovarman was himself partial to poetic and dramatic writing. Some of his miniature verses appear in Sanskrit Anthologies. He is the author of a play Ramabhyudaya, now lost. His court-poet Vakpatiraja composed an eulogistic poem in honour of the king and won the title Kaviraja. There must have been other literary works produced during this period. This explains why Bhavabhuti went over to Kanauj. The patronage of Yashovarman, as well as the handsome tribute Vakpatir-aja has paid to this senior contemporary of his, establish Bhavabhuti's poetic ability and literary renown. Even before royal recognition Bhavabhuti's plays were produced at the festival of Kalapriyanatha by a troupe of friendly actors. Incidentally, Kalapriyanatha is not Shiva Mahakala at Ujjayini or the Shivalinga Suvarnabindu situated at the junction of Madhumati and Para rivers; it is more plausible to accept Mirashi's hypothesis that the deity is Sun and Kalapriya is Kalpi, to the South of Yamuna.

A personal factor may also be considered. Bhavabhuti was born in an orthodox Brahmin family and was trained in Vedic studies, Vedanta, Samkhya and Yoga. The family must have expected him to carry on the ritual and scholarly traditions. Instead, Bhavabhuti chose a literary career and befriended professional actors who were regarded as low in society. The family must have resented this and criticised Bhavabhuti severely. The malicious critics alluded by him are most probably the members of his own family and the people of his native place. This is possibly yet another reason why the poet decided to leave his native place.

Bhavabhuti may have been an author of several works now lost. The Sanskrit Anthologies quote many verses as coming from Bhavabhuti which are not found in the available plays. Vakpatiraja speaks of Bhavabhuti's ocean-like writings which inspire narrative compositions. Chitsukhi says 'Bhavabhuti whose writings were regarded authoritative does not lose authority merely by his composition of nataka, natika and such other prose works'. In the Malatimadhava Bhavabhuti refers to his study of Vedas, Upanishads, Samkhya and Yoga; and his plays are full of allusions to different branches of science and learning. He mentions Jnananidhi, 'Treasure-house of knowledge', as the name of his guru and calls him Paramahamsa. All this implies Bhavabhuti's deep grounding in philosophy and scientific knowledge; it would not be surprising if Bhavabhuti had written Shastra works and many poetic and dramatic compositions. Unfortunately, all that has survived from his pen is his three dramas which, in chronological order, are: Mahaviracharita, Malatimadhava and Uttararamacharita.

In Mahaviracharita Bhavabhuti records the early life of Rama, impressed particularly by the heroic and the marvellous aspects of the achievements of his god-like hero. In Uttararamacharita, (his magnum opus), he treats Rama' later life but with a significant difference. Rama in this play is intensely human, prone to wrong judgement, but of super-human stature both in his silent suffering and in his profound love for his wife as well. Malatimadhava is a prakarana drama in ten acts with a social theme of young love struggling for fulfilment in the midst of opposition and obstacles. The realistic picture is painted in supernatural colours, however, and the intricate plot is steeped in romance and poetry.

In the absence of full biographical data one may only surmise about the personality of the poet from the allusions and ideas scattered in his works. Bhavabhuti seems to have imbibed deeply the traditional culture and knowledge of all the important branches of study, typifying an enlightened Brahmin of the day. Serious in temperament, possessed of a philosophical outlook, he takes life seriously, including his own vocation as a literary writer. Yet he appears to be very emotional and sensitive. His poetic excesses are a reflex of his emotional tensions. The misery of his life—people spreading bad word about him because he preferred dramatic career to the family tradition of shastric teaching and writing–his concern for the atrocious male behaviour towards innocent young women, the shock he feels at the tyranny of religion which prevents a pious shudra from practising penances, are all a measure of his sensitive nature, as they are of his unorthodox spirit rebelling against outmoded beliefs and social practices.

The atompshere of student life described in his plays may have a personal touch. Fun and enjoyment are permissible on holidays; but essentially it is a life of intellectural discipline, moral and professional training and education in values of life.

Bhavabhuti's description of the happiness of married life and of the joy a child brings may either be a personal glimpse or an ideal the poet cherished. The picture of ideal friendship and devotion that he paints suggest that Bhavabhuti may have been fortuante in this respect, though not in winning quick fame and material prosperity, which came to him rather late in life.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Anundoram Borooah, Bhavabhuti and his Place in Sanskrit Literature, Calcutta, 1878; Anyodhyaprasad Sinha: Bhavabhuti aur unki Natyakala (Hindi), Motilal Banarasidass, Delhi, 1969; Bhavabhuti: Sahitya Akademi; New Delhi, 1979; Gangasagar Ray, Mahakavi Bhavabhuti (Hindi), Chowkhamba Prakashan, Dharwar, 1963; R.G. Harshe, Observations on the Life and Works of Bhavabhuti (French), Eidtions Litteraires de France, 1938; V.V. Mirashi, Bhavabhuti, Motilal Banarasidass, Delhi, 1974.

G.K.B.

BHAVAI (Gujarati) is a Gujarati musical dance drama performed as a religious ritual to propitiate the mother-goddess. Gujarat has developed in Bhavai a very interesting, mobile and expressive form of folk-play covering a number of mythological, religious, historical and social themes predominantly portraying a society which lived in Gujarat in late mediaeval times. Much before this period a number of folk-plays known as 'Uparupakas' (musical dance-dramas) were staged and enjoyed by the people. The creative genius of mediaeval times must have utilised various elements from these prevailing dramatic forms to develop an indigenous folk drama, Bhavai.

Inspite of its prevalence throughout Gujarat the northern part is considered to be the home of Bhavai. This folk-play is enacted as a religious ritual by a number of castes, yet the professional players of Bhavai are 'Taragalas' belonging to a Brahmin subcaste which traces its origin to poet Asait, the founder of Bhavai.

Bhavai is a series of independent plays woven together. Each play is known as 'vesa' or 'swang'. Mahipatram Nilakanth, a well-known Gujarati litterateur, was the first to point out the merits and demerits of this folk-form in his publication Bhavai Sangraha, collection of vesas.

Bhavai is an open air performance with scanty stage props which requires the performers to acquire a high degree of proficiency in acting, music and dancing and also attain a skill in improvisation and extemporization. The effectiveness of the visual aspect of Bhavai is enhanced by adding spectacular scenes as well as jugglery and acrobatic feats. The vesas of Bhavai vary from simple incidents of a common man's life to the pompous life of a royal dignitary. This portrayal is effectively done with the help of appropriate lighting, costumes, make-up and performing talents of the players. In Bhavai the female roles are invariably played by males.

There is an abundance of music and dance in Bhavai. Bhavai players are good musicians. They take as a base a variety of classical tunes (Ragas) and beats (Talas) and composes 'Desis' which are light classical songs and tunes of popular appeal. Several musical instruments are played in Bhavai but its principal musical instrument is Bhungal, a long brass pipe of which a pair is always used. Dance is also an important feature of Bhavai. It bears the stamp of Kathak dance, but the performers do not stick to any classical dance-style. Their dancing is always made to suit their dramatic purpose.

Bhavai literature is mainly a floating oral tradition of plays rarely committed to writing. The language of Bhavai is Gujarati with its various dialects. Definite traces of Hindustani and Rajasthani languages are to be found in it.

Bhavaí as a literary form abounds in good prose and poetry. All the rasas (sentiments) are depicted but its predominating rasas are Sringara and Hasya. Bhavai is replete with humour both loud and subtle. It caricatures the crudities and oddities of human nature and through the medium of laughter hits effectively at the evils of the society. The mobile structure of Bhavai with its seventy-five or more 'vesas' becomes a mirror reflecting a panorama of social life.

S.R.D

BHAVAKAVYA (Marathi) is poetry of feeling and moods of the poet. It is a synonym of the word 'Lyric' in English. Its distinguishing characteristics are subjectivity, intensity of emotive experiences, spontaneity, musicality and brevity. It projects the poet's feelings about his experiences, his love for Nature, his inspired feelings about the creation of poetry itself and his desire to know the unknown. Being mainly personal in nature, it reflects his individuality and his attitude towards life.

Though Bhavakavya is the special feature of modern Marathi literature, it does not mean that it did not exist in the mediaeval Marathi literature. One does come across glimpses of poetic outburst of this nature in the poetry of saint-poets like Jnanadev, Muktabai, Namdev, Eknath, Tukaram and Shahirs like Honaji Bala, Ram Joshi and Padakars like Amritray, Madhvamuni, etc. The Abhangas like 'Evalese ropa laviyele dari, 'Tuja saguna mhanu ki nirguna re' by Jynanadev, 'Tati Ughada Jnaneshvara' by Muktabai, 'Malhar mehude gagani datale' by Namdev, 'Variyane Kundal hale' by Eknath, 'Karunashatakas' by Ramdas, 'Ghanashyam sundara' by Honaji Bala are illustrations of Bhavakavya of that period. However, these attempts were just unconscious, just a spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings. It must be admitted that the rise of Bhavakavya in Marathi, as a form of literature can be traced only to the tradition of Lyric-poetry in English. It came into vogue in 1885 and it has reached its century mark by now. Various attempts were made throughout the decades to find out a suitable nomenclature that would express the spirit of this imported form of poetry. Vinakavya, Vainik, Laghugit, Gitak, Muktak, Kavigita, Bhavagita, Gitakavya are those different nomenclatures. Out of all these, Gitakavya is the latest, but Bhavakavya still continues to be socially more acceptable.

Poet's experience is a salient feature of Bhavakavya. It can be subjected to a division into following categories: Pure Lyric, Song Lyric, Reflective Lyric, Complex Lyric.

In pure lyric (Shuddha bhavakavya) emotive experience is predominant. It is totally subjective and purposeless, containing a number of imageries and an intrinsic rhythm. It is uninterruptedly flowing and direct in its appeal.

In song lyric (Gitapradhan bhavakavya) external musicality is predominant. Because of the external musicality in it, rhythm, use of Yamaks and repetition of words are greatly emphasised in it. "A short poem which is song-like" is its apt description.

In reflective lyric (Chintanpar bhavakavya) are included compositions like Sonnets, Odes,, Elegies, Transcendental poetry (Gudhagunjanpar Kavya), etc. In this form of poetry thought is emotionalized.

In complex lyric (Sammishra bhavakavya) the complex experiences of a poet are picturized with complex imagery.

Subject-wise, in Bhavakavya feeling of love is one of the most coveted categories of experiences. Many subtle dimensions of this feeling like self-fulfilment, despair' desire, pangs, feeling of nearness, sacrifice, enjoyment, union and separation, etc. generate love lyrics. Right from Keshavsut (1885) till today hundreds of love poems have been composed almost by every poet, because feeling is fundamental and universal in its nature. It is felt differently by different people. Hence, this poetry projects this feeling in many different shades.

In Marathi, B.R. Tambe's love poems express his satisfactory marital life, those of Balakavi and Govindagraj (R.G. Gadkari) are always associated with frustration and despair, those of Anil (A.R. Deshpande) are full of satisfaction and are expressive of his tremendous faith in the strength of love in life, while those of Indira Sant are of a piercing nature, expressing pangs of separation from her beloved husband because of his death and so on.

Love-lyrics scale the heights of pure lyric when the poet has the capacity to transcend the limits of his personal feelings. However, if the poet remains tied down to his personal feelings, he succeeds in creating only a song lyric.

Love for nation, freedom, and revolution has also produced a number of lyrics in Marathi. Poems like 'Hatabhagini' by Vinayak, 'Kranticha Jaijayakar' by Kusumagraj, 'Turungachya Darat' by Yeshawant, etc, are a few illustrations of this species.

Love for God is depicted in the devotional poetry by B.R. Tambe and N.V. Tilak, etc.

Passion for Nature is another feature of Marathi Bhavakavya, prominent lyricists like N.V. Tilak, Balakavi, Anil, B.B. Borkar, Mangesh Padgaonkar, Indira Sant, N.D. Mahanor and many more. Lyrics expressing passion for Nature are of a varied and superb nature. Though many poets have written about Nature, it works as an inseparable entity with the above mentioned poets.

Poets like Keshavsut, Govindagraj, Anil, Kusumagraj, Vinda Karandikar, Narayan Surve, though essentially subjective in their expression, also bring into their poetry a lot of social content. Dalit poetry, in this respect, stands in a class by itself as far as it expresses the social content more than the individual emotions.

Poet-wise and period-wise, the span of a century of Bhavakavya in Marathi (1885-1985) can be put up into following compartments:-

i) Period of Keshavsut School of Poetry	1885 to 1920
ii) Ravikiran Mandal's period	1920 to 1940
iii) Period of Navakavya	1940 to 1965
iv) Period of Ajachi Kavita	1965 onwards.

In the period between 1885 to 1920 poets like Keshavsut, Tilak, Rendalkar, Balkavi, Govindagraj, Vinayak, Datta, Bee, etc. have written many lyrics in Marathi. Keshavsut brought up a total metamorphosis in Marathi poetry. He created a new vision in it. He wrote lyrics on many emotive experiences. The above mentioned poets had readily accepted his new outlook on poetry, called themselves the members of Keshavsut School of poetry and created their own lyrics. However, their individuality is observed in their poems.

The poet B.R. Tambe was endowed with special musical talent and aesthetic quality. His love poems, dramatic songs, divine poetry, poems for children are the illustrations of his individual contribution. Later B.B. Borkar and Mangesh Padgonkar wrote poems which have the same aesthetic tone.

In the period between 1920 and 1940, known as Ravikiran Mandal's period, Madhav Julian, Yashawant, Girish, and S.B. Ranade are the poets whose contribution to lyric composition is important. This period is called the period of stabilization and expansion of whatever was produced in the earlier period. However, it is a fact that it added some of the new forms and also introduced some new metrical devices in Bhavakavya.

The next period between 1940 and 1965 saw a remarkable change coming over the phase of Marathi Bhavakavya, with the rise of Navakavya initiated by B.S. Mardhekar. Complex experiences became the source of Navakavya. Mixed imagery, new diction and obscurity are its characteristics. Frustration, despair and mechanized modern life are delineated in it. This change was not welcomed initially by the common reader but proved to be the inevitable outcome of the forces of the time. The lyricists like Anil, Muktibodh, Kusumagraj, B.B. Borkar, P.S. Rege, Vasant Bapat, Mangesh Padgaonkar, Vinda Karandikar, Indira Sant, Padma Gole do not toe the line of Mardhekar. They express a desire to see light beyond darkness. They have their own place in Marathi Bhavakavya. The expression in the poetry of this period is mostly in blank or free verse (Mukta Chhanda).

The period from 1966 outwards is called the period of today's poetry–Ajachi Kavita. Dilip Chitre, Grace, N.D. Mahanor, Vasant Dahake, Arati Prabhu, Narayan Surve, Keshav Meshram, Daya Pawar, Namdev Dhasal etc. are some of the few representative poets of this period. Blank verse is replaced by free verse which divorces itself from external musicality in Marathi Bhavakavya. It is the intrinsic musicality which has a value for these poets. Poets from all the social strata have started writing poetry in this period and they have given rise to a new branch of Dalit Kavya (Poetry of the oppressed) in Marathi Bhavakavya. Revolt seems to be the cornerstone of this sort of Bhavakavya. It is an effervescence of pangs which these people have to undergo as members of a particular social stratum. Sincerity in expression and intensity of feelings are its distinguishing characteristics.

The horizon of Bhavakavya in Marathi is widening and it is trying to reach the depths of life.

M.J.

BHAVAPRITANAND (Maithali). Bhavapritanand Ojha was the Head Priest of Vaidyarath Temple at Deoghar in 1970. He was highly praised by the late Ramanath Jha as having introduced new types of lyric poetry, Jhoomari and Ghaira. A collection of his lyrics has been recently published.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Ramanath Jha Bhavaprita-Sangeet (Journal of Ganganath Jha Research Institute, 1969).

J.M.

BHAVE, PURUSHOTTAM BHASKAR (Marathi; b. 1910, d. 1980). was a versatile writer whose contribution to Marathi is quite significant. It includes collections of stories (twenty-six), novels (seventeen), plays (eight), collections of articles (twelve) and screen-plays (two). However, his popularity primarily rests on story-writing. Sawadhan and Adesh (periodicals) have projected him as a good journalist also. Pratham Purushi Ek Vachani (Part I) is his incomplete autobiography.

Bhave spent his childhood in Vidarbha, His father Bhaskar Hari Bhave was a physician. He was a strict disciplinarian. Young Purushottam lost his mother when he was just seven. Unfortunately, he could not live with his father. He was, therefore, brought up by his grandmother. He was educated at Hislop College and Law College of Nagpur.

Bhave was an astute worshipper of ancient Indian culture and tried to inculcate it through his logically and forcefully written articles. Similarly he was of the opinion that man and woman have inherent natural qualities independent of each other. Attraction between a man and a woman is a perennial source of love-stories. Bhave depicted many minute facets of love through his artistic literary creations. Taking into consideration his valuable contribution, he was elected President of the Akhil Bharatiya Marathi Sahitya Sammelan held in Poona in 1977.

FURTHER WORKS: Stories: Pahila Paus, Satarave Varsha, Bangla, Himani, Fulawa. Novels: Akulina, Warshav, Adicha Akshare, Mage Walun, Don Bhinti. Dramas: Vishakanya, Swamini, Maharani, Padmini.

A.R.A.

BHAVE, VINAYAK LAXMAN (Marathi; b. 1871, d. 1926) is the first historian of Marathi literature. His father was a lawyer by profession, but dabbled in salt-manufacture, and left a legacy of debt for his son, who inherited nothing else. Bhave was by nature an impulsive and an eccentric person. He was never much interested in formal education and was never a good student. But he acquired great erudition later on, on his own, when he got himself really interested in the study of old Marathi literature. He proved to be a successful businessman, applied himself to the business of salt-manufacture, defrayed all his father's debts and amassed quite a fortune for himself. Thenceforth, all his leisure was totally dedicated to the acquisition of old manuscripts. A shrewd businessman, he travelled extensively and wherever he went on business trips, he would look for and collect material for his proposed history of Marathi literature, which when completed came to be known as Maharashtra Saraswat. Saraswat took many years of hard work for its completion. It was published in 1919. Saraswat is still held in high esteem by the students and scholars of Marathi literature, and it is invariably referred to as a standard work of reference on the subject.

Bhave was not a mere historian. He was a very keen judge of literature and had a genuine feeling for whatever is good and lasting in literature. The historian has to be a critic as well, for without critical judgement history becomes a lifeless record of facts and figures. The secret of Saraswat's authority lies in its critical approach to literature. He was one of the first to solve the riddle of various indecipherable Mahanubhav scripts and his research work on Mahanubhav manuscripts helped promote the understanding of recondite elements in Mahanubhav thought and literature. His collection of old manuscripts was fabulous.

Bhave has also written a multi-volume biography of Napoleon, the very first one in Marathi. He was a stylist, and his style is direct and forceful, at once picturesque and chaste. Another of his claims to posterity is that he is well-known as the founder of Thane Marathi Granth-Sangrahalaya (1893), a valuable research library which is still flourishing. At his instance this institution sponsored a magazine Maharashtra Kavi in order to undertake the publication of the unpublished works of old Marathi poets. His history of Marathi literature, however, is his unique contribution.

M.M.

BHAVE, VINOBA (Marathi; b. 1895, d. 1982) was born at village Gagode, Dist. Kolaba, Maharashtra. He was the eldest among the four brothers and a sister. His father was a textile technologist at Baroda. His early education was carried out at his birth-place and his character was moulded mainly at the hands of his pious and affectionate mother who knew by heart various Abhangas or poetic compositions of the saints of Maharashtra. He joined third standard at a local School at Baroda. He passed his Matriculation examination in 1913 and joined Intermediate class of Baroda College which he soon left to study Vedas and Upanishadas at Varanasi. While at Varanasi he was attracted towards Gandhiji's ideas of fearless and non-violent resistance even unto death. He left his Sanskrit studies and joined Mahatmaji at Sabarmati Ashram in 1916. He took part in every menial activity from scavenging to cooking. While at Ashram he produced a text-book taking spinning as the handicraft. Gandhiji felt that the book was quite original in conception which would make scoffers realize that spinning is a handicraft par excellence which can be used effectively for basic education. He had revolutionised takli (spinning) and drawn upon its hitherto unknown possibilities. For perfect spinning probably he had no rival in entire India. He had dedicated himself to the service of lepers and the hand-book he wrote for the treatment of lepers received great attention. He had abolished every trace of untouchability from his heart. He believed in communal unity. He learned Arabic in order to study the Quran in the original. He was a multilingual man having mastered almost all the major languages of the world. When the Congress launched a campaign of individual Satyagraha under the guidance of Mahatma Gandhi, Vinoba was chosen to be the first Satyagrahi. Gandhiji believed that there was no substitute for Vinoba.

Gandhiji moved from Sabarmati to Wardha in 1921, where he started his 'Satyagraha Ashram' and Vinoba was in-charge of the Ashram. His knowledge of Hindu scriptures made a great impression on Gandhiji. He looked upon Vinoba both as his son as well as a Guru (Master). He rendered the Gita into Marathi (Gitai for Gita the mother-1932). His parallel verses in Marathi produce the haunting music of the original in an amazing degree and many hundred thousand copies of it have been sold. It has broken all the records of the sale in Marathi since its publication. During his incarceration in the Dhulia Jail in 1932 his discourses on the Gita every Sunday were recorded by Sane-Guruji. The book was named Gita Pravachane (1932), which has been translated in almost all the languages of India and remains second best seller after Gitai.

Vinoba is a fine essayist. This is proved by his collection of articles Madhukar (1936). His style is simple, direct, coupled with humour. His participation in the freedom struggle was quite fruitful to Marathi literature. His major works were written during his frequent tenures of imprisonments. While in Nagpur Jail he wrote an important book Swarjya Shastra (A Science of Politics, 1942) on the lines of Harold Laski's monumental work. Swatantrachi Pratidna Aani Ticha Artha (Pledge for Freedom and its Meaning, 1946) and Jivandristi (View of life —1946) are two important books that he wrote before independence.

After the passing away of Mahatmaji in 1948, Vinoba mainly confined himself to Pavnar Ashram near Wardha where he immersed himself in deep thinking and constructive work. He founded Sarvodaya Samaj, which resulted in Bhoodan movement. Books and pamphlets prepared from his speeches thrived. His deep study of the literature of Marathi saints resulted in collection of Bhajans of Jnandev, Namdev, Eknath, Tukaram and Ramdas, from 1947 to 1956. Introductions and discussions appended to these books have added splendour to the study of Saint literature of Marathi. His other important books are Krantadarshan (1951) Sinhavlokan (1953), Sarvodaya Vichar (1953), Diksha (1956), Gurubodha (1957).

FURTHER WORKS : Upanishadancha Abhyas (Study of Upanishadas 1955), Sahityikanshi Hitguja (Discourses with men of letters 1957), Gita-Chintanika (1958), Quransar, Bhagavatsar and Dhammapada (1958, 59), Samyasutre (1958), Vinobani Sangitalelya Gosti (Stories told by Vinoba, 5 parts 1967, 68) and Bhoodan Ganga (Part 1 to 9).

Bh.K.

BHAVISAYATTAKAHA (Apabhramsha) is a famous narrative in epic form of Apabhramsha, which is better known as kathakavya. This is a pure folk-tale that has been woven on the pattern of classical epics. It deals with the story of a prince or a merchant. There exists a long tradition of the kathakavya of this type in the contemporary literature. As many as 24 kathakavyas on this very theme have been found in Prakrit, Sanskrit, Apabhramsha and Hindi. This form is known in Apabhramsha literature under different names. It is called as Nanapanchami (Jnanapanchami), Panchami, Saubhagyapanchami, Shrutapanchami, etc.

Dhanapala's Bhavisayadattakaha is the best known among the lot available in Apabhramsha. It may be mentioned here that Nanapanchamikaha of Maheshvara Suri in Prakrit belongs to this category. Even in Apabhramsha, Dhanapala has at least a few predecessors: such as Svyambhu who wrote Panchamikaha and Vibudha Shridhara and Raidu who wrote Bhavisayattakaha. The text of Dhanapala's Bhavisayattakaha is composed in 22 cantos or sandhis. It is a composition of sandhibandha. The hero of this story belongs to the business community.

Once Bhavisayadatta sets out on a journey for business and is accompanied by his younger step-brother. The two, with five hundred young traders land in an island. There the younger step-brother treacherously leaves his elder brother alone and sets sail. The latter discovers a deserted but a rich city and a beautiful princess, whom he marries. After a long time, they take much wealth with them and go ashore in the hope that some merchant-ship might pick them up. They again meet the step-brother, who had returned unsuccessful. The latter feigns repentance and offers to carry his brother and the princess with their wealth to home. All is ready, he sets sail along with the princess and the wealth leaving his brother once again. He returns home and declares the princess to be his bride. By the help of Yaksha the elder brother also returns home when the marriage is about to be celebrated. He lodges a complaint against his step-brother and convinces the king of the land about the perfidy of his step-brother and got him punished. As reward, Bhavisayadatta got half of the kingdom and the king's daughter as his wife.

The entire narrative is woven around certain motifs. These motifs build up a narrative chain step by step and unfold the theme. Some of the motifs employed in the fabric of this kaha are: (1) the desertion of wife by the husband, (2) journey of the elder brother with the younger step brother, (3) wrong teaching by the step mother, (4) warning or a note of caution by the real mother, (5) treachery, (6) the deserted city, (7) the temple, (8) the help by the deity, (9) the princess in the captivity of a demon, (10) bravery, (11) marriage with the princes, (12) faithlessness of the step brother, (13) storm in the sea, (14) prayers to silence the stormy sea, (15) magic journey, (16) the good omen by a crow, (17) fortelling by a seer, (18) meeting between the mother and the son, (19) recognition by presenting the ring, (20) chastity ordeal, (21) punishment and reward, (22) how a mortal becomes God.

Thus the element of plot is marginal. The main role is given to motifs in elaborating the story content of the kaha. It becomes a narrative of motifs. It may be noted here that some of the motifs used are universal in character which have been found in the folk-tales of the languages of the world as mentioned by Thompson in his book Motifindex.

Bhavisayattakaha of Dhanapala is an important landmark in the tradition of kathakavyas. It has certain features which are, by and large, unique. It has been composed in kadavakabandha, a special metrical form in 16 to 30 lines, which as a characteristic feature of alliteration in the endline and which is not found in Sanskrit and Prakrit kavyas. Even in using kadavakabandh, the author has used paddhadia meter, out of the three meters usually employed in composing it, the choice of using paddhadia, and not duvai or adilla, has heightened the narrative aspect of the kaha. This narrative has effectively presented the fine blend of the four important rasas—shrinagara, vira, vatsalya and shanta. The author has also used a few new meters which were not used by the Sanskrit writers. The important meters employed in metrical composition are: kalahamsa, simhavalokan, pilavingam, shataknan, etc. The author has also employed a number of figures of speech and especially elaborate images. The images used are fresh and natural, for example the poet describes the beauty of Bhavisayanurupa in these words:

Romavali Vali amgi Vihavai Thiya Pipilirimcholi Va Navai. Samcakkala Kadiyalu Kisu majjhau najjai Karyalu mutthihigijjhau. (Bh. Kh. 9).

The poet here compares the trivali, the lines of hair around the navel, with the lines of ants. Similarly her waist is so thin and round that it can be held in one's palm.

De.S.

BHAYANI, HARIVALLABH CHUNILAL (Gujarati; b. 1917) is a linguist, philologist, research scholar of ancient and medieval literature, critic and translator.

He was educated at Bhavnagar and Bombay. He obtained his degree of M.A. with first Class, taking Sanskrit and Ardhamagadhi as special subjects, in 1941, from Bharatiya Vidya Bhavan, Bombay. Later he did extensive research on 'Paumachariu (which is a ninth century Jaina version of the Ramayana), composed by one of the great poets of Apabhramsha language and literature, Swayambhudeva, under the guidance of Muni Shri Jinavijayaji. Consequently, he got his Ph.D. degree in 1952.

In 1941, he joined the Bharatiya Vidya Bhavan, Bombay for teaching and research work. From 1965, he joined Gujarat University as Professor of Linguistics. Following his voluntary retirement in 1975 from Gujarat University he joined the famous Lalbhai Dalpatbhai Prachya Vidya Mandir, Ahmedabad, as its Hon. Professor. He presided over the Prakrit and Jainism section of the All India Oriental Conference held at Chidambaram in 1957. In 1984, Gujarat Sahitya Academy awarded him a fellowship for special Research work, with a view to enable him to prepare a historical grammar of the Gujarati language.

Bhayani is very prominent as a linguist. Being closely acquainted with the trends in modern Western research and study, he has favoured modern concepts and methods for the linguistic study of Gujarati. Among his books dealing with this area of study notable are Shabda-Katha (1963, 1983), Anushilano (1965, 1976), Thodok Vyakaran Vichar (1969, 1971, 1978), Shabda-Parishilan (1973), Vyutpatti-Vichar (1975) and Gujarati Bhashana Itihasni Ketlik Samasyao (1976).

Shabda-katha deals with the etymology and historical significance of words, breaking-up of words, their crowding tendency and their transformation. All these topics are discussed in a rigorous method with historical documentation, and hence, the book has achieved great popularity among the students of Gujarati language. Bhayani's style is characterised by brevity and lucidity, due to which a careful and conscious reader never fails to grasp the real meaning or inner significance of his writings. His articles on Gujarati and Apabhramsha languages are included in another book, Anushilano. On the other hand, Shabda-Parishilan, Vyutpatti-Vichar and Gujarati Bhashana Itihasni Ketlik Samsyao are important for investigating various aspects of the history of Gujarati. From 1981 to 1983, Bhayani edited a linguistic quarterly titled Bhasha-Vimarsha.

Bhayani has won international fame for his research work on ancient and medieval Indo-Aryan languages and literatures. There has been a considerable impact of his books in this particular field, both in India as well as abroad. His critical method of editing, his precision and keen sense of observation—all of these have provided an excellent model in this field. Sandesh-Rasak (1945), Paumachariu (1948), Neminaha-Chariya Part—1-2, (1970) (1971), and Sanatkumara Chariya (1974), Samkhitta-Tarangavaikaha (1979), Lilavatisara (1983) are the famous examples of his research work and editing of Prakrit, Apabhramsha and Sanskrit texts. His introduction to the Sandesharasaka, edited by Muni Jinvijayaji, runs into 50 pages, providing an analysis of the metres and language of that work. Paumachariya and Neminaha Chariya are edited by him in collaboration with Madhusudan Modi.

Bhayani's editing of the Paumachariya (1953-1961), a text having an extent of 12000 verses is exemplary so far as the study of an Apabhramsha text is concerned. His Apabhramsha Vyakaran was published in 1961. His critical study of Desya words 'Studies in Hemchandra's Desinammala, was published in 1966.

Over and above the works on Apabhramsha, his contribution to the field of medieval Gujarati language is also remarkable. His editions of three of Shamalbhatta's works, viz. Madan-Mohana (1955), Rustamo Saloko (1956), and Sinhasan Batrisi (18 to 22 stories 1960), provide guide lines and examples for the editing of medieval Gujarati texts. Dashama Skandha Part 1, 2 (1966-1972) edited in collaboration with Umashankar Joshi, Prachin Gurjar Kavya (1975), edited jointly with Agarchand Nahata, and Ratnachud-Ras (1977) have been done on the same lines.

Shodh and Swadhyaya (1961) and Anusandhan (1972) contain a compilation of Bhayani's various articles on ancient and medieval languages and literatures of India.

Prapa (1966) and Gatha-Madhuri (1975) are beautiful Gujarati translations of short lyrics written by classical Sanskrit and Prakrit poets. Kamalna Tantu (1979) contains a collection of translations and adaptations of selected Pali Jatakas.

Thus, editions of important Sanskrit, Prakrit, Apabhramsha and Medieval Gujarati texts, numerous research papers in these areas and translations from the ancient classics comprise the valuable contribution made by Bhayani to the study of Indian languages and literatures.

Further, his critical literary studies are published in Kavyama Shabda (1973), Kavyanu Samvedan (1976), Rachna ane Samrachna (1981), Kavyavyapar (1982). These collections of articles are imbued with critical insight, and are highly prized in the field of recent Gujarati critical literature. Of these the Rachana ane Samrachana, was awarded the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1981. A notable aspect of these works is that they introduce the readers to the current trends in Western critical theory through translations of select articles and excerpts from the Western writings on the subject. His interpretations, evaluations and opinions in this area are fairly objective. His articles tend to look for the aesthetic element in a literary composition and the linguistic means and modes of its expression.

Due to quality, diversity and bulk of his research contributions Bhayani has deservedly earned a prominent place among the leading scholars.

P.R.T.

BHIKHARI DAS (Hindi; b. early eighteenth century), son of Kripaldas, enjoyed the patronage of Hindupati Singh, younger brother of Raja Prithvipati Singh of Pratapgarh. He translated the Vishnu Purana in verse in 1728. It was followed by his other works Ras Saransh (1734), Nam Prakash (1738), Chandrarnava Pingal (1742) and Shringar Nirnaya (1750-51). The first one, Ras Saransh, which generally deals with Nayikabhed has nothing to do with Rasa. Shringar Nirnaya also known as Rasa Nirnaya is entirely devoted to the treatment of Shringar Rasa as a whole. The most outstanding work of Bhikharidas, however, is Kavya Nirnaya (1746) divided into 25 ullasas (chapters), mostly based on Kavya Prakash (Visvanath) and Chandralok (Jayadeva), almost touching everything related to poetry and its enjoyment. The most important feature is its discussion of the various traits of words. Two basic trends of the 'Ritikal,' viz Riti (poetics/rhetorics) and Shringarikata (eroticism) are beautifully illustrated with sound judgement and clarity in chaste Braj Bhasa. Examined from the point of view of pure literary merit and refined taste, Bhikhridas is ranked very high.

Critical insight of Bhikharidas is evidenced in the cryptic words of appraisal of his own erotic poetry which applies to entire Braj Bhasa poetry of the 'Ritikal':

'Aage ke Sukavijan rijhijain tau Kavitai,
Na tu Radhika-Kanhai ke Sumiran kau bahanou hai'

(It is poetry if the later poets are enchanted by it; otherwise, let it be an excuse for remembering Radha and Krishna).

Thus Bhikharidas believes that even the erotic poetry of the Krishna lore has an element of devotion. These lines are often quoted, sometimes out of their context. Bhikharidas has also given a very scientific view about literary Braj Bhasa when after mentioning a number of noted poets he says that the learning of Braj Bhasa does not essentially require one to live in the region, it can be learnt through such poets also. He also says that this language has incorporated elements of other languages which include Persian.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Dhirendra Verma, Hindi Sahitya—Vol. II (Allahabad, 1959); Nagendra, Hindi Sahitya ka Brihat Itihas, Vol. VI (ed.)

K.B.

BHIKKHU, K.C. SHARMA (Hindi; b. 1924) was born in a respectable Brahmin family in Kankhal (Hardwar) and got his M.A. and L.L.B. degrees from the Benaras Hindu

University. From the none-too–significant initial position in the All India Radio hierarchy, he rose to be its Director–General by sheer dint of hard work and honesty of purpose which, incidentally form the hallmark of his literary personality also. A comprehensive and deep study of Buddhist literature and Philosophy left an indelible imprint on his mind, its basic ingredients of compassion and love struck a vibrant cord within his own being and became embedded in his psyche and he consequently adopted the pen-name of 'Bhikkhu' (literally a Buddhist Monk).

Bhikkhu's literary personality reflects a happy and harmonious blend of traditional Indian values with healthy western traits of respect for the individual. Bhikkhu has great respect for womanhood and believes it to be an immense motivating force in man's life. A number of his novels—e.g. Revati, Astangata, Maut ki Serai, etc. revolve round female characters who have an amazing moral courage and will power and never deem their chastity to have been sullied by forcible and shameless violation of their person by male aggressiveness but who fight back with all the force of their character to vindicate their honour. Bhikkhu's faith in the essential goodness of man in general is deep-rooted in his belief in man's future.

Bhikkhu's range of experience and the vastness and variety of his thematic spectrum leaves one amazed. From suburban Indian locales to metropolitan jungles, from far-off Nagaland and Goanese milieu to the French Revolution as the background is a rare range to encounter. He identifies himself with the oppressed and the victimized anywhere—even if it be Marie Antoinette of France who was charged with 'incest' with his seven year old son. The reference to this charge in the history of French revolution left the sensitive author aghast and inspired him to probe deep into this charge and Maut ki Serai is the outcome.

His Ek aur Yayati is an account of the moral degeneration so rampant in the present day social life. The tragedy of life lies in the fact that those who have pretensions of righteousness and pose as standard-bearers of morality are found in actual practice to be steeped in immoral acts of the most heinous kind. He projects a realistic picture of our modern social life which has lost all its values and ideals, a moth-eaten fabric, an edifice that may crumble at any moment because of the hollowness of its base.

Bhikkhu has traversed his creative course without ever getting involved in various literary movements, factions or groups and has steered clear of unseemly controversies. His creative endeavour reflects an openness of approach and a direct analysis of questions pertaining to our social and personal lives. His diction and expression, free of high-brow and cumbersome verbosity, is more routine and commonplace—and consequently more natural and nearer real life situations.

Bhikkhu's creative effort with about two dozen books deserves better recognition than has been accorded by the critics so far.

FURTHER WORKS: Novels: Admi ka Bachcha (1950); Sankranti (1951); Ghar ka Bara (1952); Bhanwarjal (1954); Astangata Revati; Durva. Short stories: Mrityu ki Minar; Bela phule Adhi Raat. Play: Ruplakshmi.

Ma.C.

BHIKSHU BHAWANI (Nepali; b. 1914, d. 1980) is acknowledged to be a first rate, if not the foremost, short story writer and a front ranking poet and novelist. Avadhi being his mother tongue, Nepali was his second language in which he did all of his literary writings and to his credit, he was instrumental in bringing new beauty and expressiveness in the Nepali literary language.

Bhikshu made his debut in 1936 publishing in that year in Sharada an essay piece 'Alochak Ri Alochana' (The critic and Criticism) and a poem Sharada Viyog-ratri (Night of Separation). He later edited Sharada for some years.

Three volumes of his poems have been published. Chhaya (containing poems written between 1940 and 1945), Prakash (1949-55) and Pariskar (poems written in June-August of 1958). Chhaya (Shadow) as the title suggests is a collection of his Chhayavadi poems. Prakash (Light) exhorts us to bring about a new age of humanistic freedom. The third volume Pariskar (Cleanness) contains poems that contemplate on latter-day realities, personal and social. Rich in symbolism, irony, tenderness and musicality, Bhikshu's poems are hard and bright intellectually like diamond.

His voluminous novel Agat (The Present that Hath Come) depicts a great social transition during which time people act and react multifariously in efforts to integrate their thoughts and actions meaningfully with the oncoming transition.

Bhikshu's talent finds the artistically most gratifying expression in his short stories which are collected in the following volumes: Gunkesari, Maiya, Saheb, Aavarta. Around 1940 when writing short stories on social themes was the prevalent mode, of the very few who pioneered to write psychological short stories Bhawani Bhikshu succeeded most outstandingly.

To quote Bhikshu, 'If we name a verbal arrangement of thoughts and other matters of diverse kinds as a story and not something else, it is solely for the reason that it might stir up the innermost feelings of the reader and enable him to gain a complete emotional identity with the character'. This his stories achieve in the superlative manner. Understandably, love and kindred emotions are the subject matter of the most successful of his short stories, but success did not elude him when he dealt with other feelings and problems too. Gunkesari, a story of unfulfilled love and desire best illustrates the essence and ingredients of a Bhikshu short story in that it has sharp, intellectual characters who are very capable of dissecting feelings of ungratified desires and who brave incessant mental laceration.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Ishwar Baral, Bhikshuka Katha; Introduction; Gunkesari, 1960. Jas Yonjan, Pyasi Kehi Samalochana, 1983., Pratap Chandra Pradhan, Nepali Katha Valokan, 1983; Ratna Dhwaj Joshi, Nepali Kathako Katha., 1968.,

M.D.R.

BHIM (Gujarati, 16th century) the author of Bhimgita, known also as Rasagita. Rasikagita and Uddhavagita, came some 50 years after Bhim of Harilila. Bhimgita depicts in 135 stanzas a part of the 'dasama skandha' of the Bhagavata where Uddhava comes to Vraja to take Krishna away to Mathura.

From internal evidence this Bhima appears to be a contemporary of Vitthalanathji, the son of Vallabhacharya, the founder of the Pusti sect of Vaishnavism. This places him between 1516 and 1581. No other biodata is available. He has also written a dhola poem on Vitthalanatha.

An.R.

BHIM (Gujarati). Three medieval Gujarati poets of this name are known. Bhim, the author of Sadayavatsacharita, was a Hindu poet, the second non-Jain after Asait to write in the genre of Loka-varta or Varta. Not much is known about his life. He composed Sadayavatsacharita in 1410. The poem, in 672 stanzas, is in matramela metres and depicts the nine rasas following the poet's conscious determination (navai rasi jasu jampisu). The language of the poem belongs to the first stage of Middle Gujarat with traces of Apabhramsha in it. Three manuscripts of the poem are available in Vadodara Prachya-Vidya-Mandir, the oldest being dated 1430 and hence they are of great value from the linguistic point of view.

C.M.

BHIMA CHARIT (Assamese) is a pleasant work of poetry written by the 16th century poet Rama Sarasvati. The Kocha King Maharaj Nara Narayan who ruled western Assam with his capital at Koch Behar commissioned Rama Saraswati for the work of translating the Mahabharata into Assamese and extended royal patronage to the poet for the purpose. After this work was completed Rama Saraswati undertook to write a few Badha-Kavyas on the heroic exploits of epic heroes. The Bhima-charit is one of them and is the most popular.

In the Bhima-charit Rama Saraswati has drawn the characters of Bhima, Parvati and Mahadeva on the model of characteristic Assamese rural people and in doing so he has shown artistic skill. His Bhima, in fact, is partly modelled on the Assamese cowherd, a pet of the family but withal pert, resourceful and mischievous. Dhritarashtra, the king of the Kauravas did not take kindly to his nephews, the Pandavas, more particularly to Bhima who was very powerfully built and who alone was match for his one hundred sons. The one hundred Kaurava and five Pandava boys used to play games together. Bhima, by his superior strength, used to snatch away from the king's sons any sweets that were given to them. Any protest from them would earn them slaps and thrashings. Some he would throw up into the sky, others he would yoke to the plough. The weeping boys would lodge complaint with king Dhritarashtra. The old king at one stage made a show of conciliation. He offered the five Pandava brothers and their mother Kunti a newly built house. The house was made of inflamable materials. The idea was to set it on fire while they were asleep and burn them all to ashes. The plan was carried out, but the Pandavas escaped unhurt. They saved themselves by running out through a hole which the shrewd Bhima managed to dig.

The succeeding part of the poem is more attractive. We find Bhima now as a cowherd in the house of Lord Mahadeva in Kailash—an assignment he has undertaken solely with the hope that he would get at least a square meal. But the household of the poor, Bhang-addict Mahadeva disappointed him on this score. His appetite was so great that Parvati was puzzled because whatever was placed on Bhima's dish, he finished at one gulp. The new cowherd grumbled that his master had not got the capacity even to feed his servant squarely, much less give pay. Parvati the mistress of the house suggested paddy cultivation to augment food grains. Here again the new servant was unmanageable. He took out the bull to graze in the field, but in reality the bull strayed into the hermitage-garden of Vishwamitra and created havoc. When the sage reprimanded the cowherd, Bhima caught hold of the tail of the bull and after circling him out of all breath, threw him away. When the bull lay prostrate, the blame was cleverly thrown at the sage himself, for who but he would do it unnecessarily and without cause. After this, we find Bhima going to the rich Kuvera to borrow money for his master and mistress, the Mahadeva couple. He had a tussle with that notorious miser at the end of which Kuvera was obliged to come himself with money to Mahadeva and Parvati.

Now Mahadeva understood that his new servant was no ordinary mortal. Though the master and the mistress always faced a new problem from Bhima, they were captivated by him. When they at last asked for his real identity, he told them that he was the second of the Pandava brothers and that Kunti was their mother and that Yudhishthira was the eldest brother while Arjuna, Nakula and Sahadeva were his younger brothers. Rama Saraswati's poem closes here. Cast in popular language and racy idioms commensurate with the adventurous exploits of a fat and mountainous young hero it has become a classic of mirth for children.

Ni.B.

BHIMA DHIBARA (Oriya) is famous in Oriya literature for his kavya Kapatapasha. From the surname Dhibara it can be surmised that the poet was a ''Dhibara' or fisherman by caste. The poem was written most probably in the 17th century. It is divided into 10 cantos, each in different metres, such as, Nalini Gouda, Bangalashri, etc. The poet possibly because of his low-caste origin does not make any pretension of great learning. His use of simple idiomatic language to express deep emotions in popular melodious metres, has made the poem popular all over the state among all sections of people.

Although the poem is named Kapatapasha, i.e. the foul dice-game, it does not give an account of the game. The poem begins dramatically from the scene in the court of the Kurus when Yudhishthira, completely defeated in the game of dice, had lost everything including his brothers and his and their wife. The poet then proceeds to describe the humiliation of Draupadi, at the hands of Dushasana, which however brought immediate retribution. It so happened that when on Duryodhana's orders, Dushasana was trying to undress Draupadi, whose appeals for help evoked no response from the Kuru-elders, the clothes of Bhanumati, Duryodhana's wife, caught fire, forcing her to come into the Kuru-court completely naked. Duryodhana and his friends were thus shamed into realisation that grievous wrong was being done to Draupadi. Duryodhana thereupon asked Duhsasana to stop.

The poet in order to teach the Kurus a lesson has quoted a line from the Bhagavata: 'He who makes evil plans against others, himself suffers from the same, inviting God's wrath.' The story is taken from the Oriya epic Mahabharata of Sarala Das.

The poet within the small compass of only 10 cantos has depicted the characters of Duryodhana, Duhsasana, Dhritarashtra, Drona, the five Pandava brothers and Draupadi in a beautiful manner. The dialogues and the activities of the different characters, although given very briefly, are effective in bringing their characters and attitudes into sharp focus.

The poet has stressed the glory of Shri Krishna who had helped Draupadi in her distress. Though he was a contemporary of the poets of the Riti school, Bhima Dhibara has not used any traditional rhetorical devices (Alankara) in his poem. On the other hand his language is simple and colloquial and when wedded to music it becomes very endearing to listeners.

K.C.S.

BHIMAKAVI (Kannada; 14th century) was a popular poet of the 14th century known for his Basavapurana, said to be the first work in Kannada wholly composed in 'bhamini satpadi' metre. The work is a biography of Basaveswara, a saintly personage of the 12th century acclaimed as the chief protagonist of the Virasaiva movement in Karnataka. Bhimakavi is rightly said to have carried forward the tradition of biographical poems in Satpadi form initiated by Raghavanka (1220). Siddhanan-jesa (1650) mentions in his Raghavanka charitra, two more works as written by Bhimakavi viz. Bhimakaviswara Ragale and Bhringidandaka which are not available. Siddhananjesa also states that Bhimakavi comes from Siddhavataksetra near Srisaila and that he was a disciple of Raghavanka. The latter part of the statement is disputed. Bhimakavi's father was one Sivakavideva whom the poet mentions with great reverence. Under his father's guidance the poet became 'ubhaya kavitwa samartha'—well-versed in both the literatures viz. Kannada and Telugu. He completed his work Basavapurana in 1369.

Basavapurana is a free rendering in Kannada of an earlier Telugu work in 'dwipadi' metre viz. Basavapurana-mu composed by Palkurike Somanatha (1300) one of the pioneers responsible for spreading Basava's message of Virasaivism in Andhra regions. The Telugu work has a high place in the history of Telugu literature. A number of Telugu poets have later converted it into champu form. Palkurike Somanatha has stated in his work that he had first-hand knowledge about Basava's life and work conveyed to him by Viramaheswaras (Staunch virasaivas) of Srisaila. His devotion to Basava knew no bounds and he has written two more works on Basava, viz. Vrisadhipa Satakamu (a hundred verses on Basava) and Chaturveda Saramu (quintessence of four Vedas). In his last days, Palkurike Somanatha came to Kalya, a village in Karnataka (Bangalore District, Najadi Taluk), and breathed his last. His 'samadhi' (tomb) is still there in the village. Besides Bhimakavi, later Kannada poets like Singiraja (16th century) and Sadakari (17th century) were also influenced by Palkurike Somanatha who was held in such high esteem in Karnataka that Virakta Tontacharya (16th century), a saintly poet, composed a purana in his honour, viz. Palkurike Somanatha Purana.

Bhimakavi reverentially mentions that he undertook Kannada rendering of the Telugu purana at the instance of a dream he had in his Yoganidra (contemplation sleep) wherein Palkurike Somanatha and Anagadevacharya (probably his father Sivakavideva) appeared and inspired him to accomplish the sacred undertaking. Eulogizing earlier poets he makes a special mention of Harihara and Raghavanka of the 13th century. He must have read Harihara's work Basavarajadevara Ragale, the first narrative poem on the life of Basava. Bhimakavi's Basavapurana is a more comprehensive work, altogether a different type from Harihara's work. It is a Virasaiva purana of eight aswasas' (divisions) containing 61 'sandhis' (chapters) and 3621 verses. The pattern of Virasaiva Purana was popularised by Palkurike Somanatha followed by Bhimakavi. Both these Puranakaras view Basava as an incarnation of Nandikeswara and an integral part of a great tradition of 'Sivasaranas' (devotees of Siva). Delineating, mainly, the life of Basava from birth to 'lingaikya' (death), the poet weaves around it the lives of contemporary 'sivasaranas' like Allamaprabhu, Medivala Machayya, Kinnari Brahmayya and also of the 'adiganas' (earliest devotees), like Siriyala, Kohuru Kodugusu, Bedara-Kannappa, etc. Since Basava belongs to this world of devotees, all these episodes are blended harmoniously with the main story. A contemporary episode brings to life similar episodes of olden times. For instance, Mugdha (innocent) Sangayya's episode causes narration of a number of such innocent devotees. To eradicate Basava's ego of devotion, an opportunity is sought to narrate the tales of devotees who get rid of their ego. Basavapurana comprises seventyfive life-sketches of Jangamas (incarnations of Siva) belonging to various types. Though Basavapurana differes from Basavarajaragale in certain aspects, the two works are complementary to each other for understanding the life of Basava. Close study of the incidents and situations in the life-sketch of Basava reveals certain significant additions and omissions. For example, the incident of cattle-lifting, the situation wherein Basava offers his wife to Siva in the disguise of a 'jangama' and the hilarious pageant of onion depicted by Harihara are omitted by Bhimakavi. And Harihara, unlike Bhimakavi, does not mention Baladeva as Basava's father-in-law. The episode of Basava's interpreting the letter mysteriously fallen from above is also not found in Harihara. And again, there are contrary statements regarding details of Basava's 'upanayana' (thread ceremony) in the two works. This apart, Bhimakavi has inserted into his work a number of descriptions and episodes not found in the original Telugu work, which broadly means that Basavapurana of Bhimakavi is not a literal replica of the Telugu Basavapuranamu; the episode of Jangama asking Mayidevi for her ear-ring may be quoted as an example. This is found in Harihara also. Perhaps, it had gained currency during the intervening period. Like-wise, the miracle of the mysterious fall of the letter already quoted and the miracle of Kajjaya (bread) are not found in the Telugu purana also.

Basavapurana is considered one of the best Virasaiva Puranas in Kannada from the view of inculcating devotion in the readers' minds. Basava, as depicted by Bhimakavi, is mainly a great devotee of Siva and a 'jangama—prani' (one who considers 'jangamas' as one's own life). He is, again, a saintly figure, a good-man of miracle and above all an incarnation with a mission. Some critics opine that in depicting Basava as such the other side of his true character as a religious and social revolutionary fades away. Whatever it be, Basavapurana did provide in Kannada a sound basis for the tradition of Virasaiva—Puranas and it is, to this day, a living purana. Bhimakavi's aritifice in converting the original 'dwipadis' into 'bhamini satpadis' made him, often, tend towards the learned style of the 'vastuka' (champu) but neatly tempered with 'varnaka' (indegenous satpadi). His poetic diction is lucid and elegant.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: K. Marulasiddhappa, Salpadi Sahitya-Samanyanige Sahitya Charitre, Bangalore University, Bangalore., M. Chidanandamurthy, Basavapurana-qndu samikshe (Ch. 6)., R. Narasimhacharya, Karnataka Kavi-Charite, Vol. I. Kannada Sahitya Parishat, Bangalore., T.V. Subbarao, Bhimakavi, (Ch. 5).

S.R.M.

BHIMA KAVI VEMULAVADA (Telugu; b. 1125) was a bardic poet in Telugu. This famous poet whose life had become a legend lives only on the lips and minds of the people. Not a single verifiable fact regarding his life and literature has come to light so far. The legend has it that he was the son of Lord Bhimeswara by a Brahmin widow who yearned to have a son by the boon of the Lord; that he was subjected to indignities as the society treated him only as a bastard; that he wrecked vengeance on all those who ill-treated him by cursing them through his inspired words of measured beauty and magical potency. Once he went to a public dinner for Brahmins, but was refused admission on account of his being a bastard (golaka). In a fit of rage, he composed a verse extempore and turned the cooked rice into calcium powder and the sweets into leaping frogs. When all the guests and the host apologised to him and prayed for mercy, he restored to them their dinner by composing another extempore verse cancelling the earlier curse. Many such stories are widely current all over Andhra. Most notable among them is the curse he laid on Raja Kalinga Gangu, King of Kalinga. The king refused to give an immediate audience to him owing to his prior engagements and consequently was cursed and lost his kingdom to a rival king of Chalukya dynasty of Vengi. Later one day, it so happened that the dethroned king of Kalinga, then living in utter penury, fell in a pit in the dark of night and wailed that not a footman was there to help him with a lighted torch. Now Bhima Kavi who happened to be there by chance enquired who he was. "I am the unfortunate king of Kalinga ruined by the wrath of Bhima Kavi", said the king. Bhima Kavi took pity on him and blessed him in an extempore verse conferring the lost kingdom on him. Redeemed from his curse, the deposed king re-conquered his kingdom. Historians identified the king with the famous king of Kalinga known as Ananta Varma Coda Ganga Deva alias Vajrahasta III (12th century). Though there are other stories and verses relating to Nannaya, Sahini Mara, Tyagi Pota Mylama Bhima and one Telungadhisa, suggesting the poet's contemporaneity with them, they do not belong to one century; critics generally place him in the twelfth century. The place of his birth too, is in dispute. The consensus seems to favour Vemulavada alias Lemulawada or Lembulawada in Karimnagar district as against Drakshar-ama in Godavari district. Poets like Srinatha paid tributes to his powerful style (uddanda saili). Reputed writers on rhetoric and prosody like Appakavi quoted him with approval. Yet today not a single work of his has survived. He has been credited with the authorship of the first book on Telugu prosody called Kavijanasrava, also called Bhimana Chandas; but recent scholarship disproved the claim. The authorship is now attributed to Mallia Reca of the 9th century. He is supposed to have written the following Kavyas: Raghavapandaviyam (a double entendre composition), Satakanantha Ramayanam, Nrisimhapuranam, and Haravilasam. An astrological work, Jyotishamrita Saramu, stands in his name. It was translated into Persian. A number of stray verses (catuvulu) often in the form of a blessing or a curse are in wide circulation today. From a study of the legends and occasional verses in circulation, it emerges that he was a gifted poet of a very high order and that he led a luxurious independent life.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Arudra, Samagraandhra Sahityamu, vol. I, (Madras, 1965.); Mamidipudi Venkata Rangayya (ed.), Samagraandhra Vignana Kosamu, Vol. I, (Hyderabad); Nidadavolu Venkata Rao, Kavali Venkataramaswamy's Biographical Sketches of the Deccan poet's, Bharati, (March, 1977); Sesadri Ramana Kavulu, Bhimanna Janmasthalamu, Bharati, (July, 1926).

G.Sr.

BHIMANNA BOYI (Telugu, b. 1911) has been enriching the Telugu literature for over six decades. He started his career as a agricultural worker. He has won many laurels and honours.

Bhimanna was born in the picturesque 'Konaseema' in a village Mamidi Kuduru (Rajole; East Goolanari District) in a poor Harijan family. He had to face many difficulties due to his poverty and caste. In those days the caste barriers in Andhra, particularly in Konaseema, were much more rigid. Bhimanna completed his primary and high school education in Konaseema.

Bhimanna started his poetic career very early in life. He wrote stray poems while studying in the sixth class in high school. His father encouraged him to write the Mahabharata but Bhimanna did not fulfil his father's wishes. He had his own way of composing poetry. He learnt prosody on his own accord. Later Bhimanna described himself as a wild tree in a forest which grew on its own.

Bhimanna graduated from P.R. College, Kakinada. He studied under the guidance of the great luminaries Raghupati Venkata Ratnam Naidu, Vemuri Rama Krishna Rao and 'Gora'. Bhimanna revolted against Prarthana, a Brahmo Samaj custom, and walked out of the hostel.

He joined as a clerk in a newspaper Janawani edited by Sri Tapi Dharma Rao. He wrote a remarkable serial Janapaduni Jabulu (Letters from a villager) depicting the village life very well. Later he worked as sub-editor of Prajamitra edited by Sri Gudavalli Ramabrahmam. He worked as a teacher in Mummadivaram for some time. While working as a teacher he wrote a play Paleru (agricultural servant), which became very popular. It depicted the realistic conditions of the agricultural labourers in a realistic way and earned praise of literary critics.

Bhimanna attended a meeting at Ramachandrapuram addressed by Ambedkar, the great patriot, and read a few poems in English in praise of Ambedkar in 1944. Bhimanna adopted Gandhian philosophy. He met Gandhiji.

Bhimanna wrote another play Kooliraju (A labour leader) which was also well received by the people. He worked as sub-editor in Andhra Prabha, a popular Telugu daily newspaper, for sometime and as chief–translator. He was nominated to the State Legislative Council for two terms.

Bhimanna's works are many. Among them Madhubala (Damsel of spring), Deepa Sabha (A galaxy of lights), Madhugeeta (Spring song), Bhimanna Kavya Kusumalu (A bouquet of Bhimanna's works), Pairupata (Crop song), Anaadi Kosanunchi Anantatwamloki (From the very beginning to the eternity), Chitrakala Pradarsana (Art exhibition), Prukritilo Manava Prakriti (The behaviour of man in Nature), Tripadalu (Triplets), Manavuni Maroka Majily, Balayogi, The Seventh Season (English) Ragavaisakhi (The music in Vaisakha), Akanda Tandavamu (Rhythmless Tandava), Dharmamkosam Poratam (Struggle for Dharma), Pilli Satakam (A Sataka on a cat), Eka Padyopakhyanam (A story of a single poem), Asokavanilo Ramudu, Rabhilu, Kedareswari (Goddess of crops), Gudiselu Kaliopotunnai (Huts are on fire), Sivalakalu (Front locks of Parvati), and Janmantara Vairam are very popular.

Bhimanna was inspired by the beautiful nature of Konaseema in his early life and portrayed it in many of his works. And they have won critical acclaim. He received the central Sahitya Akademi Award for Guideselu Kalipotunnai in 1975. Ragavaisakhi is a full length socio-mythological drama.

Bhimanna likes the pastroal life of Andhra and depicted it in some of his poems. Balayogi is a play portraying the life of the great saint Mummidivaram Balayogi. Ragavaisakhi is, as one critic correctly observed, "not only a sweet song of sublime love but a profound philosophical treatise and essentially humanistic compound, presenting higher values of love through an inspiring correspondence in an enchanting style".

In Akandatandavamu Bhimanna combined the devotion to God with the realities of life–"with Lord Siva's eternal dance of creation and ambition as the main theme. These lyrics prompt man to ponder over the power of the All Pervading one." In lucid style, these verses preach the need for brotherly love and compassion and a society divorced from corruption, bigotry and superstition. His Pillisatakam is a satire on modern life and Ekapadyopakhyanam a satire on Telugu literary criticism.

In Asokavanilo Ramudu Bhimanna fancied that he entered Asokavana after the death of Ravana and thought about the past life of Sita in Asokavana.

Bhimanna preached a new philosophy 'Rasadwaita' combining 'Rasa' of aesthetics and 'Adwaita' of Sankara. He considered woman as 'Parasakti' and 'Sasktiswarupini'. He does not like the contemporary poets who imitate the traditional literature. He also dislikes Marxist poetry.

He was given the honour of Padmasri in 1973. by the Govt. of India for his services to literature.

K.R.R.

BHOI, BHIMA (Oriya; b. 1855, d. 1895) was a blind and talented Oriya saint-poet of the Khond tribe (Adibasi) who enriched Oriya literature by his devotional lyrics. He was adopted by a poor couple of the Khond tribe at Radhakhola. He left them when he was still a child and had to toil hard and suffer a lot to earn a living. He was initiated into Mahimadharma or Alekhadharma (a Hindu reform movement) by Mahima Goswami, the founder and exponent of the new movement. After his initiation he married a Brahmin girl and built his Ashrama at Khalipala in 1877 and lived there with his companions and scribes and surrounded by his disciples.

This renowned saint was highly esteemed and revered for his devotional lyrics, practice of penance and sincere prayer for the spiritual emancipation of his fellow beings. Lack of formal education was in no way an obstacle to the development of his natural poetic gift as he had a wonderful memory and sharp intelligence to assimilate the immortal teachings of Shrimadbhagavata, the works of Panchasakha (five associates) and other scriptures and puranas (mythology). Tenets of the new movement of his guru (preceptor) have been reflected in almost all his works amongst which Stuti Chintamani, a fine collection of devotional lyrics, is a classic in Oriya literature. It is a departure from the conventional mode, where the readers experience the sincere emotion of a socially tortured revolutionary surcharged with deep and unshaken optimism for the reformation of the debased society. His unlimited compassion for the sorrow-stricken human society has been reflected in a couplet, viz. "Let my life rot in hell for the emancipation of the world." The language, expression and the images of his composition were meant for the common man, intelligible and touching, and the style was spontaneous and lucid. His Chautisas (lyrics containing 34 stanzas using each of the 34 consonants in the beginning of each stanza) and Bhajanas, (singing the glory of God and dialogue between 'mana' and 'chaitanya'—mind and consciousness) are surcharged with wistful prayer and yearning for the spiritual uplift of human beings. Other works like Brahmanirupana Gita, Shrutinishedha Gita etc. are doctrinal in nature where the teacher and the preacher subdue the poet. The tenets of the new movement which discourage casteism and idol worship for the realisation of the Brahma (The Supreme Soul who is void, formless and without attribute: nirakara and nirguna) have been expounded with lucidity and with due respect to the tradition of the Panchasakhadharma (religious doctrines of the Five Associates during the reign of King Prataprudra Deva).

FURTHER WORKS: Nirveda Sadhana, (Practice of Nirveda), Adi Anta Gita (Poem of the Beginning and the End), Bhajanamati (Garland of Songs in Praise of God), Chautisa Madhu Chakra (Beehive of 34 stanza-lyrics).

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Birakishora Das, Bhima Bhoi Granthabali, Introduction (Cuttack, 1971).

G.B.

BHOJA (Sanskrit). King Bhoja of Dhara (1005 to 1045) is almost another name for patronage to learning and prolific authorship of encyclopaedic works in virtually every branch of learning. They are incredibly too many (84 to be precise). It is likely, therefore, that many of the works published in his name were actually authored by his court-poets, the most prominent among them being one Chittapa. In the field of literary theory, Bhoja is famous as the author of Sarasvatikanthabharana and Shringaraprakasha.

Bhoja's chosen task was to compile all material in the field of criticism which had accumulated in the course of centuries after the first formulation of the basic concepts by Bharata and Dandin, applicable to poetry as well as drama. In this he was influenced to a large extent by the mammoth writings of Rajashekhara which are only partially available to us now in the Kavyamimamsa, and in whose design such diverse aspects of poetry are included as recitation, intonation, imitation of master poets, varieties of plagiarism, geography, flora and fauna of India, mythological notions of the Universe, poetic conventions, gradations among learners of the poetic technique, and personal life and culture of the poet conducive to poetry, nature of instruction to would-be poets, etc. Almost all this far-flung material is rearranged by Bhoja in his two works.

But Bhoja attempted something more. It was a task never attempted before by any single theorist on such a massive scale. Bhoja wanted to encapsule all the scholarly findings on the subject of word and sentence import. Logic (tarka), Grammar (vyakarana) and scriptural disquisition (mimamsa) had all developed independent theories of meaning and denotation. The circumference of poetry touched the fringes of all these tangentially, though its centre lay elsewhere in beauty left untouched by these disciplines. Bhamaha incidentally, and Anandvardhana pointedly, had discussed the essentials of these prestigious disciplines in their attempts to disengage the essence of poetry per se. But it was left to Bhoja to take a comprehensive and detailed survey of these other disciplines (shastras), even when their relevance to poetry was not very intimate.

While so doing, however, Bhoja selected illustrations from poets, major as well as minor, in Sanskrit and made his treatment of even pure grammar, logic and semantics interesting. Incidentally, Bhoja's works became anthologies of classical Sanskrit literature, serving as a treasure-trove where glimpses of many a lost work in Sanskrit and Prakrit can be had. To mention only a few, Gunadhya's original Brihatkatha, Yashovarman's Ramabhyudaya, Kalidasa's Kunteshvaradautya, Manjira's lost Mahakavya, Anandavardhana's Vishambanalila, Bana's play Mukutataditaka, and so forth. V. Raghavan, who highlighted this aspect of Bhoja's works in numerous articles, has ignored the more crucial nature of Bhoja's achievement in focussing attention to a comprehensive philosophy of beauty which gives equal importance to beauty of form, content and feeling, whether self-existent in nature and perceived by the subtle mind of the poet, or created for the first time by his inspired genius or imagination. It is an improvement on Dandin who divided all literature into two neat compartments: beautiful expression of nature (svabhavokti), and artistic expression of imagined ideas (vakrokti). Bhoja's significant addition was the impassioned expression of feeling-shades (rasokti) in all their variety.

Though Bhoja started as a compiler of the intellectual background against which an integral aesthetic philosophy could become meaningful, he almost stumbled upon the truth about rasa which had evaded most of the post-Bharata interpreters. The literal meaning of rasa is nearer to taste or flavour at one pole and to sap or essence at the other. The former is relatively more subjective while the latter is more objective. The accent on the subjective pole could lead to an extreme of mystic or spiritual bliss without explaining the rationale underlying the classification of allied and opposed feelings and sentiments, their determinants, associates and accessories. Similarly, an undue emphasis on the multiplicity of these objective factors could lead to an underestimation of the sheet-anchor of subjectivity demanded of an adequate aesthetic theory. Bhoja gave a simple explanation, shringara means only a gay and cheerful personality and not erotic passion; it could promote spirited activity directed to realising any of the four recognised values of life (purusharthas)–righteousness, power and pelf, satisfaction of desires including love and calm repose. It could lead to agony and frustration when overpowered by heavy odds. In other words, the very core of man's personality or ego was the ground of all rasas, comic as well as tragic. Hence Bhoja said that shringara is a term with the widest denotation primarily related to man's inmost ego or self, (abhimana or ahamkara) which is the basis of all other mutations of it in differing circumstances.

Further, Bhoja could harmonise in his new classification of aesthetic elements, the Shabdabbrahmavada of Bhartrihari and the vakyalakshana and tatparyavada of Bhattamimamsakas and Tarkikas by squaring them up with the dhvanivada of Anandavardhana and Vakroktivada of Kuntaka in an eclectic and superficial, if not philosophical, synthesis. Yet his practical approach is not without its value to general criticism. He lays an equal emphasis on form and content of poetry without forgetting its mission to teach men the worth of life through affording them immediate delight rooted in their very nature. And as for details of verbal devices at a poet's disposal, perhaps Bhoja is superb.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: K. Krishnamoorthy, Studies in Indian Aesthetics and Criticism, Mysore, 1979; P.V. Kane, History of Sanskrit Poetics, Bombay, 1951; V. Raghavan, Bhoja's Shringaraprakasha, Madras, 1963.

K.Kr.

BHOJAPRABANDHA (Sanskrit) is a prose work attributed, in the chapter colophons, to a Rajarajeshwara Ballalasena. Some scholars hold that this Ballala flourished at the end of the 16th century, and, therefore, cannot be identified with the King of Bengal of this name who ruled in the 12th century.

Several versions of the text appear to exist. The Southern text has been printed repeatedly. A short version has been noticed. An eclectic edition from two Paris manuscripts has been published.

The existence of a number of manuscripts as well as of more recensions than one is itself an index to the popularity of the work. It has enriched the Sanskrit tale literature.

The stories are savoury, and written in simple prose unaffected by the artificialities of the age of decadence. There are no long compounds, recondite words and sesquipedalian sentences. Verses are interspersed throughout the work; some of the verses are floating while others appear to have been taken from various literary sources. Some of the verses are didactic in nature. The style is popular, and the work is a literary trifle, despite attempt at elegance.

The object of the work is the glorification of Bhoja, apparently Bhoja of Dhara, in relation to several poets adorning his court and basking in the sunshine of his liberal patronage.

Considerable wit is sought to be displayed by the poets who vie with one another in quick composition of smart verses. There is a series of anecdotes which are interesting but unconnected.

The work is absolutely unreliable as a historical document. It brings together, in the court of Bhoja, such poets as Kalidasa, Bhavabhuti, Dandin, Magha and less known ones like Sita and Chittapa who belong to widely different periods.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: L.H. Gray: Narrative of Bhoja.

S.C.B.

BHOJO (Gujarati; b. 1785, d. 1850) was a medieval poet in the tradition of metaphysical poetry, Jnana-Margi Kavita. He has written many lyrics (padas) as well as a few narrative poems like Salaiya-akhyana in five cantos, Chandrahasakhyana in 20 cantos and Nani Bhakta Mala in 6 cantos. Moreover, he has depicted the experience of Brahman in Brahmabodha, a metaphysical poem in 3 cantos. Bavanaksara tatha Kakka is a long poem with a didactic theme of jnan (realization of Brahman).

He is at home with the form of lyric poetry. The variety of forms in his lyrics–Prabhatiyun, Saravadan, Kafi, Hori and Chabkha–is remarkable. He has also tried traditional lyric forms like Vara, Tithi and Mahina. The experience of Advaita, realization of Brahman, teachings on renunciation, significance of a teacher, admonitions, transcience of matter are some of his major themes. His lyrics on the theme of Gopi's message to Krishna through Uddhava reveal the emotion of Bhakti.

It is through his 'Chabakha' that Bhojo enjoys his immense popularity. He is outspoken in these lyrics. He exposes man's ego, emphasises the fact of death, and asks man to turn to God. Colloquialism is the source of his poetic strength. He has employed idioms and proverbs frequently and Hindi phrases occasionally. 'Praniya Bhaji Le Ne Kirtara' a didactic poem; 'Harijana Hoye Tene Heta Ghanum Rakhvum,' a descriptive lyric; 'Kachabo Kahe Kachabine Ke', a dramatic lyric of lasting value have a permanent place in the medieval Gujarati poetry.

Ch.T.

BHOLA BHARAMALI (Rajasthani) is the latest book of poetry by the author, Satyaprakash Joshi, a poet of the first rank. The book was published at Jodhpur in 1974, and was honoured by the Sahitya Akademi award in 1977. Earlier to this Joshi had published three books of poetry–Radha (1960), Diva Kampai Kyun (1961) and Laskara na Thamai (Borunda-Jodhpur). The poem is based on a popular love-story of Bharamali, a slave girl of extra-ordinary charm and beauty, and Bagha, a Rajput landlord and owner of a village known as Kotada (Jodhpur). As the historical anecdote goes, Bharamali originally belonged to Jaisalmer before she was given away in dowry to accompany princess Umade of Jaisalmer family, married to Rava Maladeva (Sixteenth century) of Jodhpur. As it was destined, Maladeva was so charmed by the beauty of the slave girl that he neglected his spouse at the very first night. This enraged Umade and she swore not to even be in speaking terms with her husband till death. After the incident Bharamali was sent back to Jaisalmer and there also she was an eye-sore to the royal ladies. It was, therefore, planned to persuade Bhagha to take her away from the scene which he did. But the relation between Bhaga and Bharamali developed into an intimate affection in due course, so much so that the pair later on came to be known as ideal lovers. This fact of history has been given turns and twists by the author so as to suit his theory of sublimation of sex, sought to be expounded in the poem. (Author's introductory statement in the book). One need not agree with his theory of the search for the complete sex, but the way he has presented his case is commendable. He is a master architect in his use of phrases, similies, metaphors and maxims which are deeply rooted in the cultural traditions of Rajasthan. Folk songs and vocabulary of the masses are the main store house of his extra rich diction with occasional borrowings from Dingala texts. This aspect of his language has helped him so much that the partial deficiency in the thought-content and slight lack of artistic exposition of the self and subtle treatment of the abstract can be overlooked to some extent. Despite the theoretical controversy it generated, Bhola Bharamali is a fine piece of poetry.

Raw.S.

BHOLE, KESHAV VAMAN (Marathi; b. 1896, d. 1977) was a well known music composer, critic, director and diligent student of drama, film and cricket. His family originally hailed from Pune, but his father, Vaman Anant Bhole, migrated to Berar. He gradually rose to the position of Assistant Executive Engineer in the Government service and settled in Amaravati.

Born just after his father's death, Keshavrao Bhole was the youngest of his six brothers. His father was an avid listener of music and used to play on Sitar. His large house used to hum with musical performance of various vocalists and instrumentalists. Naturally, young Keshav became attracted to music. This attachment to music later become his life-long passion. Keshavrao's fondness for music became so consuming that he left his medical studies for which he had come to Bombay and became associated with a group of theatre-goers who later founded a neo-theatrical company called Natya-Manvantara. It was during this period that he got married to Durga Kelekar (later Mrs. Jyotsna Bhole), who also rose to commendable heights in theatre and music. In July 1933 Jyotsna Bhole made her maiden appearance as heroine in Andhalyanchi Shala. Staged in Bombay by the Natya-Manvantara, the play took the audience by storm, mainly because of the two lyrics exquisitely sung by her, tunes of which were set by Keshavrao Bhole himself. The couple suddenly came into limelight, Keshavrao by his lovely, appropriate and fluent tunes, and his wife by her melifluous voice and singing. Keshavrao became a symbol of neo-musicians.

In 1933 Keshavrao was admitted to the well known Prabhat Film Company as a music director to succeed Govindrao Tembe. His creative ability of music composition was now seen in full bloom in successive movies, such as 'Amritamanthan', 'Sant Tukaram' 'Kumku', 'Maza Mulga', 'Sant Jnaneshvar', 'Sant Sakhu', 'Chandrasena' and others. Outside the pictures also he set to tunes many other poems and songs. Towards the end of his career he became the chief of the music section of All India Radio, Bombay.

Under the pseudonym 'Ekalavya' Bhole wrote a number of articles on contemporary classical musicians in the weekly Vasundhara, which were later on collected in a book called Ajache Prasiddha Gayak (1933). The same book was enlarged later on in 1949 with additions under the title Sangitache Mankari. He also wrote under the pen-name 'Suddha-Saranga'. His technical outlook and biting satire with outspoken statements are seen in some of his later books such as Avajachi Duniya (1948), Astai (1962) and Antara (1979). Vasant Kakachi Patre (1964), Maze Sangit (1964), and Je Athavate Te (1974) are his other books. The last one narrates his reminiscences. By and large, Keshavrao's writings have contributed a good deal in creating a critical awareness and a classical taste among the music lovers.

Ar.M.

BHOSALE, SARPHOJI II (Marathi; b. 1777, d. 1832) was also known as Sarabhendra Bhupala. He ruled over Tanjavur from 1798 to 1832, succeeding Amar Singh.

Sarphoji had his education under the tutor, Frederick Schwartz, a German missionary, who gave him Western type of education, Sarphoji was also instructed in Sanskrit and Marathi. Sarphoji could speak fluent English and knew Telugu and Tamil languages as well.

Sarphoji was a great lover of music and art. He founded educational institutions, both of Western and traditional type, for his subjects. He wanted his people to imbibe whatever is good in Eastern and Western cultures. He started schools for teaching music and dramatic art. He established Dharma Sabha, Nyaya Sabha and Mudrita Sabha in which scholars were appointed. Sarphoji established one Dhanvantari Mahal for physicians to carry out research in indigenous and allopathic systems of medicines. He was very fond of horses. He was an expert in shooting too.

He patronized men of letters and artists from every branch. He travelled extensively throughout India and visited famous shrines.

Sarphoji collected many valuable manuscripts, books in classical (Western and Indian) and modern languages, attractive paintings, and beautiful photographs. All his collections are preserved in the Saraswati Mahal Library at Tanjavur. It is primarily due to his efforts in collecting the manuscripts that the present Saraswati Mahal Library owes its existence.

Sarphoji was a fine blend of scholarship and creativity. Considering his learning, the Royal Society of London made him the honorary member of the Society (1828), an honour bestowed for the first time on any king of the native state of the then British India.

Sarphoji wrote in Marathi the Nirupan type of narrative poetry, Yaksagana dramas, dance-verses, a travelogue and a book on medicine and some stray verses. A few works in Sanskrit and Tamil are also ascribed to him.

One of his unique contributions to Marathi language and the musical world is that he composed verses in Marathi to fit in the South Indian style of dances.

The following are his published Marathi works Nilakantha Kulalvara Charitra, Nilabhilla Charitra, Kiratarjuniya, Panchakshari Vibhuti Shivaratri Katha, Umamahesvara Varta. These five works are grouped under the title Nirupan Guccha (Part I) and are edited by T.R. Bhimarao and published by the T.M.S. Saraswati Mahal Library, Tanjavur, 1972.

FURTHER WORKS : A. Krishnaswami Mahadick Rao Saheb and others (ed.), Karvyache Sahityache Jinnas, (Saraswati Mahal Library, Tanjavur, 1958). Travelogue: A. Krishnaswami Mahadick Rao Saheb (ed.), Tristhali Yatrechya Lavanya, (T.M.S. Saraswati Mahal Library, Tanjavur, 1952). Medicine: A. Krishnaswami Mahadick Rao Saheb (ed.), Sharabhendra Vaidya Ratnavali, (T.M.S. Saraswati Mahal Library, Tanjavur, 1952).

M.R.D.

BHOSALE, SAHAJIRAJE (Marathi, b. 1684, d. 1711) was the son of Venkoji who was the step brother of Shivaji. Born in Bangalore, he ruled over Tanjavur succeeding his father. He was the most distinguished Maratha ruler of Tanjavur. He was an efficient administrator and personally led the army to Jinji to help Rajarama against the Mughals. He was an ardent devotee of Tyagaraja of Tiruvarur. It is said that only after the performance of the Puja of Tyagaraja at Tiruvarur, he used to take his mid-day meals.

Sahaji, learned scholar and a great linguist, wrote yaksagana plays, yaksagana prabandhas and devotional lyrics in Marathi as well as composed works in Telugu, Tamil, Hindi and Sanskrit. He patronised eminent men of letters, musicians and artists. He was responsible for the great renaissance in the literary and cultural field in the Southern region. He was the pioneer of the Marathi yaksagana plays and his Lakshminarayana Kalyana (1690) is regarded as the first play in Marathi.

All his works are available in the manuscript-form at Maharaja Sorphoji's Saraswati Mahal Library, Tanjavur.

His published works are Hariharavilas, Lakshminarayana Kalyana, Subhadraparinaya, Ganga Kaveri Samvada, Panchabhashavilasa (Yaksagana plays), Tyagesh Pade, Sankarakali Natana Samvada Natakam, Sri Tyagaraja Vilas and Rasika-Karnamrita (Prose Commentary on Stri-Laksana).

M.R.D.

BHRAMAR (Nepali) is the first full-blown modern Nepali novel written by Rupnarayan Sinha (1904-1955). Sinha graduated with distinction from St. Xavier's College, Calcutta and after passing Law under Calcutta University soon distinguished himself as the foremost lawyer of north Bengal.

The writing of the novel Bhramar (The Rover, 1936) has got an interesting background. The period that lay between the first and the second World Wars was one of rapid burgeoning of Nepali consciousness. Bhramar assimilates in itself this zeitgeist. Being dissatisfied with the then existing state of affairs, the novelist longed for a change that would be gratifying and beautiful to the extent of being elysian and idyllic. This explains the genesis and the range of romanticism in Rupnarayan Sinha. His was the first romantic Nepali novel and thus a trend-setter. Strangely enough he never labelled himself a romanticist. Indeed he believed he was pursuing idealism. He said, the novel should aim at setting up a high and unblemished ideal for the society to follow. His idealism, however, showed itself to be more aesthetic and romantic than moral and realistic.

As the sun was setting in the west Indra Shekhar and Maya parted ways and love between them came to a sudden end. Later while viewing the sun-rise from the Tiger Hill, Darjeeling, Indra Shekhar and Veena fell for each other. Shekhar of Don Juan proclivity loved Veena who was Lakshmi manifest. Realisation dawns on Shekhar as how indifferently he had been hurting the society all along. Repentant, he leaves his Darjeeling abode behind to penitentially serve the Nepali community settled in other parts of India. He sojourns as far as Prom in Burma. Gouri Shekhar and all who knew him entreat him to return home and to Veena to whom love of Shekhar was her whole existence. On landing at Calcutta he reads notice in papers insistently calling him back home. He sees it was a personal call made by Maya who was now blissfully in love with the honest and upright Mohan but who, when Shekhar had turned repentant, had refused insolently to have to do anything with his request for forgivness for his past libertinism. It was indeed this refusal of hers that had made Shekhar feel that he was a social castaway, an unwanted derelict, and he had set out on the penitential roving. He returns home heroically after bravely rescuing Vijaya at Calcutta from the hands of the ruffians. The former rake Shekhar, wrecker of women and society, has now turned a new leaf and become their protector.

Rupnarayan Sinha knew his Sarat and Bankim well, besides other European classics, mostly modern. Sinha's mastery of the Nepali language was great and he was an inimitable stylist. His characterization is superb. Indeed Bhramar has been justly regarded as the first album of Nepali fictional characters.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Indra Bahadur Rai, Nepali Upanyaska Adharharu, 1914; Krishnachandra Singh Pradhan, Nepali Upanyas Ra Upanyaskar, 1980.

Ke.G.

BHULE BISARE CHITRA (Hindi) is one of the best novels of Bhagvati Charan Verma, a modern Hindi novelist of repute. The novel is a representative work based on the social history of the later half of nineteenth and the first decades of twentieth century. Verma has presented in this major novel, the changing socio-political pattern of Indian life picking on a family of Indian feudatory for the purpose.

The novel has a wide perspective within which the novelist has successfully attempted to tell the story of the four successive generations of a feudal family. The primary aim in telling this story is to present the nature of the ever-raging struggle between the individual and the society from time to time. The first generation is represented by Shivlal, Radeylal, Gajraj Singh, Barjor Singh etc., the second by Jwala Prasad and Jai Devi, the third by Ganga Prasad and Satwanti and the fourth by Gyan.

Through the four generation plot, the writer has tried to depict the changing outlook and mentality of the people. Shivlal represents the traditional conduct and behaviour of the dying feudatory. He believes in flattery, and is earning money by hook or by crook. By these alleged virtues, he becomes successful in getting his son Jwala Prasad appointed as Naib Tahsildar of Ghatampur Tahsil, district Kanpur. (U.P.).

With the story of Jwala Prasad, the novelist successfully attempts to depict the modern middle class family. Jwala Prasad tries to leave the old world for the new in every respect in the matter of tradition, belief, likes, dislikes and outlook. But this was the time when on the one hand, the feudatory with its worn-out life-values, was dying; on the other, new values were yet to take shape. Thus, Jwala Prasad finds himself in an indecisive and fluid state of mind. He finds a sort of confusion prevalent everywhere. It becomes difficult for him to fit in the prevailing confusion.

In the third generation, Jwala Prasad's son Ganga Prasad becomes a deputy collector. He loves Santo, the wife of a rich businessman. This is more of lust than love. Here the novelist is unveiling the anti-social and irresponsible element that leads to exploitation and degeneration of human values. Radhakrishna's wife flirts with Watts and as a reward, Radhakrishna gets the title of 'Rai Bahadur'; Santo becomes 'Rani Satwant Kumari' by exploiting her youth and beauty. Here the writer hints at the vices of capitalist system where everything, even the chastity of one's wife, is a saleable commodity and is evaluated in terms of wealth and riches. The writer has attempted to depict such degraded and immoral state of the so-called V.I.P. and the capitalist class in contemporary society.

The fourth and the last generation of the novel, represented by Gyan, has developed an intense sense of nationalism. Naval and Vidya go to jail, inspired by the nationalist sentiment. The process of change is on. Millions of people are endeavouring to usher in a new age, inspired by a new awakening to life and its potentialities. This incessant march will never cease. The representative of the second generation, Jwala Prasad, fails to understand this new trend. He is rather baffled. And the novel ends on that note.

Bhule Bisare Chitra (1959) thus tells the story of changing Indian society right from the dawn of the modern period, i.e. 1850 to 1930 through four generations. It was the period when traditional values of Indian life had degenerated into selfishness, confrontation and sycophancy. The British were encouraging the feudatory for their selfish ends. The newly educated middle class was trying to cut down the roots of rotten old traditions for constructing a new society in order to make the country free. In this age, a new social, political religious and literary consciousness was emerging. The country was awakened. The last generation of the novel represents the real awakening of India.

In Bhule Bisare Chitra, Verma has presented the picture of an age which has a unique place in the history of India's political, social and cultural life. In this period, freedom fighters struggled hard. Several movements were launched under Mahatma Gandhi's leadership. These movements affected every class of our society and brought about a change in the values of life. Divided in five parts, Bhule Bisare Chitra with its life-like characters, delineates the three stages of India's freedom movement.

One of the most successful among all his novels, Bhule Bisare Chitra, propounds that the downfall and deprivation of moral values of feudalistic class were due to its craze for sex, greed for wealth and love for show and pomposity. The degradation of the middle class is due to their inherent conflict. The feudalistic atmosphere is pervaded by hatred, jealousy, knavery, repulsion, corruption and obtrusiveness. The fall of such a rotten society was inevitable.

In Bhule Bisare Chitra, Verma has made a remarkable use of language. The natural and smooth flow of language, sincere and straightforward manner of expression is notable in the whole of the novel. His realistic portrayal and powerful characterisation is commendable. It represents one of the Hindi's outstanding achievements in the post Independence period in the genre of novel.

S.D.M.

BHUMIGITA (Kannada) is a collection of seven poems of Gopala Krishna Adiga, one of the forerunners of the new school of Kannada poetry. The credit of giving it a definite shape and investing it with new dimensions justly goes to him. There is a marked change in the very attitude of the poet towards the aims and objectives of poetry and the means he resorts to in achieving them. His Bhumigita marks an advancement in this direction. In fact, this could be considered his distinct contribution to the Navya School of poetry. What attracts our attention is his concern for the function proper of creative literature.

Bhumigita tries to hint at the futile struggle of life. The use of disconnected imagery, dream technique, erotic symbolism .etc., have rendered the poem difficult to understand, and have thereby contributed to its failure on the whole. However, some of the best lines of Adiga could be cited from this poem.

Instead of satirizing, Adiga often resorts to angry outbursts. Halemaney, Mandi (Old Masters of the House) intends to satirize the old masters who are ever of the fleecing type. In contrast is 'Neharu Nivruttaraguvudilla' (Nehru Will not Retire) Adiga says:

It is on account of him that the stage looks full;
otherwise, the company goes bankrupt the very moment;

Haddu (Eagle/Boundary), symbolising the movements of an eagle, indicates the limitations to which living beings are subject. The poem almost reaches sublimity in the lines:

Even the target of an arrow has a contour;
The drawn-up sword, the explosive bomb and the sharpness of the teeth and the nail have always their own boundaries;
Even the boundless ocean has several,
nay hundreds of boundaries beyond the horizon.

In Prathane (Prayer) the poet aspires for art and values that "teach him to stand aright without bowing, that does not make him a horse to ride upon".

Like 'Haddu', 'Bhuta' (Ghost/Past) also resorts to pun on the words. It is indicative of the helpless state into which the society is forced. A symbolic representation thus follows:

I am aware of the techniques of driving away the evil spirits and offering homage to departed souls.
But, I have forgotten the very hymn;
the magic wand is being waved in vain

Sharadgita is a social song. It is indicative of the serious concern of the poet for society. Though the poet lays bare the conceit of the society, he is aware of the peculiar hold of the tradition which suffocates its very being.

One of the salient features of his poetry is his use of the language. In a way, he explores the possibilities of the language. According to him, what cannot manifest itself in a language cannot be called poetry. Within the limitations of the spoken language alone he expresses his experiences. As a result, the pleasure of life does not normally find its manifestation in the poetry of Adiga. It is the agony and bitterness of life that try to find expression in his compositions. At times, the best of his poetry is almost a dialogue with his own self. It is one of the tragedies of modern writing that a big gulf separates the reader from its author. Bhumigita is no exception to this.

U.R.A.R.

BHUPALI (Marathi) is a very old form of devotional song. With 'Shejarati' the deity is supposed to go to sleep. With Bhupali the devotees awaken the God. 'Kakadarati' is performed a bit earlier. Yet there is a very significant difference between the Arati and the Bhupali. Arati is sung as a part of a ritual, while Bhupali is more or less devotee's personal, heart to heart talk with the Lord. Of course Bhupali, in ancient times, was a group performance, as is evident by the Bhupalis, written by saints and devotees of the Lord. But all Bhupalis are not necessarily addressed only to God. Many homely and popular Bhupalis extol the grace of the Lord and invoke people to follow the path of Bhakti in numerous ways. From the middle ages right upto the beginning of the 20th century, elderly people and especially ladies in a Maharashtrian household used to recite or sing such Bhupalis, early in the morning when they would start their daily household chores like doing 'Sada-Sammarjana' (dusting and sprinkling) and drawing the Rangoli designs like the cow's footmark' (Goshapada) and the Swastika.

The term 'Bhupali' is rather peculiar when taken into consideration with the Gujarati term 'Prabhatiyun' and the Hindi parallels 'Prabhati' or 'Prabhatika'. The only possible explanation is that sometime in early middle ages, this sort of the devotional songs, were set to the tunes in Raga Bhupali, even though it was sung in the morning. Raga Bhupali, very much akin to Raga Bhupa, is traditionally sung at the beginning of a music concert after dusk. The famed "Ghanasyam Sundara Shridhara" Bhupali, composed by Honaji Shahir was set to the Bhupali-tune in V. Shantaram's picture "Amar Bhupali", following the traditional way of singing a Bhupali.

Mostly all saint poets and other devotees right from the days of the great saint Jnaneshvar (13th century) have written Bhupalis. But only a few of them are now available. Jnaneshwar's Bhupali-cum-Kakad Arati: "Uthi Uthi ba Gopala," is very popular and is also claimed to be that of Mukteshwar, the great classicist grandson of Sant Eknath. Vishnudas Nama has written a Bhupali in the same strain. These Bhupali songs are composed in the matra-vritta or Jati-Patita-pavana, which is more suitable to be set to a musical Raga. Honaji's famous Bhupali is an illustration of this. Incidentally it should be noted that the illiterate Honaji Shahir seems to have been influenced by Ekanath's similar songs and Shridhar Kavi's 'puranic' writings about Krishna. Honaji composed his 'lawani' songs in the early decades of 19th century.

The other sort of Bhupali is more homely and was chanted by individual people in their houses. Their verse form is that of the Marathi 'Ghanakshari', wherein a line contains 30 'akshara matras' or the 'short' ('Laghu') measures of the syllabic quantity. The Bhupali to the Sacred Rivers by some unknown writer of old is a great favourite with women of Maharashtra. Ramdas, saint poet and the legendary Guru of Shivaji, has written half a dozen Bhupali songs. His Bhupalis to Rama and Ganapati are very much on the lips of the housewives. But his Bhupalis about Vishnu and Shankara are like his 'Aratis', distinguished by the juxtapostion of colours and sounds, and are known by the references to the nuances of dominant colours in them, viz., the white and the yellow, the snowy white of Shankara's surroundings, on the slopes of the Himalayas and the glittering golden of Vishnu's personal effects and paraphernalia. The 'Pivali Bhupali' (about Shankara) and the 'Dhavali Bhupali' (about Vishnu) are nick-names given to them by popular imagination.

Both of these categories of Bhupali are rhythmically set to the Dhumali Tala, especially to its Bhajani Theka. The third category is different in the rhythmic movement.

Of this (third) category only one Bhupali is assured of a lasting interest. It is composed in the rhythmic 5 matra 'avartanas', and thus it could easily fit in the rhythmic beats of Zapatala, which has 10 matra 'avartanas' of the Tabla or Dholaka Tala. Set to Raga Bhairavi in the slow-paced 'Dhima Zapatala,' it evinces a unique beauty of composition. It starts with the words "Uthi Gopalaji Chaal Dhenukade". ("Rise oh boy, Gopala, and go quickly to the bellowing cows"). This, in the melodious voice of Late Laxmibai Jadhav, had once thrilled the audience by the ever-sweet 'swaras' of Raga Bhairavi. This Bhupali is a perfect parellel of the famous Gujarati 'Prabhatiyun' of Sant Narasi Mehta: "Jaga Jo Jadava Krishna govalia" which is composed in the lilting 'Zulana' measure, and is akin to its Marathi counter-part in the Jati 'Mohamaya' measure.

There are some other Bhupali compositions in the Dina-Vatsala Jati, and other matric measures. But they are not very significant and so they require no further mention. One limitation of the Marathi Bhupalis is that there seems to be no composition in Marathi that is in the 6 matra measures of Dadara Theka or in 12 matra quick-paced Theka of Ekatala just as we see in the famous Hindi (Braja) Prabhatika "Jagiye Raghunatha Kunvara". Perhaps it is an unintentional act of omission or; may be, Marathi has lost such compositions in the passage of time.

N.G.J.

BHUSHAN (Hindi; b. 1613, d. 1715) Bhusan's personality is shrouded in mystery, so much so that his real name also is not known. Bhushan is his pen name or, to be more precise, a decoration given by Rudra Solanki, the king of Chitrakut. He belonged to an intelectually distinguished Brahmin family of Tikwanpur in Kanpur district. His father Ratnakar Tripathi, himself a good scholar, had four sons–Chintamani, Bhushan, Matiram and Nilakanth (Jatashankar) all of whom were reputed poets of the time. Bhushan showed a distinct and deep inclination to and taste for the heroic sentiment. As was customary in those days, every artist had to seek a patron so that he could spend his time in ease and develop his art. Bhushan went to many courts but could not find a patron of his liking till he came in contact with Shiva, the famous Maratha King. Shiva was the hero of his dreams in whose praise numbers flowed in effusion from Bhushan's pen. Bhushan not only enjoyed Shiva's patronage but also his admiration and regard. There was another patron, Chhatrasal, the king of Panna (Madhya Pradesh), who elicited encomium from Bhushan by his heroic deeds. Shiva and Chhatrasal were not mere princes like many others in that age but they were embodiments of the national heroic aspirations of the people. That is why their praise is not the praise of any individual but of the lofty ideals and qualities which the people wanted to cherish and emulate and which these two showed in abundance.

Three works of Bhushan are available: Shivaraj-bhushan, Shiva-bavani and Chhatrasal-dashak.
In the first two, Shiva's triumphant victories are eulogised and in the last those of Chhatrasal. Bhushan's poetry is elevating where he is free from the fetters of poetics. Really speaking, either by temperament or by equipment, poetics was not his field. If he seems to falter at times, it is invariably under the strain of observance of the conventions and rules of poetics. He does not hesitate to twist words to fit them in the metre with the result that even familiar words tend to look unfamiliar. Many a time even grammar is ignored. But where Bhushan is able to avoid these pitfalls, his language keeps pace with the content and the result is superb. His words echo and re-echo in the ears leaving behind a lasting impression of vigour and vitality of which is he is the best representative in the mediaeval Hindi literature. Bhushan's poetry is full of vigour and bubbles with the heroic sentiment.

De.S.

BHUSNURMATH, S.S (Kannada; b.1911) in the Belgaum District, Bhusnurmath after completing his education at Belgaum and Dharwar, started as a lecturer in his own College and rose to be Professor of Kannada in the Karnatak University. He has been a devoted and devout student of the teachings and the philosophy of the Viarsaiva saints.

His Shoonyasampadaneya Vimarshe which won the Sahitya Akademi Award, is an extensive analysis of the philosophical basis and interpretation of the mystical and secular teachings involving an elucidation of the various steps and phases of spiritual development as enunciated by different Virasaiva saints and mystics. Almost all his works concern Virasaiva thought, teaching and philosophy. His recently published magnum opus, Bhavya Manava, an epic poem, develops the concept of a sublime human being on the basis of the spiritual achievement of the great sharanas. The book was honoured by the State Sahitya Akademi as the best creative work of the year 1983. He has edited a number of works pertaining to the field of his favourite interest and three other works, Paramarsha, Kashmiradinda and Kalyanakka, also deal with one or the other aspect of Virasaiva philosophy and teaching. The State Sahitya Akademi in recognition of his scholarly work honoured him with its annual award in 1969.

V.M.I.

BHUWANESHWAR SINGH BHUVAN (Maithili; b. 1907, d. 1945) was a modern Maithili writer of eminence. He is chiefly remembered for his preface to his first collection of poems called Ashadh (1936) in which he declared for the first time the birth of modern poetry. A scion of the Royal family at Darbhanga, he lived all his life a recluse at Muzaffarpur. He was a fearless critic also and the monthly magazine called Vibhuti which he brought out during 1937-41 had many new features which were not generally conventional. He also edited an old Kirtaniya drama of Ramadas Jha. A versatile writer, he also wrote in Hindi In 1958 his original works were collected as Bhuvan Bharati by Durganath Jha 'Srish'.

Some regard him as the harbinger of revolutionary poetry of today, a progressive poet.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Durganath Jha 'Srish', Maithili Sahitya ka Itihas (Bharati Pustak Kendra, Darbhanga, 1983).

J.M.

BHUWANESHWAR (Hindi; b. 1910, d. 1957) Endowed with an incisive intellect, a deep understanding of social afflictions and complexities, Bhuwaneshwar ranks as one of the pioneers of the western style of one-act play in Hindi. Born in Shahjehanpur (U.P.) where he also got his education he developed a keen interest in western authors and thinkers whom he had studied rather thoroughly. He had a strong liking for Ibsen and Shaw among the playwrights and for Lawrence because of his ruthless exposure of human frailties and moralistic pretensions. Freud also seems to have exercised considerable influence in moulding his outlook. His experience of life is repkete with bitterness incongruity, discrepancy and abnormality and his one-act plays, therefore, give free vent to intense repugnence, uncontrollable wrath and a sense of deep revolt against established social practices and norms.

Bhuwaneshwar initiated the tradition of one-act plays patterned on the western mould. His first creative piece 'Shyama: Ek Vaivahik Vidambana' (Shyama: tragedy of a marriage) published in Prem Chand's Hans in 1933 was followed in quick succession by Shaitan, Ek Samyahin Samyavadi, Pratibha ka Vivah, Rahsya Romanch and Lottery which were all compiled and published in Karvan (The Caravan) in 1936. These plays bear the stamp of rationalist western playwrights especially Ibsen and Shaw in the treatment of the theme, the content and the analysis of the problem involved. The philosophy of life enunciated by him in the appendix reminds one of the sex-oriented life view of Freud and the biting satire of Shaw.

Bhuwaneshwar's later one-act plays, however, reflect a widening of his vision and are proof that he overgrew his preoccupation with sex and love triangles to sympathetically understand and portray social afflictions and miseries, Mrityu, Hum akelay nahin hain, Sava ath baje, Strike and Usar may be mentioned in this context. In Adamkhor (Part I) published in Pant's Roopabh (1940), he reflects a thorough realistic out look relentlessly unfolding the bitter realities of life. His adaptation of Gogol's Inspector General, his Roshni aur Aag and Kathputlian are all experimental writings which helped him impart an unprecedented maturity to the genre. Photographer ke Samne (1945), Tambe ke Kire (1946) reveal man's unlimited greed with telling effect. In 1948, he turned his attention to history and his Itihas ki Kenchul was followed by a number of historical one act plays like Azadi Ki Ninu (Foundation of Independence, 1949), Jerusalem (1949), Sikandar (1949), Akbar (1950) and Chengiz Khan (1950). They reveal an unmistakeable national fervour. His last work was titled Seenkon ki Gari (1950).

Bhuwaneshwar's plays are forceful and effective. His stage directions-poetic, expressive and effective-clothed in a rather stinging style, give firm proof of his appreciation of the unlimited potential of the medium and its craft and his determination to exploit it fully. The inherent conflict of his plays starts solidifying with the introduction of dialogues, it gains momentum with the interaction of characters and their circumstances and then the inevitable denouement takes us to the point of culmination and the drop scene. With a few master strokes he creates the requisite impression of the characters. His probing eye unfolds the weaknesses, the evils and the ugliness of the upper class in all its facets. The extent of soot and filth underneath the thick cover of idealism is mercilessly exposed by him in a wide variety of portrayals. He makes no effort, even indirectly to suggest any solutions to social problems.

Bhuwaneshwar is a significant playwright in Hindi by virtue of his historical position as a pioneer and also because of the literary excellence and effective impression that he is able to create so successfully.

Ma.C.

BHUYAN, NAKULCHANDRA (Assamese; b. 1895, d. 1968) is a noted playwright and short-story writer. He had formal education only upto the standard of Entrance Examination which he passed in 1916. Nakulchandra started his career as a librarian of the Dibrugarh District Club and switched over to other departments such as the Dibru Sadia Railway and the Deputy Commissioner's Office, Tezpur, as a clerk. Finally, he came to serve the tea gardens of Assam in various capacities for a long period of twentyeight years till he retired in 1954. Even in the drab life of the tea gardens Nakulchandra could produce a series of plays on the Assam history and a series of short-story collections besides other miscellaneous writings. Although he started writing even when he was a school student, his talent got the fertile soil of growth as a playwright, after coming in contact with the Ban stage of Tezpur. It was his plays that established Nakulchandra ultimately as a famous man of letters in Assamese.

His first venture towards play-writing is Jerengar Sati (1924), with a few dramatic scenes written in blank verse. Another play of the same period is Swayambara, based on the episode of Nal-Damayanti and published in the popular monthly of the time-Bardoichila. His dramatic writing had its full fruition in his historical play Badan Barphukan (1927), Chandrankanta Simha (1931), Bidrohi Maran and Numali Kunwari (1963). In the first two there is a dramatic portrayal of the tragic incidents of the Assam history, the internal chaos and intrigues in the administration that invited the external Burmese aggressions and the fall, consequently, of the age-old Ahom administration. While maintaining fidelity to the facts of history, Nakulchandra's inventive imagination added to the texture of his plays some imaginary situations and characters that make his works immensely popular. The third Bidrohi Maran is based on the theme of Mayamara rebellion during the reign of King Lakshmi Simha (1769-1780). The fourth Numali Kunwari may be called a heroic tale of imagination based on a theme related to the reign of Ahom king Chuhungmung in the thirties of the 16th century. Behind the creation of these historical plays, particularly the first three, there is a deep urge of the poet-playwright's warmth of patriotism, reminding the people of their lost independence and adding a stimulus to India's struggle for freedom from the British Imperialistic rule. Nakulchandra's attempt on a non-historical theme is his Sahu Ai (1925).

Besides writing a series of plays Nakulchandra wrote also a series of short stories and thus became one of the pioneers in the field. And his short-story collections are: Chorangchowar Chora (1918), Jonowali (1933) and Galpar Sarai (1962). His Bahagi (1923) is a very important anthology of Assamese Bihu songs. Apart from these, he wrote a book for children named Sonhatar Vishma (1956) and a biographical work called Radhakanta Handique Dangaria (1961). His solitary attempt at writing the history of a famous Assamese clan is Bara Bhuyar Buranji (1916).

Nakulchandra was closely associated with the management of the Chandrakanta Handique Bhavan of the Asam Sahitya Sabha, Jorhat, towards the later part of his life. He became the President of the Sabha in 1966 and died, before the completion of his term of office.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Harichandra Bhattacharyya, Asamiya Natya Sahityar Jilingani (Gauhati, 1968); Nanda Talukdar, Chira Chenehi Mor Bhasha Janani (Gauhati, 1976).

Pu.S.

BHUYAN, SURYAKUMAR (Assamese; b. 1894, d. 1964) was a scholar, poet, historian and an educationist of repute. Having passed the M.A. examination in English literature in 1916 he became a teacher of English in Cotton College, Gauhati, and finally retired as the Director of Public Instructions from the government service in 1949. He was awarded Ph.D. and D.Litt. degrees by the University of London for his research contributions to the field of history.

After his retirement from the government service he was nominated to the Rajya Sabha where he espoused the cause of Assam during the two-year term of his tenure. In 1954 he was appointed Honorary Director of the Department of Historical and Antiquarian Studies which was practically his own creation, though it was taken over by the Government after it attained a definite shape. He served as the Vice-Chancellor of Gauhati University for three years, from 1956 to 1959. He presided over the modern section of the Indian Historical Congress in the Gwalior session of 1952. He was also elected President of the 22nd session of the Asam Sahitya Sabha held at Shillong in 1953.

Bhuyan regularly contributed to the Assamese literature since he was a student. He contributed several biographies of notable persons of India. Among his important biographical works are: Anandaram Barooah (1920), Gopalkrishna Gokhale, Rabindranath Tagore (1920) and Ramani Gabharu (1951). Besides the above individual biographies he also published a large number of biographical sketches incorporated in his two collections Jonaki (1928) and Chaneki (1928). His biography of Anandaram Barooah is decidedly one of the best biographies in Assamese, containing as it does many revealing information about the great Sanskrit scholar in addition to his biographical detail and scholastic achievements.

Although Bhuyan was a teacher of English literature, he was essentially a historian. His historical works on the medieval and early modern periods, both in English and Assamese, have brought to focus a few of the most prominent personalities of history and their times. Lachit Barphukan and His Times (1947), Atan Buragohain and His Times (1957), Anglo-Assamese Relations (1950), Studies in the Literature of Assam (1956), and Assamese Literature-Ancient and Modern are some of the important works published in English. The number of Assamese books is no less impressive. Ahomar Din, Buranjir Vani, (1961), Saraighatar Suvachani (1971), and Lachit Barphukan (1972) Swargadeu Rajeswar Sinha (1974), are notable historical works in Assamese.

Bhuyan was the founder Honorary Director of the Department of Historical and Antiquarian Studies, Gauhati, where more than thousand manuscripts are preserved. From this institution Bhuyan has published nearly forty valuable works, mostly chronicles. Most of the chronicles of medieval Assam, some with English translations, were edited by Bhuyan.

Bhuyan's contribution to Assamese literature is of no mean order. He published a few short stories embodied in the collection Panchami (1927) and a few critical literary essays incorporated in Tripadi (1960). His romantic poems composed in his youthful days contain some of the best specimens of Assamese romantic poetry. His poetry dealing with love and patriotism are delicate combination of romantic sensibility and sensitive quest of truth and beauty. One such poem Apon Sur (In Quest of My Personal Note) is a fine expression of poetic insight, imagination, dignity of expression ånd personal philosophy. Nirmali is a fine collection of his lyrics. Bhuyan writes a balanced idiomatic and succinct prose. His historical writings couched in a readable language are marked by objectivity and vividness of detail. Bhuyan will always be remembered for bringing to light a series of old chronicles which otherwise would have been swept into the dung-hill of oblivion.

S.S.

BIBLIOGRAPHY (Kannada). Among the earlier attempts in this direction, A. Grant's Native Publications in the Bombay Presidency up to December 1864 deserves to be taken note of. Among the 898 entries it contains few related to Kannada. This work was done under the instructions of the India Office, London, in response to a representation by the Royal Asiatic Society. Grant himself was not satisfied with this catalogue. He has ascribed the imperfections of the catalogue mainly to (i) the non-availability of proper documents in the printing presses; (ii) the negligent attitude of the printers and publishers who failed to appreciate its usefulness; (iii) the attributing of malafide intentions to the government; (iv) the non-disclosure of names in respect of non-respectable publications: (v) the lack of proper appreciation on the part of some Deupty Education Inspectors; and (vi) the newness of the venture. Indeed, it was again Grant who suggested that legislative measures should be taken to force the publishers to submit two copies of their publications to the Government. This suggestion was accepted by the Government and acted upon during 1867. The fate of his other suggestion that the Government should purchase two copies each of the publications is not known with any certainty. The situation remains the same even to this day.

It was L.D. Barnett who in 1910 compiled a catalogue of Kannada books in the British Museum. The second volume of the Indian National Bibliography contains details regarding the Kannada publications along with those of some other languages. Though not in the strictest sense, Karnataka Kavicharite (in 3 volumes) by R. Narasimhachar, Karnataka Kavichariteya Anukta Kritisuchi by Shivanna, the Kannada Hastapratigala Varnatmaka Suchi (in 8 volumes) of the Institute of Kannada Studies of the University of Mysore, the Sirigannada Granthakartara Charitra Kosa by Venkatesha Sangli, the Adhunika Kannada Barahagararu of the Prasaranga of the University of Mysore, Srinivasa Havanur's Ondu Savira Kannada Pustakagalu, the Govinda Pai Vanmaya Darshana by Srinivasa Havanur and M.V. Nayak, the Gokaka Granthavali, by H.M. Nayak and the Kannada Janapada Grantha Suchi again by H.M. Nayak are some of the publications which partially or fully fulfil the requirements. A cyclostyled catalogue of 1200 important works in Kannada, prepared by K.S. Deshpande for the Sahitya Akademi, has been made available to the United States Library of Congress and other institutions.

Some bibliographical material has also been provided as appendix to the volumes in the series Kannada Writers and Their Work published by the Institute of Kannada Studies, 8 numbers of which have been so far published. As appendices to Felicitation volumes also, some bibliographical material has come forth as in the case of Kuvempu, Karanth, Masti, Govinda Pai and others. The Karnataka Bibliography (vol. 1) by T.V.V. Shastry and Lila Subramanyam is devoted exclusively to literature relating to Karnataka. Basava Sahitya Darpana by S.R. Gunjal is another work which provides a catalogue of works and articles of Basavanna. T.V. Subramanyam and Lila Subramanyam have given us a bibliographical account of the works both of and on Gandhi which was published as a part of the Prabuddha Karnataka (Vol. 51, No. 4).

However, the credit for recognising this academic need and showing a serious concern in this regard goes to the Prasaranga of the University of Mysore. Kannada being one of the most flourishing languages of this sub-continent, the problem was of an enormous magnitute. With the first printed book coming out in 1817, namely William Carey's A Grammar of the Curnatika Language, printed at Serampur, Calcutta, details regarding nearly 40000 volumes published till 1968 had to be systematically collected and scientifically presented.

In no single place were all the printed works available. It was therefore a big task to search out each and every corner of the well known and less known libraries and even some personal collections of reputed scholars and lovers of literature. Though it was originally planned to accommodate these details in about six volumes, a seventh volume had to be published. The first volume published in 1971 has catalogued as many as 1449 entries relating to the Pure Sciences. General Science, Physics, Mathematics, Engineering, Technology, Chemistry, Geology, Biology, Botany, Zoology Agricultural Science, Medical Science and Home Science. For the first time people came to know that scientific and technical literature of this magnitude was available in Kannada. The second volume was published in 1975. It related to General Subjects, Useful Arts, Fine Arts, Linguistics, Metaphysics, Religion and Philosophy. The number of entries has come to 5327. The third volume relating to literature in general and to poetry in particular has some 4155 entries. The Fourth volume, relating to prose in general, drama, short stories and essays, and published during 1974, has listed some entries. The fifth volume brought out during 1979 is devoted to the novels whose number has gone up to 2571. The sixth volume relating to children's literature was also brought out during the same year, since it was the International year of the Children. This volume has 3421 entries. The seventh volume, exclusively devoted to translations, was published in 1984, and has listed 1966 entries.

With regard to the publications since 1969, the situation has not been materially different although some material was available in the volumes of the Grantha Loak, a monthly exclusively devoted to the publication industry since 1976, and the volumes of the Pustaka Puravani which is now defunct. The volume relating to the period 1969-71, which has recorded 2722 entries, was brought out during 1974, while that of 1972, with 2488 publications enlisted, was published during 1977. Likewise the bibliographies for 1974-76 and 1977-80, brought out respectively during 1981 and 1985, have respectively recorded 3355 and 5163 entries. As these figures indicate, there has been an appreciable growth in the number of publications. Even during the worst hit years, i.e., during the last 3 or 4 years-this number has not gone below the average of 1200 of the previous decades.

This work is the result of active collaboration between scholars from the field of literature and doyens in the field of Library Science. This has been hailed as "an achievement of the first magnitude in the bibliographical world of India" and "a milestone in Indian Bibliography". These encomiums showered on the technical excellence of the third volume apply equally well to the other volumes also.

This bibliographical work has also had a deep bearing on the academic pursuits and research. Some of the presumptions held fast during the previous decades, with regard to the earliest work in the different genres, had to be set right in the light of the revelations of these volumes. For example Mitravinda Govinda by Singararya was supposed to be the first play in Kannada. But this credit now goes justly to Usha Parinaya Natakavu by T.S. Chikkodi. Likewise, the pride of honour of being the first social novel does not rest with Indira Bai of Gulavadi Venkata Rao, but goes now to Chandraprabha. It could now be safely declared that the first book of Essays happens to be Tunuka-Minuku (1912) by Eckacakra Bhaskara. Detailed checkings have also helped in correcting some of the misgivings. For example, Kamalaksa Padmagandhi of Venkatesh Bhima Rao Bhandiwad, which was supposed to be an adaptation of Romeo and Juliet, is now definitely known to be a novelette in Kannada. Likewise, the credit of being the first translator of Shakespearean plays into Kannada also does not go to Srikantesha Gowda, as has been claimed by a few, but to B. Venkatacharya for his narrative adaptation of the Comedy of Errors (1876) or to A. Ananda Rao's dramatic adaptation of Romeo and Juliet (1889).

However, it must be admitted that curiously enough, Mitravinda Govinda of Singararya does not find a place anywhere in the volumes of the Bibliography. Likewise, Gurunath Joshi's abridged translation of Ramacharita Manasa published by Minchinaballi, Dharwar during 1964, does not occur any where in these volumes. Some entires in the indices also suffer from misprints. These are not, however, big lapses anyway. The editors themselves have modestly stated that about 20% of the publications might have gone unnoticed by them in spite of their best efforts for reasons too obvious to need any elaboration.

As B.S. Keshavan, former Librarian of the National Library, Calcutta, who was himself involved in the National Bibliography Scheme, has rightly remarked. "This is a high level performance envisaged and carried out with imagination to the satisfaction of every one concerned." The importance of these volumes has been rightly acclaimed by H.M. Nayak in his statement that "It will not be possible for any one to undertake any work without referring to these bibliographies."

P.G.

BIBLIOGRAPHY (Malayalam). The growth of reference material in a language can be considered as an index of the research activities in that language. Bibliography being an important research aid, its growth also helps research. Compared to other Indian languages Malayalam seems to be better off in this field. It has to its credit many bibliographies already published.

The most important bibliography published in Malayalam is the Malayalagranthasuchi edited by K.M. Govi and A.K. Panikkar and published in two volumes by the Kerala Sahitya Akademy, Trichur. The first volume came out in 1973 and the second in 1974. It is a retrospective bibliography giving details about the books published in Malayalam from the beginnings of printing upto the end of 1970. The first volume deals with literary works and the second volume is devoted to books on other subjects. Altogether there are 26,109 entries. Of these 15,623 pertain to literary works. The majority of works published in Malayalam are poems or their collections. Even though this is not exhaustive the authors have been able to bring together most tities including the list of books in the British library.

Next in importance comes the Desiyagranthasuchi. This is a list of Malayalam books deposited in the National Library, Calcutta, in accordance with the Delivery of Books Act. This is distributed free by the Department of Education, Government of Kerala. From 1958 to 1966 nine volumes have been published. In addition to the lists published in each year decennial volumes are also published.

K. Mahadeva Sastri prepared 2 volumes of descriptive catalogues of the manuscripts in the palace library in 1939. They cover various subjects. In 1951 P.K. Narayana Pillai published a list of Malayalam manuscripts of the Manuscripts Library, Trivandrum.

Apart from these, there are lists of books pertaining to special branches of knowledge or particular genres of literature. In Malayalam the preparation of bibliographies has attracted much attention. Persumably, as a result of this, a book on the theory and practice of preparing bibliographies has been published by A.K. Panikkar under the title Granthasuchi, Tattvavum Prayogavum (1968).

The Library of Congress regularly publishes accession lists. The Southeast Asia list contains details of Malayalam books also. This is a very useful reference tool because almost all books published in Malayalam are bought by the library of Congress.

Almost all Ph.D. theses published in Malayalam contain a bibliography of books pertaining to the subject of study.

T.B.

BIBLIOGRAPHY (Punjabi). J.F. Blumhardt was the first to compile in English bibliographies of Punjabi books and manuscripts preserved abroad in the libraries of British Museum and India Office, London, and published them, with the title Catalogues in 1893 and 1899 (by B.M.), and 1902 and 1977 (by I.O., the last having been produced posthumously by C. Shackle); e.g., Catalogue of the Hindi, Punjabi, Sindhi and Pushtu Printed Books in the Library of the British Museum, London, 1893. They were followed by the publication of A Bibliography of the Punjabi Language in 1906 (in the Indian, Vol. 35) by George Grierson who also published in 1916 (in his Linguistic Survey of India, vol. IX, pt. I) 'A List of All the Works dealing with Punjabi', excluding reference to text printed in India which had already been mentioned in the Catalogues of Blumhardt. Catalogue of the subsequent holdings of the India Office Library, compiled by G. Gaur and E. Dimes, was published in 1975. Punjabi manuscripts preserved in the American, Russian and European repositories have been mentioned in their respective catalogues as well as in the catalogue compiled in 1971 by J.D. Pearson. Those available in the libraries of Pakistan at Lahore have been mentioned in Urdu by Shehzad Bukhari in his dissertation (1972), M. Bashir Husain in his Catalogues (1972-73) and Shehbaz Malik in the Khoj (1982). The catalogue of the pre-partition holdings of the Punjab Public Library, Lahore (entitled Punjabi Pustakan da Sampuran Suchi-Pattar) was published in 1946. A catalogue of Punjabi books printed in Pakistan, grouped under about fifty subjects and entitled Punjabi Kitaben (1977), has been compiled by Sibatul Hasan Zaigham and another published in the Khoj Darpan (1978 & 1983) by Shehbaz Malik.

At home, Chief Khalsa Diwan, Amritsar initiated in 1935 the publication in the Punjabi language and script a bibliography of Punjabi books, entitled Punjabi Pustakan da Suchi-Pattar. Ganda Singh augmented it by publishing a bibliography of Punjabi books pertaining to the history of Punjabi and Sikhism in his Sikh Itihas Wal (1946), A Select Bibliography of the Sikhs and Sikhism (1965) and A Bibliography of the Punjab (1966). The Punjabi Department, Patiala undertook the cateloguing of all sorts of Punjabi books available in Punjabi and published in 1953 Punjabi Parkashnan di Suchi, compiled by S. Shamsher Singh Ashok, mentioning 5000 titles grouped under 42 subjects and authored by about 1500 writers, belonging to the period 1845-1952. Its enlarged edition, compiled by S. Gurnam Singh and others, was published in 1971 by the Languages Department, Punjab in a huge volume mentioning 12000 titles. Its companion volume, Punjabi Pustak Kosh, was released soon after, giving their bibliographic details subject-wise under sixty genres of writing in Punjabi. The Department also published in two volumes (during 1961 and 1963) a detailed catalogue (entitled Punjabi Hathlikhtan di Suchi, compiled by S. Shamsher Singh Ashok of above 1500 manuscripts noticed in the Indian Punjab. Almost similar catalogues of such holdings in the libraries Amritsar (viz. Sikh Reference Library, Khalsa College Library and Guru Nanak Dev University Library), compiled by Bhai Randhir Singh, S. Shamsher Singh Ashok, Navjot Kaur and Kirpal Singh, respectively, have been published by their respective organisations including the Sikh History Society and Sikh History Research Board at Patiala, Punjabi Alochna Sahitya Suchi, compiled by Hakim Singh and Amar Singh has been published by the Punjabi University, Patiala (1978). The Central Reference Library, Calcutta, published bibliographic details of Punjabi books, received in the National Library during 1958 and compiled by Gurnek Singh Taj in its first year's Cumulative Volume of the Indian National Bibliography in 1959. Its Punjabi version, entitled Rashtri Putak-Suchi, began to be produced almost simultaneously. Its first issue covering the receipts of 1958 and 1959 was published by the Education Department, Punjab in 1961. Its publication was later undertaken by the Languages Department, Punjab which published its 1971-72 and 1973-74 issues, compiled by S. Natha Singh Jaggi and Harinder Kaur, during 1977 and 1980 respectively. Bibliographic details regarding the doctoral thesis, compiled by Dharam Singh, have been published in the Khoj Darpan (1978), Amritsar.

H.S.S.

BIBLIOGRAPHY (Sanskrit). On the history of Sanskrit literature, the important books are A.B. Keith, Sanskrit Drama and History of Sanskrit Literature; M. Winterritz, History of India Literature (3 Vols.); A.A. Macdonell, A History of Sanskrit Literature; S.N. Dasgupta, A History of Sanskrit Literature Classical Period (Vol. I); A. Weber, The History of Indian Literature; M. Krishnamachariar, History of Classical Sanskrit Literature; A.K. Warder, Indian Kavya Literature (4 Vols); J. Gonda (ed.), History of Indian Literature, (Several volumes published). For details about authors and works, K. Kunjunni Raja, (ed.), New Catalogus Catalogorum, Madras University (Vol. 1-11); also Catalogus Catalogorum, Vols. 1-3; (on Sanskrit literature of Kerala), Contribution of Kerala to Sanskrit Literature, are valuable. S.K. De , History of Sanskrit Poetics; P.V. Kane, Sanskrit Poetics; K. Krishnamoorthy (ed.), Dhvanyaloka and Vakroktijivita; V. Raghavan, Bhoja's Shringaraprakasha, Number of Rasas, Some Concepts of Sanskrit Literature are other significant works of bibliographical importance.

K.K.R.

BICHITRA RAMAYANA (Oriya) by Biswanath Khuntia (early 18th century) has been an immensely popular work throughout Orissa because of its simple and lucid language and popular metres. According to W.W. Hunter, "Viswanath Das Kavi alias Purusottama Viswanath Khuntia was a writer of good celebrity and author of the Vichitra Ramayana or the wonderful Ramayana, an Oriya version of the original Sanskrit epic. Of all the translations of Ramayana in Oriya this is the most popular, and passages from it are still recited by dancing boys when the scenes and events of the epic are acted on the stage."

Two printed editions of the work are available at present. One of them has been published by Radharaman Pustakalaya, Cuttack and the other by Jagannath Singh, Cuttack. Both the publishers have included a number of passages from poets other than Biswanath, like Vikram, Gopi, Gopal, Narana, Padmanabha, Lakshman, Jadunandan, Shyama, Kapila, Vamana and Vaisya Sadasiva. As per the manuscripts, the total number of Chaupadis in Bichitra Ramayana is 225 of which the Adi contains 28, the Ayodhya 15, the Aranya 24, the Kishkindha 26, the Sundara 18, the Lanka 69 and the Uttara 45. The work was completed in the 25th Anka of Divyasimha Deva I, corresponding to 1708-1709.

The real contribution of Biswanath Khuntia to the Rama literature of Orissa was in his choice of the model, that is, the Southern recension of Valmiki and not the Bengal recension, which was followed by Balaram Das and other Rama poets of Orissa. He made a faithful adaptation of the Southern recension excepting the episodes of the milkman and the ruddy goose which he had taken most probably from Balaram Das. However, as some of the manuscripts do not contain these stories, it is doubtful whether they were present in the original text.

Compared with Upendra Bhanja's Baidehisabilasa, which greatly appealed to the learned pandits, Bichitra Ramayana of Khuntia mainly appealed to the common folk, particularly the dancers and the ballad singers. It is also much shorter in length.

K.C.S

BIDAGDHA CHINTAMANI (Oriya) of Abhimanyu Samanta Sinhara is one of the finest literary works of the 18th century Oriya literature. The work, in 94 chhandas, describes the love-sport of Radha and Krishna. The poet in introducing Sri Krishna's childhood sports (Balyalila) refers to the birth-story of Radha and Krishna and also to the killing of demons from Putana to Keshi in passing. He has also referred to episodes like Jamala bhajana, Kaliya ganjana, and the defeats of Indra and Brahma. But he mentions all these episodes only to give a continuity to the subject matter of his poem, which mainly aims to depict the love-sports of Radha and Krishna and also to explain the love-theory in detail. The love between Radha and Krishna develops stage by stage, according to the canons of Kavya Shastras. The characters, like Paurnamasi, Nandimukhi, Vishakha and Madhumangala, help in the love-affairs of Radha and Krishna. Sri Krishna speaks his mind to Madhumangala and Radha hers to Vishakha. The poet takes this opportunity to explain the different types of love, its stages of development and also its influence on the mind of a lover. But surprisingly Radha was not the only beloved of Sri Krishna. She had a predecessor in Chandrabali. Krishna had met Chandrabali, the wife of his elder cousin, Govardhan Malla, to whom he had gone to learn about the cows. Chandrabali was asked by her husband to receive the son of Nanda, the King. In their first meeting deep passion arose in both and it culminated in their physical union. At this stage came Paurnamasi telling Sri Krishna of the unparalleled beauty of Radha. Sri Krishna now wanted to have Radha.

Abhimanyu, while apparently composing a Kavya, has actually turned this into an Alamkara Shastra. He introduced discussions on different categories and subcategories of Nayikas, Sakhis, Dutas, etc., as well as the various moods (Haba, Bhaba and Lila) of the lovers. These do not add to the poetic merit of the composition, but only reveal the writer's comprehensive, almost pretentious knowledge of poetics advocated by his Vaishnava predecessors, like Rupa Goswami (16th century) and Sadananda Kavisurya Brahma (18th century).

Thus in depiciting the love of Radha and Krishna, his stress was more on the formal Shastric love than on the natural love between a man and a woman and so he has brought in sages, like Vyasa, Garga and Durbasa to expound his theory of love and its magic influence on human beings.

Introducing Alamkara Shastra in a Kavya as a sort of appendix at the end was against the Indian Kavya tradition, except in the case of the Bhattikavya which was both a Kavya and an Alamkara Shastra. But even there, the Alamkara portion was integrated into the Kavya instead of coming almost at the end as in Vidagdha Chintamani. This appears to have been a direct influence of the Persian tradition with which Abhimanyu was familiar.

Despite these discussions on the pattern of Alamkara Shastra, the popularity of this work was not affected. This is due to its sweetness of diction, the musical beauty of the arrangement of words and also the artistic expression of the human feelings. This work has also been accepted as one of the best religious compositions in Oriya literature.

K.C.S.

BIDYARATNA NILAMANI (Oriya; b. 1867, d. 1923) was born at Brajabiharipur Sasan, in Cuttack district. His father was Sauri Charan Mishra, and mother Rohini Devi. His early education was in the village Pathshala, and subsequently he was admitted into the Baidyeswar Primary School. He was awarded scholarship in the school and completed his studies in Charchika Middle Vernacular School. He went to Cuttack for higher studies but could not continue his studies due to financial stringency of his father. Bidyaratna could not acquire any formal degree; he was largely a self-taught man, and read widely and deeply. Coupled with his devotion to studies which was manifested from his early life was his commitment to social reforms and a nobility of character and purpose, which was almost rare in those days. One of his principal purposes was how to eradicate illiteracy and with that end in view he accepted teachership in Gopinathpur Primary School in Bamanda State, which he subsequently left to join as a teacher in Deogarh School, at Deogarh, the capital of Bamanda State.

In course of time Bidyaratna came to be established as a renowned writer, poet, journalist, translator and editor of literary magazines as well as a patriot and social worker. His activities spread from Bamanda in the western Orissa to Khallikote and Badakhemundi, two states in the southern Orissa. One of the persons who inspired him early in his career was the poet and the educator, Radhanath Ray, whose good offices in fact brought him in contact with the enlightened king of Bamanda at Deogarh. Subsequently Bidyaratna's services were requisitioned at many places by a number of ex-feudatory kings who had a taste for literature and culture. His writings in Hitaishini, Prajabandhu, Ganjam-Gunadarpana, Utkal Madhupa, and Utkal-Dipika, well-known journals of the time, show his involvement and range in contemporary literature and culture.

In a different way Pandit Bidyaratna was one among the pioneers who worked towards the integration of different parts of Orissa into one state. He also raised his voice against child marriage, dowry system as well as against other prevalent social vices and used literature as a sharp, effective instrument to achieve his social objectives. He is respected today as a sober, serious writer who wrote in inimitable prose with great clarity and understanding.

P.P.

BIHARI (Hindi; b. 1559, d. 1663) The question of his lineage is not free from controversy but the majority of scholars is in favour of regarding him as a Mathur Chaturvedi Brahman. His literary output is an anthology called Satsai consisting of 713 couplets (dohas) only. But during the last three hundred years he has enjoyed a popularity and reputation second only to Tulsidas. There are more than fifty commentaries in verse as well as prose on his Satsai. Many poets have expanded the ideas expressed in the dohas in metres like Chhappaya, Kundliya and Savaiya. Bihari's Satsai has been rendered into Sanskrit and Urdu as well. A veritable mass of literature has grown round his small collection of couplets.

Bihari's poetry is not only quantitatively small, it is also thematically limited; that is to say, his imagination, in conformity with his times, moves within the orbit of Sringar (erotic sentiment) but such is the magic of his genius that he creates innumerable patterns of beauty out of material which is apparently so simple but, at the same time, so full of potentialities. He has only the female figure before him but like a skilful photographer he knows the exact angles from where to snap and each click gives a wonderful portrait. One can compare the portraits — there are hundreds of them but none resembles the other. Bihari has borrowed a great deal from his predecessors, particularly from writers in Sanskrit and Prakrit and to some extent also Persian, but it has all undergone such a complete metamorphosis under the pressure of his artistry that it is either unrecognizable or, if at all recognizable, it is a finer, subtler and more improved version of the original. Bihari's greatest asset is his brevity of expression his ability to convey a lot in as few words as possible. It is because of this rare skill that a small metre like doha becomes a perfect medium of communication in his hands. Beauty is not an abstraction with Bihari; it is something of flesh and blood, immensely sensuous, which one can see and feel. Bihari delights in depicting the external beauty; But to the internal beauty of emotion and feelings Bihari's access is not as great. His poetry has none of that rhythm or music which keeps on resounding in the mind for a length of time. Its effect is like the flash of lightening. Secondly, his eroticism lacks sublimity; it remains confined to the physical plane. But in that he is unmatched. Bihari reflects the composite culture of his time more fully than any other single Hindi poet. And no doubt for this reason he remains one of the most popular of Hindi poets today. Rightly it has been said of his 'dohas' that though small in size, these arrows of his 'dohas' inflict deep wounds within the reader's psyche.

De.S.

BIHARI SATSAI (Hindi) was composed around 1630. Seven hundred and 'Thirteen odd Dohas' (couplets) of the celebrated Hindi poet Biharilal are compiled under the title Bihari-Satsai. Bihari was the court poet of Jaya Singh, the king of Jaipur and used to compose couplets there under his inspiration and patronage. No other single work secured for its author as much renown as did the Satsai for Bihari. About fifty commentaries have already appeared on the Satsai and the process continues unabated even now. He never composed any other work and the Satsai forms the sole basis of his fame. Written in the typical Hindi meter of 'Doha', the Satsai is a work where there is no specific narrative link between one couplet and the other but still it brings full aesthetic relish. Visualising a tiny bouquet of fascinating objects and phenomena, Bihari presents them in a small couplet in a compact deeply meaningful and forceful style which defies emulation. They form the best examples of compactness and brevity which is proverbially the soul of wit. Each of his couplets is unparalleled in its compactness and subtlety.

In his creative process Bihari has thematically drawn on the rich traditions of Arya Saptashati and the Gatha-Saptashati. But he imparts a new rich lustre to the ideas he borrows from these works. The Satsai is replete with rich example of 'dhvani' and 'figures of speech'. The language used is pure 'Braj' which is blended with the language of areas spread around the 'Braj-mandal'.

Bihari Satsai is not a work intended to enumerate the features of various aspects of 'rasa', 'figures of speech', etc., and yet amorous topics like 'classification of heroines', 'the descriptions of the six Indian seasons', 'the descriptions of beauty from top to toe' finds full inclusion therein. Apart from the erotic sentiment, he finds scope for other sentiments, too, in his work — even the emotion of detachment and tranquillity of mind has found a place.

Bihari was not a devout poet but the Satsai has couplets which revolve round a sense of devotion. Couplets pertaining to general human behaviour and morality reflect Bihari's worldly wisdom. Though not a metaphysicist, his concepts in some cases are tinged with philosophy, spirituality and mysticism. Some of them contain meaningful aphorisms and maxims. The aphorisms and maxims he wrote keeping public conduct in view are based on his own rich experience of life.

Though it is difficult to assign exact dates of the creation of his couplets yet keeping in view the year of his birth, it can safely be said that they were composed around 1630.

Vi.S.

BIHAYI (Dogri) is a type of Dogri folksong sung on occasions connected with conception, birth and post-birth rites.

Dogras have different types of folksongs named differently, for occasions from pre-birth to post-death of an individual. After a woman has conceived for the first time and the foetus is growing in her womb, every effort is made by the relatives and friends to fulfil her wishes and to keep her pleased. A function called 'Thuan' or 'Reetan' 'Surani' is arranged in the 7th, 8th, or 9th month of pregnancy according to the family tradition and on the date fixed for it, a 'puja' is performed. The prospective mother who is in the family way, puts on ornaments and colourful clothes and she is seated on a low seat called 'Peerha'. The house is decorated with 'alpana' and gods are set on the 'alpana' and they are worshipped. Lamps are lighted in front of the gods. The pregnant woman prays and pays obeisance to married women and touches the feet of family elders and seeks their blessings. In the course of these rites, 'Bihayis' are sung by the women present on the occasion. They refer or are addressed to the pregnant woman, the infant she will deliver, the father to be, and other relatives who will become grandfathers and grandmothers and uncles and aunts of the infant to be born. These songs are full of humour, puns and fun. The intention is to entertain and please the pregnant woman, and imagined situations in the songs are supposed to generate in her mind tender feelings for the infant and to highlight her responsibilities towards it and the dignity and beauty of motherhood.

'Bihayis' are also sung on the occasion of actual birth of a son, his naming ceremony and the ceremony of first shearing of his hair 'mundan'. Some 'Bihayis' are meant to be sung on the occasion of marriage; these are the ones referring to the bridegroom's birth. The 'Bihayi' beginning with the words 'Neen Jis dhyarai mera Harihar Jammeya, Soyio dhyara bhagen bhareya' is sung on almost all occasions from the Thu-an (pre-natal function) to marriage function.

There is a wide variety of themes of 'Bihayis' from mundane matters of the sister-in-law demanding a costly gold ornament 'Phull Sariyan' if a son is born, to the 'lilas' of Rama and Krishna. Krishna's pranks and his charming playfulness, as described in the puranas and popular in Dogri folklore, form the main strand of Dogri 'Bihayis'. An infant born to the poorest of the poor becomes the Lord of Triloki (three worlds) on the occasions of such rites when women get-to-gether and sing.

'Krishna Murari Janame Bhabo Trailoki de Nath Godan Hariyan Bhariyan'.

(Krishna Murari, the Lord of the three worlds is born, she is fulfilled)

The songs coloured by imagination provide an escape from the hard realities of daily existence to a world full of joy and divinity. The infant born by the grace of God, is a harbinger of happiness. That is why, in one 'Bihayi' he is called a toy of gold that plays in the laps of grand parents and gladdens their hearts.

These 'Bihayis' are often used as a pretext to caricature, mimicry or make fun of somebody or cast aspersions on the behaviour of in-laws or to plead care for the infant's mother. Some 'Bihayis' describe the presents brought on such occasions for the infant or the boy. In some, the songs purported to have been sung on Krishna's birth in Gokul are repeated over and over again–'Nand ghar Janame Krishna Murar' and for some moments, the new-born's mother becomes 'Yoshada Maiya' and the father becomes Nand-Baba and the whole atmosphere takes on the colours of what is described in the 'Bihayis' where there is beating of drums and swaying of elephants at the gate and distribution of sweets. One 'Bihayi' describes the father of the infant as a blossomed lotus and the mother, a queen like a jasmine bud breaking into a flower.

The subject matter of Dogri 'Bihayis' shows that the woman giving birth to a son is pampered quite a lot. They sing of getting cosmetics to decorate her from far off places like Lahore and the mother-in-law and the sister-in-law (husband's sister) offering to do the household chores so that she can attend to the baby. These 'Bihayis' also throw light on the status of women giving birth to sons, customs and rites and culture and values of the community.

Sha.S.

BILGRAMI SAFIR (Urdu; b. 1833, d. 1890) Syed Ahmad was born in Masehra Dist. Etal (U.P.). Except for a few years he spent at Merehra and Bilgram he lived in Arah (Bihar), which was indeed his second home.

Like his father, Mir Syed Ahmad, 'Safir' had respect for his ancestors and their homeland, Bilgram. This is evident from his assumption of Bilgrami as his identity despite the fact that he was neither born there nor lived there ever after his early childhood, only 2 years–from the age of two to the age of four.

Safir was a precocious child gifted with an unusually sharp memory and an inborn love for books, which he started collecting when he was barely a child of 8 years. It is said that he commenced composing verses at the tender age of 14 and by the time he reached 16 he had to his credit a Masnavi and a collection of Ghazals–both in Persian. He took to Urdu poetry soon thereafter. Like most children of that period he had received his formal education in Persian and Urdu.

He was a restless youngman with an intellect too sharp and quick for his age. He kept changing his takhallus (nom-de-plume) and after discarding many, one after the other, he ultimately settled on 'Safir'. It was his search for the perfect master (Ustad) that made him seek guidance in poetry from many a master of the age, including the Marsiya poet, Salamat Ali Dabir (1803-1875). This search ended with his adoption of Mirza Ghalib (1797-1869) as his peer-murshid (Master). Between these two unusual individuals, developed the traditional relationship of Guru (Master) and Chela (disciple). He was devoted to his Master who in turn was equally proud of his disciple and instructed him well in the intricacies of the languages: Persian and Urdu. Safir who used to get most of his poetic compositions corrected by Ghalib through correspondence, is often referred to as the greatest of the many disciples of Mirza Ghalib.

Safir Bilgrami stayed in Patna for good 18 years or so and though he earned great name and fame there, he did not stay there for good and returned to Arah where he died in 1890 leaving behind a large circle of disciples, friends and admirers.

Safir, a versatile writer, was equally at home in prose and poetry. He was a sensitive poet, a well informed critic, a dedicated researcher and an accomplished literary historian. As a poet he handed all genres of Urdu poetry like ghazal, qasida, marsia and masnavi. During the 58 years of his life he wrote several books. Some of his disciples accord to him the distinction of leaving behind about 700 works. This is an inflated figure, but there is no denying the fact that his output was enormous. His Jalwa-e-Khizr (history of Urdu Poetry in 2 volumes), despite the anthor's somewhat eccentric approach, is still relevant.

His published collections of poetry comprise Safir-e-Bulbul and Khum Khana-e-Safir; his better known prose works include Jalwa-e-Khizr, (Vol, I and II), Tarikh-e-Bilgram (Part I), Mahsharistan-e-Khaval and Rashhat-e-Safir.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Mashiq Khwaja, Ghalib aur Safir Bilgrami, Karachi, (1981)., Muhammad Sadiq, A History of Urdu Literature (English), Oxford (1964)., Zafar Uganvi, Safir Bilgrami-Hayat aur Karname, Calcutta (1976).

B.V.

BILHANA (Sanskrit), son of the grammarian Jyeshthakalasha and Nagadevi, was born at Konamukha, near Pravarapura in Kashmir. Completing his education in grammar and poetics, he visited Mathura, Kanyakubja, Prayaga and Varanasi, received welcome at the court of King Krishna of Dahala (Bundelkhand) and spent some time in the court of Karnadeva Trailokyamalla (1064-1094) of Anhilvad. While on a pilgrimage in South India, he was honoured with the office of Vidyapati by the Chalukya King Vikramaditya VI Tribhuvanamalla (1076-1127).

The Vikramankadevacharita, composed at Kalyani before 1088, by Bilhana is a laudatory historical poem in eighteen cantos, describing the exploits and the expeditions of the King Vikramaditya VI and his love and marriage with Chandralekha (or Chandaladevi), daughter of a Shilhara ruler of Karahata. In the last canto, the poet gives his autobiographical account. The historical kernel is presented on the poetic canvass with conventionalism like whitewashing the hero, in Vaidarbhi style, which is studied but not overdone.

Chaura (or Chauri) Suratapanchashika or Chaurapanchashika (fifty stanzas of stolen love) available in at least three distinct recensions, is ascribed either to Bilhana or to Chora or to Sundara. The delightful but unreliable legend about the poem is: The Brahmin Bilhana fell in love with his pupil, the Princess (called Shashikala or Chandrakala (lekha) or Yaminipurnatilaka or Vidya), was found out and condemned to death. On his way to the gallows, he recited these passionate stanzas, recollecting the tender episodes of stolen pleasure, of quarrel and reconciliation, of intense yearning and deep realisation. Moved by the sincerity of love, the king relents and the lovers unite. The poet is silent about this incident in his autobiographical account. The legend, thus has no historical basis; it only indicates the popular skeletal frame that Bilhana turned into which a series of vivid romantic pictures of immediate experience.

Karnasundari, a play in four Acts and a poem called Bilhanacharita (or Bilhaniyakavya) are also ascribed to Bilhana.

S.A.U.

BILLESUR BAKARIHA (Hindi) is a novelette by Surya Kant Tripathi 'Nirala', first published in 1945, Allahabad (U.P.). The author has called it a work belonging to the Progressive movement. It neither presents Marxist philosophy explicity, nor does it depict class-struggle, yet it may be called progressive in the sense that it presents in a realistic style the life, environment and nature of rural India. It records in detail the life of a village which the writer has observed at close quarters. The small and dirty mud-houses, the fields, the cunning and manipulating nature of some men, their jealousy, opportunism, selfishness and meanness are all depicted with intimate knowledge. Though 'Nirala' lived most of his life in the cities, he had his ancestral and family moorings in the village. He was fully acquainted with the village vegetation, birds, method of farming and the changing panorama of nature with the change of seasons. The pictures connected with goat-breeding cultivating various crops, visitation of the birds in early winter and the marriage rites performed before the departure of a marriage-party have been drawn intimately. The essence of this novelette, however, lies in the spirit of revolt against tradition, which finds a memorable expression here. Billesur, born in a Brahman family, takes to grazing goats and challenges the villagers.

Billesur Bakariha is a novelette with a simple plot. It has neither a startling story nor has it any fancy philosophical or physchological analysis. The simple, day-to-day, life of a village unfolds itself gradually in unassuming idiom of the common folk. Billesur, a poor, unemployed young man goes out of his village and reaches Burdwan in Bengal in search of a living. He is exploited by his employer and also by his wife. As time passes he understands their evil designs, makes up his mind to collect money. When he has collected a modest sum, he returns to his village. The villagers, thinking that he has lots of money, try to get their share of it. But Billesur is now too smart to fall a prey to all this cunning manoeuvre. With his hard work, intelligence and worldly wisdom Billesur finally becomes rich and manages to marry. Now, it seems, he is finally happy and at peace with the villagers.

The novelette starts in the style of a research article giving the history of a family, its caste and the derivation of the word 'Billesur'. In the second chapter, the story picks up and then runs smoothly upto the end, exciting curiosity of the reader throughout. The novel does not end with a final scene. It leaves the reader in suspense.

This novelette has a certain resemblance to Kulli Bhat 'Nirala's memoirs. The most attractive feature of this novelette is the language. Unlike the prose of other romantic Hindi poets and some of his own works, the prose of Billesur Bakariha derives its inspiration from the spoken language of the village people. He has frequently used their idioms, words used in common parlance such as 'Lagan' (Magical), 'Adhiya' (on contract), 'Farende' (bunch) etc.

'Nirala' was a past-master of ironical style. Here too he has not spared the realist writers, poets writing in blank verse and even Tulsidas and the goddess 'Sita'. All of them have been victims of his sharp satire.

Billesur Bakariha is a landmark in the field of realistic fiction in Hindi.

J.L.G.

BIOGRAPHY (Assamese) Biography in Assamese literature began in the 17th century when the followers of Sankaradeva (1449-1568), the Vaishnava saint, preacher and writer of Assam, started narrating the eventful life of their preceptor as a sacred task. Recounting the life of Sankaradeva also entails recounting the life of Madhavadeva (1489-1596), Sankaradeva's chief disciple, dearest associate, religious heir and also a writer. Thus the biographies of Sankaradeva have also been the biographies of Madhavadeva, especially in the period of Vaishnava Literature covering the 17th and the 18th centuries. Later certain other followers and preachers of the Vaishnava religion became the subjects of biography for their followers and in this way the trend of religious biography was formed and nourished in these two centuries. Because these biographies of saints and preachers were invariably written by their devout disciples, these biographies are full of unqualified praise for the subjects who are looked upon as gods or super-human beings. Such biographies naturally abound in exaggerated incidents and supernatural elements. Medieval European literature too had such religious biographies and there is the exclusive term hagiography for these religious biographies of saints. It is interesting to note that in Assamese literature too, these biographies have come to be known as 'guru-charitas' or just 'charitas' and not as 'jivanis', the equivalent term for biographies. Most of these hagiographies have been in verse; but a few of them are in prose too. All of them have not yet been collected from the 'satras' or Vaishnava monasteries where they were composed and preserved. Those collected and catalogued would number about fifty of which only about a half are published under competent editorship.

We shall bring to our purview here only a few outstanding guru-charitas where the zeal of a hagiographer has not spoilt their qualities as biographies. The first that deserves mention here is Sankaradeva-Madhavadevar Jivan-Charitra (Biography of Sankaradeva and Madhavadeva (early 17th century) by Daityari Thakur. Other two charitas that can claim the same attention are Sri Sri Sankaradeva (mid-17th. century) by Bhushan Dwija and Sri Guru Charitra (late 17th century) by Ramananda Dwija. All in verse, these three hagiographies also like all other hagiographies of the period, have a tendency of deify the subject, Sankaradeva; and, accordingly, these three biographies too show some exaggerations and supernatural elements. But the hagiographers in these three works evince restraint and sobriety in the handling of matters and expression of admiration. Some artistic quality can also be seen in the handling of the form and the language.

Later biographies of these two centuries show more exaggerations and supernaturalism. But one hagiography stands out among them in balance, restraint and style. It is a prose work called Katha-Gurucharita (Prose Hagiography of the Gurus, 18th century) by some anonymous writer or writers. It depicts the life not only of Sankara and that of Madhava but also of a few other subsequent apostles, thus bringing the work more to the line of a chronicle of the Assamese Vaishnava order than a biography proper. But in the process of its coverage of a long span of time and also space, the work proves to be a treasure house of many valuable facts and information of the 17th and 18th century life and society. The portrayal of the lives and personalities of Sankara and Madhava is also very vividly done with minute details of incidents and actions of their lives and times. The book bears a rugged and yet very charming prose style with a simple colloquial way of expression.

Other biographical works of the 18th century are generally a rehash of the already familiar material. But in them one can see a new and rather unhealthy tendency of muck-raking on the gurus of other sects. Even then there are at least two charitas which have remained away from such practices. One of them is Ramananda Dwija's Vamsigopaldevar Charit (Hagiography of Vamsigopaldeva) which is marked by a lively depiction of the subect in a felt language; and the other is Nilakantha Das's Deva Damodar Charitra (Hagiography of Deva Damodar) which shows a masterly restraint in the handling of the materials.

Modern Assamese literature, secular and humanistic in nature in contrast to the old religious literature, evolved by the middle of the 19th century under the influence of Western literature when the British rule was established in the state. Assamese biography too changed its hagiographical nature then and acquired its biographical nature. Subjects of biography now came to be chosen from fields other than religious, like cultural, social and political. Supernaturalism and exaggerations now were eliminated, though the adulatory tone persisted. The subject of the biography was even now treated as a hero who was above the ordinary human being; but he was no longer deified.

The first biography of the modern period is Gunaviram Barua's Anandaram Dhekiyal Phukanar Jivan Charita (Biography of Anandaram Dhekiyal Phukan, 1880). Dhekiyal Phukan was a literary figure of the 19th century, a civil servant of the British Government who had fought for the use of the Assamese language in schools and courts instead of the prevalent Bengali language. He thus attained the status of a hero in the world of culture. Besides choosing such a hero for this first modern Assamese biography, the author has brought in quite a few other new elements that make this biography distinct from the earlier hagiographies. The life-story has been told here with the help of ascertained facts only, though there are no footnotes or references to prove the statements. Though again the tone is adulatory, the hero is never looked upon as a super-human being and there are no supernatural elements and exaggerated events. Artistically however the biography is nothing much. The life-story is unfolded chronologically in a simple unadorned language.

The next biography that deserves mention here is a religious one. It is Mahapurusha Sri Sankaradeva aru Sri Madhavadeva (The Great ones Sri Sankaradeva and Sri Madhavadeva, 1916) by Lakshminath Bezbarua who has come to be recognized as the father of Modern Assamese Literature. Though based on earlier hagiographies, this religious biography is refreshingly free from superstitious attitude; the two saints are regarded as human beings,though a sense of veneration prevails. The style of the work is all along pleasant.

Suryyakumar Bhuyan is the thid biographer who deserves attention. His Anandoram Barooah (1920) is a good biography with authenticity and accuracy of facts and treatment of the subject as a human being. Facts are presented always with the help of evidences, very often quoting sources. And the work bears evidences of the author's hard toil for digging out materials not only from various places of Assam but also from places of unpartitioned Bengal, London and Oxford where this brilliant scholar and I.C.S. officer of the 19th century either studied or worked. Himself a tireless historical researcher and a reputed writer, Bhuyan gives here an assessment of his subject's works too, which all come against the background of the Indian renaissance of the 19th century. This work thus occupies an important place among the Assamese biographies. Inspite of this however, Bhuyan's success here is of limited nature. Though the biography contains a good deal of facts and details, the subject does not come up very alive. The language too, though precise, expressive and idiomatic, is inadequate for a biography which should have the dual identity of history and creative literature.

Harihar Ata (1960) is another biography by Suryakumar Bhuyan. It is a religious biography of a unique character, though small in size. The author has delineated the human character of Harihar Ata, a Vaishnava Elderman of the 18th century who commanded wide respect as a strictly religious personage. In Bhuyan's portrait, this widely respected religious man of stern habits who made religious practices inseparable from his private life too, emerges as an amusing though still lovable person.

Bezbarua: Manuhjan (Bezbarua, the Man, 1938) by Maheswar Neog is only a biographical essay on the early life of Lakshminath Bezbarua. But even this deserves mention in view of the fact that this happens to be the only attempt at New Biography in Assamese. The making of the man, Bezbarua, through the incidents and events of his early life is vividly and skilfully built up in a very palatable style. But a New Biography aims not only at presenting the life of the man vividly and pleasantly but also tries to see the man in a detached manner. For this in place of adulation we see here satire though this is again an attitude of the other extreme. Neog has never been satirical to his subject; he is rather all along respectful and admiring. But he has not been all along very strict in selection and scrutiny of the mass of materials - an imperative for a New Biographer.

Sri Sri Sankaradeva (1949) by Maheswar Neog is another distinguished work. It is here in this biography written in the scholarly vein that Assamese religious biography which had its birth in the 17th century attains its maturity. The author,a reputed scholar, has shifted and winnowed the whole mass of materials available in the earlier hagiographies and chronicles, and has written out this most authentic biography of Sankaradeva. The preacher's religion, philpsophy and literary works also find here an able assessment. And all these are shown against the perspective of the all India neo-Vaishnavite movement of the time.

Nalinibala Devi's Smrititirtha (Pilgrimage in Memory, 1948) is the biography of Nabinchandra Bardoloi,an illustrious national leader and statesman of Assam of the late 19th and early 20th centuries. Written by his daughter, an eminent poet, it is of course a laudatory work saturated with emotion. Even then, it is a valuable work presenting all the important facts and events of the leader's life and thereby covering a very important phase of the freedom movement in Assam. The nationalistic fervour of the author also runs throughout the book. The subject comes out quite alive because of the author's use of many small details of the subject's private life - an effort which is very rare in Assamese biography.

Maniram Dewan (1950) by Benudhar Sharma is also a biography of a freedom fighter who was hanged by the British during 1857 rebellion that touched Assam too. The author has done a commendable research work for this rather large biography, by bringing to light many forgotten facts of history and recreating the life of the martyr by putting the mass of materials in proper order and perspective.

Mahadev Sharma's Gopinath Bardoloi (1956) is another biography of a nationalist leader that can claim an important place. It is a sincerely written work with all the important facts, incidents and events of the life of this first Chief Minister of Assam in independent India, a devout Gandhian and a statesman. The book also shows a good coverage of the political history of the subject's life-period - the first half of the 20th century. The author shows very well how Bardoloi played a very crucial role in the history of Assam in the forties when he, with the support of Gandhi, opposed successfully the British Cabinet Mission proposal of grouping of the states, and thus saved Assam from the fate of being merged with Pakistan. Besides highlighting such political and other public aspects, the author here portrays the man nicely with many small incidents of the subject's life and by quoting from his private diaries, letters and official records.

Nanda Talukdar is a devoted and untiring biographer in Assamese who has written so far about half a dozen biographies in quick succession. His subjects are generally chosen from literary and socio-cultural field; and he brings to his biographies all the available materials. However, Talukdar betrays very often his lack of sharp analytical power so necessary for throwing light on the subject's true character and personality. His language is also functional and often dull. Three of Talukdar's important works that may be mentioned here are: Banaphular Kavi Dowerah (1971), Kanaklal Barua (1972) and Hem Barua (1978).

Satyendranath Barkataki's Napoleon Bonaparte (1973) in three volumes is another important biography. Though based on all second hand materials gathered from published books, it bears the sign of the author's competence in selection and analysis of the vast mass of materials of the life of this great hero of the international scene.

Akshaykumar Mishra's Pandit Narayan Dev Mishra: Manuhjan (1973) is only a biographical eassy. But even this needs mention because this happens to be the only attempt in Assamese at an intuitive biography, a biography that is written with the help of imagined incidents and details that could be probable in the life of the subject as it is known from the intuition of the biographer. Needless to say, such a biographer must have a very clear idea about the personality and character of the subject. Mishra has proved his competence to write such a biography in this essay.

Praphulladatta Goswami's Manikchandra Barua (1977) shows in it the touch of a biographer who knows his job and responsibility well. Goswami, a well known scholar and writer, reconstructs here the life of Barua, an independentminded social and political leader of Assam during the later part of 19th and early part of the 20th century. The materials are drawn here not only from second hand sources of already existing biographies but also from the first hand sources of records and papers in offices and institutions and from the old persons interviewed. With profuse materials gathered thus, the biographer has thrown new light on various aspects of life in the state while reconstructing the life of the man as fully as possible. The author has been able to show his mastery in handling of the materials too. His emphasis is on truth and accuracy of facts; even then the readability of the book has never suffered.

Goswami is a biographer not of this kind of life-and-time accounts alone. He also writes biographies or biographical essays where the emphasis is on readability. His full length biographical work, and the most successful in this trend is Eti Jiya Kahini (A Living Story, 1979). It is an exceptional biography in Assamese in two senses. First, its subject is an ordinary person who was obscure in the society with no public life; never before such a person was chosen as the subject of a biography in Assamese. Secondly the manner of reconstructing the life is rather unusual. The life story is unfolded in the manner of telling a story. Very often the narration is given in the subject's own lips, just as if the subject told his own life-story to the author in his life time. Such portions are narrated in first perons and within inverted commas. It has thus been one of the most pleasant reading biographies in Assamese literature.

To sum up, biography is no doubt a large branch of Assamese literature with about three hundred works in print. It can be proud of its long history too, dating back to the 17th century. But unluckily it cannot be equally proud of its quality. Though there are a few exceptional works in various aspects as mentioned above, Assamese biography does not generally bear any sign of the author's hard toil either in the field or in the library. What is still worse, all of them are highly reverential or laudatory to the subjects so that subjects are not generally studied as human beings but are looked upon as angels. This may be attributed to three reasons. First, the inherent tradition of guru-worship in our society; secondly, the hang-over of the nationalistic spirit of our pre-independence days when all the devoted freedom fighters were looked upon by us as our infallible heroes; and thirdly, the Victorian ideal of hero-worship that percolated to the Assamese society during the British days either through the biographers' direct study of Victorian literature or through the influence on them of the teachers of English literature. Assamese biographers, for these reasons, are yet to produce objective biographies where the subjects of study may be still angels-but they are only angles with feet of clay.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Gobindaprasad Sarma, Jivani, Asam Sahitya Sabha, Gauhati, 1974., Maheswar Neog., Sankaradeva and His Times, Gauhati University, Gauhati, 1965., Satyendranath Sarma, 'Charit Sahitya' in Sahityar Abhas, a collection of individual essays, Dutta Barooah & Co., Gauhati 1963.

Go.S.

BIOGRAPHY (Bengali). The life of Shri Chaitanya, the most remarkable personality in Bengal in the middle ages, inspired the first attempt at biography writing in the Bengali language. Vrindavan Das's Chaitanya Bhagavata composed in verse possibly during the saint's life time, may claim to be the first biography in Bengali literature. As expected, supernatural elements have place in it, but we also have in this well-written piece a good picture of the contemporary social condition in Bengal. Among other extant biographies of Shri Chaitanya, Krishnadas Kaviraj's Chaitanya Charitamrita, written in the 16th century is noticeably unique for its philosophical depth and artistic execution. Biographical compositions of the 17th century are by and large hagiographic in attitude and distinguished neither for artistic excellence nor for factual authenticity. Religious devotion to and admiration for the miraculous activities of religious personalities mark these attempts in verse.

In the 18th century a distinct change in attitude is discernible in the art of biography. Bharatchandra Rai (1712-60) in his Annadamangala has described incidents in the lives of Maharaja Pratapaditya, Nawab Alivardi and Maharaja Krishnachandra in which facts and fiction coalesce. Vijayram Sen's Tirthamangala (Pilgrimage, 1770), written after the battle of Plassey, gives thumbnail sketches of notable contemporary pesonalities. Similar attempts have been made to present the life and activities of rich, successful contemporary businessmen and enterpreneures in Bengal, the bourgeoisies that came into prominence at the beginning of the British rule in India. The social status of the individual and his achievements were focused in place of the supernatural and the miraculous. Although these composition were still in verse, the approach was broadly historical and factual. In the 19th century biographical sketches in prose were published in obituary columns in newspapers like Bengal Gazette, Digdarshana and Samachardarpana. The credit of writing the first biography in prose goes to Ramram Basu (1757-1813) a teacher of Fort William College. In fact his Raja Pratapaditya Charitra (1801) is also the first work printed in Bengali script. Written for the students of Fort William College, this biography is rich in historical facts. During the 19th century Renaissance in Bengal special attention to the writing of biography was directed towards idealization as the writer felt that knowledge of ideal charaters would help in building the national character. Naturally, biographies written in English served as models, and some authors openly declared their admiration for Dr. Johnson's biography by Boswell. The School Book Society published Satya Itihas Sar (Essence of True History, 1830) composed on the model of Plutarch's Lives, in which translation of stories about Homer, Confucius, Socrates and others had been included. Rev. Krishnamohan Banerji's Jivan Vrittanta (1847) and Iswarchandra Vidyasagar's Jivan Charitra (1849) and Charitavali (1856) are mainly translation of life sketches of Western personalities written by English writers. Kalimoi Ghatak's Charitashtaka (Eight Lives, part I-1868, II-1873) is devoted to the lives of contemporary personalities in Bengal. The didactic element was always powerful in these attempts, and the studies of illustrious lives, highlighting the moral element, characterised the later half of 19th century. Inspired by the idea of spreading education among women in our country many biographies of eminent Indian women were published: e.g. Nilmani Basak's Naba Nari (Nine women, 1852), Martha Saudamini Sinha's Nari Charita (Lives of Women, 1865), Gopikrishna Mitra's Mahilavali (Women, 1867), Durgadas Lahiri's Dwadash Nari (Twelve women, 1885). Monthly journals like Vividartha Sangraha and Rahasya Sandartha published a number of biographical sketches of Indian and Western historical figures. Iswarchandra Gupta's life of Bharatchandra Rai (1855) is remarkable for its compilation of facts. Dinabandhu Mitra, the famous playwright, published Suradhuni (Part I, 1871, Part II, 1876) a long verse composition, in which contemporary society, institutions and the activities of illustrious personalities like David Hare, Wilson, Iswarchandra Vidyasagar, Rammohan Roy, Madhusudan Dutt have been described with great vigour and exactitude.

During the last quarter of the nineteenth century biography found a new creative interpreter in Bankimchandra Chatterjee (1838-94). His biographical sketches of Dinabandhu Mitra (1877), Iswarchandra Gupta (1885) Sanjibchandra Chatterje (1893) are not merely statements of facts, they are indeed an original contribution to the understanding of life and work of these personalities. Nothing like it existed in the language and the brilliant analysis of facts sheds new light on the subjects. Individual lives have been seen as a product of contemporary social conventions and the creation of writers as heavily coloured by their passions and prejudices. Although Bankimchandra did not compose any full-length biography, he always stressed the importance of biography in nation building. The period between the last quarter of the 19th century and the first quarter of the 20th saw the publication of some of the finest biographies in the language e.g. Vidyasagar (1895) by Chandicharan Bandopadhyaya, Michael Madhusudan Dutt (1896) by Jogindranath Basu, Debendranath Thakur (1913) by Ajitkumar Chakravarty and Ramtanu Lahiri O Tatkalin Banga Samaj (1918) by Shivnath Sastri. Mahendranath Gupta's Shri Ramakrishna Kathamrita (Gospel of Ramakrishna, 5 Vols. (1902-1910, 1932) deserves a special mention as it records the dialogue of the sage, Ramakrishna with stenographic exactitude. Rabindranath Tagore, however, brought a completely new approach in his biographical studies. His essays on Buddha, Jesus Christ, Rammohan Roy, Vidyasagar, Bankimchandra, Gandhi and Debendranath Tagore seek to reveal the centre and significance of their creative forces, rather than describing the factual details of their lives. In an intuitional and subjective approach he interpreted the truth and depth of their life's work. He thought that insignificant incidents in a person's life should have no place in biography. Tagore has always been attracted by personalities who were guided by reason rather than faith, he stressed the human qualities of courage, character, integrity and truthfulness. Like Bankimchandra, he did not undertake any full scale biography, but his studies remain unique for their penetration and imaginative perception. Useful biographical information of distinguished Bengali authors and pesonalities may be studied in Harimohan Mukherjee's Bangabhashar Lekhak (writers of Bengal, 1904), Upendra Banerjee's Charitavidhan (Dictionary of lives, 1908), Sahitya Sadhak Charitmala series (Lives of authors edited by Brajendranath Banerjee and others) and Sangsad Bangali Charitavidhan (Dictionary of Bengali personalities), edited by Subodhchandra Sengupta. Sahittik Varshapanji (Year Book of authors in Bengali language) edited by Ashok Kundu also provides useful information about contemporary writers. Among biographies composed during the second half of the 20th century Prabhatkumar Mukherjee's Rabindra Jivani (Life of Rabindranath Tagore), a four volume comprehensive biography of Tagore stands as a model of exactitude in facts and details.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Devipada Bhattacharya, Bangla Charit Sahitya, 1964.

A.D.C.

BIOGRAPHY (Dogri). There is very little biographical and autobiographical literature in Dogri. Just three books, two of which are translations.

The first book of biographical nature in Dogri is Bawa Jitto di Amar-Katha. It is the life story of a Dogra martyr and it was orginally written in Sanskrit by Shukdev Shastri. It was translated into Dogri by Anantram Shastri and published in 1958. The second book, also a translation, is Atma-Katha, a Dogri translation of Mahatma Gandhi's My Experiments with Truth. The translation has been done by Ramnath Shastri.

The third book, and the first original book of biography in Dogri is Sher-i-Duggar Lala Hansraj written by Mulk Raj Lala Saraf, the doyen of the journalists of J & K State. It was published on 2 October, 1968. It is a 71-page life history of Hans Raj Lala (1866-1944) a prominent Dogra leader of his time who founded Dogra Sadar Sabha and worked tirelessly for the social and economic uplift of his community.

Besides these books, a few essays of biographical and literary interest based on interviews by the editor, have been published in Sheeraza (Dogri). They give interesting information about the life and thinking of the writers interviewed who include Yash Sharma, Vishvanath Khajuria, Madanmohan Sharma, Ramlal Sharma, Kehri Singh 'Madhukar', Jitendra 'Udampuri',Kunwar 'Viyogi' and Padam Sachdev. Five of these writers are Sahitya Akademi Award winners. Some biographical details about a few writers are found in the Kalamkar and similar series of books on authors and their works, published by the J & K Cultural Academy, Dogri Sanstha and Bandralta Sahitya Mandal. The writers covered are Raghunath Singh Samyal, Charan Singh, Vats 'Vikal', Narendra Khajuria, Har Datt, Shambhunath and Parmanand 'Almast'.

Sh.

BIOGRAPHY (English) in Indian Writing in English obviously shows the impact of British rule in India as well as the cultural approaches of the west towards this form of writing. Though ancient Indian literature has such outstanding works as Ashvaghosha's Buddhacharita or Bana's Harshacharitra, the new biography in Indo-English writing is different from these ancient classics in form and content, and in literary or cultural approach. It is difficult to be precise about the earliest Indo-English biographical writings, but it is fairly certain that before 1885 three biographical works were published. Kaveli Venkata Ramaswami's Biographical Sketches of the Dekkhan Poets (Calcutta, 1829) was the first of these works. The second, an account of Baboo Harishchandra, Lights and Shades of the East (Bombay, 1863) by Framji Bamanji is another work of this kind. T.Rama Rao's Biographical Sketches of the Rajas of Venkatgiri (Madras, 1875) is a commissioned biography. These are early and rather amateurish attempts in biographical writing.

The growth of the spirit of nationalism in the 19th and 20th centuries led to another kind of biographical writing moulded by patriotism, the fight for freedom and a modern Indian Renaissance. These biographies of the leaders of the Indian Renaissance were intended to provide 'ideals' for the society to emulate. Great personalities such as Rammohun Roy, Keshub Chunder Sen, Behramji Malabari in the 19th century and outstanding national leaders such as Tilak, Gokhale, Tagore, Ranade, V.S. Srinivasa Shastri, Lala Lajpat Rai, Gandhi, Jawaharlal Nehru, Sardar Patel, Rajaji, Babu Rajendra Prasad and many others became the great subjects of biographies by various writers. These biographies touch various artistic levels—good, bad, indifferent. One of the earliest biographies in this context is The Life and Teachings of Keshubchunder Sen by P.C. Muzumdar (Calcutta, 1851) followed by K. Chakravarti's Life of Sri Chaitanya. (Calcutta, 1897). Interestingly enough, W.E. Dhankoti Raju wrote an adulatory biography of the Queen, Queen Empress Victoria (Madras, 1887) to mark the golden Jubilee of her reign.

Excellent biographies have appeared in 20th century Indo-English writing which are notable for deep personal understanding and also for objectively. Krishna Kripalani's biography of Rabindranath Tagore, and B.R. Nanda's life of Gopal Krishna Gokhale may be cited as the finest examples, D.G. Tendulkar's exhaustive volumes on the life and work of Mahatma Gandhi (8 volumes 1951-54) and D.V. Tamhankar's life of Tilak, Lokmanya Tilak-:Father of Indian Unrest and Maker of Modern India (1956) are rather laborious attempts at recording the soul-stirring events in the lives of these great men. In contrast, Sarvepalli Gopal's life of Jawaharlal Nehru is lively as well as scholarly. R.K. Diwakar's life of Sri Aurobindo, Mahayogi (1954) is a piece of contemplative intensity. B.R. Nanda's Gokhale, Gandhi and Nehru (1974) is a work of sustained scholarship and authenticity. Indulal Yanjnik's two-volumes study, Gandhi as I knew him (1933-34), is a fine example of 'Intimate Biography'. Khushwant Singh's biography-Ranjit Singh (1963) is a work of considerable scholarship. Sen Gupta's Pandit Ramabai Saraswati (1970) and Dilipkumar Roy's, The Subhas I knew (1960) are fine examples of sympathetic biographical writings. There are several biographies of great men by minor writers, and of small men by even smaller writers — too numerous to mention. However, they offer insights into the life and work of their chosen men and women, and also reflect facets of contemporary life.

V.A.S.

BIOGRAPHY (Gujarati) developed as a new literary form in Gujarati under the Western influence. Narmad was the first to attempt it in Kavicharitra (1865), a series of biographical essays on the lives of medieval poets. In each case he takes pains to collect authentic information about the poet's life and work and tries to evaluate the same in an objective manner. He furnishes rational interpretation of certain popular beliefs about poets like Narasinha and Akho. He does not hesitate to point out human weaknesses, though apologitically, as in the case of Dayaram and bluntly as in the case of Akho. His style of narration is simple and picturesque though at times uncouth. He has also written 27 short sketches of kings, warriors, poets, philosophers and religious heads of various countries in Mahapurushonan Charitra (1870), but these are not full-fledged biographies. Forbes-Jivan Charitra (1869) written by Manahsukhram Suryaram Tripathi, is the first of this type. In this book, the writer gives complete account of the personal life and public activities of A.K. Forbes in the context of the contemporary cultural life of Gujarat and gives a reasonable objective assessement of his thoughts and deeds. Being a Sanskritist to the extreme, Manahsukhram used generally pedantic Sanskrit language in his biographies, as in those of Harivallabhdas Balmukunddas (1880) and Sujna Gokulji Jhala (1881).

Mahipatram Rupram, Narmad's contemporary and a social reformer, has written four biographies: Uttam Kapol Karsandas Moolji Charitra (1877), Durgaram Charitra (1879), Parvatikumar Akhyan (1881) and Akbar-Charitra (1889). Of these the first one is a full-fledged biography and the best of all, wherein the author identifies himself with the subject, narrates important events like those of Maharaj libel case with precision, etc., and finally offers objective assessment. Durgaram-Charitra based on Durgaram's own diary, is a short biography written by Mahipatram. Paravtikunvar Akhyan is more or less a husband's tribute to the departed spouse. Akbar-Charitra gives a year-wise authentic account of Akbar's rule, with description of Akbar's personality as depicted in history.

Kavijivan (1887) is a short critical biography of Narmad written by his friend Navalram Laxmiram. The life-sketch is largly based on the facts mentioned in the poet's autobiograpy Mari-Hakikat (which was not published till 1933). It is a mature attempt to evaluate Narmad's social and literary career. Navalram's critical faculty is at its best in this monograph as he judiciously analyses the poet's mind, justifies the metamorphosis of his views on social reform.

Bholanath Sarabhainun Jivancharit (1888) written by his son Krishnarao. is also based to a large extent on the diary maintained by Bholanath. Barring 36 pages devoted to the description of about half a dozen events of Bholanath's life, the entire book deals with the social and religious philosophy of Bholanath with a rather indistinct picture of the contemporary social life. The author's attempt to put poet Bholanath above all the old and new poets of devotional songs is hardly justifiable.

Govardhanram Tripathi has contributed two works of biography: Navalram Laxmiramni Jivankatha (1891) and Lilavati Jivankala (1909). The first one was written as a preface to the collection of Navalram's essay describing Navalram the man, the teacher, the literary artist and the social reformer. He explains the origin and development of Navalram's literary faculty and evaluates the same. Episode of Navalram's death is depicted with delicate touch. However, the write-up does not extend beyond the scope of a critical essay on Navalram's life.

In Lilavati-Jivankala, against faint life-sketch of his daughter Lilavati, who died at the age of 21, the author unburdens his own philosophy of Shreya and Preya, Jijivisha and Mumursha and so on which makes the reading heavy.

The full-length life-story of Govardhanram himself, Shriyut Govardhanram (1910) written by his nephew Kantilal C. Pandya, is an important landmark. The author collects information from various sources, tests their authenticity, selects appropriate events, describes them with minute details and finally tries to assess Govardhanram's achievement in the context of his ideals and aspirations. The cultural background of Gujarati society is also reflected in the book, which furnishes interesting details about Govardhanram's personal habits and literary sensibilities. It also reveals the inner working of the mind of this great man of letters, who conceived a master plan for the uplift of his countrymen. Though the author's style of narration is compact, pedantic and full of involved expressions, the book acquires unique importance by virtue of its contents.

Nandshankar Jivanchitra (1916), written by Vinayak Nandshankar Mehta, is another outstanding biography. It is full of sketches of persons and places of contemporary Gujarat which Nandshankar has depicted in Karanghelo, the first Gujarati novel. Treatment of the subject is defective in the sense that portrait of the hero is overshadowed by the variegated picture of contemporary life, which in a way is amusing and instructive.

B.K. Thakore has written Ambalalbhai, a biographical study of the mind and character of Ambalal Sakarlal Desai, containing objective analysis of Ambalal's economic and industrial theory. Being an essay on the thoughts and activities of Ambalalbhai it includes the story of his personal life.

Skipping over numerous biographies of general information category, we come to Gandhian era. Kishorelal Mashruvala, one of the close associates of Gandhiji, has written four books of biography, Ram ane Krishna (1923), Buddha ane Mahavir (1923), Sahajanand Swami (1923) and Ishu Khrist (1925). He strips these divine personages off their superhuman traits and tries to rationalise their actions as those of great men. He does not approve of Ram's killing of Vali or Shambak. He compares Ram and Krishna and introduces them as great personalities who built noble traditions of Indian Culture. In the essay on Buddha and Mahavir, Kishorelal explains their teachings. In case of Sahajanand, he draws a neat life-sketch and dwells upon his social reforms and their impact at length. Mashruwala preaches the precepts of all these stalwarts in a didactic style.

Three short biographical sketches, viz. Vir Vallabhbhai (1928), Sant Francis (1933) and Be Khudai Khidmatgar (1936) written by Mahadev Desai are fine specimens of restrained but elegant style, presenting true images of the respective persons in historical perspective.

Artistic portraits of Narsinha and Narmad in Narsaiyo Bhakta Harino and Narmad: Arvachinoman Adya by Kanaiyalal Munshi signify the magic touch of creativity. Munshi tries to imbibe the spirit of Lytton Stratchey in biography. He treats historical material with imagination and creates a living story which reads like novel. Even in an essay like Gujarat Ek Sanskritic Vyakti he presents before the reader in a fine style the pageant of the cultural renaissance in Gujarat. Munshi thus gives creative touch to biography. Vijayray Vaidya unsuccessfully attempts this style in the life-story of Navalram, Shukra-tarak (1944), where he transgresses the limit of history and indulges in ommissions and commissions hardly permissible in biography.

Nhanalal Kavi has written a full-length life-story of his father Dalpatram in Kavishvar Dalpatram Part I, II, III, (1933, 1934, 1940, 1941) which is remarkable for richness of style and material. In these books Nhanalal has unconsciously furnished plenty of material for his own biography as well. It is based on notes dictated by Dalpatram in his old age and on the first-hand information emerging from his son's memory. Nhanalal has tried to establish Dalpatram as the pioneer of Modern Age. Nhanalal has so ably interwoven Dalpatram's activities with those of Gujarat that this story of Dalpatram's life virtually becomes a saga of the cultrual life of Gujarat in the nineteenth century. Nhanalal's style of narration is verbose though picturesque, and studded with metaphors. It is at places exaggerated.

Short biographical sketches drawn by the poet in his essays and lectures (Saksharranto) are also lively and impressive.

Vir Narmad (1933) by Vishvanath Maganlal Bhatt is the best example of biographical study covering all the aspects of Narmad's personality. It is a rare combination of critical and creative faculties.

Narhari Parikh's contribution in this field is also substantial. He has given three interesting books of biography: Mahadevbhainun Purvacharit, Sardar Vallabhbhai and Shreyarthini Sadhana. He selects the material carefully, arranges it in chronological order and tells the story in simple, lucid and interesting style. There is an undercurrent of sympathy based on sound understanding which makes these life stories full of human interest.

Two biographical works on the life and letters of Manilal Nabhubhai Dvivedi are worth mentioning here. Manilal Dvivedinun Janmacharitra (1957) by Ambubhai Purani is a literary biography in the sense that it portrays the subject with special reference to his social, religious and cultrual environment. The second one, Manilal Nabhubhai Jivanrang (1957) by Dhirubhai Thaker is compact, comprehensive, full of shocking events, based as it is on Manilal's autobiography, with dispassionate observation of his behaviour in private as well as public life.

The last, but not the least, in imporatnce is Harilal Gandhi (1971), the life-story of Gandhiji's eldest son, Harilal, written by Chandubhai Bhagabhai Dalal. Here is a moving but authentic account of Harilal's frustrated life, written with an unbiased sympathetic approach and proper understanding of Harilal's mind. It is based on facts collected from letters and authentic records and reads like a novel, retaining its identity as biography.

Scores of biographies have been written of writers, warriors, thinkers, philosophers and such other leaders during the last hundred years. Many of them are meant for children. Most of them are merely informative. Only a few writers have succeeded in literary accomplishment. Almost all types of biography, such as autobiography, chronological life story, biographical study, film biographical essay, memoirs, thumb-nail sketches, etc, are exploited by Gujarati writers.

D.T.

BIOGRAPHY (Hindi). The tradition to write an autobiography or a biography did not exist in the olden times. Self-abnegation was more in tune with the times than self-publicity or self-aggrandisement. But human values undergo changes with the times. No wonder, therefore, that biographical literature in Hindi has come to be recognised today as an independent literary genre in all respects.

A thorough search does reveal the existence of some biographies in Hindi even during the mediaeval period. Bhaktamal, Chaurasi Vaishnavon ki Varta etc., are supposed to belong to this category but their authenticity is not beyond doubt. Strictly speaking, however, biographical literature in its true sense originated only during the Renaissance. This age witnessed the emergence of such personalities in all fields-viz., national, social, relgious, etc. who transcended their corporeal limitation to acquire an extra-ordinary status through their achievements. Our approach to them, however, is generally enveloped by awe-inspiring hero-worship.

To begin with, many such biographies–big and small were written. Biographies meant for children and adolescents, appreciative tales full of praise for national heroes and accounts of the adventurous expliots of the revolutionary heroes all belong to this category. In the Bharatendu era, barring a couple of wirters like Kartik Khatri and Deviprasad Munsif besides Bharatendu himself, none had a systematic and rational approach. During the Dwivedi era, likewise, we find numerous biographies but they all seem to be obsessed by such qualities as hero-worhsip and idealism. There are, of course, one or two honourable exceptions like Swami Satyanand's Shrimad Dayanand Prakash (1918) and Banarasi Das Chaturvedi's Kaviratna Satyanarayan (1926).

In fact, the period stretching till the dawn of Independence is marked by the evolution of a soical and political consciousness and the realisation of our national identity resulting therefrom. The ideal men who gave momentum to the age can only be the objects of our gratitude and veneration and the upsurge of veneration quite naturally disturbs balance and becomes a stumbling block in the path of artistic creativity. Such an atmosphere is congenial only to the creation of biographies overwhelmed and obsessed by the grandeur and splendour of their personalities.

Such a state of affairs prevailed till after a decade of Independence. The biographies were in search of qualities like self-sacrifice, self-abnegation, dutifulness, compassion and renunciation for the sake of guidance of the future generations. Such biographies, of course, have their utility and importance. They may not fully satisfy the strict criterion of creativity but some of the biographies of this age do bear the imprint of mature reflection and investigative faculty. In this respect, the instances of Ganesh Shankar Vidyarthi (Devvrat Shastri, 1939), Sant Tukaram (Hari Ramchandra Diwekat, 1937), Italy ka Sahid (Venimadhav Agrawal, 1933), Prince Bismarck (Indra Vedalankar), Swami Shankaranand Sandarshan (Bhawanidayal Sanyasi, 1942), Chaitanya Charitavali (Prabhudutt Brahmachari, 1931-34) and Jagat Guru Shankaracharya (Dindayal Upadhyaya, 1947) may be cited.

The period of real exaltation of biographical literature in Hindi commences with the country's passage through the painful process of disillusionment and its confrontation with the unpalatable hard realities of life. The great Indian personages got divested of the godhood imposed on them by people who came to a painful realisation that none becomes great by being shorn of one's weaknesses. 'Activity' has to be backed by 'life' and life is not just a conglomeration of some qualities. Alongwith sensitivity and faith, artistic expression and impartial study, too, are equally essential.

Even in this era, we find a number of biographies which reveal an overall lack of essentials of a biography. Rahuldev Sankrityayana has as many as six biographies to his credit, viz. Lenin, Marx, Mao-Tse Tung, Akbar, Prithvi Singh Azad and Virchandra Singh Garhwali but it is only in the last two that he could establish a realistic identity of his subjects. To some it may sound curious, but it still remains a fact that stucturally the important biographies are mostly those of litterateurs. The statesman, the philosopher, the religious mentor may be incarnations but a creative litteraturer is just a human being. He can create only if he is a man. It is only through the furnace of sweet and bitter experiences of life that he aspires to achieve the heights of greatnesss.

Some significant biographies of non-literary personalities have also been written during the present era. In the biographies of Marx and Jaya Prakash Narayan authored by Ramvriksh Benipuri (1951), we find the languagestyle moulded not only according to his faith and sensitivity but also according to his depth of study. The same thing holds good about Jaya Prakash Narayan's biography written by Lakshminarayan Lal but undertaking to write a biography while the subject is still living is a risky enterprise. Lohia's biographer Onkar Sharad (1971), too, took that risk deliberately and successfully portrayed a life full of struggles with commendable objectivity. Govind Ballabh Pant's biography by Shambhu Prasad is also an important work in this category.

The author of Krantidoot Bhagat Singh aur unka Yug (1972) has himself been an active revolutionary. To some extent his account of Bhagat Singh is bound to be somewhat subjective, but even so it represents an authentic document of a whole era. Dharma Vir, the author of Lala Hardayal (1971) is, likewise, himself an authoritative scholar. His approach is research-oriented. The authoress of Yugdrashta Bhagat Singh aur unke Mirtyunjay Purkhe, Virendra Sindhu is a niece of the great revolutionary himself. A subjective bias would not, under the circumstances, be unnatural but the authoress has earnestly tried to present authentic material on her subject wherein we could easily discuss a happy blend of dry factuality with aesthetic relish. The biography of the immortal martyr Sukhdev has been penned by his brother Mathuradas Thapar. It is an important work from the point of view of authenticity. The author, while making a valiant effort to keep above partisan spirit, reveals facts which throw new light on the era. Vishvanath Vaishampayan, the author of Amar Shahid Chandra Shekhar Azad has likewise been a living witness of the goings-on of the era and he presents an intimate picture thereof through one of the leading architects of the era.

Amongst the makers of history, the biographies of Shiva, Tantia Tope, Rani Lakshmi Bai, Nana Sahib Peshwa and Nana Pharanavis may be mentioned. In the field of religion and philosophy, two important biographies were written during this period. The biography of Gopinath Kaviraj titled Manishi ki Lok-yatra (1969) is authored by Bhagwatiprasad Singh. It has a bit too much of pedantic touch. It is important for those who have an interest in the specific system of spiritual practices. On the contrary, Uttar Yogi (1972) by Shivprasad Singh successfully portrays the multi-dimensional and complex life of Aurobindo in all its richness and fullness.

As has been already stated the biography, as a literary genre, found its true subject in the case of literary personalities alone. The first important work in this respect is Shiv Rani Devi's Premchand: Ghar Mein. Technically speaking, we may dub it as a non-biography but it provides us with a real glimpse into Premchand's private life.

Three important biographies of the era, which have been much talked of, probably due to the personalities of their subjects, are: Kalam ka Sipahi (1968), Nirala ki Sahitya Sadhana (1969) and Awara Masiha by Vishnu Prabhakar. The author of the first, a biography of Premchand, is Amrit Rai, Premchand's younger son. The author of Nirala ki Sahitya Sadhana, Ram Vilas Sharma, was a close friend of the poet. In spite of some objectionable references, the biography has been hailed as a full and living monument to his memory. As against this, the author of Awara Masiha, a biography of one of the greatest novelists of our age, had never even had a glimpse of him. Even so. the biographer has sincerely tried to present the mystery-shrouded and complex life of the great litterateur with utmost sympathy and commendable impartiality.

Some other significant biographies in Hindi may be mentioned here:

Makhanlal Chaturvedi: Ek Jivani (1960) by Rishi Jaimini Kaushik Barua: This biography makes for an interesting life-sketch which has the grip of life as a whole and its approach is not one-sided either. The author has successfully delved into the poet's heart.

Ramchandra Shukla is (1963) by Chandrashekhar Shukla. We find in the pages of this biography the man that was Ramchandra Shukla.

*Kalam ka Mazdoor (*Madan Gopal): Inspite of profusion of analysis and lack of artistic talent, the author has succeeded in portraying the simple and straightforward but lustrous image of a struggling personality.

Sumitranadan Pant: Jivan aur Sahitya, by Shruti Joshi: The authoress, with an intimate affinity and deep understanding, gives ample evidence of her artistic talent and deep insight in the portrayal of the great poet.

Agnisetu by Vishnu Chandra Sharma: Penning down the biography of a revolutionary poet of Nazrul's calibre is a challenge. Accepting this challenge in all good faith, Sharma has tried to view the life of the poet in wider contemporary perspective, it is a significant work though it lacks a comprehensive outlook and artistic grace.

Gorky by Onkar Sharad: Inspite of several drawbacks of language and narrative quality, the biography assumes the gripping interest of a novel through clarity and lucidity of ideas and the author's sympathy with his subject. One can understand Gorky's inner self through this biography.

Mila Tej se Tej (Sudha Chauhan): This interesting biography of poetess Subhadra Kumari Chauhan has been written by her own daughter and she has, by and large, succeeded in presenting an upright image of the poetess of Jhansi ki Rani as also in establishing her own identity.

There are other biographies too in cheap editions, e.g. Loknayak Jaya Prakash Narayan by Suresh Ram Bhai. Compiling the life sketches of a number of personages in a single volume has received a boost during the recent years. Such works have a definite objective, hence they have their limitations, too. The most important amongst such endeavours is Kshemchandra Suman's Divamgat Hindi Sevi. Only two volumes have so far been published. The compiler has tried hard to prepare short biographical sketches of about 1500 of those who have served the course of Hindi.

There appears to be no project of a planned effort to translate great biographies of world literature. The translations of such biographies as have enriched the various languages of the world would, undoubtedly, be an asset to our literature also.

The biographies published in recent years under the Sahitya Akademi project titled Adhunik Sahitya ke Nirmata are well-written and well-produced. Some worthwhile biographies are also available under the category of books meant for adolescents. The work done by the Peoples Publishing House and the National Book Trust in this respect is indeed commendable.

V.P.

BIOGRAPHY (Kannada). It is estimated that there are more than a thousand biographies in Kannada and that half of these belong to the pre-Independance period. Considering the large number, they cannot all be expected to fulfil the stringent requirements of that literary form. A large number is limited both in approach and marshalling of material; they are no more than bare outlines of the character and achievements of the chosen subject. Not all writers of biographies can be expected to be Boswells or Stracheys nor all such writings to be rich in intimate detail and ironical detachment. Most of the them, especially of the earlier period, intended as they were to serve a limited purpose, stressed the achievements and traits of character of the chosen heroes as worthy of emulation. Their aim was to bring out the message of their lives rather than explore their inside and reveal the men within as modern biography seeks to do. The very fact that almost all the subjects of the earlier writings were either saints or savants, patriots or social reformers or religious leaders is proof that the subjects were chosen for what they had to teach and therefore more for admiration and emulation from outside and less for analysis and understanding of the man from within.

The following titles belonging to the earlier phase will bear out the above observations. The more prominent among them (with the names of the authors in brackets) would be as follows: Jesus Christ (Kittel); Basava, Buddha and Swami Ramatirtha (Hardekar Manjappa); Shankaracharya (D. Narayana Sastry); Madhwacharya (N.S. Purohit); Allama (Buddhayya Puranik); Paigambar (Pujar); Lincoln (B. Chandrasekarayya, C.K. Venkataramayya and Honnapurmath); Akbar, Shivaji, Tippu, Nana Phadnis, Ranjit Singh (R.H. Deshpande); Napoleon (A. Rama Rao) and others.

The next phase reveals a wider range in the choice of subjects and a more distinctly literary manner with the arrival of a whole new generation of writers who constituted the emerging Navodaya school or the literary renaissance of this country. The following titles (with the authors' names indicated in brackets) would be representative and typical of the new approach both in the choice of subject and manner of treatment: Kunigal Ramashastrigala Charitre (M.S. Puttanna); Alida Maheswamiyavaru (C.K. Venkataramayayya); Gopala Krishna Gokhale and Diwan Rangacharlu (D.V. Gundappa); Ramakrishna Paramahamsa and Rabindranath Tagore (Masti); Ramakrishna Charitamrita and Maha Yogi Aravinda (Diwakar); Jawaharlal Nehru (D.K. Krishna Iyengar and Sriranga); Ramakrishna Paramahamsa and Swami Vivekananda (Kuvempu); Uttangi (Hurali); Rashtrakavi Kuvempu and Teenamshri (Dejagu); Aravinda (K. Chanbassappa); Darwin, Newton and Lenin (N.S. Veerappa); Sri Ramanuja and V.K.R.V. Rao (H.S.K.); John Stuart Mill (H. Krishna Rao); and Basavanna (M. Chidanandamurthy). These titles can be easily regarded as milestones in biographical writings of the last fifty or sixty years. All of them are remarkable for the wealth of material, carefully collected and effectively presented, so that the basic traits of the character, personality, achievement and influence of the chosen subjects are successfully brought out. Not less remarkable are the distinctive prose styles of the individual authors. In these hands biography in Kannada definitely achieved a literary form and maturity.

The lives of saints, religious leaders and founders of faiths claim more writers than other subjects. Apart from those already mentioned in this category a few more excellent biographies in this line have to be noted. Sriranga has translated the well known work on the life of the Buddha by Dharmananda Kosambi. G.P. Rajaratnam besides the Budddha, has written about the Chinese Buddhist pilgrims. B. Vasantaraju and Mirji Annarao have written about Mahavira and U.K. Subbarayachar about Jesus Christ. Prabhu Shankar has written about Kahlil Gibran and Sister Nivedita, R. Narasimha Murthy about Sarala Devi, Kundangar, and Akka Mahadevi and O.N. Lingannayya and G.S. Shivarudrappa about Siddharama. M.R. Srinivasamurthy's Bhaktibhandari Basavanna is among the many accounts of that great religious reformer, the most balanced and authoritative.

Apart from contemporary political leaders like Mahatma Gandhi, Nehru, Vallabhbhai Patel, Rajendra Prasad, Azad, Ambedkar, J.P. Narayan, Lal Bahadur Shastri and Indira Gandhi and those of an earlier generation like Tilak, Gokhale and Ranade, eminent personalities of international repute of many lands and different periods like Socrates, Doctor Johnson, Marx, Lenin, Gorky, Stalin, Pasha, Mill, Benjamin Franklin, Jefferson, Martin Luther King, Lincoln and Kennedy receive adequate attention in biographies that give fairly detailed accounts of their life and work. Among the scientists, Faraday, Einstein, Edison, Flemming, Louis Pasteur, Mary Curie, C.V. Raman and J.C. Bose have been written about.

Nearer home, Javare Gowda's biography of Kuvempu is thorough and well informed. His account of T.N. Srikantiah within its short compass is intimate. The dramatist Kailasam has been the subject for Kandade, K.V. Ayyar and A.N. Krishna Rao. The last mentioned author and T.R. Subba Rao have written about each other. Short but full of intimate understanding are V. Sitaramiah's book on Karanth, and Karanth's book on painter Hebbar, Anantharangachar's on R. Narasimhachar and Tirumale Rajamma on the great 'veena' player Sheshanna.

Biography as a form of literature is a demanding art. Its authenticity depends on the industry and research involved in collecting the material and its value on the point of view from which the material is presented. Though it is true that no writer chooses to write a biography unless he admires his subject, the Kannada biographer has, almost invariably, chosen to present his subjects as larger than life. This has been only natural since the motive has been always to uphold and commend the personality, his work or his message. It has also to be noted that only when an author has written about another contemporary of his, does the writing carry the authority and intimacy of personal knowledge but in all other cases–and they form the vast majority–the material, however meticulously collected, is not the product of personal knowledge but drawn from secondary sources, from what has already been written. That is how most Kannada biographies succeed in conveying information about the chosen subjects rather than presenting a personal point of view or exploring the traits of their personalities as modern biography seeks to do.

A fairly large number of pen-portraits of varying length has been written and these are free from the above limitations. They are based on personal knowledge and even if these portraits do not abound in biographical detail, they provide a closer understanding of and a more intimate insight into the personalities written about. Such is the extensive gallery of portraits from memory to be found in the seven volumes of DVG's Jnapaka Chitrashale in which come to life the author's senior and junior contemporaries in many walks of life, artists and administrators, musicians and men of letters and many others. V. Sitaramiah's Mahaniyaru (The Worthies) and Hiriyaru Geleyaru (Elders and Friends) belong to the same category and, together with the former, they not only build up a gallery of memorable characters who, in various ways, enriched life in Karnataka, but also vividly recreate the entire atmosphere of the period in which they lived and worked. A.N. Krishna Rao's portraits of some of the artists of Karnataka provide intimate introductions to some of those who since have acquired name and fame. The earliest to attempt this form of writing was the late D.B. Kulkarni whose portrait of Gouramma the writer has remained a touching classic. These writings, even if they cannot be described as biographies as such, are useful substitutes and what they lack in the matter of biographical detail is amply made good by the intimate glimpses they afford into the character, personality and work of the chosen subjects.

A large number of Felicitation Volumes published in recent years in honour of persons who have distinguished themselves in one or another field also contain biographical matter or the story of their lives in outline. These can be no more than outlines and as such their value as biographies is very limited.

V.M.I.

BIOGRAPHY (Kashmiri). The biographical writings in Kashmiri began in the 14th century, but there is not a single manuscript of these ancient biographies extant. An authentic chronicler of Badshah's times (1420-1470), namely, Shrivara mentions two poets, Som Pandit and Yod Bhatt in his Jaina Rajtarangni, who wrote the biography of Badshah. Som Pandit's biography, is famous by the title Zana tsareth (light of Zaifn-ul-Aabidin Badshah). The 15th, 16th and 17th centuries are chiefly the centuries of lyrical poetry. During the long period of monotony, there was no work of biographical nature. However, some well known historians and scholars in Persian wrote some biographies of the most popular saint-poets of the Kashmiri language. They were particularly attracted by the life of the most revered saint-poet, Shiekh-ul-Aalam. These biographies are known as Reshi Namas and Noor Namas. There is also a long chain of chronicles in the Persian language in which a considerable portion deals with the lives of Kashmiri poets.

The actual history of Kashmiri biographical writings begins with certain long poems which commemorate the life of Prophet Muhammad and his relaltives. The earliest of these narrative poems is Vafatnama Anhazrat (an elegy written on the death of Muhammad) written by Baba Kamal, a 17th century poet. It has wrongly been ascribed to another Kashmiri poet, Muhmud Gami (1765-1855). In fact Muhmud Gami has written another elegiac narrative Vafatnama Hazrat Fatima. It is a beautiful elegy mourning the death of Hazrat Fatima. One more biographical poem which has wrongly been ascribed to Muhmud is Khadijnama (biography of Hazrat Khadija). The evidence of old manuscripts reveals that the poem had been written by Syed Ali Khan.

The poem has been written in an overwhelming devotional tone and simple mellifluous diction. Sidiq Ullah Hajini (1832-1900) has also written two narrative poems in the 'masnavi' form that is 'Maghazi-ul-Nabi' and 'Shakalu Shumaili and Hazrat' (The Prophets' Personality). The two poems together serve the purpose of a complete biography of the Prophet.

The biographical works mentioned so far are all in verse. After 1947 when Kashmiri prose made a new beginning, some biographical works in prose also appeared. In 1949, Amin Kamil published the translation of J.E. Eslemant's book on Baha-Ul-lah under the title Baha-Ul-lah ta nov Zamana. The beauty of the book lies in its lucid style. Mehjoor wrote a brief life-sketch of his contemporary poet Aasi who died young in 1950. This sketch was published in the monthly Kongaposh. There appeared some more life sketches in the same magazine, for instance Kamil's essay on Mehjoor's life who died in 1952. In late fifties, P.N. Pushp wrote a brief biography of Vinoba Bhave, entitled Vinoba ta Sarvoday. The importnce of this booklet rests on lucidity, clarity and succinctness of expression. In 1961, Pushp published one more booklet, Tana Mana Nagma Hyuv (lyric incarnate) in which he produced a beautiful pen portrait of Rabindranath Tagore. Here, too, Pushp's penchant for the simplicity and sweetness of common speech is amply revealed. Mohi-ud-Din Hajni wrote some biographical essays such as 'Wahab parray', 'Asad Parray', 'Molvi Sidiq Ul-lah Hajni'. His essays inspired other researchers like Moti Lal Saqi, Naji Munawar, Ghulam Mohd. Shad, Ghulam Nabi Khayal, Muhammad Yusuf Teing, Amin Kamil, Ghulam Nabi Nazir and Autar Krishan Rahbar. Moti Lal Saqi wrote brief life sketches of his contemporary poets and published them in one volume Gashir (luminaries, 1970). The book, written mainly with utilitarian point of view, is quite traditional in terms of its ornate style and general rendering. In his next collection of biographical essays, Ankawan (An Estimate 1976) we find five more profiles: Karem Buland, Shah Qalandar, LakhiManjoo Bulbul, Ghulam Muhammad Zag, and Lichni Kak. Saqi also compiled the collected works of Samad Mir and wrote his detailed biography.

While pursuing research on Muhmood Gami, Naji Munawar has come accross several such poets of considerable merit as had remained forgotten; Maqbul Amritsary is the most important among them. He compiled the works of Muhamud Gami utilizing the evidence of a number of unpublished manuscripts. The book also contains a short biography of Muhmud. Naji also wrote a concise history of Kashmiri literature in which profiles of Kashmiri poets are given in a simple, dispassionate and lucid style. Naji does not indulge in legends and myths in his biographical writings. Ghulam Nabi Khayal wrote eleven biographical essays on eleven eminent men of letters in world literature, namely, Homer, Virgil, Kalidasa, Umra-ul-Qais, Dante, Hafez, Shakespeare, Goethe, Pushkin, Iqbal and Tagore. The essays are contained in one volume Gaashir Munar which won him a Sahitya Akademi Award. Khayal's prose has all the beauties of simplicity and clarity. The rare pictures contained in the book add to its value. Autar Krishan Rahbar's Kashri Adbech Tarikh must also be mentioned in this brief survey, for it also covers the lives of some early poets in Kashmiri. The book is well documented. Amin Kamil edited three volumes of Sofi Shayir (mystic poets, 1961) which contains brief bio-notes on the poets evaluated and edited in the book. In fact all the collected works of various Kashmiri poets edited demand mention, for each of these works contains an introduction to the life and work of the writer, Kulyati Maqbool Shah Kralawari (edited by Mohd Yousuf Teing) Noor Nama (edited by Amin Kamil) Kulyati Sheikh-ul-Alam (ed. Moti Lal Saqi) Kulyati Wahab Parrey Mohi-ud-Din Hajini are the most important books of this kind.

There are some remarkable translations which have enriched the genre of biographical writings in Kashmiri. The most important is Shams-ud-Din Ahmed's translation of Payambar, the liveliest Persian biography of Prophet Muhammad written by Zain-ul-Aabidin Rahnuma. The translator has succeeded to a great extent in transferring the force and melifluousness of the original into Kashmiri prose. The book has been brought out in three deluxe volumes by the J & K Cultural Academy. Akhtar Mohi-ud-Din has rendered Mahatma Gandhi's autobiography into simple, clear and lucid prose. The translation bears the title Miyanen Tajruban Hinz Dastan (1974). It is for the quality of Akhtar's style that we are continously interested, moved and excited by the translation. Two more translations of biographical nature are Rahman Rahi's Farid-ud-Din Ganjshakar and Bansi Nirdosh's Son Domi Shayir (a short biography of Tagore). In the recent years the genre of biographical writings is getting special attention. The Department of Kashmiri of the University of Kashmir is making a considerable contribution to this field. Awhalnama (1979) is a dictionary of men of letters in Kashmiri. The first volume of the project, is written by Chaman Lal Chaman and Bashir Akhtar. The utility of the book lies in its being a handy reference book. There are several reminiscences published in various journals of Cultural Academy which are worth mentioning when a detailed survey of biographical writings is intended. Mention must also be made of some of the pamphlets published by various cultural and literary societies of the valley. Halqa Adab Sonawar Hajan has published some five of such pamphlets, Lala Tantrey (ed. Mohd Ahsan) Lasi Dar (ed. M.D. Hajini) Ramzan Phoph (ed. Taskeen) and Nabir Mir (ed. Mohd Ahsan). Adbi Markaz Kamraz has published two volumes of Mashahiri Kamraz which is a collection of short biographical sketches of the eminant people of the Kamraz area. Similarly, the Cultural Forum of Shopian has brought out the first volume of Nir' posh a collection of biographies of the men of letters of the Maraz area.

Sh.S

BIOGRAPHY (Konkani). Biography as a genre is yet to develop in Konkani. Ever since the advent of missionaries in Goa in early 16th century, innumerable brief and lengthy accounts of lives and teachings of Christ, St. Francis Xavier and other saints were published in Roman script. However, based on legend and hearsay as they are, they belong to the domain of fiction more than biography in the true sense. Recently, quite a few books on lives of great men of India have been published for children. Konkani speaking community itself has produced very many eminent personalities. Yet very few attempts have been made to bring out their biographies.

Shannay Gomybab's Punyatmo Ram Kamati (Ram Kamati, the Virtuous Soul, 1939) depicts the life, work and tragic downfall of the great Goan, settled in Bombay in 17th century. Gomybab published Abbe Faria (real name Jose Custodio de Faria, 1941) surveying the life and achievement of the great hypnotist. Abbe Faria is one of Goa's greatest sons (b. 1756). After Pinto's revolt against the Portuguese, he fled to Portugual thence to France, where Mesmer was popular as was his theory of magnetic fluid. Abbe Faria studied the phenomenon of hypnotism and gave it a scientific basis disproving Mesmer's theory. He is believed to have died around 1820. Tulsidas (1976) by R.K.Rao and K. Ananta Bhat is a biographical sketch by Rao with the Konakani versions of Tulsidas' verses (fiftyone in all) by Bhat. Shantaram S. Varde Valaulikar's Vajralikhnni (The Mighty Pen, 1977) published as a commemorative volume to mark Shannay Gomybab's birth centenary by Konkani Bhasha Mandal, Goa gives a short account of Gomybab's life and works. Bhagwan Buddha (1979) is a translation by Bakibab Borker of Dharmananda Kosambi's Marathi classic. Kosambi's itinerant life, dedicated to the study of Buddhism is described in the foreword. Like the Buddha, he left home in quest of true knowledge. The present book apart from presenting the life of Buddha, attempts to make an analytical study of the history of the times of the Buddha. Shannay Gomybab (Life of Shanny Gomybab, 1980) by R.N. Naik is a survey of Gomybab's life and his great contribution to Konkani, which has earned him the title 'Father of Konkani Literature'. Abbe Faria (1982) by Pandurang S. Varde is a free translation of Abbe Faria's biography in Portuguese by the famous Portuguese scientist Egas Moniz. Premchand (1984) is a translation by Olivinho Gomes of Premchand biography in Hindi by Prakashchandra Gupta. Mention must also be made of Honore de Balzac a booklet by Manohar Rai Sardesai depicting the career of the eminent French author. Originally delivered as Shanny Gomybab Commemorative Lecture in 1976, the brief biography was published by Konkani Bhasha Mandal in 1979. Shorter biographies for children are Ravindra Kelekar's Ashe Ashil'le Gandhiji (1964) and Shantaram Hede's Bapu (1971). Other contributions are Suryaput Subhash by Ashok Kamat, Aryabhatta (1980) and Bhaskaracharya (1982) by Arun Heblekar, Surashri Kesarbai Kerkar (1980) by Amita Phalldesai, Master Dinanath Mangeshkar (1982) by Jaywant Kapileshwari, Nana Shanker Shet (1983) by Shivananda Rivonkar and Francisco Luis Gomes (1984) by Olivinho Gomes. The Kerala Konkani Academy published Shraddhanjali (1983) (ed. P.G. Kamath), a commemorative volume on Rashtrakavi Manjeshwar Govind Pai scripted by a group of writers.

P.G.T.

BIOGRAPHY (Maithili) The earliest biographies were mere panegyrics rather than an account of the life or times of a person. Such biographies were written more in verse than in prose. Such 'Charitas' were written about famous heroes like Sudama and Rama. Biography in prose was attempted on the lives and deeds of illustrious writers and scholars like Shankar Mishra and Pakshadhar Mishra, the eminent scholars of Nyaya, saints like Lakshminath Gosain etc.

Biography properly so called was first attempted by Mahamahopadhyaya Muralidhar Jha (life of the Mathematician Sudhakar Dwivedi), Trilochan Jha of Bettiah (life and times of Harimohan Jha), Achyutananda Datt (life and deeds of Balva Khan) etc. The best biography of this kind was written by Ramnath Jha (on Ganganatha Jha, Balkrishna Mishra, Satyanarayana Jha, etc.). This was, however, all in the field of short biographies.

Long and exhaustive biographies in Maithili have been written only recently: such as, on the lives of Mahamahopadhyaya Muralidhar Jha, Umapati Upadhyaya, Vidyapati and Maharani Rajalakshmi. Among them the biography of Rajalakshmi is the best. Biography has not yet developed in Maithili, it is still in the beginning. Memoirs, autobiographic notes and reminiscences are more popular. The best of these are undoubtedly Girindra Mohan Mishra's Kichu Dekhala Kichu Sunala (1973) and Harimohan Jha's Jivan Yatra (1978). As a piece of literature perhaps Hansraja's Bisarala, Bisrals (1979) is the finest writing in this manner.

J.M.

BIOGRAPHY (Malayalam) evolved by the end of the 19th century. One witnesses its beginnings in the biographical notes on Alexander, Aristotle, Archemedis, Bacon and others published by Vishakham Thirunal in the journal Vidyavilasini (1875). Vishakham had translated these from Mander's Treasury of Great Men and entrusted further translations of it to Kerala Varma Valiya Koyil Thampuran. Kerala Varma had translated some more and a book by name Mahacharita Sangraham containing 107 biographical notes was published in 1895. During the last decade of the nineteenth century two more biographies were published: Raja Sri T. Madhavàvarayar by Sakha Rama Rayar Lakshmana Rayar and Devji Bhimaji by M.T. Kunjunni.

Now about 500 biographies are available in Malayalam, most of which were published during the twentieth century. A number of biographies were produced with the main purpose of educating the younger genertion and they lack the truthfulness expected of the genre.

The biographies available at present can be divided into three categories–religious, political and literary. Again this may be about a native or a foreigner. Biographies of Chattampi Swamikal, Narayana Guru and Sadhu Kochoonju are famous as religious biographies while among political biographies those of Changanachery Parameswaran Pillai, Mannathu Padmanabhan and Sakthan Thampuran are outstanding. Among literary biographies those of Kumaran Asan, Kerala Varma, A. Balakrishna Pillai, Vallathol, Ulloor and C.V. Raman Pillai are important.

Malayalam has only a few biographers of whom P.K. Parameswaran Nair and N. Balakrishnan Nair are significant. The biographies of C.V. Raman Pillai and P.K. Narayana Pillai written by P.K. Parameswaran Nair are the best in Malayalam.

There were organised efforts also for bringing out biographies. Thomas Paul, the owner of Vidyavilasam Publishing House, had started a scheme for publishing short biographies of literary men in Malayalam following the model of Men of Letters series in English. He published biographies written by different authors. Venkulam G. Parameswaran Pillai is another who had started a series of biographies, namely Jivacharitra Sanchika in which he intended to bring out 120 biographies of eminent men. But he could produce only 29 short biographies in 3 volumes. Another endeavour in this connection is Kairali Children's Book Trust, registered in 1980, whose chief purpose is to publish short biographies of 400 personalities of the world. D.C. Kizhakkumuri is the Secretary and Executive of the project. Now the project is more than half way and is progressing steadily. Recently a few good biographies have appeared in Malayalam. They include the biography of Kelappan by C.K. Moosath, of Vakkom Maulavi by Hazi M. Mohamed Kannu and of Suranad Kunjan Pillai by K. Sankaran Namboothiri.

P.V.V.P.

BIOGRAPHY (Marathi). The writing of biography in Marathi began almost immediately after the passing away of Chakradhara and Jnaneshvara, two great personalities of medieval Maharashtra. Mahimbhatta wrote two biographies in prose–Leelacharitra (1278) and Govindaprabhucharitra (1287). These are anecdotal in nature and are compiled with great efforts by collecting memoirs of the disciples and followers of Mahanubhav sect, who came in close contact with these personalities. Namdeva's biography of Jnaneshvar was written in verse at the end of the 13th century and was set in sentimental and mythological vein.

It was quite natural that the lives of great saints like Eknath, Tukaram and Ramdas should provide the material for the writing of their biographies and some biographies of them are available. The most prominent and prolific among the biographers is Mahipati. His voluminous works Santalilamrita (1767), Bhaktalilamrita (1774), and Santavijaya (Incomplete, 1790) exhaustively portrays a galaxy of saints. His biographies though ancedotal and mythological have preserved all that was known and spoken among the people of that time.

Another branch of biography is historical one. Biographies known as Bakhars have been written to bring to readers the life stories of the great heroes of the independent Maharashtra. Krishnaji Anant Sabhasad, Raghunath Yadav and Malhar Ramrao Chitnis wrote some important biographies of Shivaji. Malhar Ramrao wrote 7 biographies in the beginning of the 17th century depicting the era of Maratha rulers.

Coming to the modern period, the style of writing biographies underwent immense change. Instead of writing in a high flown language, a simple narrative language giving much more information on the life of the personality is being used. This influence is seen in all types of biographies e.g. biographies of pious personalities, historical figures, saints of all ages, kings and political leaders and public figures of the present time. In the early British rule, the biographies of great personalities of the world were translated. Vinayak Kondadeva Oak has translated many such biographies. M.V. Chaubal wrote original biographies of Saint Ramdas (1871) and Eknath (1872). Krishnashastri Athlay's biography of Sri Sankaracharya (1889), gives a vivid account of his life.

When the interest in the history of Marathas was revived through the efforts of many historians, the biographies of important historical personages appeared successively. Vasudevshastri Khare's biography of Nana Phadanvis (1892) and D.B. Parasnis's biography of Rani Laxmibai (1844) and Brahmendraswami Dhavadshikar (1901) are based on extensive historical documents. Pangarkar and Ajgaonkar have written about the lives of all the important saints of medieval Maharashtra. Pangarkar's biography of Moropant (1908) is an important work which is written with great authority.

Some important biographies are Anandibai Joshi by Kashibai Kanitkar (1891), Vishusastri Chiplunkar by his brother Laxman (1894) and Bhaurao Kolhatkar and Annasaheb Kirloskar (both 1901) by S.B. Majumdar.

The writing of biography is profuse and plentiful after 1920. Lives of saints (medieval as well as modern) are more in number. Then comes the turn of historical and political personalities. Lives of scientists, reformers, teachers, authors, philosophers etc. are written in great number.

Political figures have always found a great place in Marathi biography. Among them Lokmanya Bal Gangadhar Tilak occupies a unique place. The influence of his personality on Indians in general and Maharashtrians in particular hardly needs mention. He was a towering political figure who led the masses towards the goal of independence and hence writers have a special love for him. His biographies written by N.C. Kelkar (1927), S.L. Karandikar (1941) and N.R. Phatak (1975) are worth reading. Along with Lokmanya Tilak, Mahatma Gandhi finds a place in biographical literature. D.N. Shikhare's Mahatma Gandhi Jivancharitra (1944), Acharya S.D. Jawadekar's Mahatma Gandhi (1949) discuss various deeds of this great personality. Dadabhoy Naoroji by N.S. Phatak (1922), Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru by Sane Guruji (1949), Vir Savarkar by S.L. Karandikar (1949) and Mahatma Jyotiba Phule by G.B. Sardar are biographies of some of the great personalities. Special mention may be made of the biography of Dr. B.R. Ambedkar by Dhananjay Keer. He took great pains to give a detailed account of a great political leader who showed beacon-light to the down-trodden people of India.

Besides the political figures, lives and works of great scholars have also been recorded. G.R. Hawaldar gave an account of Raosaheb V.N. Mandlik (1927), a social reformer of the time. The biography runs into more than thousand pages. G.G. Jambhekar has taken great pains in writing the life account of Acharya Bal Shastri Jambhekar (1950) a pioneer in social awakening in Western Maharashtra. Justice K.T. Telang by S.N. Karnatki (1929), Mama Parmanand by P.B. Kulkarni (1964), Chatrapati Shivaji Maharaj by B.S. Bendre (1969), Dr. Shankar

Abaji Bhise, the great scientist by J.B. Kulkarni (1969), Achyut Balwant Kolhatkar by V.H. Kulkarni (1979), Senapati Bapat by H.M. Joshi and S.S. Navre are some of the important biographies dealing with various aspects of these great personalities.

N.R. Phatak. Dhananjaya Keer and D.N. Gokhale are three eminent biographers of modern Marathi whose works are based on extensive research and analysis. Gokhale's biographies of Dr. Ketkar and Dr. Patwardhan have set a new ideal of writing biographies on psychological interpretations.

J.B.K.

BIOGRAPHY (Nepali) Motiram Bhatta's Kavi Bhanubhaktacharyako Jiwan Charitra (Life of Poet Bhanubhakta Acharya) was published in 1891. It was a pioneering work both in the field of Nepali biographical writing and literary criticism. Prior to that, as later researches have found out, biographies of the Gorkhali King Ram Shah (1606-1633) and the founder of present-day Nepal, Prithvinarayan Shah (1742-1775) had been written around 1606 and 1744 respectively. Seven years after the publication of the biography of Bhanubhakta, Chiranjiwi Sharma who was later to be associated with the journal Gorkha Patra (founded 1901) published his autobiography Mero Katha (My Story) in 1898.

The journals Gorkha Patra and Chandra (founded 1914) carried fairly regularly short biographical sketches of eminent persons, past and present. Amongst those who were featured were Bharatendu Harishchandra, Bankim chandra, Tulsidas, Pandit Jagannath, Magh, Shankaracharya, Ishwarchandra, Buddha, Gokhale, King George V and a host of others. In book form, however, only a translation of the life of Jung Bahadur, done by Hari Singh Thapa, made a solitary appearance.

Jiwan Charitra (1915) by Bigyan Bilas contained life sketches of Shankaracharya, Rana Pratap and General Garfield. Ratan Dhwaj Rai wrote Ladenla, a short life sketch of the hill leader of north Bengal in 1936. A combination of literary learning and interest in historical study enabled Surya Bikram Gewali to produce a succession of historical biographies–Ramshah (1933), Drabya Shah (1933), Prithvinarayan Shah (1935), Bir Balabhadra (1940), Amar Singh Thapa (1943) and Nepali Birharu (1949).

Next there is a harvest of biographies which have as their subjects Nepali writers. Brahma Shamsher wrote a life of Bhanubhakta and Naradev Sharma wrote one of Motiram Bhatta. Rimal: Byakti Ra Kriti (1975) by Keshav prasad Upadhyay, Bhimnidhi: Byakti Ra Kriti (1975) by Ghataraj Bhattarai, Vidwachchhiromani Hemraj Sharma (1978) by Prakash A. Raj, Mahakavi Deokota Adikavi Bhanubhakta Acharyako Sachcha Jiwan Charitra (1960) by Naranath Sharma Acharya, and Mahakavi Lakshmi prasad (1961) by Churhamani Bandhu were fore-runners of the tribe. They altogether add up to a spate of biographical criticism in Nepali literature.

The Ramakrishna Vedanta Ashram of Darjeeling (West Bengal) greatly attracted the Nepali intelligentsia in the forties and fifties. Swami Abhedananda (1967) by Bishnu Kumari Khadga and Ramakrishna (1973) by Indra Sundas are products of that relationship.

Raj Narayan Pradhan's Naw Nami Neta (Nine Famous Leaders) and Paitis Prasiddha Purush (Thirty-five Famous Men) stand on a different footing. Rather than relating the life in detail, the short sketches aim at presenting the personality of the characters viewing them surely from an angle well out of anything perpendicular.

In 1965 Bangdal Laina Singh, who is himself an artist, brought out his Bishwaka Chha Mahan Kalakar (World's Six Great Artists). It is a study of the lives and works of Leonardo da Vinci, Michael Angelo, Titian, El Greco, Velasquez and Goya. The lives are well told.

Autobiographies of Booker T. Washington, Rousseau, Gandhi and Jawaharlal Nehru are available in Nepali translations. There is also a biography of a Gorkha soldier, Deshman Rai, in Nepali. This book, Os (1978), by Bhagirath Rawat, is retold in an autobiographical form.

A publication of great importance is Balkrishna Sama's autobiography Mero Kavitako Aaradhana (My Worship of Poetry), volumes I and II published in 1966 and 1972. Parashmani Pradhan wrote Afno Barema (About Oneself) of which the first part has come out. Dil Bahadur Newar has been writing Mera Biteka Dinharu (My Past Days), a four volume project, of which the first two volumes have been published. Chakrapani Chalise (1883-1958), compiler of the Nepali Pocket Dictionary and the Dictionary of Synonyms wrote his autobiographical Atma-Parichay in verse, which was published posthumously in 1983.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Dayaram Shrestha and Mohanraj Sharma, Nepali Sahityako Sankshipta Itihas, 1977., Kumar Pradhan, A History of Nepali Literature, 1984.

A.G.

BIOGRAPHY (Oriya) Proper biographical literature in Oriya began in the 19th century, mainly by the text book writers of the period. They were generally inspired by Carlyle and Emerson. In the year 1866, Fakirmohan Senapati, the pioneer novelist, translated into Oriya Vidyasagar's Bengali book Jivan Charita (Accounts of Lives) and Madhusudan Rao, the poet, included brief life-accounts of Ashok, Queen Durgavati, Buddhadeva, Isaac Newton, and Napoleon, etc., in his book Prabandha Mala (The Garland of Essays). In 1896, in Tritiya Patha (Third Reader) by Sitanath Ray, the lives of Pratap Singh and Lord Peter were published. In Balika Patha (Girls' Reader, 1897) by Kanka Manjari Devi, the life histories of Sanjukta, Shaibya, Padmini and other great Indian women were described. A little later, in 1907, the well-known scholar, Pandit Mrityunjay Rath, published life-histories of Pratap Singh, William Hunter, Sir William Jones, Queen Ahalya Bai, Shankaracharya, Ishwarchandra Vidyasagar, etc., in his book Prabandha Patha (A Reader of Essays). In Bibidha Sandarva (Miscellaneous Essays, 1928) of Anandachandra Pati, the lives of many great men and women were published. Moreover he also wrote about the glories of Rajputana and the glorious lives of the Rajputs. In Nari Darpana (Mirror of Women, 1927) Pandit Mrityunjay Rath included stories about Sita, Panna, Swarnamayi, the great queen, and Sulakshana, etc.

Probably in this connection one may look back to the 17th century, to a book entitled Jagannath Charitamrita by Dibakar Das. The book was in verse and it contained the life-history of the poet Jagannath Das, the author of Oriya Bhagavata. This may be considered as the first attempt in Oriya literature at biographical writing. A similar work was Adhyatma Bhakti by Rama Das, who lived during the 18th century. The work contained biographies of ancient poets and saints and the accounts were written in poetic form. Similarly Shri Chaitanya Bhagavata of Iswar Das written more or less at the same time, was a biographical account of Chaitanya who came to Puri in 1509. These were among the few noteworthy books of biography in Oriya literature, before the advent of new era in the 19th century. All these books were written in verse, and none of them was documented in the modern sense of the term. The accounts given in those books, though of a biographical nature, were largely based on recollections, hearsay and legends which in many places, as particularly in Shri Chaitanya Bhagavata, almost bordered on miracles and semi-divine activities. But in general they were popular and the accounts given in them were by and large accepted by the readers as authentic.

Proper biographical literature in Oriya came to be written, from the later part of the 19th century onwards, and initially most of them were written in the periodicals. The main aim of those writings has been to educate and inspire people, and hence the accounts and activities of important and well-known persons, both from inside and outside Orissa, as well as from the present and past, were given. In Utkal Darpana (The Mirror of Utkal, 1883-84) the life histories of national leaders like Surendranath Banerjee and Raja Rammohan Roy were published in instalments. Balasore Sambad Bahika (The News Carrier of Balasore, 1880) published the biography of Raja Radhakanta Deva of Bengal, a strong supporter of female education. The life-history of the famous Bengali writer and educationist, Bhudeb Mukherjee was published in Oriya O Nabasambada, a magazine of 1894. At that time in Shubha Barta (Good News) and Taraka (The Star), the Christian Missionary journals, the lives of ideal persons were discussed. In Utkal Sahitya in 1903, poet Radhanath Ray published the life-history of Sudhal Dev, the ideal ruler and literary figure of Bamanda, a contemporary feudatory state of Orissa. In the year 1897, in Utkal Sahitya, Shyamsundar Bala discussed the life and work of the scientist, Franklin, and the account became a source of inspiration to many, as Franklin, though born in an ordinary candle seller's family, became immortal through his continuous efforts, perseverance and great deeds. During that time Anangamohan Chakravarty, in his book Sathi (Friend), published the biographies of many saints, because he maintained that man's hearts are filled with hope and encouragement in crisis, danger and temptation by remembering the lives of saints. Also Jagamohan Singh published the biography of the queen Karma Devi, a brave Rajput woman. In Utkal Sahitya (1914) the biographies of Abhimanyu Samanta Simhara, the famous 18th century Oriya poet, and Madhusudan Rao, well-known contemporary poet, Pandit Mrityunjay Rath, etc., were remarkable features. It also published the life-story of Dinakrishna Das. Other notable publications in Utkal Sahitya were, 'Gangadhar Prabandha' by Kulamani Das, 'Nilamani Vidyaratna' by Krishnaprasad Choudhury, 'Annatol France' by Saratchandra Mukherji and 'Sir Surendranath' by Vishwanath Kavi. Again in the Utkal Sahitya of 1917 and 1919, the essays on the poet Bhupati Pandit by Tarinicharana, on Mahatma Gandhi by Chintamani Acharya, on Swami Vivekananda by Shashibhusan Ray, on Acharya Shibanath by Vishwanath Kar, on Emerson by Shashibhushan Ray, on Payagambar Mohamed by Sheikh Golam Gaos, and on Sri Ramakrishna by Agani Das may also be considered as biographies. These writers gave graphic and interesting pictures of these great men.

Another important literary journal, Mukura (The Mirror), also took important steps in publishing biographies. Pandit Mriyunjay Rath, Gopabandhu Das, Jagabandhu Singh, Parbaticharan Das, Krishnachandra Sengupta, etc., had written biographical accounts in Mukura at different times. Also in the first year of its publication the journal brought out an account of the life-history of Sri Ramakrishna in a serial form. In the second year, the life-story of Raya Ramananda was published again in serials. Afterwards these two biographies were compiled into separate books. In addition to these, the essays on Sir William Jones and Murshid Kuli Khan by Mrityunjay Rath, on Abhirama Bhanja by Gopabandhu Das, on Rameshchandra Dutta and Mahadev Govinda Ranade by Jagabandhu Singh and on Guru Govinda Singh by Chintamani Acharya, all published in Mukura, were fine, intelligent accounts which showed the writers' real involvement in their subjects. The educationist and poet Nandakishore Bal wrote a fine critical biography of the famous novelist Fakirmohan Senapati in Mukura. It was a remarkable work, and in addition to its being a competent introduction to the novelist, it gave authentic accounts of the culture and society of contemporary Orissa. After the first World War, Sahakar (The Mango Tree) and a few other literary journals, helped the tradition of publishing biographies. These biographical essays played an important part in arousing a strong social consciousness in the minds of the contemporary youth. In Prabandhabali (1971), the writer Shyamsunder Rajguru introduced the biographies of some important literary figures and discussed their contributions to Oriya literature in a scientific manner. At the same time Mrityunjay Rath, Gopinath Nanda, Tarinicharana Rath, etc., also continued to write biographies of many important and well-known Oriya poets of the past and present. In 1921 Pandit Sadashiba Mishra published a book entitled Jagannath Das Goswami. This was the first authentic account of the poet Jagannath Das of Oriya Bhagavata fame in prose. Two other important literary biographies entitled, Karma Yogi Gourishankara and Sarala Charita were also written by Mrityunjay Rath. In these Pandit Rath gave detailed accounts of the lives of Gourishankara and Sarala along with graphic accounts of the social and cultural life of the periods concerned.

In the second quarter of the 20th century a literary organisation named Oriya Prachara Sangha was founded to patronize and publish biographical literature in Oriya. Some of the valuable biographies published by the Sangha were as follows: Maharaja Sri Ramachandra, Dayananda, Washington, Martin Luther, Karmavira Gokhale, Mohammed, Aurangzeb, Mahadev Govinda Ranade, Bhakta Kavi Madhusudana, Mahapurush Peter and Vira Keshari Shivaji. The writers who were associated with this literary organisation and wrote these books were Padmacharan Patnaik, Kalindicharan Panigrahi, Jagabandhu Singh, Dibyasingh Panigrahi, Banamali Panda, Lakshminarayana Sahoo, Bamadev Mishra, etc. These books were not only written interestingly, they also had a good range, that is, the persons were chosen from different areas. Thus there were literary figures, historical personalities, mythological characters, spiritual leaders, scientists, reformers, national leaders and many other such persons belonging to India and abroad. But lured by idealism some of these writers also permitted themselves at times a large dose of fancy, and attributed superhuman qualities to their subjects. And yet, they also provided a large element of hope, consolation and inspiration to the common reader.

Because of the socio-political factors of non-co-operation movement of the time, the writers were inspired to write biographies of personalities who fought for the independence of their country. In this connection the biography of the great revolutionary leader Matzzini of Italy, written by Godabarish Mahapatra in 1928, is noteworthy.

After Independence the writers and publishers of Orissa became increasingly interested in biographies, and biographical literature in Oriya was enriched by both original writing as well as through translations from other literatures. Thus biographies were written on eminent political personalities, such as, Mahatma Gandhi, Jawaharlal Nehru, Rajendra Prasad, Sardar Patel, Jayaprakash Narayan, Ram Manohar Lohia, Vijayalakshmi Pandit, Lalbahadur Shastri, Rajagopalachari, Madhusudan Das, Chittaranjan Das, Bal Gangadhar Tilak, Gopabandhu Das, Acharya Harihar, Godabarish Mishra, Nilakantha Das, Harikrishna Mahatab, etc. Some of the noteworthy writers in this field were Suryanarayana Das, Sachhidananda Kanungo, Gopabandhu Choudhury, Surendranath Dwivedy, Gopinath Mohanty, Surendra Mohanty, Binod Kanungo, Birakishore Das, Nagendra Kumar Ray, Nilamoni Mishra, Gorachanda Mishra, Gopalchandra Mishra, Gurucharan Patnaik, Mayadhar Mansingh, Jagannath Mohapatra, Chintamani Panigrahi, Asit Kavi, Rajanikanta Das, etc. Most of these books have been written with felicity and with many authentic details related to the persons discussed. Particularly Suryanarayan Das's two books, one on Madhusudan Das and the other on Gopabandhu Das, are good examples of well-documented and serious biography.

Though started recently, the importance of fictional biography in Oriya literature is to be noted. Surendra Mohanty in his two books, Shatabdira Surya (The Sun of the Century) and Kulabriddha (The Elder) has written about the life and activities of Madhusudan Das (1848-1934), the great leader of Orissa, in the style of a novel. Mohanty's lucid presentation has made his books very appealing and inspiring. A second fictional biography is by Chakradhar Mohapatra, entitled Kuntala Kumari Jiban Charita, the life story of late Kuntala Kumari (1900-1938), the well-known poetess of Orissa.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Chintamani Behera, Bidagdha Pathaka (1975), Natabara Samantray, Odia Sahityara Itihas, (1964)., Pathani Patnaik, Jibani Sahitya–Eka Adhyayan (1977)., Shrinibas Mishra, Adhunika Odia Gadya Sahitya (1978).

P.P.

BIOGRAPHY (Punjabi) Although the oldest specimens of prose available in Punjabi literature, viz., 'Janam Sakhis' are in the form of biographies of Guru Nanak Dev, the founder of Sikhism, biography in Punjabi as a genre originated in the beginning of the 20th century. The earlier biographies available in the form of 'Sakhis' stories Janam Patris (Life-chronicles) Ghohtis (Symposia) Masale etc., were mere exegesis of the heroes or anecdotal explanations of their life and philosophy in the puranic style. Like many other prose genres, earlier biographies of the twentieth century were also written under the influence of revivalist movements in the form of 'Chamatkars'

(Guru Nanak Chamatkar (2 Vols), Kalgidhar Chamatkar (2 Vols), Ashat Guru Chamatkar (2 Vols) by Bhai Vir Singh, the father of modern Punjabi Literature. These Chamatkars are also not very well-knit biographies. In fact, Bhai Vir Singh wrote about different anecdotes of the gurus on different occasions, mostly on birth and death celebrations of the gurus for publication in his weekly paper, Khalsa Samachar, or as tracts on behalf of the Khalsa Tract Society. Later these different tracts and writings were so edited in Chamatkars that these give the impressions of biographies of the gurus. Special efforts have, of course, been made to arrange them in chronological order as far as possible. The contents are mainly based on old 'Janam Sakhis.' These are more detailed and at places the description is very vivid and literary. Pieces of beautiful literary prose are in abundance in these Chamatkars. Bhai Vir Singh's attitude towards his heroes is that of a religious devotee and as such these writings become the specimens of subjective prose-biographies.

The British rulers with a critical interest in Sikh history sponsord writers like Lala Sharda Ram Phillauri (1837-1881) who wrote the Sikhan de Raj di Vithya (The story of Sikh rule). It was felt that more accurate biographies of the Sikh rulers and generals should be written. The major writers in this field are Karam Singh (1884-1930) and Ganda Singh (b. 1900) and Baba Prem Singh Hoti Mardan (1881-1954). Besides Banda Bahadur and Sardars of different Sikh Mish of the later 18th century, Maharaja Ranjit Singh and his descendants like Maharaja Khadag Singh, Kanwar Nannhihal Singh etc, his generals like Akali Phula Singh and Hari Singh Nalwa were the main subjects of these biographies. Of these, those written by Karam Singh are brief and sketchy, whereas those by Baba Prem Singh Hoti Mardan are fully documented but historical raw-material in them has been collected without proper arrangement and interpretation. Biographies by Ganda Singh are more objectively written and show a literary quality. Banda Singh Bahadur is a beautiful example of this kind of biography.

After independence the writing of biographies in Punjabi took a new turn. With the importance accorded to Punjabi as a regional language in educational curricula and the administrative spheres of the state, many literary monographs came into existence. These were the life-accounts of the prominent literary figures. Another type of biographies written in the post-independence period was related to the great revolutionaries of the Punjab such as Baba Sohan Singh Bhakhna, Baba Gurdit Singh Komagatamaru, Bhagat Singh and Udham Singh who struggled hard throughout their lives to free their motherland from the yoke of slavery and a few outstanding personalities of the later half of the eighteenth century such as Nawab Kapur Singh, Jassa Singh Ahluwalia, Jassa Singh Ramgarhia etc. Jaswant Singh Jas, the author of many of these biographies, has thus taken the biographical literature in Punjabi a step further.

There has been a spate of centenary celebrations of the Sikh Guru starting from the third birth centenary celebrations of Guru Gobind Singh in 1966 followed by the celebrations of Guru Nanak Dev in 1969, Baba Farid in 1972, Guru Tegh Bahadur in 1975, Ravi Das in 1978 and Guru Amar Das in 1979. Quite a few biographies of the Gurus and other saints were written during these celebrations. Sahib Singh, Gurbakhsh Singh Pritlari, Kartar Singh, Tarlochan Singh, Harbans Singh Chawla etc. are a few prominent writers of these biographies. As compared to the biographies of the Sikh Gurus and Saints written in the earlier decades of the twentieth century under the influence of the revivalist movements, these biographies have relatively more objectivity and the approach is more scientific.

In the post-independence period small biographies also came to be written on a literary level, amongst which are those written by S. Kapur Singh and collected in his book Sapt Shring (1952). Taking an overall view we can say that although biography in Punjabi has taken a few strides widening its horizons, it has not yet gone very far from its infancy.

Gu.S.

BIOGRAPHY (Rajasthani) Though the modern concept of biography was unknown to the traditional writers biographical writings were not unknown to mediaeval Rajasthani literature as evinced by the manner in which the court poets described in detail the birth, childhood, marriage, coronation and important events of the life of the ruler, alongwith other descriptions of the capital including markets, palaces, gardens, festivals, sports, and amusements, etc. (Rajarupaka by Ratnu Virbhana, Nagari Pracharini Sabha, Varanasi 1941). However, such descriptions were more concerned with the individual. Such works were styled as Vilasa, (Dalpat Vilasa, Bikaner, 1960) Prakash, (Pratap Prakash, Jaipur, 1983) Katha (Katha Bal-Lila by Keshodas Jodara-16th century) etc. With the advent of the Muslim rule, more so of the Mughals, the genre came into vogue and the influence of Persian biographies and autobiographies encouraged our writers to make similar attempts. These were generally termed Vats (Kunwarasi Sankhalai ri Vata Kunwarasi Sankhalai, Jaipur, 1981). It was, however, in the historical field that there is an instance of an incomplete biography on the pattern of Humayun Nama or Akbar Nama under the title Dalpat Vilasa by an unknown author. It contains minute details of the life of Dalpat Sinha of Bikaner who served Akbar in the late 16th century. All others are biographical tales dealing with important events of the lives of the persons concerned. Karan Sinhaji Rai Kanvaran ri Vata (18th century MS. catalogue of Rajasthan MSS in the Sanskrit Library, 1947) is one such work. Such works do not fall into any specific category according to the modern concept of the genre. These are short-stories, historical records and biographical accounts, all combined into one. Throughout the 17th, 18th and 19th centuries such accounts of historical personages were written under a number of titles. Side by side biographical accounts in verse were produced. This form has been so favourite with the authors that writers of the old order still prefer to use it for that purpose. Kalu' Yasovilasa (1975) Manaka-Mahima (1975), all written by Acharya Tulsi, fall under this category. Some biographies have been explicity intended for children. S.N. Joshi of Bikaner has given Apana Bapuji (Jaipur, 1969) a biography of Mahatma Gandhi. His style is quite lucid and the narrative plain and simple. Dindayal Ojha of Bikaner has presented biographical sketches of national leaders under the titles Bharat ra Nirmata (1972) Desa ra Gaurava (1972) and Choti Umara Mota Kama (1972). These are mere informative pieces of prose and cannot be termed literary works. Mahavira ri Olakhana (1975) by Shanta Bhanevata of Jaipur however may be taken as a sort of biography. But on the whole it seems that the genre has not been able to catch the fancy of the modern writers in the language.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Hiralal Maheshwari, History of Rajasthani Literature, Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi, 1980.

R.D.S.

BIOGRAPHY (Sanskrit). One main section of prose literature in Sanskrit is akhyayika or biography of which Bana's Harshacharita dealing with the life and exploits of his patron, King Harsha of Kanauj, is the most outstanding. As contrasted with katha or novel which is purely imaginative, the akhyayika deals with the life of historical personages, even though it also contains literary descriptions, exaggerations, etc., in ornate style. Other important biographies are Bilhana's Vikramankadevacharita on his patron, Prithvirajavijaya of Jayanatha of Kashmir. It is Bana who started the tradtion of writing the biographies of intimately known contemporary kings. The poets of royal courts naturally praised their patrons and justified their actions. Some biographies are in the form of Mahakavyas; here literary additions are more than in akhyayikas. Kumarapalacharita in 28 cantos, the first 20 in Sanskrit and the rest in Prakrit deals with the life of Kumarapala, king of the Chalukyas. The Mathuravijaya of Gangadevi deals with the exploits of the Vijayanagar King Virakamparaya. The Vishakhavijaya by Keralavarma Valiya Koil Tampuran describes the life and activites of Vishakham Tirunal Rama Varma Maharaja, of Travancore. It is doubtful if we can include Ashvaghosha's Buddhacharita and Shivaswamin's Kapphanabhyudayam as historial poems, since the literary elements are more prominent than the biographical elements.

K.K.R.

BIOGRAPHY (Sindhi) seems to have been attempted first in Ahivalu Shah Abdul Latif Bhitai written by one of the early stalwarts of Sindhi prose, Mirza Qalich Beg (1853-1929). The book was first published in 1885 and reprinted in 1897. It sketches in brief biographical episodes in the life of the great Sufi mystic poet of Sindhi, Shah Abdul Latif (1689-1752). It is surprising that except a few small biographical essays in literary magazines and the above mentioned work, no other biographical book worth mentioning was brought out upto the end of the last century. However, Sindhi prose writers paid more attention to the development of such literature in the first decade of the present century. Biographies of great men in different fields began to appear in Sindhi, which included saints, mystics, poets, educationists, social reformers, patriots, martyers and national leaders. A brief survey of the outstanding biographies in Sindhi, original as well as translations, is as under:

During the period 1901-1947, Kauromal Chandanmal Khilnani seems to be the first writer in Sindhi who paid attention to the development of biographies. He brought out a book entitled Arya Nari Charitra (Lives of Hindu Women, 1905). It contains brief life sketches of ideal Hindu women of ancient and medieval India. Thereafter, he wrote two books entitled Mahatmauni ju Darsana (Survey of the Great Souls, 1907) and Bhagatani ju Sakhyu (Lives of the Devout, 1908). Khilnani also wrote at first small life-sketches of great thinkers of Bengal, Raja Rammohan Roy and Keshabchandra Sen to propagate the ideology of Brahmo Samaj in Sindh. Another important work published in the first decade of the present, century is Sufi Soonhara (Illustrious Sufis, 1907), by Pahilajrai Lilaram Vasvani and Muhammad Sidiq Musafir.

Some of the Muslim prose writers of Sind brought out biographies of great men of Islam. e.g. Mirza Qalich Beg published Javahar-ul-insan (1926), Kamil Insana (Great men, 1926), Qadim Sindhu Ja Sitara (Luminaries of Ancient Sindh), Shahname Varo Shah (Biographies of Emperors of ancient Persia, based on Firdausi's epic Shahnama 1926), Shaikh Bir Ali Sina (Life of the famous physician and philosopher Avicenna (980-1037), published in 1926). Fateh Muhammad Sevhani brought out in 1914 a biography entitled Hayatun Nabi (Life of The Prophet). The book was again reprinted in 1953. Maulani Din Muhammad Vafai (1896-1950) translated from Urdu into Sindhi a book entitled Hazrat Muhammad Mustaffa (published in 1930). Lalchand Amardinomal Jagtiani (1885-1954) was the first Hindu writer to write a biography of Hazrat Muhammad, entitled Muhammad Rasul Allah.

The book published in 1911 was acclaimed as the best and the first life-sketch of the Prophet published in Sindhi. The work won the critical acclaim of the Muslim scholars of Sindh. As the book was written by Lalchand at the age of twenty six, many Hindus expressed fears that the writer would soon embrace Islam. The work is considered to be one of the best biographical books in Sindhi, written in a simple and lucid style.

Sikhism had its wide impact on the Sindhi community during the last century. In order to spread the message of Guru Nanak and that of the other Gurus who followed him, some of the Sikh scriptures were translated into Sindhi during the last century. Jethanand Sanvalani is the first writer who brought out the biographies of ten Sikh Gurus in detail. The work entitled Nanak Prakash (The Light of Guru Nanak) was published in thirty four volumes from 1910 to 1920.

Other important biographies published in Sindhi prior to independence of the country were Ram Badshah (Life of Swami Ramatirath) published in 1914 by Lalchand A. Jagtiani; Divan Dayaram Jetamal (A biography of Divan Dayaram, one of the foremost educationists of Sindh during the last century) published in 1917 by Khanchand Partabrai; Gokale ji Hayati (A biography of Gopala Krishna Gokhale) published by Tejumal Shahani in 1926; Rajarishi Dayaram Gidumal jo Jivan Charitra (A biography of Rajarishi Dayaram Gidumal Shahani, 1857-1927, the well known social reformer, educationist and philanthropist of Sindh) published in 1938 by Shevaram Phervani; Hiranand-Sindhu ji Atma (Sadhu Hiranand—A Soul of Sindh, 1938) originally written in English by Dayaram Gidumal Shahani and translated into Sindhi by Mulchand Manghomal Vasvani. Sain Qutub Shah (Sain Qutub Shah's Life—a Sufi Mystic of Sindh) published in 1947 by Jhamandas Bhatia (1902-1965); Luvaria ja Lal (Saints of Luvari, 1934 a life of Khwaja Muhammad Zaman 1713-1774, a mystic poet and his successors) Sindhu ji hika Uttam Siddha Mandali (A group of Saints of Sindh, 1939, Biographies of Vilayatrai, Jivatsingh and Chandumal) by Shevak Bhojraj; Hayat-e-Qalich (Life of Mirza Qalich Beg, 1937) by Mirza Humayun Beg.

Sindhi writers covered a wider area for selecting personalities from different walks of life, whose biographical sketches were published in Sindhi; e.g. Saints of Sindh and other parts of India; heroes of Indian history (such as Rana Pratap, Shivaji, Durgadas, Banda Bahadur, Laxmibai of Jhansi); national leaders (such as Lokamanya Tilak. Mahatma Gandhi. Jawaharlal Nehru, Vir Savarkar Subhashchandra Bose, Abdul Ghaffar Khan of Frontier), poets and writers (Rabindranath Tagore, Aurobindo Ghosh, Munshi Premchand); social reformers and leaders of Sindh (Sadhu Navalrai and Sadhu Hiranand Advani, Kauromal Chandanmal Khilnani, Hasan Ali Effenedi); religious leaders (Rama, Krishna, Gautam Buddha, Mahavira Vardhaman, Christ, Hazrat Muhammad, Zaradushtra).

The trend of writing biographies in Sindhi of eminent personalities of India continued. It is, however evident that most of the biographies are written on saints, religious personalities and national leaders. Some of the outstanding biographies produced in Sindhi in India are Kanwar (Biography of Sant Kanwarram, 1957) by Tirth Basant. The book was given Sahitya Akademi award in 1959. The same writer has written the biography of Mahatma Gandhi entitled Gandhiji (in three volumes) published in 1972 and 1978; Dada Vasvania jo Jivan Charitra (A biography of Sadhu T.L. Vaswani, 1967) by Jethanand Bhavandas Lalwani; Sant Kanwarram by Kanaiyalal Talreja; Doctor Choithram Gidvani ji Jivani (Life of Choithram Gidvani, 1967) by Vishnu Sharma; Lenin ji Jivini (Life of Lenin, 1968) and Indira Gandhi ji Jivani (A Biography of Indira Gandhi, 1969) both books by Arjun Detaram Nathani 'Sikayal' (b. 1919).

A general survey of biographical works in Sindhi clearly shows that the life-sketches of eminent Sindhi writers of the present century have mostly not been produced in Sindhi. In order to evaluate the literary contribution of contemporary Sindhi writers, Koonja and some other literary periodicals have produced special issues on eminent writers, such as Lekhraj Kishinchand 'Aziz', Ram. P. Panjwani, Gobind Malhi, Narayan Shyam. These issues contain brief biographical sketches of the concerned writers and critical appreciation of their literary contribution. But, detailed biographical works on contemporary Sindhi writers are still awaited. Sahitya Akademi under its series 'Makers of Indian Literature' has brought out three monographs in Sindhi of Kishinchand 'Bevas' (1885-1947) by Hari Dilgir published in 1982; Lalchand Amardinomal (1885-1954) by Murlidhar Jetley published in 1984; and Mangharam Malkani by A.J. Uttam published in 1984. Similarly, a collection of papers presented on the occasion of a seminar organised by Ministry of Education, Government of India, to celebrate the birth centenary of a well known Sindhi prose writer and critic, Hotchand Mulchand Gurbaxani was brought out in 1983. All these books contain a life-sketch of the writer in detail. Three other biographical works Fankar Ain Felsoofi (1973) and Aftab-e-Inqlab (1975) by Mohan Kalpana; Maxim Gorki (1984) by Gobind Malhi may also be added to the list.

M.K.J.

BIOGRAPHY (Tamil) Since literature reflects life, there is always some biographical strain or self revelation in creative writing, a tendency that goes back to the colophons of the Sangam texts where Tamil literature is concerned. The line of descent includes biographical details in elegiac utterances of Atiyaman by Avvaiyar and Pari by Kapilar, in the hymns of the Saivite saints, in Barani or war literature like the celebrated Kalingattu

Barani giving intimate glimpses into the life of Kulottunga Chola I and in the late seventeenth or early eighteenth century poems on the Muslim patron of poets, Chitakati.

But biography in Tamil is of comparatively recent origin, as its beginning and growth may be traced to the development of Tamil prose in the wake of the starting of Tamil printing press after the 1835 Act. In 1871 came out what is probably the first biography in Tamil, strangely enough on the life of Lord Clive by Katirvelu Pillai. By the end of the century, some forty lives had been written, mostly on Christian and Hindu saints, an echo of the struggle between Christian missionaries and the Hindu community as a result of attempts at mass conversion of the native population. Obviously, there was no aesthetic motivation behind such fevered writings.

Tamil biography may be said to have come of age at the dawn of the present century with the publication of the two-volume Tennatu Sirettargal (Heroes of the South, 1902 & 1904), by K.S. Duraisami and T.A. Rajaratnam's biography of the distinguished editor of Tamil classics. Damodaram Pillai (1902). Though the former contains a medley of personalities like maharajas, judges, administrators and patrons, its surprisingly objective evaluation invites to some extent comparison with the western mode of appreciation. The latter is carefully divided into a number of sections, beginning with a descriptive account of Jaffna, the scholar's native place, and ending with his life sketch. Also included is a detailed account of his work as an editor. There is even a brief account of the history of Tamil literature to serve as a background to his editorial achievement.

Since then, there has been a spate of biographies of Tamil, non-Tamil and western men and women who had attracted the attention of the world according to their genius and temperament, their number and variety testifying to the Tamil biographers' rapidly growing interest in the genre. But there is a large absence of scientific documentation of source materials and where they are available, and a considerable lack of acquaintance with the methodology of the genre. Many writers put their heroes on pedestals for emotional and other extraneous reasons and, in the words of John Morley, the Victorian biographer, "contemplate the hinder parts of their divinities". The human element is missing in such works. A microscopic minority would expose their subjects for no valid reason. In either case, we have not produced a Boswell (our nearest equivalent is U. V. Swaminata Iyer with his half respectful and affectionate account of his guru, Tirusirapuram Minakshisundaram Pillai) or a Lytton Strachey who inaugurated the modern biography with his masterful irony at the expense of the subject. And yet there is more than one silver lining in the dark horizon.

Of literary biographies, a notable example is U. V. Swaminatha Iyer's life of his teacher (1933) with its delineation of Minakshisundaram Pillai's character, temperament and achievements, but there is little about his life. Yet there is valuable information on Pillai's prolific production of Sthalapuranas, the large circle of his disciples and the historical and sociological background to his life. Of the many biographies on Bharati, two stand out. Ramaswami Iyengar's Mahakavi Bharatiar (1944) is on this side of hero worship in its authenticity, but is full of valuable information on many aspects of his life and his associates, particularly during his Pondichery days and discusses with insight Bharati's method of poetic composition. Unlike other biographers, he frankly refers to the poet's weaknesses. R.A. Padmanaban's Chitra Bharati (Illustrated Bharati, 1957) is the only documented biography of any Tamil writer with many authentic photographs of the poet, his family and his friends and fascimiles of his poems and letters. But as biography, it is more historical than critical. The well known writer Raghunatan and his life of Pudumaipittan (1951), one of the founders of the Tamil short story, is singularly objective in its characterization of the man, although it is written with a deep sense of affection and is richly evocative of the artist's achievements. What we get at the end is a full blown portrait of a man of immense courage and daring whose life was a ceaseless struggle against the vicissitudes of fortune until death snatched him away in his prime. There is an elaborate life story of Maraimalaiatikal alias Swami Vedachalam, champion of the Tamil purist movement, by his son Marai. Tirunavukkarasu. It is an 'inside' story of his reformistic zeal in Shaivism, society and language, and includes valuable excerpts from his diary.

Of the great social reformers and iconoclasts Periyar E.V. Ramaswami's authentic biography, Tamil Talaivar (Leader of the Tamils, 1939) by Swami Chidambaranar is a veritable mine of information on his life and is revealingly anecdotal, though incomplete as a biography. The biographical accounts of C.N. Annadurai ('Anna' to his followers and admirers), the founder of the DMK party are uniformly eulogistic like Maraimalayan's Periarinar Annavin Peruvalvu (The Great Life of Genius Anna), as those on the Congress stalwart Kamaraj.

Before Chiranjivi brought out his historical compendium on Kattabomman (1958), the rebel chieftain of Panchalankurichi who was hanged by the British in 1799, there had been many lives either laudatory or hostile to the hero in a mixture of fact and fiction. Chiranjivi's documentary presentation leaves the reader to form his own opinion, though there is a hint that the biographer would go along with some historians to find a selfish motive in Kattabomman's revolt against British authority. M.P. Sivajnanam's life of V. V. Chidamparam Pillai (1946) is biased, as he idealizes his hero by deliberately glossing over his shortcomings confessed by the subject himself in his autobiography. T.S.S. Rajan's biography on the life and achievements of the political firebrand,

V.V.S. Iyer (1946), an associate of Savarkar in London, and later of Shri Aurobindo and Bharati in Pondicheri, is a candid portrait of a controversial personality based on a careful appraisal of facts. The biographer traces many of his subject's troubles to his obstinate character. Kovai Ayyamuttu's Rajaji En Tandai (Rajaji, my Father, 1970), an odd title which betrays the biographer's emotional bias, is too reverential to be taken seriously.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : March Pachter, Ed., Telling Lives: The Biographer's Art (Washington, 1979). Salini lilantirayan, Valkai Varalerru Ilakkiyam (Madras, 1974);
(Madras, 1974)

K.Sa.

BIOGRAPHY (Telugu). Ever since Gurazada Sriramamurty published his book on the lives of the Telugu poets in the last decade of the nineteenth century, the trend has been set for the writing of the biography in Telugu.

In early British period there were a few biographies of Queen Victoria in Telugu, celebrating the occasion of the Golden and Diamond Jubilees of her reign. Similarly, personalities like Abraham Lincoln and Jawaharlal Nehru are the subjects of many a biography in Telugu.

Although Gurazada Sriramamurty's book, as mentioned earlier, is the first of its kind, the first comprehensive collection of the biographical sketches of the Telugu poets, ranging from Nannaya of the eleventh century to Gopinathamu Venkata Kavi of the eighteenth, must be credited to the great Andhra writer Kandukuri Veeresalingam (1848-1919). In his Andhra Kavalu Charitramu (The History of Telugu poets), published in 1897, Veeresalingam was not content with providing the facts and figures about the poets' lives and activities; he also gave the bio-data, a critical estimate of the given poet's work and quotations illustrating the general trend of the poet's genius. In such a large compilation, factual errors, mostly about dates, are unavoidable. Barring these, this book is still the most authoritative work in the field.

Among the biographies of individuals, the first reference should be made to Desoddharaka Charitra, the biography of Desoddharaka (popular title of Kasinathuni Nageswara Rao, meaning the ' saviour of the country'), by Gorripati Venkata Subbayya, for two reasons. One is that Nageswara Rao occupies the second most important position (after Veeresalingam) in the social and literary resurgence of Andhra Pradesh. The other is that Venkata Subbayya is the most prolific biographer in Telugu.

In this biography Gorripati tells about the indomitable spirit of Kasinathuni (1867-1938), which enabled him to rise from humble beginnings to mighty achievements. He left his native village in the Krishna District of Andhra Pradesh and went to Bombay in search of fortune. And he made it. Becoming prosperous with the manufacture of the multi-purpose pain balm 'Amritanjan' he came back to his native state and set about using his wealth and influence to promote the culture of the Andhras. He was the founder of Andhra Patrika, which is the first daily and is still being published. He was the first Andhra to provide funds for the study of Hindi in south India; the first to build a theatre in Andhra (Durga Kala Mandiram at Vijayawada) for the staging of plays; and was one of the first batch of Andhras who took up Gandhiji's call for Harijan uplift, (Veeresalingam and Nageswara Rao joined the national struggle for Independence and were jailed for taking part in the Salt Satyagraha movement) From this biography we also learn about the 'Sri Bagh Agreement' between the two regions of Andhra Pradesh, arrived at in his Madras home of the same name, paving the way for the eventual formation of a separate province for Andhras. It is also interesting to note that Kasinathuni was a great writer in his own right; he wrote an independent commentary on the Gita, edited the History of Telugu literature, and even composed ten 'Satakams' (100 poems of a descriptive and devotional nature). The book ran into two editions (1961 and 1969).

The next important biography is also by Gorripati Venkata Subbayya published in 1963; it narrates the life-history of Cuttamanchi Ramalinga Reddi, popularly known as C.R. Reddi (1880-1956). Reddi was virtually the founder of Andhra University, the first university established on Andhra soil in 1926. He also had a hand in the foundation of the Osmania University in the then Nizam's dominion of Hyderabad. Gorripati's biography relates the various incidents in Reddi's life, starting from his education in India and abroad, and finishing with his efforts in the promotion of Telugu literature and education. An evaluation is made of Reddi's pioneering efforts in the field of literary criticism in Telugu.

The third biography of Gorripati, Rasa Tapasvi Krishna Rao (1972), is the chronicle of the life and works of Mutnuri Krishna Rao (1879-1945), the founder editor of Krishna Patrika, the oldest extant journal, founded in 1902. Aside from the bio-data, it contains what Mutnuri's contemporaries spoke about him, as well as specimens from his editorials. Worth quoting is Krishna Rao's homage to the goddess of Death: "She alone is a 'Dayamayi' (the benign lady); how sweet and tender is her touch!.... Releasing the diseased, decrepit bodies from intolerable torture, she puts their owners to restful, eternal sleep and awakens them in a new abode". Gandhiji's tribute to him too, must be quoted: "I see the spiritual spark in his eyes". When Gandhiji was pausing for the right word (at a lecture in Andhra National College, Machilipatnam, 1921) after saying "every man must look upon spinning as a ....", Krishna Rao supplied "sacrament", to the delight of the Father of the Nation.

Rao, in his book Sri Sarvottama Jivitam (The life of Sri. Sarvottama) wisely plays upon the word 'sarvottama' which makes out the life of Gadicharla to be the noblest of all. Early in life Gadicharala recognised that "our low status is due to lack of knowledge; knowledge is the first step towards progress, and the means to it is literature". Accordingly, he travelled all over Andhra Pradesh, collecting funds for the establishment of a library and an adult school in every nook and corner of the State. He carried the message of Gandhiji's 'Swadeshi' to such heights as to say: "They should be Swadeshi in dress, in food, in name, in speech, in thought and even in spirit". He never sought any office for his service to the society.

Among the spiritual leaders of the day 'Sri Satya Sai Baba' of Puttaparti in Andhra Pradesh, has gained international attention, because of his miraculous powers. There are many biographies of him in Telugu in both prose and poetry. The one that impresses most among these, is "Bhagavan Sri Satya Sai Baba Divya Lila Tarangalu" (The miraculous deeds, literally waves of Bhagavan Sri Satya Sai Baba) by B.S.R. Anjaneyulu (1980). The volume was personally presented to the Baba on the occasion of his fifty fourth birthday, November 23, 1980. Besides the life-history, it demonstrates ninety nine incidents, in which the sage brings relief to the diseased through his miraculous powers. Nineteen illustrations of the Baba's 'Sarvajnata' (all-knowing genius) were authentically reported (one tells the story of how all the questions of the editor of Blitz were answered even before they were separately put to him: the editor wrote his questions in advance on paper for his own guidance, but did not pass them on to the Baba).

Mention must be made of the biography of Tirupati Venkata Kavulu, the most popular twin-poets of Andhra, by D. Venkatavadhani (1973); Bala Yogi, the sage of Mummidivaram, who sits in constant meditation, without food or drink, by Akula Vinayaka Rao (1959); and Rajarshi Radhakrishnan the philosopher-statemen, who is compared to both King Janaka and King Rantideva for his wisdom and social service, by Ganti Subrahmanya Sarma (1965).

R.M.C.

BIOGRAPHY (Urdu). The art of biography in Urdu is not as developed as in western languages but some excellent examples of biographical art are present in this young language. Biography is a kind of history which deals not only with human races and classes but also highlights the events pertaining to a particular individual from his birth to death, Origins of biography are traceable in Persian 'Tazkiras' of Urdu writers and Urdu 'masnavis' of the Deccan period. 'Tazkira' Nikatu–shshoara (Persian) by Mir Taqi 'Mir' may be cited as an example. According to Nasir-ud-din Hashmi Tauseef Nama, a masnavi by Feroze (1550-1581) is the first biography in Urdu. This masnavi had set an example for the following generations of poets of Deccan and in 16th & 17th centuries while Fazal, Zauqi, Baqar Aagah, versified biographies of different religious personalities of Islam in the form of Masnavi, Abdul, Wajhi, Nusrati and others produced biographical masnavis of various kings of Deccan. Biographical sketches of Imam Husain and his companions are found in Urdu Marsia but technically these cannot be included in biographical literature. Urdu 'Tazkiras' of Ali Lutf (Gulshan-e-Hind), Mustafa Khan Shaifta (Gulshan-e-Bekhar), Karim-ud-din and Fallon (Tabqatush-shoara), Mohd. Husain Azad (Ab-e-Hayat), Master Ramchander (Tazikarat-ul-Kamilin) and others are worth noting in that they contain biographical outlines though very brief, of Urdu writers. Sir Syed Ahmed Khan is known as the founder of modern Urdu prose. In the fourth chapter of his book Asarus-Sanadid (1947) Sir Syed included biographical sketches of eminent contemporaries who were considered specialists in different fields of life in Delhi. Except Shaifta, Syed was the first biographer of 'Ghalib.' Ahsanut-Sawarikh (1964) by Aqa Hasan Rizvi is not history but a detailed biography of Raja Digvijay Singh of Balrampur, in a simple language and interesting style. In 1971 Waqarul Mulk (Munshi Mushtaq Husain) translated French Revolution and Napolean from English into Urdu. Title of this translation was Sarguzasht-e-Napolean Bonapart. Aza Nama-e-Masood (1976) is the biography of Syed Salar Masood Ghazi written by Inayat Husain. Second half of the 19th century is considered as the golden period so far as Urdu biographies are concerned. 'Hali' and 'Shibli' are the best biographers of this period. Altaf Husain Hali is often referred to as Boswell of Urdu. He not only recorded events from the life of Sheikh Sadi, the great persian poet, but also pointed out in the foreword of his book Hayat-e-Sadi the principles of biographic art in detail. His biographies of Mirza Ghalib Yadgar-e-Ghalib and Sir Syed Ahmed Khan Hayat-e-Javed are considered landmarks in this particular field of literature. While 'Hali' in biographies is factual, his contemporary Shibli Nomani was inclined to hero-worship, and intended to write a series of 'Royal Heroes of Islam' but could not do so. However Shibli selected great personalities of the past for his biographic writings such as Mohammad, the Prophet of Islam, his followers like Umar Farooq, Imam Abu Hanifa, Imam Ghizali, Maulana Roomi and Abbasi king, Mamoon Rashid. His biographies Seeratun Nabi (which was completed after his death by Suleman Nadvi), Alfarooq and Almamoon are known as ideal biographies but his Seeratun-Noman, Alghizali and Sawaneh Maulana Roomi are also equally important. Shibli's style in his biographies is more artistic than that of Hali, who prefers undecorative and simple style. Deputy Nazir Ahmed's biographical novel Ummahat-ul-umma is a disputed biography of the wives of Prophet Mohammad as it was considered a disregard to these religious ladies. Many contemporary writers produced biographies of religious personalities in this period. Among these, works of Suleman Mansoorpuri (Muhr-e-Nabuat–3 volumes), Mirza Hairat (Seerat-e-Rasool–6 volumes), Ralia Ram (Sawaneh Umr Mohammad) and Laxman Maharaj (Arab ka Chand) are unforgetable. Abdul Halim 'Sharar' started the series of biographies Ulma-e-Islam and thereafter Mashahir-e-Islam in the magazine Mohazzab (1980). His pamphlets on 'Junaid Baghdadi', 'Abu Baker Shibli', 'Sakina Bint-e-Husain', 'Khwaja Moin-ud-din Chishti', etc. are included in this chain, but in style and content he is more journalistic than literary. Effect of Shibli's hero-worship is apparent in most of the biographers of the first quarter of the 20th century. Abdul Razaq Kanpuri's Nizam-ul-Mulk Toosi and Albaramaka (two of his series Wazara-e-Islam), Hakim Ahamed Husain's Hayat-e-Salah-ud-din and Mohmood Zangi, Najmuddin's Seeratul Shafai Ebadullah Akhtar's Hazrat Zaid and Mohammeduddin Fauq's Maharaja Ranjeet Singh and Ghani Kashmir are some of the brightest examples of hero worship. Abbot's biography of Napoleon was published by Anjuman Taraqqi-e-Urdu, entitled Hayat-e-Napolean (5 volumes). Shibli's disciple, Sulaman Nadvi not only completed the last volume of Seeratun Nabi left incomplete by Shibli but also contributed to biographic literature by his own books Rahmat-e-Alam, Hayat-e-Imam Malik and Seerate-e-Aesha. Sulaman Nadiv also wrote Shibli's biography Hayat-e-Shibli with great zeal and devotion. In Zindagani-e-Benzir, Abdul Ghafoor Shahbaz had tried to chronicle some of the events of Nazir Akabarabadi's Life. Seerat-e-Siddiqui by Habib-ur-Rehamn Sherwani, Waqar-e-Hayat by Ikramullah, Hayat-e-Khusrau by Sayeed Ahmed Marahravi, Hayat-e-Anis by Amjad Ali, Hayat-e-Hafiz by Aslam Jairajpuri, Seerat-e-Moavia by Sharif Ahmed, Saif-ul-lah by Simab Qureshi, Seerat-e-Omar Ibdul Aziz by Abdus Salam Nadvi are also some of the significant biographies of this time. Iftikhar Alam wrote the biography of Deputy Nazir Ahmed on the lines of Hali's Hayat-e-Javed.

Eminent biographies in Urdu before independence of India are: Hayat-Dabir by Afzal Husain Sabit, Gulshan-e-naz by Durga Parshad Nadir, Hazrat Mohammad and Sawaneh Umir Martin Luther by Shradha Prakash Deoji, Krishna Jeewan Gandhi Nama and Tarikh-e-Masih by Hasan Nizami, Ram Charcha by Prem Chand, Sri Eknath by Shaikh Chand, Seerat-e-Belai by Wajahat Huasin, Gautam Budh by Hafiz Syed, Sawaneh Umri Ram Teerath by Narian Swami Zehoor-e-Haqeeqzt by Bhola Nath, Alxohra by Rashid-ul-Khairi, Afghan Badshah by Mohd. Amin Khan, Ata Turk by Mirza Dehlvi, Raza Shah by Ghulam Muhiddin Asad, Hitler Mahan by Chander Shekhar Shastri, Saulat-e-Shershahi by A.A. Murtaza, Noor. Jehan by Simab Akbarabadi, Bahadur Shah Zafar by Z.A. Alvi, Sawaneh Haider Haider Ali by Amjad Ali Ashhari, Hayat-e-Rehmat Khan by Altaf Barelvi, Maharaja Ranjit Singh by Sitaram Kahlil, Seerat-e-Mohd. Ali Jinah by Rais Ahmed Jafri, Hayat-e-Ajmal by Rashid Khan, Hasrat Mohani by Abdul Shakoor, Sauda by Sheikh Chand, Jawahar Lal ki Kahani by Mohd. Rahim Dehlvi, Obedullah Sindhi, by Mohd. Sarwar, Qaid-e-Millat by Ghulam Mohd, Hayat-e-Karamat Husain by Hamid Ali Khan and Tazkira-e-Abdul Ghafoor by Azmat Ali Hasrat.

After 1947, among notable biographies may be included Asar–e-Abul Kalam Azad by Qazi Abdul Ghaffar, Yadgar-e-Hali by swaleha Abid Husain, Premchand by Hansraj Rehbar, Tazkira-e-Muasreen (4 volumes) by Malik Ram, Akbar Badi by Tabassum Nizami, Iqbal-e-Kamil by Abdus Salam Nadvi, Mohd. Iqbal by Jagan Nath Azad, Zinda Katha by Urooj Zadi, Shad Arifi-Shaksiat aur Fun by Muzaffar Hanfi, Zauq, Sawaneh aur Intiqad by T.A. Alvi, Juned Baghdadi by Z.H. Faruqui, Hasrat Mohan-i-Hayat aur Karname by Ahmar lari, Mutala-e-Amir Minai by Abu Mohd. Sahar etc.

Special Numbers of literary magazines like Manto Number of Pagdandi (Amritsar) edited by Aijaz Anand and Tilok Chand Mahroom Number edited by Gopi Chand Narang, Krishen Chander Number of Shair (Bombay) edited by Ekaz Siddiqui, Abul Kalam Azad Number of Ajkal (Delhi) edited by Arsh Malsiani, Chakbast Number and Hasrat Mohani Number of Ajkal (Delhi) edited by R.N. Raz., Shakhsiyat Number (2 volumes) of Nuqoosh (Lahore) edited by Mohd. Tufail, contain short biographies of many important writers and poets of Urdu. Magazine Shakhsiat aur Fun (editor, Sabir Dutt) has brought out special numbers of Jan Nisar Akhtar, Qatil Shafai, Mohinder Nath, Faiz Ahmed Faiz and Kamleshwar. Some commemorative volumes like Nazre Zaidi Nazre Hamid and Naz-re-Arshi edited by Malik Ram, Naz-re-Sajjad edited by A.Q. Desnavi, Naz-re Malik Ram edited by Gopichand Narang are also significant contributions.

Mu.H.

BIRASIMHA (Oriya), popularly known as Buddha (Buddhist), was a 16th century poet. He was the legendary leader of a group of Buddhist monks living on the banks of the river Prachi at the time of the fusion of Buddhism with the Brahmanic faith, characterized by Lord Jagannatha. Birasimha composed many Chautisas (poems of 34 verses), of which the most celebrated is the Birasimha Chautisa (1932). It describes the mystic cult of body worship featuring in the later Mahayana Tantric practices as adapted to a similar cult of the Hatha-Yoga pattern depicted by the five contemporary Oriya saint-poets. A work on medicine is also ascribed to him.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Bamshidhara Mahanti, Orisare-Bauddha-dharma (1956)., Radhacharana Panda, Prachi Nadira Itihasa.

G.C.U.

BIRHARE (Punjabi). This folk-form was very popular during the medieval period. But it has not been preserved for posterity in any book or manuscript with the result that most of these songs have been lost into oblivion.

Birhare give vent to the feelings of the women folk, separated from their husbands or lovers with an eagerness to meet them. These songs are mostly composed by women, especially the young damsels and are generally sung in social gatherings, marriage ceremonies and spinning time.

There is no special form of Birhara; it can be in two or four lines or more than that. These are short, terse and absorbing. Images are drawn from the objects of daily life. Language is simple, but full of intensity of emotions. One of the most popular Birhare is given below

I stand on this bank of the river
You on the other side
In between the water swirls
When I think of you, O my love
My tears flow spontaneously.

This poetic-form was so popular during the middle ages that Guru Arjan Dev, the fifth Sikh Guru, adopted it. In Adi Granth under Asa Rag there are three Shabads under this title, which are to be sung in the tune of 'Chhand'.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Bhai Kahan Singh—Guru Shabad Ratanakar Mahan Kosh, Language Dept., Patiala, 1962.

S.S.W.B.

BISADA EKA RITU (Oriya) is a collection of eighty-five poems by Bhanuji Rao. It was first published in 1973. So far it is the only collection by the poet. Bhanuji Rao jointly with Guruprasad Mohanty published a collection of poems named Nutan Kavita in 1955. Both the poets brought freshness into Oriya poetry of the 50s. This freshness is due to an awareness of the complexities of modern existence and an attempt to express these complexities in an original style, free from ornamental artificiality.

Rao's poems are the expression of this consciousness. It is his modernity. The major theme of his poetry is human condition in a world where all the values of the past are dead or dying. They reflect a sense of gloom in a world of disintegration.

The poems are fresh due to the poet's experiments with the use of different rhythms and words. The use of speech rhythm, colloquial language, new striking imageries and symbols contribute to a nourishing freshness in Rao's poems. The language of the poems is apparently simple but it has always deep suggestiveness. In a poem like 'Konarak' the language suggests the importance of modern life. The poet has also made some important experiments in poetic form. The poems 'The Moon' and 'Return' are examples of prose form. Here the language is pure prose but the total effect is highly poetic due to its images.

The poems bear the influence of T.S. Eliot. But the poet has never really imitated the elder poet. He has owned the Eliotean sensibility of a synthetic mind and expresses his own experiences with pleasingly exact observations by the bold use of natural speech rhythm and with the sensitive eye and ear which see and hear the life around him. A good example is the following poem, entitled 'Hemanta' (Autumn) where the poetic 'experience ranges from beautiful to ugly and from feelings of life to feelings of death'—

Autumn has come,
To the forest of mango, saal and jack fruit,
It has come stealthily, sneaking its way
Like a cat-burglar,
Into the night of green leaves.
Lo, the autumn sleeps
Like a dead sparrow covered
With yellow paleness,
Its flesh lies strewn
Pell mell over the grass.

(Translated by the poet)

Sau.B.

BISALDEVA RASA (Rajasthani) is a work by Narapati Nalha. There is a controversy about the date of its composition, but it was done by the middle of the 14th century. The published book is available in three different editions, Bisaldeva Raso, (ed. Satyajivan Verma, Nagari Pracharini Sabha, Varani, 1925); Bisaldeva Rasa. (ed. Mataprasad Gupta, Hindi Parishad, Visvavidyalaya, Prayag, 1953); Bisaldeva Raso, (ed. Taraknath Agrawala, Hindi Pracharak Pustakalaya, Varanasi, 1962). The first and third editions carry the texts divided in V.S. 1669 and 1933, both of which may be treated as of one and the same. Gupta has presented his scientific edition consisting of 128 genuine verses only, after carefully examining fifteen manuscripts forming five separate groups. So far as the scientific editing of the text is concerned, there are certain drawbacks in Gupta's edition. He has also not been able to put forth any valid logical reason for his accepting only 128 stanzas, out of 475-500 verses available in a number of manuscripts. At present, over thirty manuscripts of Bisaldeva Raso are known (Introduction to Agrawala's edition), and two distinct recensions of the poem are noticed—one divided into 'Khandas' (parts or chapters) and the other without 'Khandas'. Those without 'Khandas' are further available in different recensions, hence the need of a well edited one. Its narrative part consists of——the marriage of Raja Bisaldeva of Ajmer with Rajamati, daughter of King Bhoja of Dhara (Malwa); Bisaldeva's enragement at the challenging and unpleasant truth stated by the new queen; his subsequent tour to Orissa for a period of twelve years; the description of Rajamati's sorrows in separation in the 'Barahamasa' style; and the king's coming back to the capital resulting in the reunion of the couple. There is a comprehensive and connected narrative, dealing with love and eroticism, to be sung before the audience, though, the characters are only seemingly historical, meant only to construct a story, and all efforts to link them with history are futile. The sole aim of the author is to present a love poem in an unassuming way. The description of pangs of separation, sorrows and painful complaints of Rajamati, in the 'Barahamasa' style, occupies the foremost place in this poem. Its importance lies in the ancient linguistic, literary and cultural traditions depicted there. The statement of facts is either done by the poet himself or through the characters. The marriage ceremony is described with full royal grandeur, and the related time-honoured traditions of the Hindus find a fitting place. The language is simple and spoken Rajasthani.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Narottamadas Swami, Raso Sahitya Aur–Prithviraj Raso, Bharatiya Vidya Mandir, Sodha Pratisthan, Bikaner 1962.

Hi.M.

BISANPATA (Dogri) or Bisanpate are short songs with religious, philosophical, spiritual, and mystic contents. They are Bhakti songs. It is not known how they came to be called Bisanpatas (Vishnu-padas, verses on Vishnu). Vishnu in Hindu mythology is Sakar-Brahma or God with attributes but in Dogri consciousness, 'Bisanpatas' have for their subject both 'Sakar-Brahma' and 'Nirakar-Brahma' i.e. the formless God. As a matter of fact majority of Bisanpatas are addressed to God without form and speak about the mirage of this world and the transitoriness of things and the philosophy of Vedanta. In one Bisanpata, the devotee is exhorted to churn truth by using this body, with the churner of the mind and vision of the heart.

In another Bisanpata the guru (the master) is requested to colour him in the colours in which Dhanna Jat, Mirabai and Prahlad were coloured:

Another Bisanpata speaks of the net of attachment created by illusion, which causes worries and reduces one to a bundle of bones. There are Bisanpatas about yoga and dhyana like:

Diya balai din ratin
Jog-dhayan da tel jalai nit, surat-jnan di bati
Sunn masunne mandu-e di bich nhuchak neendar ati

This is similar to Kabir's padas. A special characteristic of Bisanpatas is a synthesis of mysticism or spiritual philosophy with local folk-elements. A Bisanpata enshrines high philosophic thought in images drawn from common grass. There is one omnipresent God and there is light residing somewhere in the layers of Maya.

Some Bisanpatas are marked by native directness and local colour like the one in which the devotee asks the Lord to eat what she is preparing for him with love, a meal of rice and local lentils.

Sha.S.

BISAT-E-RAQS (Urdu) is a Sahitya Akademi award winning collection of Urdu of Makhdum Mohi-ud-din (1908-1969) who became almost a legend in his lifetime. A flamboyant young man born in Hyderabad then ruled over by the all powerful Nizam, he gained unprecedented popularity first as a romantic poet and later as the stormy-petrol of a Revolutionary movement. Makhdum who was born in a small village of District Medak (Hyderabad, Andhra Pradesh) was educated in Osmania University. Engaged in active politics, he emerged as one of the great heroes of the famous Telangana Struggle launched by the local peasantry and died in harness as an active Communist.

The poetry and personality of Makhdum have been extremely colourful. A thorough romantic at heart, he was in love with all the beautiful things of life and his revolutionary urges were only an expression of removing ugliness from the earth, which as per his belief and conviction mostly emanates from socio-economic imbalances leading to human exploitation on the one hand and squalor, misery and degradation on the other. Mukhdum's poetry is a full-throated melody in search of his longlost paradise of joy which is the birth right of every individual. Every line of Bisat-e-Raqs throbs with this urgent quest.

Though an active revolutionary, his poetry is devoid of all loudness. There is no bombast in them. He is a poet of mellowness, of warmth and of soft whispers of human intimacies. In his early poems, he appears to be inspired by the Nature poetry of Josh Malihabadi. In this phase, his deep attachment to descriptive poetry: his love for the pastures and the pools of his native village and his total identification with his people; his other and this wordliness, his sense of sensusous delight and his ardent nationalism lend a tender healing touch to his poetry as also to those who read it.

Even in this early phase, Makhdum's sense of colour and lyrical use of words and images remained distinctive. In his thoroughly romantic poems, he maintains his poetic identity by juxtaposing colourful images with an unusual abandon and ecstasy and lyrical use of words welded together by the intensity of personal experience.

The Second World War marks a watershed in Makhdum's poetry. During its first phase, he wrote poems like Jang, Mashriq, Maut ka Raag, Azadi-e-Watan and perhaps the best of all, Sipahi which was a clarion call for boycotting recruitment to the British army.

In the second phase, however, when the anti-fascist aspect of the War got emphasised, Makhdum supported the war efforts of the allies and wrote Jang-i-Azadi which is also full of lyricism, sweet melodies and a flow of tender imageries. To him, like his other comrades, it was a People's War.

Perhaps, the most popular poems of this period were Andhera, Inqilab and poetic translation of the Kazak poet. Jambul Jabir's poem on Stalin. His poem on Revolution (Inqilab) is in a category of its own. It is no loud assertion for carnage but a tender heart-felt desire for social change—sensitive, subjective and lyrical.

1947 saw Makhdum actively engaged in the Telangana struggle of the peasantry both against the Nizam and the Central Government, finding expression in a single poem Telangana. Soon afterwards, after a brief spell of imprisonment, Makhdum found a new poetic style, which was pleasantly different from that of his elder contemporaries like Josh and Faiz. Instead of describing or preaching, he took to a clever combination of metaphors of colourful imagery and the pathos of personal experience adding new dimensions of social significance communicated through suggestion. His poems, Qaid, Aj ki Raat na Ja, Chand Taron ke Ban, Raqs and above all, his most celebrated poem Charagar—point to his new poetic diction, born of the cross-fire of hope and despair at the moment when the fulfilment of dream of human happiness begins to appear as distant and tortuous, though sure. Faith in a rather distant future coupled with the tortuous path to it gives birth to a poetry of intense yearning and an equally intense joy. Thus the admixture of pain and joy makes Makhdum's poetry a thing of beauty.

In consonance with the paradoxical juxtaposition of these emotions, he achieves a diction of unprecedented excellence. For instance, his Charagar, is a saga of love which depicts two lovers longing for "the alter under the canopy of white jasmine." This forth-right style of expression without conventional ornamentation caught the imagination of readers throughout India and Makhdum became a household word.

His ghazals are likewise marked by felicity of tone and an intimate aroma. There is no immediate political symbolism but they eloquently express the emotional experience gained by the poet in his political struggle. To him, ghazal is a halfway-house between intimate, personal and even private experience and the social sensibility embodied in political and social milieu. This intimatization of the wider experience in tender ghazal couplets remains his distinction.

He seldom talks of prison walls or gallows but of tender thoughts, sweet memories, sacred ideals and yearnings which make life worth living even under the shadows of death and imprisonment.

The last phase of Makhdum's poetry embodied in Bisat-e-Raqs is best symbolised by his poem, Waqt-ka Bedard Masiha which eloquently expresses the torture of the transitional period. Dreams haunt and yearn for fulfilment. Realities of life shatter all hope and often question the very rationale of living in an ugly and ruthlessly unjust world and yet Time appears as a saviour who, through a ruthless operation, may bleed the night of its poisionous blood and bring solace and happiness to man.

Makhdum's Bisat-e-Raqs is a testament of beauty and faith. Beauty of the human quest for the joy of life which enriches every experience and illuminates every struggle, Faith which makes every moment of life throb with agony and ecstasy. Makhdum has given a new dimension to Urdu poetry. Such mellow, tender and melodious poetry has been seldom written by an ardent and active revolutionary.

M. H.

BISHABRIKSHA (Bengali), a novel by Bankimchandra Chatterjee, was published in instalments in Bangadarshan (1872). It was published in book form in 1873. During Bankim's life-time, it ran through eight editions.

Bishabriksha was his first social novel. In this novel the conditions of the 19th century family life and its social background in Bengal found a suitable expression.

A resume of Bishabriksha is given below: Nagendranath was satisfied with the natural love of his wife Suryamukhi. Nevertheless, an irresistible desire for Kundanandini, an early-widowed girl who found refuge in his house, overpowered him. He married her. Upon this Suryamukhi left his house in anger and despair. Unfortunately Kunda too could not bear the burden of this unusual tie. She committed suicide by taking poison. After estrangement and long separation, Nagendranath and Suryamukhi were re-united.

The book is an artistic portrayal of the deeper mysteries lying behind the petty squabbles in family circles. As a realist, Bankim did for the first time in Bengali novel recognise love between two sexes outside matrimonial alliance. His preoccupation with social morality got the upperhand and consequently the realistic recognition was frustrated by Kunda's unnatural death. Whether the re-union between the husband and wife had met with the demands of real situation is a doubtful proposition.

In characterisation, Bankim has drawn Suryamukhi with sympathy. Kunda too is well portrayed. Kamalmani is pleasant. By contrast Nagendranath is colourless. Devendranath is rather a striking personality. The character that surpasses all in this novel is Hira. Such a forceful character is a rare phenomenon in Bengali literature.

Bishabriksha has been translated into a number of languages in India and outside. The first Indian edition was in Hindustani (G. Quadir, Sialkot, 1891). English translation was entitled The Poison Tree (by Miriam S. Knight, London, 1884). A Swedish translation appeared under the title Det Giftiga Tradet (Stockholm, 1894). According to a biographer the author himself translated parts of it into English for making a presentation to the wife of the then Governor of Bengal, Mr. Eliot (Title: The Bane of Life).

U.B.

BISHAD SINDHU (Bengali) is not only the highest literary achievement of Mir Musarraf Hossain (1847-1912), but, according to many, it is a landmark in the Muslim contribution to Bengali literature. It was published in three parts between 1885-1891, the Muhurrum episode in 1885, the deliverance episodes in 1887 and the story of Ezid's murder in 1891. During the author's life-time Bishad Sindhu (Ocean of Sorrow) ran through eight editions. In almost each edition Musarraf Hossain made changes to improve its artistic excellence. The author claimed that the narrative was based on original Persian and Arabic sources. But Musarraf Hossain had little Persian and less Arabic. In actuality the story is based on his readings of the Bengali Punthi literature. The alchemy of the author's imaginative genius transformed that base metal into the outstanding achievement of Bishad-Sindhu.

In the foreword of the first edition, the author gives an outline of his narrative. The book narrates how Hazrat Hossain reached the field of Karbala with the members of his family on the 8th Muhurrum of 61 era and how they were decimated by the soldiers sent by Ezid. Owing to this religious connotation of the story, the Bengali Muslims of the villages consider it as a religious book. But despite the use of religious elements, the narrative cannot be called religious by any stretch of imagination. Some have claimed it to be a historical novel. But the historical basis of the story is too tenuous. More important than the religious and historical elements, it is the human element and spirit of romance that permeate the whole story. The characters are larger than life and the novel projects a vastness of range. These being epic qualities, Bishad-Sindhu may truly be called an epic novel. The king of Damascus, Ezid, the great opponent of Hossain, is the villain of the story. Yet, Ezid is the central character of the novel, and it is the power and brilliance of his characterization that is the major attraction of the book. Undoubtedly Ezid is a sinner, the visible embodiment of Evil, but even in sin he is magnificent. Great commander of an army, he has no command over his heart. His passionate and unrequited love for Jainab endows his character with deep human sensitivity. Crown and kingdom have no longer any meaning for him, his only aspiration is to win the hands of Jainab. And it is not lust that inspires him but love. Musarraf Hossain's creative power reaches its pinnacle while depicting the human greatness of a sinner. Jainab was the wife of Abdul Jabbar. After he was forced to divorce Jainab, she was married to Hasan. Out of jealousy for Jainab, Hasan's first wife Jayeda instigated by Maimuna, poisoned Hasan. Now Hossain, brother of Hasan, remains the only hindrance in the way of Ezid's gaining Jainab. The first part of the epic narrates the battle of Karbala and the murder of Hossain by Simar. The second part depicts the deliverance of Omar Ali and Jainal Abedin from the clutches of Ezid and the one set of the battle between Ezid and Hanifa. The final section tells the story of Ezid's punishment and the coronation of Jainal Abedin.

The grandeur of the story is matched by the unhurried rhythm of the sonorous language. The story of the ocean of sorrows has been told in a language of oceanic greatness. Each of the sentences has the sinuous power and sweep of the sea-waves. Surprisingly, Musarraf Hossain has used very few Arabic or Persian words. The architecture of this prose epic has been built up mainly with the tatsama words, which he has used with the easy grace of a Bankimchandra. The purity of his sanskritized diction surprised the contemporary Bengali Hindu litterateurs. This novel's poetic power and grandeur of language has rarely been equalled by any Bengali Muslim writer since.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Brajendranath Bandyopadhyay, Mir Musarraf Hossain, Sahitya Sadhak Charitmala-II (Calcutta, 1949); Munir Choudhari, Mir Manas (Dacca, 1965).

As.S.

BISHI, PRAMATHANATH (Bengali; b. 1901) was a versatile writer, poet, playwright, satirist, novelist, short story writer, essayist, critic and a belletrist. He had his school education in Shantiniketan and as one among its first batches of pupils came in direct contact with Tagore from his childhood. He learnt to write from a very tender age and while prosecuting his studies in the Calcutta University as a private student he had already made a name for himself as a poet. Deyali (1923) was his first book of poems followed by Basantasena (1927), Prachin Asami Haite (From the Old Assamese, 1934), Vidya-Sundar (1934). There was a definite romantic streak in his earlier poetry which revelled as much in sensuous love as in love of Nature. Sonnet was the predominant poetic form that he had adopted as his principal mode of expression and in this he showed quite a fine sense of balance, compactness and metrical dexterity not easily to be found in the practitioners of this particular kind of poetry. In 1932 as a private student he stood first class first in M.A. (Bengali) from the Calcutta University, whereafter he acted as a research fellow for three years in the same University. After that he embarked upon a career of teaching. For a period he had a stint with the Ananda Bazar Patrika as one of its Assistant Editors but soon returned to his fold as a teacher. Several years back he had retired from the Calcutta University as Rabindra Professor. He was a nominated M.P. to the Rajya Sabha.

Bishi's versatality is remarkable. He is as much at ease in prose as in poetry. And in prose again, there is hardly a branch of literary prose which he has not tried his hand at and embellished. Among his novels and short-story collections mention may be made of the following more known ones–Joradighir Chowdhury Paribar (The Chowdhury Family of Joradighi, 1937), Chalanbil, Padma (1935), Dakini (The Witch, 1945), Ashwatthar Abhishap (The Curse of the Banyan Tree, 1947), Brahmar Hasi (Brahma's Laugh, 1948), Pra-na-bir Nikrishta Galpa (The worst Stories of Pra-Ni-Bi), Swanirbachita Galpa (Self-chosen Stories), Galpa-Panchashat (Fifty stories,), Carey Saheber Munsi (The Penman of Mr. Carey), Lal Kella (The Red Fort). Of this list the first two titles are in the nature of a saga of some zamindar families of North Bengal and the last two are semi-historical in character. The story of Lal Kella is built around the so called 'Sepoy Mutiny' of 1857. His latest two novels are Purnabatar (The complete Incarnate) and Bangabhanga (Partitioned Bengal) of which the former is mythologically and the latter politically inspired.

As a dramatist Bishi assumed the initial of his full name as his pseudonym (Pra-Na-Bi) obviously in imitation of 'G.B.S.' and wrote some delightful comedies like Rinam Krittva (By Borrowing, 1935), Ghritam Pivet (One should take clarified Butter, 1936), Mouchake Dhil (Stone pelted at a Hornet's Nest, 1938) and Parihasa Bijalpitam (Stray Thoughts in Jest, 1940), etc. These are all light plays, farcical in character, but very enjoyable because of the gay abandon of their mode of writing.

As a belletrist he appears with equal force and regales his readers with a profuse dose of light-hearted humour and inventive wit, sometimes as Pra-Na-Bi sometimes as Kamalakanta in the fashion of Bankim's well known jester of the same name. Of course in tune with his political beliefs Bishi does not lose an opportunity to have some digs at the 'progressives' and the 'leftists', but nevertheless his thrusts are liked by his friends and foes alike because of an absence of animosity in them and their frolicsome spirit.

But it is as a critic and an essayist that Bishi is more widely known and reckoned. True to the tradition of Rabindranath, he enlivens all his prose writings with a subtle sense of humour and this streak of his pen is no less evident in his critical evaluations and literary assessments than in his plays and belles-letters. So far as criticisms are concerned, he has made some fine evaluations of Tagore's poems, dramas and short stories in books bearing names of their subject-matter (Rabindra-Kavyanirjhar, Rabindra Kavyaprabaha, Rabindranatyaprabaha, Rabindranather Chhotagalpa, etc.) in addition to an excellent little book on Michael Madhusudan Datta. His studies of Bankimchandra (Bankimchandra-O-Uttarkal) and a few other significant past writers of Bengal (Banglar Lekhak) are no less readable. Also he has written a very nice autobiographical book entitled Rabindranath-O-Shantiniketan (1944). Besides, he has edited and compiled quite a large number of works of the classical masters of Bengali literature.

N.C.

BLANK VERSE (Assamese). In Assamese metre, the blank verse (amitrakshar chhanda) is built on the meterical structure of 'payar' (8.6.), which is at once the most widely used verse-form and endowed with the virtues of English iambic pentameter. Assamese blank verse, like its English source model, is not just rhymeless verse. Its aim is to provide more freedom to the sense-movement of metre than what the end-stopped verse forms are prepared to concede. In the process, the conventional instrument of end-rhymes is also dispensed with. As for the base verse of payar, it serves best as the medium for enjambement with its attendant phenomenon of shifting pauses.

The first practitioner of blank verse in Assamese was Bholanath Das (1858-1929), who introduced it in his Sitaharan Kavya (1888). Other noteworthy poets of blank verse are Padmanath Gohainbarua, Hiteswar Barbaruah and Dandinath Kalita, each of whom wrote some full length kavyas in the first half of the 20th century.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Mahendra Bora, Fundamentals of Assamese Metre, Dibrugarh, 1977.

M.B.

BLANK VERSE (Bengali), known in Bengali as amitrakshar chhanda, was introduced by Michael Madhusudan Datta around 1860 under an amusing circumstance. Madhusudan once remarked to his friends that no improvement in the Bengali drama could be expected until blank verse was introduced in it. His friends objected to it on the ground that Bengali was ill-adapted for the stately measure of blank verse. Madhusudan, however, accepted it as a challenge and within a few days wrote the first canto of his poem Tilottamasambhavkavya. Amitrakshar chanda, however, is not just unrhymed verse but a metrical structure of a special kind. Madhusudan used the traditional metrical verse structure 'payar', a verse line consisting generally of fourteen 'matras' (and quite often fourteen syllables too) with a ceasura after the eighth and the final pause after the fourteenth. Thus the final pause is continuous with the sentence final. What Madhusudan actually did was to remove the obligatory pause after the fourteenth and tried to make room for enjambment. A new structure was thus evolved where a poet attained a greater measure of freedom; he could carry on the sense from one line to the other without being bothered either by the length and structure of the sentence or by the compulsion of pauses at the end of a verse line. The introduction of blank verse revolutionized Bengali poetry by the dynamism inherent in the structure itself; it gave a new vitality and added an altogether new dimension to the Bengali poetry. The break with the earlier reading style of verse, partly influenced by music, was also complete with the employment of blank verse. Madhusudan took his model from the Paradise Lost. He thought that 'good blank verse should be sonorous'. He tried, accordingly, to achieve sonority in his experimentations. Though his initial experiments with blank verse, in Tilottama, are marked by certain ineptitude, he was immensely successful with the new metrical structures in his epic Meghanadbadhkavya. It was eminently suitable for his grand style and his epic ideas. It reached its finest stage in the poem Birangana (1862) distinguished by flexibility as well as terseness.

There was an expected criticism of and opposition to this new metrical experiment but it was shortlived. It was very soon accepted by the major poets of the 19th century and became very popular too. Rabindranath Tagore. also wrote some of his plays, Chitrangada and Bisarjan in amitrakshar, though his rhythm is entirely different from that of Madhusudan. Tagore in some such of his writings used rhyme; strictly speaking it is violation of one of the basic features of blank verse–but he retained the feature of enjambment which is recognized as the most vital requirement of Bengali blank verse. Girish chandra Ghosh, the noted dramatist of the 19th century, exploited the possibility of the metrical structure created by Madhusudan and made some further innovation. He discarded the fixed length of the verse–sentence and arranged his lines differently. This new structure, popularly known as 'girish chhanda', is derived from the amitrakshar of Madhusudan and became extremely popular in certain types of plays in the 19th century. Though it is not so frequently used by the modern poets, many of their experimentations towards achieving greater freedom and flexibility in metrical structure can be related to the history of the evolution of amitrakshar in Bengali.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Mohitlal Majumdar, Bangla Kabitar Chhanda (Calcutta, 1945); Prabodhchandra Sen, Chhanda Parikrama (Calcutta, 1965); Tarapada Bhattacharya, Chandabijnan (Calcutta, 1948).

S.D.

BLANK VERSE (Gujarati). In their attempts to write epics under the influence of English literature, most of the poets of the 19th century including Narmad have all been in search of a particular metre which is parallel to the blank verse in English dramatic and narrative poetry. The characteristic features of the blank verse such as the absence of rhyme, overrunning of lines, variation of pauses have been sought perseveringly.

The idea of the absence of rhymes is not new, as the classical Sanskrit and even Prakrit tradition usually follow the rhymeless patternings of stanzic form. But the idea of unsingable verse is difficult to achieve, since from classical Sanskrit to old Gujarati there has been a long tradition of the singing of verse instead of recitation.

In this connection, the repetitive Matra Vrittas and non repetitive Varna Vrittas have been suggested and tried by different poets. But only successful exploitation of Prithvi by B.K. Thakore has opened the royal path to blank verse for successive Gujarati poets. Prithvi has enough pliability to accomodate free pauses and 'great sentences' in its run on lines.

C.T.

BLANK VERSE (Kannada) or Sarala Ragale, occupies a pre-eminent position among all the metrical forms popular in modern Kannada and it is also very dear to the poets and playwrights of the Renaissance. It is singularly used in poetry, but in drama it occurs commonly mixed with other metrical forms, although there are instances where it has also been used independently. Poets started using it for narrative poetry in the third decade of this century. Later on, its use became dominant in drama and finally reached its culmination in epic poetry.

It has been a matter of considerable discussion among scholars whether Sarala Ragale which made its appearance in the modern Kannada period was an independent creation or whether it evolved from some other metrical form, either native or foreign. But the consensus now is that it originated from Lalita Ragale, a syllabic metrical form which has been in vogue for several centuries in Kannada, and by adopting into it certain prosodic niceties afforded by the English blank verse, it was evolved further over the decades into its present finished form.

So far as Lalita Ragale is concerned, it is apparent from a study of its history that a certain primitive form of it, which the famous Champu poets of the old Kannada period had devised (through the influence of Prakrit prototype), was developed into its fulness and perfection by Harihara, an eminent poet of the medieval Kannada period. The efforts of some later poets to develop it further from where Harihara left it were of no consequence, but the new form it received during the modern Kannada period ideally suits the genius of the Kannada poetic tradition.

The common characteristic of Lalita Ragale is that it is built up of pairs of metrical lines or couplets with beginning and end-rhymes, each line consisting of four 'ganas' (or feet) and each foot having five matras (quantative syllables). A canto of a poem may consist of any number of such couplets.

It follows from the works of Harihara, which are themselves called by the genre-name Ragale, that this metrical form lent itself well to both narrative and descriptive poetry.

The blank verse in English too, passed through several stages of development–first, of heroic couplets; second, of doing away with rhyme but retaining the caesura at the line-endings with regular measures, and the third and the most important, of dropping the caesura at the end of the line, and because of such enjambment, caesura occurred in the middle of the lines and gave way to variations in measure. At the hands of poets like Shakespeare and Milton, blank verse achieved a rare beauty reaching the acme of perfection.

The Renaissance poets of Kannada who were exposed to the beauties of the English blank verse as perfected by its masters, adopted its beauty and felicity into the Kannada blank verse, while retaining some of the characteristics of Lalita Ragale, such as its feet structure, the number of feet and the unnumbered verse-lines. This is how Sarala Ragale was born and developed. The virtues that were borrowed from the English blank verse were the doing away with rhyme, allowing substitutions in measures while maintaining the original rhythm, syllabic elision and protraction, having either full or incomplete caesura in the middle of the lines, enjambment, forming verse paragraphs by breaking the verse-lines, etc. The structuring of the foot-measure varies from language to language. In English blank verse, we find that although the foot-measure is balanced by slurring or protraction of syllables, the occurrence of too many accented syllables is very common. This kind of metrical balancing is rather rare in Sarala Ragale. There are always an equal number of matras in the feet of the lines which makes for a total rhythm and without affecting the base rhythm.

It was T.S. Venkanniah who suggested the name of Sarala Ragale as equivalent to the English blank verse. Since then the name has rooted itself firmly in Kannada. It could be said that the word 'Sarala Ragale' combines in it the sense of both 'Blank' in 'Blank Verse' and of 'Ragale' in 'Lalita Ragale'.

Sarala Ragale has an extensive and glorious history in Kannada. All the great and famous poets of the modern Kannada have not only used it, but also composed their masterpieces in that metre. B.M. Srikantiah, Masti Venkatesa Iyengar, Govinda Pai, Kuvempu, M.R. Srinivasamurthy, V.K. Gokak, Muliya Thimmappaiah, L. Gundappa, S.V. Parameśvara Bhatta, Sameṭanahalli Rama Rao, K.V. Raghavacharya, Krishnamurti, Puranik and others have composed their several poems, longer poetic works and plays in Sarala Ragale. The narrative poem entitled 'Sthalagala Hesaru' by Masti in his collection of poems Aruna (1924) was the first ever work in this metre. His epic work Sri Ramapattabhisekham is also in this metre. Kuvempu has come to be known as the finest craftsman of Sarala Ragale. All his verse plays are in this metre and have gained considerable popularity. Besides, both his poem Chitrangada and his great epic Sri Ramayanadarsanam are considered to be the finest models of this metrical form. Sri Ramayanadarsanam can be said to be in the 'Grand Style' and the Sarala Ragale in it has been called by the poet himself 'Maha Chandassu' or the Great Metre. Sametanahalli Rama Rao's Shakuntala, V.K. Gokak's Bharatasindhurashmi and Bhusanur Mutt's Bhavyamanava are some of the recent epic works written in Sarala Ragale. Two other significant works which need to be mentioned in this context are Golgotha and Vaisakhi, both by Govinda Pai, dealing with the 'last day' of the lives of the Christ and the Buddha respectively. B.M. Srikantiah's Aswatthama and Parasikaru and M.R. Srinivasamurthy's Nagarika and Dharmaduranta, K.V. Raghavacharya's translations of the plays of Aeschylus and Sophocles as well as some recent translations of Greek plays by other writers show how well Sarala Ragale has lent itself to the rendering of the English blank verse in Kannada. Some of Masti's plays and his translations of Shakespeare's plays and the narrative poems and plays of Krishnamurti Puranik, Muliya Thimmappiah and S.V. Parameshwara Bhatta are also in Sarala Ragale.

It may be observed here that the above mentioned poets and playwrights have, depending upon their abilities and genius, shown certain distinct characteristics in the use of the Sarala Ragale. Masti's language is very much akin to the style of prose and is direct and simple. He fills out the shortness of foot-measures by the lengthening of vowels by two on three matras, B.M. Srikantiah breaks foot-measures by splitting the conjuncts with the result that the lines seem to suffer from metrical imbalance. M.R. Srinivasamurthy's works have mechanical foot-measures and his lines are punctuated by either full or incomplete caesura. In Govinda Pai, the succinctness of language and a tight structure hold our attention. The substitutions of his lines are marked with variety and a pleasing quality. Gokak does not stick to the normally accepted characteristics and writes lines of 'elephantine extensions., In Krishnamurti Puranik, because of the recurrence of the same kind of substitutions, there is a certain monotony. K.V. Raghavacharya's language is terse and the structure of the measures is mechanical. While the metrical handling is weak and loose at some places in the earlier works of K.V. Puttappa, in the two epic poems, particularly in Shri Ramayanadarsanam, the Kannada blank verse has reached its highest point of perfection.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: M. Chidanarda Murthy, Ragale, Sarala Ragale:

Mahachandassu Sahyadri(1975); T.V. Venkatachala Sastry, Sarala Ragale, Mahachandassu: Kannada Chandah-Swarupa (1978), Sri Ramayanam Darshanam Chandassu; Kavempu Sahityaloka (1983).

T.V.V.S.

BLANK VERSE (Marathi) is called 'Niryamak Padya' in Marathi (Yamak: rhyme, Nir-without). It is the distinctive poetic form of English language and medium of nearly all verse dramas and many narrative and reflective verses. In the Marathi literature and prosody it has remained on the level of academic curiosity. Though some attempts were made to create and establish the Niryamak Padya, (which of course is not the exact imitation of the English Blank verse) by modern Marathi poets no basic metric innovations were made in Marathi Blank Verse, for want of more eminent poets who could have used and popularised the same. The reason for this lies in the fact that Marathi language and poetry does not find itself at home with the Blank Verse as it has accepted Free Verse, which has now become a distinctive feature of new Marathi poetry. Even though the demarcation lines between Blank Verse and Free Verse have not remained clear in the practice of Marathi poetry and dramatic verse, eminent scholars of Marathi Prosody like N.G. Joshi, however, distinguish these two, as the former being stanzaic and the latter only obeys the rules of rhythms, nothing else can bind it. Moreover the distinctive feature of Blank Verse is the recurrance of beats with regular pauses and run on lines, unlike that of Free Verse which does not follow any predetermined design.

The real difference between Blank Verse and Free Verse lies in that, that the former proves its excellence when it is set to recitation and hence comprises of regular stress accents based on the count of beats; while the latter does not give prominence to the stress accents, the measure being loosened to give more play to imaginative genius.

We find the Blank Verse composition in the poetry of Vinayak D. Sawarkar who named his metre as Vainayak Vritta (one meaning being a metre framed by Vinayak). The prominent features of the Blank Verse mentioned above are found in this Vainayak Vritta, viz., the absence of rhyme, formal division of the poems in verse paragraphs (which are practically the traditional stanzas only), the regular repetition of a group of beats or 'matras' (matra beat) and an intrinsic flow in the recitation of the verse. In particular the Vainayak Vritta consists of three groups of six short beats (laghu matra) plus a long beat (guru matra), a pattern called 'Dhavalchandrika' in Marathi prosody.

The so-called Vainayak Vritta was also handled by very few poets, N.G. Joshi being one of them.

Poets like V.N. Deshpande have tried to practise the Blank Verse form to some extent but unlike the 'Vainayak Vritta' his compositions do not express the quality of intrinsic flow and also rule of rhymelessness is not abided by.

Some poets like Rendalkar have composed rhymeless verses in the traditional metres like Shardulvikridita, Prithwi, etc., but except the absence of rhyme they do not show any acquaintance with the Blank Verse on the whole. Same is the case with the rhymeless sonnets composed by Nath Niphadkar.

If we try to find the traces of Blank Verse in the verses of Marathi drama we again come across compositions akin to Blank Verse in the qualities of regular stress accents, intrinsic flow of run on lines, etc., but almost all of these verses, as if naturally, contain the end rhymes and hence cannot be clearly categorised as Blank Verse. However, Sawarkar has used the Vainayak metre in his own drama Ushhap. Also V.N. Deshpande has used some different beat patterns like Lavang Lata (Seven beats) and Chandrakanta (eight beats) in his verse-dramas and some of his verses are rhymeless, but they do not follow this rule invariably. Versified dialogues are becoming a feature in some of the modern Marathi dramas like Ti Phulrani and Lekure Udand Jahali by Vasant Kanetkar. Though pattern of Blank Verse is found in the verses of such plays it cannot be legitimately called Blank Verse, as the composition is hardly stanzaic and does not follow the rule of rhymelessness. Hence the long and short of the Blank Verse in Marathi is that the usage of the same is not the distinctive quality of either the Marathi poetry or the dramatic verse.

Shr. S.

BLANK VERSE (Punjabi). The term Sirkhandi Chhand was applied first of all in Punjabi by Bhai Vir Singh to the long stanza used by him in his famous epic, Rana Surat Singh. But there also this stanza form is not really blank verse in the sense it carries in English poetry, for in these stanzas of Rana Surat Singh the line has a rhyme in the middle throughout the stanza which may contain any number of lines.

Blank verse as such has seldom been used in Punjabi poetry earlier or even in the present day. To be particular, stanza 24, of Guru Nanak's Japu, can be metioned in this context, but there also the first two lines have a rhyming in the middle. Many stanzas in Guru Gobind Singh's Chandi di Var also use 'Sir-khandi Chhand', in this sense.

S.S.S.

BLANK VERSE (Sindhi) tradition one does not find in Sindhi literature. It was N.V. Thadhani who experimented on this form while translating Srimad Bhagavad Gita into Sindhi. The work was published in 1923.

This was done in Bahr Mazaj (Mafailun repeated eight times in two lines), the metre much in vogue in Sindhi. In the opinion of the translator, it came over to the Anushtap Chhand (used in original work) as each couplet can be divided in four Padas with the fifth syllable as short one. The major part of the eleventh chapter of the Gita was translated in Bhujang Chand (Known in Persian prosody as Bahr Mutaqarib) as used in the original work. Long after the publication of the Gita translation by N.V. Thadhani, some poets did write their poems in Blank Verse in various metres to continue the experiment, but the effort was not powerful enough to provide a permanent place for this form in Sindhi literature.

N.G.N.

BLANK VERSE (Tamil) as a literary term should be equated with ahaval in Tamil, a prosodic line of varying syllabic quantities used without end or beginning rhymes, but also without the caesurae familiar in the English standard blank verse line. Ahaval as a term is said to come from the human voice, the throw of the voice so to say, and hence ahaval, as used in the earliest strata of Tamil poetry, served the same utilitarian purpose in Tamil as in Elizabethan dramatic blank verse.In like manner, the new verse practitioners of modern verse like Na Pichamurthy (1900-1977) Ka Naa Subramanyam (1912), Nakulan (1923) and others try to use blank verse for New Verse experiments.

In the Sangam poems, blank verse was used in units of single lines without carrying forward residues of sound or extensions of syllables. 'Yaadum ure Yaavarum Kelir' was the famous first line of a Purananuru verse which stands solid by itself, the caesura exactly in the middle, divided by the conversational idiom. In like manner, a foster mother setting out in search of an errant daughter gone away with her lover says in quite conversational terms, addressing as if it were you and me—

> My feet are worn to the bone;
> My eyes have lost their sharpness peering into endless faces;
> How many are the lovers of this world going along, two by two.

The blank verse in Tamil was a perfect conveyor of significances for the emotionless poems, better call them poems of emotional stasis in a Joycean sense and the poets present dramatic, lyrical and emotional states with complete skill.

Blank verse was used in subsequent periods by the bhakti poets, more so by the Saivite Nayanmars than by the Vaishavite Alvars for crying hallelujahs to their God and to hymn him in historical and narrative terms. It acquired a flexibility which it did not have in the Sangam poems, in the poems of praise by Manikkavachagar.

It was Ilango Adigal, the author of the Tamil epic Silappadhikaram who put the 'ahaval' to its most significant and meticulous use. Like Milton's blank verse in the Paradise Lost, Ilango carries a strong narrative forward sustaining it by moral, aesthetic, metaphysical and other passages. The date of hango and Silappadhikaram is a much discussed one, traditional scholars dating it back to the 2nd century, almost contemporary with the Sangam poems but scholars like Vaiyapuri Pillai date it to the 10th century, a likely date much in agreement with the sophistication of the blank verse ahaval used, and in the selection of details with uncanny fictional skill.

In Tamil literature, till the effort of Sundaram Pillai, blank verse was put to no greater use after the epic Silappadhikaram. P. Sunderam Pillai in his Manonmaniyam uses it with some skill but he is not able to extract the best from it. It was Subramania Bharati who in the present century in his absurdist Kuyilpattu makes inspired use of blank verse in a most romantic manner; his mastery of blank verse is evident also in some natural scenic descriptions in his Panchali Sabatham. Bharati (1882-1921) seems to have contemplated writing some blank verse plays as well, but only fragments remain, and no one could guess what use he might have made of this ahaval form; he had a gift for vigorous renewal and his not having been able to write his verse dramas has left the blank verse scene poorer.

Na Pichamurthy (1900-1977) made use of blank verse ahaval form in his nonscanning, nonprosodic forms which however continued to use the images and metaphors of older poetry without the rigmaroles of end or beginning rhymes, counting of syllables and the like. Most of the practitioners of a modern form of verse known for convenience as New Verse use a sort of blank verse which remains more or less true to the spoken rhythms of the language. Among the effective users of blank verse are Nakulan (1923), Sundara Ramaswamy (1923) Ka Naa Subramanyan (1912), Gnanakkoothan (1943) and others. Blank verse or ahaval is especially suitable in Tamil for longer poems and narrative attempts but except in the Silappadhikaram and to a certain extent in the Kuvil of Subramania Bharati it has not been experimented with. An autobiography of a poet in some thirteen thousand lines in known to exist but it has not yet been published in book form.

The use of ahaval is possible in verse drama of which we have few specimens in the modern period in Tamil., Bharatidasan (1892-1967) tried to make use of it, but his tendentiousness made his poetry somewhat colourless.

K.N.S.

BOAT SONGS (KOLI SONGS) (Marathi). Koli is one of the primitive communities in Maharashtra. There are about twenty five or more branches of this community classified under three main groups, namely Mahadevkoli, Malharikoli and Sonkoli. Some of the branches of this community were originally inhabitants of Mahadev Hills or Balaghat. Some of them were the devotees of God

Malhari. The branches of this community dwelling on the original Bombay Island and its nearby places of coastal line are particularly known as Sonkoli. Their main profession is fishery. Mahadev and Malhari Kolis are mainly agriculturists. Sonkoli community is economically developed while others are comparatively backward and hence enlisted as the scheduled tribes and communities. All these subcommunities of Koli have their treasure of peculiar folksongs. Traditional songs prevailing amongst Sonkoli are popularly known as Koli songs or Boat songs.

Koli songs have a wide variety of subject. Though God Khandoba and Goddess Ekweera are their main deities, many of this community worship several village deities such as Ranai, Kalsubai, Matubai, Jakubai, Warsubai and others. Koli believes in the solemn promise made to God or deity as well. They believe in black magic. All these have found poetic expressions in Koli songs. There are several sacred rites prevailing in these communities since ancient times. At the time of first menstruation in case of a girl or at the time of first conception in case of a married girl some sacred rites are observed. There are religious rites to be performed at the time of marriage. All such sacred rites are performed not only with religious feelings cultivated through generations but also observed with festivity. This festivity is naturally expressed in many of the traditional Koli songs. Especially sacred rites at the time of marriage are performed in ceremonial ways. This adds to the festivity and gives new dimension to the songs. Most of the Koli songs are expressions of such moods.

The Koli community celebrates the common Indian and Maharashtrian festivals like Ganesh Festival (Gauri Ganapati), Coconut Day, Holi Poornima, etc. On such occasions the Kolis sing festival songs in which the significance of these festivals and their cultural importance are narrated. Mostly such songs are sung collectively by men and women together. The manners of celebrating these festivals are traditional. The narration in the songs and the modes of singing are traditional too. Some festivals like Somvati Amavasya are celebrated in particular families. And on that occasion also songs based on religious rites are sung.

While celebrating religious fairs, festivals or marriage ceremonies men and women of this community wear rich traditional clothes and ornaments which add to their festivity and enhance their pleasure. The descriptions of colourful costumes and ornaments find place in the song. In a Koli song very much popular in Maharashtra 'Ya Go Dandya Vana madhe Navara Kunacha Yeto' (meaning; whose bridegroom is coming from Danda) we come across the description of colourful costumes worn by the bridegroom and his associates.

In Koli community marriages are celebrated according to old customs. Before actual marriage a ceremony of applying turmeric paste is performed on a large scale. A long strip of twelve to thirteen squares is drawn on the ground. A bride or a bridegroom is asked to sit in each square and then the paste is applied. With this performance in each square songs are recited collectively. In one of such popular songs we find an elaborate description of the beauty of the bride with poetic similes, e.g. 'Tuje Paya Jase Ooskandy! Tujya Mandya Jaisya Keli Go Garbhu!' (meaning: Your legs are like sugarcanes, your thighs like plantain interior.)

God and Goddesses of the Kolis are from hills and valleys. Hence there are abundant references to sea, sky, constellation, forests, flowers and fruits. Such references usually occur in Koli songs popularly known as Gauri's songs (Songs of Goddess Gauri). While describing the beauty of a bride through poetic similes the composers of Koli songs have taken analogy from nature. A handsome bridegroom is described as 'a pearl born in the interior of a shell'.

As mentioned in the beginning, fishery is the main profession of Sonkoli community. Usually the fishermen are on the sea away from their homes for about more than twenty days in a month. Their wives look after the houses and the fishermen live a hard life on boat. While seeing the fisherman off at the sea, the fisherwoman is overwhelmed with deep feelings of separation and anxiety. When on the sea the fisherman, though busy in his work, does not forget his home but gratifies himself with the happy memories and bright future. All such emotional experiences are expressed in Koli songs popularly known as Nakhva Geet. These songs are addressed by the boatman to the fisher woman or addressed to him by her. The songs symbolize the boatman's emotional life, or one can say that the songs signify the life of Koli community. Hence in a way boat is a symbol of their life.

In view of the wide variety of subjects and content of Koli songs they are categorized as religious songs, ritual songs, festival songs and boatman's songs. There is one more category which is known amongst the Koli as 'Ambvanya' or erotic songs. These are couplets or short lyrics expressing erotic feelings and especially they are sung by male Kolis only. It is said that fishermen far away on the sea tease each other by singing such erotic songs and amuse themselves. But this might be a lesser category of Koli songs.

Mostly Koli songs are sung while dancing different types of Koli dances. While singing religious, ritual or festival songs Koli men and women dance together. Sometimes they dance separately. They dance in accordance with the composition of the song and to the suitable tunes of musical instruments like the Dholak and the cymbals. Rhythmic and prolonging sounds of the particular composition of the song are played on the Shehnai. Men and women dance to the tunes and gesticulate in different manners to express the meaningful content of the song. While singing Nakhva Geet or Boatman's song, the dancers use small wooden oars; standing in two rows they gesticulate in such a way that the spectator feels as if the boat is undulating on the sea. This part of dramatization is very entertaining.

Music, dance and drama are the three elements of folk songs and Koli songs are no exception to it.

S. K.

BOAT SONGS (Tamil) are sung by fishermen when rowing their boat in the sea or lakes or rivers. Such songs are called 'Elelo Patal' as they raise the 'Elelo' sound when singing. A story is also told justifying this name. Once there lived in Mylapore a generous merchant called Elelasingan who helped the fishermen. As a mark of gratitude they sang their boat songs, having his name as their stock word. In course of time the name 'Elelar' was changed to 'Elelo'. This story lacks sound proof. Boat songs are ordinarily called 'Odappattu' since 'Odam' means a boat.

The stock word 'Elelo' of the boat song was used by those who prepare lime by stamping. Sometimes when lifting heavy stones the Elelo songs were sung. The stock words used very often are 'Elele Ilasa, Elai Elo or calacalaa'. A change may be noticed in the songs of stone lifters such as 'Iel, Ilasa or Elelampidi Elem'. In the Vellakkaran ballad a voyage was described from London to Kanyakumari. The songs take 'Kappal Odutu par' as the stock word. (Ed. A.N. Perumal, 1983).

In later days poets adapted the form of boat song in their poems. K. Azhagiriswamy in his drama Parankiyar Vantar composed such a song in a rowing scene. There the stock words add to the rhyme of the song considerably. These words run as 'Ela Elo Ela Elo Ela Ela Elilalo'.

Kambadasan in his Arunotayam introduces a boat song with 'Ileso' as its stock word. Kannadasan in one of his on songs labour adopted the form of boat song and used 'Elelo and Ilalo' as its stock words.

'Amba Patal' is another form of boat song very much related to fishing. They are sung by fishermen when catching fish in the sea or in rivers. 'Amba' might have been derived from the word 'Ambi' which means a boat. When boats are taken into the sea and also where they are pulled out for repairing, Amba songs are sung.

These songs are sung in two batches. One man begins and the others sing in chorus. When the fishermen go to catch a kind of fish called 'Kola' they sing a boat song named 'Kolamara Amba'. At the time of spreading vast nets, they sing a song known as 'Peruvalai Pattu'.

Many boat songs are found in vogue among the fisher folk. They survive only in the lips of ordinary people. In some of them every line ends with the stock word. But it differs from song to song. Ordinarily 'Elelo' and 'Elelo ilo' are found to be the stock words. Boat songs relieve fishermen from tedium and help them to do their work with enthusiasm.

A.N.P.

BOAT SONGS (Telugu). Godavari, Krishna, Penna, Nagavali, and Vansadhara are the major rivers flowing in Andra Pradesh along with twentynine minor rivers. Telugu folk literature overflows with boat songs.

Sailors who travel on boats sing many songs to express their joys and sorrows, to relieve their burden and to express their love thoughts in lyrical language. Boat songs are generally not found in a written form and they change from time to time. They have a tune reminding one of the flow of the river.

Nedunuri Gangadharam, Krishsri, Chintha Dikshitulu, Kavikondala Venkata Rao, B. Rama Raju and several others collected the songs of the boatmen and published them in various journals and books.

Rustic love and philosophical strain are found in the songs of boatmen who make a living on the banks of the Godavari and the Krishna.–

"O uncle, you may trip and fall
My basket is heavy with fish, won't you help me?"
"O fair lass! who are you? Where are you from?
We are in the midstream, no sight of the shore."
"It is getting dark, hasten to reach the shore"
"Yes, we have touched shore
I shall now help to take off your load."

Literary versions of the boat–songs are popularised by Devulapalli Krishna Sastry and Nanduri Subbarao.

O boatmen, take me across!
The boat dances on the waters like a swan
Leave not the rudder and lead to the shore
You are the oar, you are the boat,
You are the guiding star and you are the far-off shore.

You are the bracing friendly breeze" says Krishna Sastry in an allegorical style.

Nanduri Subbarao's heroine Yenki expresses the longing of her lonely heart in the famous song:

Won't you take pity on me, this moon-lit night?
The stream hisses like a cobra, spitting foam of light.
May not the charm of the moon light be wasted tonight.
May the ferry reach the shore,
May my lover take me into his arms.'

Boat songs form a considerable portion of the rich legacy of folk songs. They express the simple joys and sorrows of the people whose life is marked by thrill and adventure as they are at the mercy of the wind and the wave, the most unpredictable of the elements.

K.R.R.

BOBBILIKATHA (Telugu) is a popular historical ballad in Telugu. Three different editions of the ballad are available now. The first one in a manuscript form, at the Madras Manuscript Library (No. 2556) is written by Narasimhacharlu of Parlapalli and contains an interesting preface in which it is said that the story is narrated by Narada to Indra. The third one Peda Bobbili Raju Katha is the text used by folk singers and was written by one who belonged to Dhenuvakonda family ('Dhenuvakonda vari racana'.).

The ballad, heavily relying on historical events that occurred in the Northern districts of Andhra, deals with the political feuds of the Bobbili and Vijayanagar kings, culminating in a one-day war between the two states during the 18th century. Bussey, a French warrior and administrator, to whom the Nizam of Hyderabad had given the Kalinga Circar as a gift, was passing through the northern parts of Andhra and gave audience to the neighbouring kings at Rajahmundry. All the lords came to see him to pay their respects. Ranga Rao, the king of Bobbili, failed to join the rest, presumably because he did not like the supervision of the French officer and was waiting for an opportunity to oppose him. Taking his absence as an advantage, Vijaya Rama Raju, the king of Vijayanagaram, who had a long-standing rivalry with the Bobbili king, levelled false charges against Ranga Rao, alleging that Rao wanted to be an independent king and turned Bussey's mind against him. He also bribed Hyder Zung, Bussey's commander. Bussey, believing the charges levelled against Ranga Rao both by Raju and the Zung, to be genuine, sent a 'firman' to Ranga Rao asking him to leave Bobbili immediately, in lieu of which he would be given another land. This demeaning order was rejected forthwith both by Rao and the loyal followers of Bobbili. But Ranga Rao approached Gorum Dora, the ruler of Bunder and a friend, to intervene on his behalf and see that the misunderstanding between him and Bussey was settled. Convinced of the innocence of Ranga Rao, Bussey set forth to reach Srikakulam without implementing his threat to see that Rao and his followers evacuate Bobbili. But when they came near Bobbili, both Vijaya Rama Raju and Hyder Zung put another idea into Bussey's mind that Ranga Rao was insolent and indifferent to him and his authority and that he should not go unpunished. They also told him that they spent much money during their stay at Rajhamundry and Rao must pay at least their expenses. An easy prey to such tale-bearers, Bussey was set against Bobbili. Finally, a war had become inevitable and Bussey's army attacked Bobbili on January 24, 1757. The war was a mere one-day affair. All the Bobbili lords had fought boldly and died in the war. Their wives committed suicide. Ranga Rao's child, one month old now, was given to Venkata Lakshmi, a loyal maid, to be carried away to safety. But on her way, she was caught by Raju's spies. She was brought before Bussey. In an examination for identification whether this boy was a royal child or not, the boy Venkatarayudu, was left to choose a thing from among many items of attraction:

He did not touch fruit
Neither did he touch coins
Venkatarayudu took into his hands
The warrior's weapon–Chandrayudham

Bussey had now realised that he was misguided by Hyder and Raju and said that such a boy with the warrior's blood in his veins should not die and asked Venkata Laxmi to take him away.

Meanwhile Paparayudu, the brother-in-law of Ranga Rao and a great warrior, came to know of the sad fate of all his close relatives, his own sister and brother-in-law, and came to the battlefield. Vijayarama Raju, after a victorious day, was sleeping in his tent. Paparayudu woke him up, fought with him and killed him. Ultimately Paparayudu known as Bobbili puli (Bobbili tiger), killed himself. Finally the boy Venkatarayudu was made the king of Bobbili.

Bobbili Katha is one of the few ballads which heavily used authentic historical material without distortion. There are, of course, incidents and character portrayals which are magnified more than the others, but that is due to the point of view of the author towards his material and the people involved.

The ballad is significant in the enunciation of the emotions of 'vira' and 'karuna'. The invocation scenes, the scenes wherein the followers assure Ranga Rao of their loyalty, scenes of the battle and the final scene where Papa Rao kills Raju invoke "vira", whereas the scenes of the ladies committing suicide, Mallamma's letter to Vijayarama Raju requesting him to save the honour of Bobbili women, and Venkata Lakshmi carrying the boy away to safety–are those that invoke 'karuna'. The cock-fight, a game in which the Telugu villagers take a particular interest and one which, more often than not, led to larger fights between kings, find an important place in this ballad too. The characters of Ranga Rao, his brother Vengal Rao, his messenger Lakshmanna, his brother-in-law Papa Rao are drawn in the true spirit of heroism. Though the ballad mainly rests on the male roles for advancing dramatic action, the female roles are also drawn significantly.Mallama Devi, Bheri Ramakka and Venkata Laxmi are characters which are remembered for ever by the Telugu people.

The ballad idealizes two aspects of social life in the olden days of Andhra: honour and loyalty. A king should fight until death if his honour is questioned. Similarly the followers of a king should abide by his orders without raising a question. Thus loyalty to the king, patriotic attachment to the country and bravery to live up to one's ideals–these are the ideals that the ballad upholds.

The ballad, written in 'tri' and 'chaturasra' talas, is one of the most popular ones both with the singers and the listeners.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: B. Rama Raju, Telugu Janapada Sahityamu,

Hyderabad., Dhenuvakonda Varu, Pada Bobbili Raju Katha. Madras, 1923, Peddada Mallesam, Bobbili Katha (M.S.) Madras Manuscript Library, No. 2556., Subba Rao, Telugu Janapada Gathalu. Hyderabad.

M.N.S.

BODHA (Hindi; b. 1767, d. 1806) Amongst the poets of the 'Riti' period of Hindi Literature who imparted a touch of intense love and pain of separation to poetry, Bodha (Buddhi Sen) acquired renown for his moving and feelingful expressions. Bodha was born in Rajapur (Distt. Banda, U.P.) and his relatives held prestigious positions in the State of Panna (M.P.) which impelled Buddhi Sen to aspire for and acquire the position of a court poet there. It was there that Buddhi Sen became Bodha, as he was addressed by the King of Panna, and it was this very name that made him known to the people at large.

Bodha is known as a poet of amorous sensibilities. As the legend goes, he developed a fascination for the glamorous and beautiful danseuse named Subhani (Suvahani) who danced at the court of the King of Panna. The king, enraged by the audacity of the poet, expelled him from the state for six months. These six months, away from his beloved, were an ordeal for him and the pangs of separation resulted in the creation of Virah Varish. When, on the expiry of the prescribed period of expulsion, Bodha returned to Panna, he was asked by the king to recite one of his new creative compositions which the poet readily did. Extremely pleased, the king ordered him to ask anything as prize to which Bodha exclaimed 'Subhan Allah, The king gave away the courtesan Subhani to him as a present and the poet had his foremost wish thus fulfilled.

Bodha has penned many a composition portraying the course of true love. He had experienced for himself the 'agony of love' (Prem ki Pir) and has, therefore, been able to give a poignantly touching expression to it. Bodha was a poet who had drunk deep the wine of aesthetic pleasure. He, therefore, never felt drawn to the writing of 'Riti' works. Whatever he wrote out of his surge of love is a spontaneous expression of an emotional poet endowed with aesthetic sensibilities and a carefree relish for life. His two celebrated works are Virah Varish and Ishqnama.

Vi.S

BODHESWARAN (Malayalam; b. 1902) is a revolutionary poet. A rebel throughout his life, he questioned, challenged, and finally rejected stereotypes wherever he saw them–in society, in literature, in beliefs, in politics.

Christened Narayanan Nair on his birth in a South Kerala town, he was, during his youthful days, attracted by the progressive tenets of the Arya Samaj and he changed his name into Bodheswaran. He had a short stint as a religious preacher; some of his talks on religion have been collected and published under the name Matha Prabandhangal (Religious Discourses, 1929). Partly disillusioned by his spiritual avocation, he found fulfilment in political activities and during the thirties and forties of this century his was a voice listened to with much attention by the leaders as well as the rank and file of the national movement.

He has published three collections of poetical compositions, Adarsaramam (1926), Haridayamkuram (1931) and Swatantra Keralam, (1938). In his writings Bodheswaran does not mince words when he sees to his abhorrence that patriotic spirit is fast disappearing, that wealth has elbowed out all positions of eminence and that vice and vulgarity are becoming more and more rampant. He is a poet who could coin expressions and phrases with sharp thorns thrown into them. He can breathe fire into his lines. The noted critic, A. Balakrishna Pillai quotes Bodheswaran's poems as supreme examples of "realist lyricism." He sets down the enthralling details of the failings and foibles of the people he saw, he came into contact with and of the people he happens to know very well. Bodheswaran is truly the forerunner of many later poets who came to be ranked as revolutionaries in Malayalam literature.

C.N.

BOKIL VISHNU VINAYAK (Marathi; b. 1907 d.), school teacher by profession was a famous Marathi story-writer and novelist. His first long story 'Katu Satya' (The bitter truth) was published in Yashwant (1929), He became famous by his long story 'Bebi' (1929) a tragedy based on the theme of intercaste marriage, expressing the bitterness of cruel social customs, with satire. Stories like 'Tarecha Samsar' (Tara's family-life), Purvajanchi Athavan' (Memory of fore-fathers) gave him permanent place of regard. He has written about 200 stories and published 18 collections of which Valvacha Paus (A Sudden Rain, 1934) was the first. He has also written 25 novels. First novel Phol Asha (The False Hope, 1930) is notable for humour in characterisation and presentation of children's emotions. His novels attained greater success after 1940. He tried to transform some of his novels into dramas, unsuccessfully though. He presented interesting portraits of life in light humorous style. His stories are elaborated by witty and elegant conversations and lengthy but interesting descriptions. He showed appreciable knowledge of child-psychology in creating character of a naughty child-hero Vasant. He drew charming portraits of life of newly married couples with their tender love, funny misunderstandings and sweet quarrels. He also portrayed pleasures, sorrows, ambitions and dreams of a teacher. In stories 'Mati' (The Soil), 'Bhikarada' (The Beggar), 'Jag Kunache' (Whose is the World?), 'Uparati' (The Repentance) he presented pictures of persons suffering disappointment. His stories like 'Islmai,' and 'Kodachi Mulagi' (The Girl of Leucoderma) are full of pathos. Real cream of art is seen in his stories upto 1940. Later stories lack liveliness due to humour based on foolish accidents, clumsy characters and vulgar conversations. Some novels present social problems like the frustration of children of fadist and morbid parents, evil effects of second marriage, etc. Novels Kuber Ki Rang (Kuber or Colour, 1945) and Tu Titha Mi (Where you are, I am there, 1946) shows objective presentation of the problems of low-class people. Aba and Sainya Chalale Pundhe (The Army marches on, 1952) depict contemporary political atmosphere. He is efficient in colourful narration giving essential and interesting details and picturisation of youthful beauty. His humour at places transgresses the limits of decency but generally is pleasant. He believed in the entertaining nature of art, while writing his novels and short stories.

FURTHER WORKS: Jamin Ani Asman (The Earth and the Sky), Phuga (The Balloon), Nilobachi Gatha, Hi Vadil Manase (These Elderly People), Hakkaanchi Janiv (The Consciousness of Rights), Dhandevaik Mandali (The Professional Group), Vyavahar Ahe Ha (This is Business), Natiche Chitra (Picture of an Actress), Sarikanyokti, Yashacha Rajmarga (The Royal Path of Success), Tine Lagna Ka Kele (Why did She Marry). Popular Novels: Chal Pudhe (March Forward, 1944), Bebichi Bahin (Bebi's sister, 1945), Zanzavati (The Stormy Wind, 1946), Sakhi (The Girl Friend, 1947), Thigal (The Patch, 1947), May echi Shal (The Shawl of Love, 1949), Gathabhet (The Meeting, 1949), Sat Pavale (Seven Steps, 1950).

Nis.M.

BORA, LAMBODAR (Assamese; b. 1860, d.1892) was a promising prose writer in the neo-renaissance age of Assamese literature in the 19th century. Though of a poor peasant family he could achieve higher education upto the B.A. and B.L. degrees. Young Lambodar started his professional career as a teacher and then switched over to the profession of law. In a life span of only thirty-two years he gave sufficient indications of his literary ability in the art of biographical and dramatic writing. Even to-day our biographical literature is not rich; but Lambodar took to this branch with a patriotic zeal and the sincerity of a researcher.

Lambodar was a classicist and felt deeply that with out a proper study of Sanskrit, India's glorious past in art, culture and literature could not be preserved. He never wanted that the learning of a language should be commercially biased. He could not cherish the idea that one should learn English or any other modern language at the cost of Sanskrit, which might not be commercially viable. He had natural regards for stalwarts like Anandaram Barua of Assam and Ishwarchandra Vidyasagar of Bengal, who carried out research works in Sanskrit with a life-long dedication. Himself adept in Sanskrit, Lambodar planned to write the biographies of these two Sanskrit scholars. He started his epoch-making Preface to the biography of Anandaram Barua in a powerful magazine of the time Asam Bandhu (1881-82) edited by Gunabhiram Baura. His book Anandaram Baruar Jiwan Charit was a planned task which could not be completed, but its Preface indicated the mighty mind of the author and his dignified Assamese prose style endowed with indigenous idioms, and a good number of similes and metaphors.

Lambodar's literary contributions left unfinished are: Anandaram Baruar Jiwan Charit, Ishwarchandra Vidyasagarar Jiwan Charit and a play Samaj Darpan Natak. His works, used now as textbooks for students, Larabodh and Jnanoday also testify to the quality of his prose style. His rendering into Assamese of Kalidas's Shakuntala bears his depth of knowledge both of Sanskrit and Assamese. He also showed his promise in the Assamese satirical literature with the publication of his article Sadanandar Kalaghumati (Sadananda's Nap) published in the Asam Bandhu (1881-82) (Vol. 1). It was a mild satire on the contemporary Assamese society, bringing to the fore some of its vices.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Dimbeswar Neog, New Light on History of Asamiya Literature, Gauhati, 1962; Maheswar Neog, Asamiya Sahityar Ruprekha, Gauhati, 1962; Satyendranath Sarma, Asamiya Sahityar Itibritta, Gauhati, 1959.

Pu.S.

BORA, MAHENDRA (Assamese; b. 1929) is a modern Assamese poet of repute and a critic with serious interest in many fields of Humanities. He secured his M.A. in English from Calcutta University and taught in several colleges. Later, he secured D. Phil. from Gauhati University for his work, "Fundamentals of Assamese Metre". He emerged as one of the pioneer modern poets in Assamese in the fifties and he has given this trend a strong footing by compiling the Natun Kavita (New Poetry, 1957), the first anthology of the modern Assamese poetry. He has published two anthologies of his own, namely, Jatismar (Parapsychic Person, 1962) and Ei Nadiyedi (By this River, 1970). An inflexible faith in the undulating course of life and immortality of soul and nature are two basic characteristics of his poems. He has been influenced by the European Imagist poets to a great extent. Phul, Tara, Gan (Flowers, Stars and Songs, 1957) is a book on modern poets and poetry of different countries, written in prose. He is equally known as a critic of significance. Asamiya Kavitar Chhanda (Metre of Assamese Poetry, 1962) and Ramanyasbad (Romanticism, 1976) carry the designs of his thinking and prose-style. The latter was awarded the 'Mahendrachandra Sarma Award',1977, by Asam Sahitya Sabha in 1978. 1857 in Assam (1957) is a monograph in English. He has edited the Weissalisa (two old chronicles on the 1st Burmese invasion of Weissali, i.e., Assam, from Tai-Khamti source), 1976. He has translated the following books into Assamese: Gulliver's Travels (1953), Don Quixote (1954), Nil Sagarar Sadhu (Toilers of the Sea 1954), Federalist Papers (1957), Yearling (1958), Binodini (1962), Raja (1962), Bhut (Ghost, 1965), Pinocchio (1972) and Deshe Deshe Galpa (Stories from different Countries), 1972.

Bora is the Lakshminath Bezbarua Professor of Assamese Language, Literature and Culture in the Dibrugarh University, Assam.

N.S.

BORA, MAHICHANDRA (Assamese; b. 1894, d. 1965) was a short story writer of repute. He graduated in 1918 from Scottish Church College, Calcutta, and later on obtained the B.L. Degree from Earl Law College, Gauhati. He started his career as the manager of a tea-garden, served as a school teacher and finally established himself as a lawyer in the Nowgong court. He joined the Indian National Congress and was an active member during the period 1930-1952. He participated in the freedom struggle for which he had to suffer much and courted imprisonment thrice as a satyagrahi. He was connected with social, educational and cultural institutions and was elected a member of the Assam Legislative Assembly. Mahichandra Bora established himself as a short story writer of eminence. He had the unique quality of telling stories in a humorous and satirical tone. He attacked the hypocrisy and corruption of the so-called leaders and elites of the society in his stories; he did not even spare the people of his own profession. Ukilar Janmarahasya (The Birth-story of a Lawyer) is a story-collection of Bora. He published a collection of his poetry under the title Shanti-Shatak and a life sketch of Manikchandra Bora under the title Manik. He was accorded the title 'Galpar-Samrat' (King of story writing) of Assam by the leading Assamese monthly the Awahan in the thirties of the century.

N.S.

BORA, MAHIM (Assamese; b. 1926) is a renowned short story writer and poet in Assamese. He secured his M.A. in Assamese from Gauhati University in 1952 and has been since teaching Assamese literature in colleges. He began his literary career in the forties and established himself as one of the most eminent short story writers in the fifties. His first collection of short stories, Kathanibarighat (Kathanibari, the river port, 1961) presents some of the most outstanding short stories written in Assamese. National Book Trust of India has published its translations in all major Indian languages. He has a deep insight, an unquestionable love for mankind and an intimate sympathetic relations with the joys and sorrows of the lower and the lower middle class people of the rural Assam. An undertone of pathos runs through his stories in a humour-coated style. His second collection Bahubhuji Tribhuj (A Triangle of Multidimensions, 1967) depicts the triumph and failure of the characters facing irony of their fates, and his third collection Ekhan Nadir Mrityu (The Death of a River, 1972), and fourth Rati Phula Phul (The Flower that blooms at Night, 1977) depict the problems of society and individual in some given perspective. Mai, Pipali Aru Puja (1967) is a collection of humorous short stories. Moinar Padulit Bandhilo Ghora (The Horse is tied in the Uncle's Gateway, 1967) is a collection of personal essays written in lighter vein. Bora has established himself as a novelist also. Putala-Ghar (Doll's House, 1971), Herowa Digantar Maya (Charm of the Lost Horizon, 1973) are his two novels. Mahim Bora is also known as a modern Assamese poet of high standard. Ranga Jian (Red Dragon-fly, 1978), the only collection of his poems, shows that they are small in number but rich in substance. His Chintabichitra (Varied Thoughts, 1975) is a collection of literary essays and Batrish Putala is the Assamese version of the stories of king Vikramaditya and his throne, meant for children.

He is now the Head of the Department of Assamese in Nowgong College, Assam.

N. S.

BORA, SATYANATH (Assamese; b. 1860, d. 1925) had his schooling in the Bengali language medium. As he lost his father in childhood, Satyanath's uncle, Sonaram Bora took the responsibility of educating him.

After obtaining the B.L. degree Satyanath took up the decision of joining the Bar. When he started practising at the Gauhati Court, he was the only Assamese lawyer at that time. During a period of eleven years from 1913 to 1924 he not only practised in the Gauhati Court but served also as a lecturer of Assamese at the Cotton College and when in the year 1924 the Earle Law College was established at Gauhati, Satyanath joined this institution as one of the lecturers. He was an efficient lawyer and an honest man. He also led a very simple life, but in public life he was a helping hand to many. He was greatly honoured by all as a lawyer.

Satyanath was one of those litterateurs who enlivened the Assamese literature with his simple and chaste prose. He was also a contributor to the magazine, Asam Bandhu edited by Gunabhiram Barua. Bhasha, Shanti, Asha and Samajile (published in the journal) deserve special mention. Ghari, Phuloni, Purnimar Inn, Dhumuha Balak, Torakat, Eta Katha, Makar Sukh aru Dukh and Bancha, are his poems published in the Asam Bandhu during the year 1895.

A good number of his papers were published in the monthly magazine Jonaki that was first published from Calcutta. Satyanath himself took over the editorship of Jonaki, when it started being published from Gauhati in 1901. A series of essays entitled 'Stray Thoughts' were published in the Times of Assam. Through these essays he gave expression to the experience he had in the Bar. Some of his papers were published in the Usha edited by Padmanath Gohain-Barua.

Satyanath started from his college days to compose modern Assamese songs. He was disturbed to see the Assamese singers singing Bengali songs owing to the dearth of Assamese songs. With a view to meeting this want he published his Gitavali in 1882, a collection of his modern Assamese songs. Although these poems were mostly love songs, the racial characteristic of the Assamese people found place in them.

Satyanath's Sarathi (The Charioteer) was published in the year 1911. The book contains all the experiences he had had and the experiences of the people around. Sarathi is written in simple and chaste Assamese thereby making it an invaluable piece of Assamese literature.

Satyanath's next book Akash Rahasya (1915) discusses the origin of the solar system, the daily and annual movement of the planets and also the surface of the planets, the sun and its satellites, the moon, the stars and the milky way.

In the new Jonaki, edited by him, a series of his essays, under the title of Kendra Sabha were published, depicting the failures, the lapses and the defects of the society. These articles were compiled and published after his death in the form of a book entitled, Kendra Sabha.

Chintakali (1937) is the collection of his thought-provoking essays like Samsar Prabha, Manar Mahattwa, Jibanar Amiya and Jibanar Shanti Prava. A study of his work reveals that Satyanath strove very hard to cultivate essay in Assamese as a distinct art-form.

As an example of critical studies Sahitya Bichar is another well-known book of Satyanath. It deals with the characteristic features of literature, poems and prose, drama, champu, etc. The elevated prose style of Sahitya-Bichar has made it a valuable book.

His Bahal-Vyakaran, a book on Assamese grammar consisting of three hundred pages, is extremely popular among students and people in general.

Satyanath endeavoured most consciously to create a modern Assamese prose style, the predominating characteristic of which is its compactness and economy of words.

Ni.B.

BORADE RAOSABEB RANGANATH (Marathi; b. 1940) was born at Katgaon in Latur taluk of Usmanabad district. He is at present working as a Principal of the Vinayakrao Patil College at Vaijapur.

Borade is known as one of the important writers who wrote on rural themes after 1960. He has contributed to Marathi short story, novel and drama. After independence some Marathi writers who had experienced rural life started writing about their environment. Their literature reflected genuine consciousness about rural culture. Borade belongs to this generation of writers who have established firmly the new trend of writing on rural themes.

The novel Pachola established his reputation as fiction writer. Due to modernisation of traditonal rural trades new tensions were created in the lives of rural craftsmen. Pachola reflects these emotional tensions created by social transformation. Parbati, wife of Gangaram tailor, narrates this pathetic story. Simple, natural beauty of Usmanabadi dialect spoken by a rural woman lends charm to the novel. Borade has successfully written the whole novel in rural dialect.

He has also written plays like Kashyat Kay Ani Phatakyat Paya. But Borade is mainly famous as a rural short story writer. He started writing short stories from 1960. His stories are published in 14 collections including Perani, Malani, Walavan, Rakhan, Vanvala, Talmel, Natigoti and Kholamba. He portrays the rural life with a deep attachment to rural culture. Rural life is firmly tied with rural family, caste structure, village institutions and customs and land which supports them all. Borade depicts a rural person with all these factors shaping his collective and individual life.

In a way his stories are family-stories. Family, emotional ties created by mutual relationship within it, and tensions caused in this relationship by poverty are particularly depicted by Borade in his stories. He also portrays problems and sorrows of rural women. The stories which centre round women, many a time, become tales of their unfulfilled passions, but mostly the seriousness and pathos of such situation is missing in his stories. He also portrays the world of children in a skilful manner. He has given this new dimension to Marathi rural literature.

Nature forms the part of rural life, but in Borade's stories nature appears just as a dim background.

He has written many humorous stories. He acquired the skill of portraying the humour in village life without making it ridiculous. This humour is based on exaggeration and unexpeted turns of events.

His language is made up of skilful synthesis of rural and urban speech. Sometimes he writes his stories completely in rural dialect of Marathwada. He frequently uses maxims and proverbs deeply rooted in folk life. He also adopts the style of rural dialogue which enriches the atmosphere of his fiction.

R.B.M.

BORGOHAIN, HOMEN (Assamese; b. 1932), is a Sahitya Akademi Award winning novelist, a pioneer in anti-romantic modern poetry and short story, a first rate critic and prose writer, and a journalist of repute. Born in a middle class rural family and gifted with a sharpness of intellect he had a brilliant academic career which ended with his attainment of B.A. Honours degree in English from the Gauhati University (1954). A voracious reader and scholarly writer, he is always keen on keeping his self-identity above everything and has all along maintained an uncompromising attitude to practices of all kinds, social, political and economic. This is why he gave up an important Government job and took to an independent profession like journalism. Under his efficient editorship two Assamese weeklies Nilachal (1968) and Nagarik (1977), both published from Gauhati, attained wide popularity with the reading public of Assam.

Homen Borgohain first appeared in the pages of the Ramdhenu, the epoch-making Assamese journal of the fifties, as a promising young poet and short story writer. Being acquainted with the trends and the technique of modernism in European literatures through English, his powerful mind got deeply enthused by existentialism and Freudian psychoanalysis. Satanism and animalism in the thought and action of man got a place of prominence through symbolism in his poetry. He is not wedded to any socialist doctrine like Marxism; he is out and out a humanist with a progressive outlook.

A few of his poems like Smriti (Memory), Rati (The Night), Ophelia, Sap (The snake) and Mor Aita (My Grandmother) have become extremely popular.

A few of his short stories like Ismile Shekhar Sandhanat, Shishur Hanhi, Eta Natun Bhikhari, and Hati have attained a high-water mark in the history of modern Assamese short story. His famous collections of short stories are: Bivinna Korus (1955), Prem Aru Mrityur Karane (1958), Galpa Aru Naksa (1964), Bivinna Narak Swapna Smriti Aru Bishad (1967), and Hridayar Manchitra (1979). The last named book of pungent social satires in modern Assamese created furors in all social circles of Assam.

Towards the sixties the poet and the short story teller in Homen Borgohain developed into a novelist of the high order to win the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1978 for his epoch-making novel Pita-Putra (The Father and the son, 1975). This novel may be described as a pageantry of the rural life and society of Assam taking as its background the sweeping socio-political changes of the forties and the fifties. His Subala (1963), the first of its kind in Assamese, is the story of an innocent girl who has become a harlot in a whirlpool of circumstances beyond her control. Subala's optimistic efforts to redeem herself from the world of brothels and her ultimate disillusionment make the novel a masterpiece in the history of Assamese novels.

His Tantrik (1967) treats sex as a Yogic excercise for self-realisation through the worship of the woman's beauty and the experience of joy in sexual consummations. His Haladhia Charaye Baodhan Khai (1972) is the soul stirring tale of an innocent peasant, losing his all including the small piece of land to the capitalist who holds the reins of politics and justice in the society. His Kushilaba (1970) is also a socio-political novel having satirical studies in characters. One more novel that attained popularity is Timir Tirtha (1975).

Homen Borgohain's prose works are Bishwas Aru Samshay, (1968,Dhusar Diganta (1972), Jijnasa (1980), Ananda Aru Bedanar Sandhanat (1981) and Call Girl (1981).

Homen Borgohain's skill as a powerful critic and prose-writer is best revealed in his editing of two works of critical essays–Bimsha Shatabdir Asamiya Sahitya (1967), published by the Asam Sahitya Sabha, and Asamiya Galpa Samkalan in two parts (Part I-1975 and Part II-1976) published by the Publication Board, Assam. His prefaces to the Galpa Samkalan are fine specimens of literary criticism in Assamese.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Satyendranath Sarma, Asamiya Upanyakhar Gatidhara, Gauhati, 1976.

Pu.S.

BORGOHAIN, NIRUPAMA (Assamese; b. 1932) had her M.A. degree in English from Calcutta University and in Assamese from Gauhati University. A journalist by profession, she is a short story writer and a novelist. As a short story writer, she expresses the innate feelings of men and women in a simple but appealing language. Her collections of short stories are: Anek Akash (Many Skies, 1961); Jal Chhabi (Water Colour, 1962); and Shunyatar Kavya (Poetry of Nothingness, 1969). She has three volumes of long stories, too, viz., Ipar Sipar (This Bank and the Other, 1971), Tini Kanya (Three Maids, 1978) and Jananir Sandhanat Ejan Deka Manuh (A Young Man in Search of a Mother, 1981). As a novelist, she reflects the eternal sentiments and emotions of men and women. She makes these specially meaningful in aptly chosen situations. Her first novel, Sei Nadi Niravadhi (That River eternal,1963) is a regional novel placed along a lower Assam river. It portrays the lives and intimate friendship of a boy and a girl of a village on this river. Her next novel, Ejan Budha Manuh (An Old Man, 1966) shows the changes of values as generations change. Dinar Pichat Din (Day after Day, 1968) throws light on the heart of a woman that yearns for a man's love in marriage. Her other novels of the same nature are: Antasrota (The Stream Underground, 1969), Hriday Eta Nirjan Dvip (The Heart, a Lonely Island, 1970) Chhaya Aru Chhabi (The Shadow and the Picture, 1971), Samanya Asamanya (Ordinary and Extraordinary, 1971), Cactusar Phul (The Cactus Flower, 1976) and Nami Ahe Ei Sandhiya (The Dusk Falls, 1977). With Iparar Ghar Siparar Ghar (The House of this Side and of that, 1979), Borgohain seems to have changed her outlook on life. She depicts the socio-economic life in the main through her subsequent novels, Bhavishyatar Ranga Suryya (The Red Sun of the Future, 1980) and Din Prati Din (This Day and Every Day, 1982).

Of her novels, Iparar Ghar Siparar Ghar is the most serious and important. It depicts the present exodus of the poor people from the villages to the towns out of their frustration in village life caused by the present socio-economic system where only the middle class and the upper class can thrive.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Trailokyanath Goswami, Adhunik Galpa Sahitya, Lawyers Book Stall, Gauhati, 1965., Trailokyanath Goswami, Adhunik Asamiya Galpasamgraha, Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi 1971.,

Go.S.

BORKAR, BALKRISHNA BHAGAVANTA (Marathi; b. 1910, d. 1984) was an eminent Marathi and Konkani poet. Born in a family hailing from the village of Borim, he passed Teacher's diploma in Portuguese and Matriculation in English. He worked as a teacher in various schools in Goa from 1930 to 1945. Soon after the Goa Liberation movement started by Dr. Lohia, he left for Bombay where he edited the periodicals Amha Gomantak (Our Goa) in Marathi and Projeco Avaz (People's Voice) in Konkani devoted to Goan freedom struggle. He worked as Spoken Word Producer at Poona (1955-60) and Panjim (1961-70) stations of All India Radio. Borkar was the Chairman of the Reception Committee, Gomantak Marathi Sahitya Sammelan (1957). He presided over Marathi Kavi Sammelan (Solapur, 1958), was a member of the Indian Delegation of Men of Letters to Ceylon (1963), presided over the Konkani Conference (Bombay, 1967) and the second Session of Marathi Literary Conference (Mahabaleshvar, 1970). He was the President of Institute Menexes Braganza, Panjim (1964-70) and was honoured with the title Padmashri (1967).

Borkar started writing poetry at an early age. Pratibha (Talent, 1930) is his first collection of poems. His second collection of poems Jivan Sangit (1937) contains some of his best known and most popular poems, especially, Tethe kar majhe julati (Before I fold my hands). His other collections are Dudhsagar (1947), Anand Bhairavi (1950, Maharashtra State Award), Chaitra Punav (1970). As a poet, he scrupulously follows the traditional pattern of rhyme and rhythm and remains the most classic of modern poets. The metrical forms he uses are extremely varied ranging from the ancient Shardulavikridit to the modern Padakulak and passes through the popular Pavada and Lavani. Though his poetry has undergone considerable change during its course, it has resolutely refused to follow short-lived fashions. Borkar's poetry can be sung; this intense musical quality is its hall-mark. Proudly proclaiming himself as a disciple of poet Tambe he has lifted Marathi poetry to sublime heights of lyricism. Borkar is an optimist. Though fully aware of the selfishness and cruelty that stalk the world, he has unshakable faith in the essential goodness of human nature. His poetry abounds in colourful pictures of nature especially those of Goa. He is intimitable as a master craftsman of words which in his hands become a source of aesthetic delight. In him can also be found a happy blend of the spiritual and the sensuous. Some of his poems are highly philosophical and even mystic. The favourite themes of his poetry are: love as an all pervading novel passion, the happiness of a peaceful domestic life, nature as an eternal source of beauty and inspiration, divine grace and the secret ways of destiny. Borkar has left a deep impress on Marathi and Konkani poetry.

Borkar wrote a few novels including Mavalata Chandra (1938), Andharatil Vat (1943) and Bhavin (1950). His novel Bhavin became quite popular due to its novel theme, lyrical language and racy narration. It depicts the pathos of the life of a devadasi. He wrote a biography of Rabindranath Tagore (1963) which received Maharashtra State Award. Borkar wrote in Konkani also. He contributed significantly to the development of Konkani language.

FURTHER WORKS: Marathi: Short Stories: Priyadarshani (1960). Biography: Anandayatri Rabindranath (Rabindranath, the Traveller of Joy, 1963) Translations: Jalte Rahasya (The Fiery Secret, 1945), Kanchechi Kimaya (The Magic of Glass, 1951), Amhi Pahilele Gandhiji (Gandhiji we have seen, 1950) Majhi Jivan Yatra (My Life's Journey, 1960). Konkani: Poetry: Gitai (Translation of Bhagvadgita, 1960), Pamyinam (Anklets, 1961). Essays: Presidential Speech (Ninth Konkani Conference, 1967), Konkanich Vatchal, Tiji Jodnuk ani Ghadnuk (Konkani Vocabulary, Its Composition and Formation, 1973). Translations: Gita Pravachanam (Discourses on Gita by Acharya Vinoba Bhave, 1956), Bharatacho Distavo (India of My Dreams by Mahatma Gandhi, 1957), Paigambar (The Prophet by Kahlil Gibran, 1973), Vasavadatta (Shri Aurobindo, 1973) Sansay Kallol (Deval's Marathi play of the same name, 1975).

M.S.

BORO SAHEB ONGBI SANATOMBI (Manipuri) is the first and the only historical novel of M.K. Binodini Devi. It was published in 1976 at Imphal and won the Sahitya Akademi award in 1979.

The novel (Sanatombi betrothed to Boro Saheb) is based on the story of love relationship between Sanatombi, a daughter of Maharaja Surchandra Singh of Manipur (1886-1890) and Major Maxwell, Political Agent of Manipur after the British annexation following the battle of Khongjom in 1891. Sanatombi was married to a Meitei legally, but the marriage proved a failure and even while she was at the house of her legally married husband, she ran away with Maxwell to become his mistress. The novel recounts the different episodes, ups and downs and vicissitudes of Sanatombi's life who ultimately had a miserable and tragic end being a social outcaste and having been left behind by Maxwell who went away to England.

The novel is one that belongs to historical category. In the pages a good picture of the political, social and palace intrigues of Manipur in the troubled years are depicted. However, the main concern of the novelist is to build up the distinctive personality of the protagonist, historical and imaginative. She takes enough liberty to shuffle and reshuffle the historical anecdotes to suit her purpose. Sanatombi, in the eyes of the Manipuris judging from her activities and angularities, is considered over-smart, an outcaste and they could never approve of her being a mistress of Maxwell. But in the novel Binodini Devi tries to depict her as one who has been 'more sinned against than sinning'. Sanatombi ultimately emerges a tragic and lovable character and the last portions of the novel where the novelist depicts the last days of Sanatombi are full of pathos.

I.R.B.S.

BOSE, AMRITLAL (Bengali; b. 1853, d. 1929) was a noted Bengali playwright and an actor of the Bengali stage. He passed the Entrance examination from General Assemblies, Calcutta in 1869. After doing his Entrance examination he got admitted into the Calcutta Medical College, which he left after two years, for learning Homeopathy in Benaras. He then started practising homeopath at Bankipur, Bihar. During these days he used to come to Calcutta frequently and to serve as a teacher in his father's school at Shyambazar. He became more interested in theatre; by this time the Calcutta National Theatre was founded and Dinabandhu's Nildarpan was staged on 8th December, 1872, in which Amritlal did act a female role. He became famous almost overnight. Soon he became associated with almost all the leading theatres of Calcutta. His calibre was adjudged by the authority of the Bengali theatre, Girischandra Ghosh as one of the best. Amritlal began writing plays. His literary career, however, started with a poem written to pay tribute to Radhakanta Deb in 1867. He was greatly influenced by Pyarichand Basu, a distantly related uncle, to write plays, poems and dramas fraught with humour and satire. Bose had successfully shown his aptitude for satire and humour in his writings. His first theatrical writing was Ekai ki bale toder bangla sahitya which was never published. His first farcical play, Model School was staged in the National Theatre on 15th January, 1873 and the first full length play, Hirakchurna was published in 1875. It was staged and Amritlal himself acted in it. At this juncture Bengali theatre movement started and Amritlal began to stage some anti-British plays like Gajandananda O Juvaraj, Karnat-kumar-natak or Hanuman-charita. The government proscribed them. But the movement did not stop. The Police of Pig and Sheep and Surendra Binodini were staged. Amritlal was the manager of the theatre. He along with the hard core of the movement, Upendranath Das, Matilal Basu, and Bel Babu were immediately arrested. It is interesting to note that Amritlal, after this incident took a job in the Police Service and went to Port Blair in April 1877, but came back to join theatre permanently in Calcutta, after a year. He felt the need of writing good stageable plays in Bengali and started writing Chorer upar Batpadi (1876), Til tarpan, (1881), Brajalila (1882), Dismis (1883); Chatujye O Badujya (1984), Vibaha Vibhrat (1884), etc. Amritlal became famous for his theatrical writings and for his direct involvement in the movement of the Bengali theatre, yet his other writings also deserve recognition. He wrote novels like Chanchalas (1887) and books of poems Gangatate (1888), Astabale Amritlal (1924) etc. He was elected the Jt. President, Bangiya Sahitya Parishad, Calcutta in 1923, and was awarded 'Jagattarini' gold medal in 1925 by the University of Calcutta. He was the President, All India Bengali Literary Conference in 1926. People used to appreciate his sense of humour and gave him the title 'Rasaraj'. He wrote about fifty books and many more essays, plays, stories, criticism and poems which were not published in book form.

FURTHER WORK: Play: Tarubala (1891), Bimata athaba Bijaybasanta (1893), Babu (1894), Harishchandra (1899), Adarshabandhu (1900), Sabas Bangali (1914) Nabajiban (1914), Yajnaseni (1928). Dramatisation: Taraknath Gangopadhyaya's novel Swarnalata's dramatistion Sarala (1915), Bankimchandra Chatterji's novel–Vishbriksha (1925), Chandrasekhar (1925), Rajsimha (1926). Poetry: Amrita Madira (1903). Short Stories and Novel: Nimchand (Story, 1889), Abalabal (Novel, 1897).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Arunkumar Mitra, Amritlal Basur Jibani O Sahitya(1970); Brajendranath Banerji, Sahitya Sadhak Charitmala, Vol. 6, 1947.

Na.S.

BOSE, BUDDHADEV: (Bengali; b. 1908, d. 1974) was an eminent Bengali poet, short story writer, essayist, critic and dramatist. After completing school and college education at Dacca, he took his M.A. in English from Dacca University. He joined Ripon College at Calcutta as Lecturer in English in 1934. Founding Kavita-Bhawan in 1939, he inspired young poets of the thirties by publishing their poems in his Bengali poetry quarterly Kavita which was being published by him since 1935. He went on a lecture tour to America in 1953-54. After coming back he joined Jadavpur University as Head of the Department of Comparative Literature. Again he went on a lecture tour to America and Europe in 1961 and delivered lectures at New York, Sorbonne, Kyoto and Tokyo. After retirement from Jadavpur University he went to the U.S.A. for the third time to lecture there in variuous universities.

Before his appearance as an author Buddhadev had come out as co-editor of Pragati, an organ of the progressive young writers. Bose was equally facile in prose and verse from the very beginning. His first book of verse Marmavani (1925) is a forgotten work now. The next collection Bandir Bandana (1930) contained poems of passionate love. Versed in Tagore, he tried to break away from the traditional verse form like many of his contemporaries, but could not escape Tagore, particularly from his novel Seser Kavita, a blend of romance and wit. Adolescent effusiveness soon departed and Bose's pen matured rather quickly.

His other books of verse include Prithivir Pathe (1933), Kankabati (1937), Damayanti (1943), Draupadir Sarhi (1948), Siter Prarthana Basanter Uttar (1955), Je Andhar Alor Adhik (1958), Marchepada Pereker Gan (1966), Swagata Biday (1971) and Ekdin Chiradin (1971). His emphasis on passion and youth and on the struggle between art and life where art always prevailed, his queries about the inner workings of existence, his consciousness of the flow of life, his conversational style enriched with colloquial language and his easy to and fro between imagism and symbolism cannot but enthral his intimate reader. His Bengali renderings of Baudelaire (Baudelaire–Tanr Kavita 1967, Rilke (Rainer Maria Rilker Kavita 1970), Hoelderline (Hoelderliner Kavita, and Kalidasa (Kalidaser Meghduta) enriched Bengali poetry enormously. His translation from Hans Christian Andersen and his own poems for children, particularly Baramaser Chhada (1956) also contributed largely to the Bengali children's literature.

As a story writer Buddhadev was equally competent; of course, poetry played a dominant part in his fiction, but that was because he wanted his novels to be a 'revelation and refraction' of life at the same time. He searched for a subjective totality after the manner of D.H. Lawrence and Dostoevsky, Tolstoy and Thomas Mann, James Joyce and Tagore to acquire the vision of an artist-protagonist, and naturally, the theme that runs through all his novels is nothing but the self-conscious artist who takes a dip into the river of time and feels the undercurrents and cross currents of it. His first mentionable novel Sarha (1930) deals with adolescent lonelines which ends with a robust feeling for the flow of life. The novels like Rhododendranguchha (1932), Jedin Phutlo Kamal (1932) and Dhusar Godhuli (1932) show the novelist's vacillation between the spells of art and life. The novels like Lalmegh (1934) and Basarghar (1935) show no shift of emphasis. From Kalo Haoa (1942) a sort of departure is evident, the follies of religion and marriage as institutions being put to the test. In Tithidor (1949), his best and most powerful novel, we get some intimate miniatures of middle-class family life, its domestic delight and controlled dramatic moments. Novels like Nirjan Swakshar (1951), Moulinath (1952), Nilanjaner Khata (1966), Patal Theke Alap (1966), Rat Bhore Bristi (1967, sued for vulgarity), Golap Keno Kalo (1968), etc. intensify a social aspect of art and the alienation of the artist 'who delights in being a misfit in society for a definite cause'. The same characteristics are discernible in his short stories. Some mentionable collection of them being Abhinay Abhinay nay o Anyanya Galpa (1930), Premer Bichitra Gati (1934), Gharete Bhramar elo Gunguniye (1935), Char Drisya (1955) Hridayer Jagaran (1961) and Prem Patra (1972). Besides these, he had some good collections of children's stories to his credit.

Buddhadev the dramatist was not so impressive in his early years. But gradually he started drawing his dramatic qualities from his own poetic thought and poetic dramas written by Tagore, Browning, Yeats and Eliot. Babu o Bibi (1960), Tapasvi O Tarangini (1966), Kalkatar Electra O Satyasandha (1960), Sankranti (1970), Pratham Partha Anamni Angana (1970), and the two adaptations Prayaschitta (based on Yeat's Purgatory) and Ikkaku Senin (Based on a Noh-play) are his important plays showing a deft blending of weakness of the flesh and strength of the spirit, of speech and rhythm, of drama and poetry.

Buddhadev's prose-writings, and particularly his critical writings are no less significant than this poetry. Drawing no articificial line between the prose of feeling and prose of thought, and dissociating himself from sadhubhasa since 1930, Buddhadev let his prose compete with his poetry and win. Starting from Hathat Alor Jhalkani (1935) through his critical sketches in Uttartiris (1945) and Kaler Putul (1946) to the travelogues Japani Journal (1961) and Desantor ((1966) Buddhadev tended to show his ability which is very rare in modern Bengali literature. As he was a master artist of personal essays, his belletristic criticism has a flavour of its own. His survey of modern Bengali Literature An Acre of Green Grass (1946), though dotted with private feelings, left its impress on the later critics. His critiques on Tagore in Rabindranath: Kathasahitya (1955), Sanga Nihsangata O Rabindranath (1963), Tagore: Portrait of a Poet (1962) (lectures delivered in the University of Bombay), Kavi Rabindranath (1965, Saratchandra Lecture of C.U.) and some essays of Sahitya Charcha reveal the essentials of Tagore the poet, creating a new norm of literary criticism. The essays collected in Swades O Sanskriti show some sparkling observations on Indian culture and politics, unexpected from a poet living for the sake of art. Buddhadev's prose gave a new prose style to Bengali literature and his Mahabharat Katha displays the rare contribution of deep critical insight and excellence of style. In fact, in his hands Bengali became an effective medium of literary criticism, even of the most complex kind. As founder-editor of the Bengali poetry quarterly Kavita (1935), Buddhadev trained himself as much as others and it was due to his persistence that poets like Jibanananda Das, Samar Sen, Subhas Mukhopadhyay and Naresh Guha came into the lime light.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Achintyakumar Sengupta, Kallolyug, Calcutta 1950; Alokeranjan Dasgupta, Buddhadev Bose, Sahitya Akademi, 1977.

U.M.

BOSE, CHANDRANATH (Bengali; b. 1844., d. 1910) became very famous for his non-fictional prose writings and particularly for his literary criticism in Bengali. He graduated in 1865 and took his M.A. degree in History later and passed the Law Examination in 1867 from Calcutta University. He tried in vain to be a lawyer and instead became a Deputy Magistrate, which took him to Dacca, but Chandranath soon came back as he did not find the job suitable for him. He then was offered the post of the Principal, Jaipur College, Rajasthan; but unfortunately he was not keeping good health there. Ultimately he was selected as the translator for the Govt. of Bengal in 1887 and he retired from the post in 1904. Chandranath, however, came in contact with many competent teachers from Europe in his school life who inspired him to cultivate English literature and to write in English. Chandranath was so successful in this direction that he, at first, could not write in Bengali at all; in fact, he began to write in Bengali only after his English critique on the novel, Krishnakanter Will by Bankimchandra Chatterjee, was published in Calcutta Review in 1879 (no. 137, pp. XIX-XXIV). Bankim himself inspired Chandranath to write in Bengali. Chandranath responded very successfully. His critical estimate of Abhijnan Shakuntalam was published in the prestigious Bangadarshan in 1880. Since then Chandranath never wrote anything in English except his official works. His essays and articles on the Hindu religion, morality, philosophy, and literary criticism were all full of new thinking and became extremely valuable to the men of taste and learning.

Shakuntalatattwa (criticism; 1881), Pashupati–sambad (historical novel: 1884), Ful O Fal (philosophical: 1885), Garhasthya Path, (Domestic Life: 1886), Garhasthya Swasthabidhi, (Domestic Health: 1887) Hindu Bibaha (Hindu Marriage: 1887), Tridhara (Triple Stream in Hindu Society: 1891), Hindutattwa (History of the Hindu: 1892), Kah Pantha (1898), Bartaman Banga Sahityer Prakriti (Nature of current Bengali Literature: 1899), Sabitritattwa (1900), Samjamsiksha ba Nimnatama Sopan (1904), Prithibir Sukh Duhhkha (autobiographical: 1909).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Brajendranath Bandyopadhyay, Chandranath Basu: Sahitya Sadhak Charit Mala, No. 83, Vol 8 (1958).

Na.S.

BOSE, JOGENDRACHANDRA (Bengali; b. 1854, d. 1905) was an editor and a novelist. As a champion of orthodox Hinduism Jogendrachandra led a bitter journalistic campaign against the progressive views of Brahmo Samaj through the medium of his Bengali weekly, Bangabasi, which was largely circulated in the villages of Bengal and specialised in vituperation and derision. His Model Bhagini (Ideal Sister, 1886-88) was a very widely read sarcastic novel. His other sarcastic writings include Kalachand (a novel-1889-90), Chinibas Charitamrita (The holy character of Chinibas, a novel, 1890), Nerha Haridas (Bald Haridas, a narrative, 1904), Bangali Charitra (The Bengali character, stories and sketches, 1885), and Mahiravanar Atmakatha (Autobiography of Mahiravana, a humorous fictitious autobiography, 1888). His satiric pen-portraits and novels are largely inspired by the express intention of deriding anglicised ideals. Intolerant and aggressive in the criticism of everything Western, his particular targets of attack are educated young men like Chinibas, hero of Chinibas Charitamrita and enlightened women like Kamalini, heroine of Model Bhagini. Laughter, however, does not flow out of the interaction of incidents and situations (his plots are too simple and straightforward for novels), but is a product of the observed incongruities of characters. One remembers him for his very long romantic novel Shri Shri Rajlakshmi (1896-1902), which intelligently integrates various subplots into an attractive narrative, possibly woven round a real incident. We are grateful to the author for the isolated but convincing pictures of Bengali life, in and out of Bengal, a century ago. A talented writer, Jogendrachandra had little sense of proportion and delighted in loud exaggeration. Jogendrachandra's claim to posterity also depends on the establishment of Bangabasi Press, which published cheap editions of the Ramayana, the Mahabharata and other religious and philosophical works. Works on India written in English were also published by him. He also edited and published Hindi Bangabasi, Dainik (a Bengali Daily) and an evening paper in English, Telegraph.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Ajitkumar Ghosh, Banga Sahitye Hasyaraser Dhara (Calcutta, 1960); Brajendranath Bandyopadhyaya, Jogendrachandra Basu (Calcutta, 1948); Srikumar Bandyopadhyaya, Banga Sahitye Upanyaser Dhara (Calcutta).

A.D.C.

BOSE, JOGINDRANATH (Bengali; b. 1857, d. 1927) was an educationist, poet and biographer. After graduating from the Calcutta University, Jogindranath joined as Headmaster of the High School at Deoghar in the Santhal

Parganas district in Bihar. Here he came in contact with Rajnarain Bose (1826-1899), an eminent literary savant and leader of the Brahmo Samaj. Under his inspiration Jogindranath devoted himself to the service of Bengali literature and soon distinguished himself as a leading litterateur of his times. He was the first and foremost biographer of the illustrious Bengali poet Michael Madhusudan Dutta (1824-1873) and his biography of the poet is still considered good. At a period when Mahakavya (epic) writing was passing out of vogue, Jogindranath dared to produce two such works based on the life of two historical persons and national heroes, viz. Prithviraj (12th Cent.) and Shivaji (17th Cent). In writing these epics he proved himself to be a worthy successor of his hero–Michael Madhusudan Dutta. Jogindranath also wrote a large number of poems and biographies.

He also edited and published a number of standard text books. For some time he edited a weekly Bengali Journal named Surabhi (1882-83).

FURTHER WORKS: Amarkirti (Father Daimen's Biography, Calcutta, 1890, Michael Madhusudan Datter Jivancharita, Calcutta, 1893, Abalyabai (Biography, 1900), Tukaram Charita, Calcutta, 1901, Patibrata (stories from mythology in prose), Calcutta, 1911; Chabi O Kabita, 2 pts., Calcutta, 1914; Devabala (Historical drama), Calcutta, 1915; Shivaji (Epic), Calcutta, 1918; Manav Gita (A poem in 12 sections on Hindu religion), Calcutta, 1925.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Sukumar Sen; Bangala Sahityer Itihasa–Vol. II, 5th edn., Calcutta, 1963.

G.S.

BOSE, MALADHAR (Bengali, 15th century) is one of the pre-Chaitanya poets of Bengali literature. He wrote a poem entitled Shri Krishna-Vijaya, in which the story of Krishna has been narrated. The work is partly based on the Bhagavata-Purana, partly on popular legends.

Maladhar came from a Kayastha family of the village of Kulingram (Now in the district of Burdwan, West Bengal). The names of his parents were Bhagiratha and Indumati. He obtained the title Gunarajakhan from the king of Bengal, who has been identified with Rukh-ud-din Barbak Shah (1455-76). His Shri Krishna-Vijaya is written in a simple but lucid style. In this work, we also find evidence of his sincere devotion towards Lord Krishna. For this reason, this work drew eloquent tributes from Chaitanya.

In a couplet found in the manuscripts, we get 1395 Shaka (1473-74) and 1402 Shaka (1480-81) respectively as the dates of the beginning and completion of this work.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Nandlal Vidyasagar (ed.), Shrikrishna Vijaya, (Calcutta, 1945)., Sukhamay Mukhopadhyay, Bangla Sahityer Prachina Kavider Parichay O Samay (Calcutta, 1973).

Su.M.

BOSE, MANINDRALAL (Bengali: b. 1897) was a highly educated and widely travelled Bengali fiction-writer. He was one of the leading predecessors of the 'Kallol' group in the twenties. Instead of following in the footsteps of Saratchandra, he appeared as a colourful personality with luxuriously romantic longings of youth. His stories and novels, most of which were published in the monthly journal, Prabasi, presented the wish-fulfilling indolent dreams of the young generation in the post-war age of frustration and decadence. His world of fiction is a sort of sophisticated fairyland, where the exquisitely beautiful heroines are highly accomplished with an aroma of languor and luxury around their personality. It is quite obvious that the central theme of the author's novels and stories has a lyrical flavour of romantic love. All his major novels and collections of stories, including Ramala (1923) Jibanayan (Portrayal of Life, 1936), Sahayatrini (Fellow—traveller, 1941), Mayapuri (Place of Illusion) and Rakta Kamal (Red lotus) are basically loveoriented. There is often a touch of platonic idealism in these romantic love-episodes. Moreover, with the introduction of an element of death of the young lovers, the author has sought to portray, in those episodes, the morbid loneliness of his contemporary generation.

Gop.R.

BOSE, MANKUMARI (Bengali; b. 1863, d. 1943), niece of the poet Michael Madhusudan Dutta and one of the foremost female poets of her time, was married to Bidhusankar Bose in 1873. She became a widow at the age of 19. Since then she wrote poetry for sixty years in different periodicals. Most of her poems express deep sorrow either over human mortality or loss of the beloved. Besides writing poetry, Mankumari used to write articles on female education, particularly on the problem of teaching Indian girls who were hitherto keeping themselves constantly to the Zenana, on the problem of providing medical facilities for the female population in the rural area of Bengal, and on eradicating social evils and immoralities. She was a regular contributor to the Bamabodhini, founded by Keshabchandra Sen, a magazine exclusively for women. In 1919 she was awarded a fellowship by the Government of India which she enjoyed till her death. Her books of verses include Priyaprasanga, Subhasadhana, Kavyakusumanjali, Kanakanjali, Puratanchhabi, Bengali Ramanider Grihadharma, Bibahita Striloker Kartabya, Birkumarbadh Kavya (written after the manner of Meghnadbadh Kavya by Michael Madhusudhan Dutta) etc. Mankumari's short stories Rajlakshmi, Adrishta Chakra, and Sobha were awarded Kuntalin Puraskar. Mankumari became the president of the poetry section of Bengali Literary Conference held in Chandannagar in 1937. She was awarded 'Bhubanomohini' gold medal (1939) and 'Jagattarini' gold medal (1941) by the Calcutta University for her contribution to Bengali literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Brajendranath Bandyopadhyay, Bangla sahitye Mahila (Calcutta); Jogendranath Gupta, Banger Mahila Kavi (Calcutta, 2nd edn. 1954).

U.M.

BOSE, MANMOHAN (Bengali; b. 1831, d. 1912), a poet and playwright, was born to a traditionally aristocratic family. He had early education at his village and then at Calcutta. Coming in contact with Iswar Gupta the leading poet of the day, he published his early writing in his Samvadprabhakar. Soon he himself brought out a bi-weekly Samvad-Vibhakar (1852) which of course did not survive a full year. Comparatively more known is his Madhyastha, published a few months before Bankimchandra's Bangadarshan (1872). It started as a weekly but later developed into a monthly.

Like his guru, Iswar Gupta, Manmohan kept up his interest for kavigan, an indigenous musical composition which was fast dying out. His songs were collected in Manmohan Gitavali. (1887). The preface to this volume is important in as much as he put on record an authentic history and technique of this type of song. His plays were more akin to the traditional Yatra than to modern drama. He introduced mythological themes with devotional songs, thus inaugurating an era of Puranic drama. His plays are Ramabhisheka (1867), Sati (1873), Harishchandra (1875), Partha-Parajaya (1881), Rasalila (1887) and Anandamay (1890). His other books are Hindu Achara Vyavahara (1873), Vaktritamala (1873), Nagasramer Abhinaya (1875), Dulin (novel, 1891) and Satyanarayan Katha (1921).

Incidentally, Manmohan was connected with the Hindu Mela (1867), India's first national association where his intensely patriotic songs were sung.

B.D.

BOSE, MANOJ (Bengali; b. 1901) was a distinguished Bengali novelist and short story writer. His early years were spent in the natural backdrop of his native village, the living memory of which had a strong impact on his literary personality. Later, under compelling circumstances, he came to Calcutta, wherefrom he graduated. Meanwhile, he had joined the non-cooperation movement of Mahatma Gandhi. He made his first appearance in the realms of Bengali literature as a poet. But ultimately he gave up writing poetry and emerged gradually as a prolific prose-writer with more than sixty titles to his credit. Several books of the author have been translated into different languages. His first collection of short stories, Banomarmar (Rustling woods, 1932) was well-received by critics. This collection, along with two subsequent collections, Narabandh (Dam made of human bodies, 1933) and Debi Kishori (Teen aged goddess, 1934) reflect some of the major tendencies of the author, namely, love of nature, romantic leanings, nostalgia for the past and awareness of the supernatural.

The author's love for rural surroundings and people living in such surroundings have found a more vivid and powerful expression in his later stories and two major novels, Jal Jangal (Rivers and Jungles, 1952) and Ban Kete Basat (Habitation in place of Forests, 1961). These two books present a lively saga of men and nature, in which human characters with their primitivism and strong vital instincts are well depicted against a large panorama of the Sunderbans.

The author made his debut as a novelist with a remarkable political novel Bhuli Nai (We have not forgotten, 1943), based on the personal lives and political activities of the terrorists. A few more titles may be included in the list of political novels: Sainik (Soldiers, 1945), August 1942 (1947), and Bansher Kella (Castle of Bamboos, 1948). The background of all those novels was the national movement during the pre-independence period. The author has also excelled in the delineation of love. An exclusive list in this regard includes a lot of stories and several novels. Among the novels are Ogo Badhu Sundari (Oh, the Beautiful Bride, 1946), Ek Bihangi (One she-Bird, 1954) Brishti Brishti (Rains, Rains, 1957), etc. One of his outstanding contributions is the novel, Nishi Kutumba (I come as a thief, 1963) in two volumes which was given the Sahitya Akademi award in 1966. The novel is of an entirely different type, the story of which centres around the mysterious, though extremely real, world of the thieves, hitherto quite unknown to us. The excellence of the novel rests chiefly on a harmonious blending of the stark realism and the soft, subtle humanism in the author's attitude towards the subject matter.

The versatile author has sought to express himself in some other mediums of literature also, e.g., plays, travelogues, memoirs, etc. The plays are chiefly the dramatic presentations of the deep patriotic feelings of the author. His first play, Plaban (Flood, 1941) was followed by some others, including Nutan Prabhat (New Dawn, 1944) Rakhi Bandhan (Tying a Rakhi, 1949) and Viparyaya (Disaster).

The author has travelled all over the world. The experiences of those travels, tinged with the aesthetic touches of an artist, have been narrated in several travelogues, Chin Dekhe Elam (I went to China, 1953) which was awarded Narsingh Das Prize, 1954, Sovieter Deshe Deshe (In different parts of the Soviet Union, 1957), Natun Europe, Natun Manush (New Europe and New People, 1959), etc.

An awareness of the reality of the surrounding world combined with a sense of mellow romanticism constitutes the main attitude of the author towards life and literature. And this attitude expressed through a lucid style has earned him a unique place in Bengali Literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Bhudeb Chaudhuri, Bangla Sahityer Chota Galpa o Galpakar (Calcutta, 1975); Dipak Chandra, Manoj Bose: Jiban o Sahitya (Calcutta, 1972); Srikumar Banerjee, Banga Sahitye Upanyaser Dhara (Calcutta, 1962).

Gop. R.

BOSE, NAGENDRANATH (Bengali; b. 1886, d. 1938) was a noted orientalist, archaeologist, lexicographer and scholar. He was born in a family of Calcutta, and had his education upto class VIII, as a student of the Normal School, Oriental Seminary, and Metropolitan Institution, Calcutta. His student career abruptly ended owing to his family debacle, which followed him all through his life. At the age of fifteen be had started writing poems. But he appeared as a dramatist later with Karnasimha, and Karnavira (an adaptation of Macbeth in Bengali); he had also written a novel, namely Akshichand. Besides, he translated Hamlet into Bengali. Shankaracharya, Hariraj, Lausen, and Parshvanath are other dramas he had written. During the third stage of his literary career, he emerged as a scholar extraordinary. This aptitude perhaps attracted him towards antique learning, which resulted in the compilation of Shabdanu Mahakosha, appendix to Shabdakalpadruma. It was in 1887, when the first volume of Vishvakosha (Encyclopaedia in Bengali), edited jointly by Rangalal Mukherjee and Troilakyanath Mukherjee, was published, Nagendranath associated himself with this great task and from the second volume, all the remaining volumes were edited by him. Vishvakosha consists of 22 volumes. It took long 20 years (1891-1911) to complete. Nagendranath published a good number of research articles in the Asiatic Society Journal (Bengal) and Sahitya Parishad Patrika. He also became editor of the latter journal. In recognition of his profound scholarship, the Government nominated him a member of the Central Text Book Committee, a rare honour in those days. He also collected a good number of Sanskrit, Bengali, and Oriya manuscripts. He edited many works.

And, above all he will be ever remembered for Vishvakosha (Vishvakosha Lane of North Calcutta Commemorates this great work), edited by him.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Bengali; Vanger Jatiya Itihas (first published in 1898). English: Archaeological Survey of Mayurbanja 1911. The Social History of Kamrupa, in 3 vols., 1922-23. Hindi: Bharatiya Lipitattva, 1914. Sanskrit Books edited by him: Brahamanda-Puranam (1-23 Vols), 1891-1902; Sangeet Ragakalpadrum of Krishnanada Vyasdev, 1915: Encyclopaedia: Bengali Edition (1891-1911) 2nd Edition (incomplete) 1935-38. Hindi Edition (in 25 Vols. 1913-1831).

Pr.K.

BOSE, NIRMALKUMAR (Bengali; b. 1901, d. 1972) was a social anthropologist, Professor, traveller, writer and a staunch Gandhite. Nirmalkumar Bose taught Human Geography in the Calcutta University, edited the ethnological journal, Man in India for quite a long time, was the Secretary of Bangiya Sahitya Parishad for a term and held a number of other responsible official and non-official positions. Among these positions special mention may be made of his position as the Secretary to Mahatma Gandhi during the latter's Noakhali tours in the riot–affected days of 1946-47, his stint with the Government of India twice, first as the Director of the Anthropological Survey of India with its headquarters in Indian Museum, Calcutta for a period and then as the Commissioner, Scheduled Castes and Tribes of India. He travelled extensively throughout the country, with a view to studying her temple architecture and other allied subjects of interest and wrote his well known books Paribrajaker Diary (The Diary of a Traveller, 1945) and Konaraker Bibaran (Account of Konarak, 1960) on these subjects.

But apart from all these activities, he was chiefly known as the interpreter and propagator of Gandhiji's teachings and wrote a number of much-publicised and appreciated books in English and Bengali like Selections from Gandhi (1st edition, 1948, Ahmedabad), My Days with Gandhi (1953, Calcutta), Swaraj O Gandhibad (Swaraj and Gandhism), Gandhiji ki Chan (What does Gandhiji want, 1958), Gandhijir Rachna Sankalan (Selections from Gandhiji's writings, 1966), Gandhi Manas (The mind of Gandhi, 1967), and Gandhi Charit (Biography of Gandhi, Revised Centenary edition, 1969). Among his other books are: Hindu Samajer Garhan (The social structure of the Hindus 1949), Nabin O Prachin (The New and the Old, 1949), Ganatantrer Sankat (Crisis of Democracy, 1974), etc.

N.C.

BOSE, RAJNARAYAN (Bengali; b. 1826, d. 1899) was universally respected as a national leader. Leaving the Hindu College in 1845 he worked as English translator of the Upanishads and as a teacher of English in Sanskrit College, Calcutta. In 1846 he became a Brahmo and since then he had been a leader of the Brahmo movement. He retired as the Headmaster of Midnapore Jila School in 1851. Besides being a man of many-sided activities he has been a prolific writer on literary, religious and philosophical topics. His important books are Dharmatattwa Dipika (1866), Hindu Dharmer Shresthata (1873), Sekal ar Ekal (1875), Hindu Athaba Presidency Colleger Itibritta (1876), Bibidha Prabandha (1882), Briddha Hindur Asha (1887) and Atma Charit (1904).

So.B.

BOSE, RAJSHEKHAR (Bengali; b. 1880, d. 1967), more popularly known as 'Parashuram', was an eminent Bengali scholar and humorist. Educated at Patna and Calcutta he stood first in M.A. in Chemistry from Calcutta University and joined Bengal Chemical Ltd., Calcutta (1904). Though a scientist by profession, his wide interests included lexicography, Sanskrit classics, linguistics, and music. He compiled a very useful dictionary of the modern Bengali language Chalantika (Current words 1939), and made Bengali translation of Kalidas's Meghduta (1943), Valmiki-Ramayana (abridged, 1946) and the Mahabharata (abridged, 1949).

His first humorous story was published in the Bharatbarsha, a wellknown Bengali monthly, in 1922. It was a story entitled Shrishri Sidheshwari Limited which exposed with an inimitable sense of humour, the hypocrisy and dishonesty of the fake companies of the 20's. It attracted immediate apreciation. Henceforth, he regularly wrote under the pseudonym 'Parashuram', an iconoclastic personality of the Mahabharata, but there was little bitterness in his writings. His style is remarkable for its directness, wit and brilliant thumbnail sketches of persons and situations. He uses the rhythm and diction of colloquial speech with an eye to its innate wit, although at times sanskritised chaste expression is employed with telling effect. His portrayal of urban educated Bengali youth of the 20's and 30's (Kachi Samsad, the youthful club) and the peculiarities of social ambience is unique for its sense of humour, acute observation and gift of sympathy for human foibles. With a few words and picturesque phrases, Rajshekhar's magic style could make a character alive and the atmoshpere convincing. His satiric stories of vote-catching politicians (Dakshin Rai), and fake religious Gurus (Birinchibaba) inspire more laughter than derision. He also took out some stories and incidents from the Ramayana and the Mahabharata and treated them in a serio-comic chaste style (Hanumaner Swapna, Tritiya Dutasava, Panchapriya Panchali, etc.) which is still unrivalled in Bengali literature. His books of short stories include Gaddalika (1924), Kajjali (1927), Hanumaner Swapna (Lord Hanuman's Dreams, 1937), Krishnakali (1953), Dhusturimaya (1952), Niltara (1956) Anandibai (1957), Chamatkumari (1959), etc. His books of thoughtful essays, Laghuguru (Heavy and Light, 1939), and Bichinta (Thoughts, 1955), demonstrate his scientific temper, logical thinking and precise diction. He was a recipient of Rabindra Puraskar (Tagore prize) in 1955. and the Sahitya Akademi award in 1958, on his Anandibai.

A.D.C.

BOSE, RAM (Bengali; b. 1786, d. 1828) was an eminent folkpoet (kaviwala or kavial) of Bengal. Kavigan (songs of poets) is a peculiar product of a 19th century school of folkpoets, known as Kavials, who extemporised their songs, were engaged in a duel of words and made witty, often caustic comments and repartees while standing before a crowd. The subjects of their songs varied from Radha-Krishna theme to contemporary intemperate habits of young men. They never cared for excellence; the songs circulated in the mouth of appreciative people, only some of them were written out later, most possibly in a transformed shape. Ram Bose came to Calcutta for study, but preferred to work as a clerk in a mercantile office for some time and ultimately took up the profession of a Kavial. Considered by many as the finest Kavial, his productions are unique. His available poems on Sakhi-Samvad where Radha unburdens her feelings for Krishna's indifference to her, are often marked by mechanical metrical dexterity, uninspired alliteration and a certain vulgarity in expression. A few of them, however demonstrate the simplicity and directness of spontaneous expression, the vigour of vernacular idiom and the tenderness of genuine feeling. Some of his Biraha songs (Radha's pangs at the separation from her beloved Krishna) touch the height of excellence in their frank expression of passion and emotion, but more often the craftsman gets the better of the poet demonstrating barren ingenuity, artificial rhetoric, sarcasm and sentimentalism.

It is a far cry from the passion and poignancy of the Vaishnavapadavali. However, Agamani songs (songs by Menaka in anticipation of the annual visit of her daughter Uma or Parvati, consort of Shiva) are almost uniformly of excellent standard. The yearning of a Bengali mother to meet her daughter living away from her is communicated in an artless overflow of tenderness without any rhetorical device or philosphical depth. Their spontaneity and utter simplicity make them the best of Ram Bose's works. They testify to the quality of the poet who was ill-educated but had the gift of the heavens. A controversial figure in his profession, Ram Bose organised his own Kavial group only a few years before his death.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : Niranjan Chakraborty, Unabimsa Satabdir Kaviwala O Bangla Sahitya; S.K. De Bengali Literature in the Nineteenth Century,

A.D.C.

BOSE, RAMRAM (Bengali; b. 1757, d. 1813), was one of the pioneers of Bengali prose literature. He was closely associated with the Christian Missionaries, particularly with William Carey of the Serampore Baptist Mission. He wrote a hymn to Christ (1788), first of its kind in Bengali, and a few poetical tracts Harkara (1800) and Jnanoday (1800), praising the Bible and criticising popular Hindu-

ism. His fame, however, rests on his prose work Pratapaditya Charitra (1801), a biography of a 16th century Bengali feudal lord, which happens to be the first major and significant prose work in Bengali. Carey inducted Bose as a teacher of Bengali in the College of Fort William which he served till his death. His other work Lipimala (1802), a collection of model letters, was written primarily for the use of students. His style is generally crude and inelegant yet his Pratapaditya Charitra is an interesting document in the history of Bengali prose.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Brajendranath Bandyopadhyay, Ramram Basu, Sahitya Sadhak Charitmala, Vol. I (Calcutta, 1962); Sajanikanta Das, Bangla Gadya Sahityer Itihas (Calcutta, 1975); Sisirkumar Das, Early Bengali Prose (Calcutta, 1966).

S.D.

BOSE, SAMARESH (Bengali; b. 1924) is a well known short story writer and novelist. Hailing from a middle class family of East Bengal, Samaresh had little formal education but he made up for this lacuna by his varied experiences which he had derived from life. He came to Calcutta when he was a mere boy of 13 and since then till his success as a writer his was a course of unmitigated struggle to gain a foothold in the world. He tried his hand at various jobs ranging from that of an ordinary hawker to clerical work in jute mills ultimately landing himself in the post of a tracer (he was good at drawing) at the Ichhapur Ordnance Factory during the second World War. By that time he had become a member of the Communist party of India and did party work as a committed member. He was detained under the Security Act for a time when the Communist Party was banned in 1949.

Bose started writing during the early fifties and made a name for himself as a young writer with promise showing a distinct slant for the realistic portrayal of life in the bustees of Calcutta. His knowledge of the conditions under which the workers toil in the jute mills around Calcutta was evident in his book B.T. Roder Dhare (By the side of B.T. Road, 1952) and in a later publication Jagaddal (1966) in an undoubted measure. Just as Manik Banerjee had earlier portrayed the fishermen of the river Padma, Bose came out with an apparent counterpart in his novel Ganga (1957) in which he sought to draw a vivid picture of the life of the fishermen of the Ganga, with a love story in the centre but nevertheless taking care simultaneously to stress the vagaries and uncertainties of fish catching in this unsure river and their consequent hardships. In his short stories like Akalbasanta, Shashta Ritu, Chhenra Tamasuk (Chhenra Tamasuk has since been filmed successfully) and others, realism and creativity are grafted together in a very smooth amalgam.

For a period Bose strayed from his usual mode of writing and produced a few extremely controversial novels like Bibar (The Pit, 1966), Patak (The Fallen, 1969), Prajapati (The Butterfly, 1969), Manush (Man, 1970), Barabilasini (The Harlot, 1976), etc. They drew protests from a sizeable section of the readers because of their obvious overdose of sex and obscene language. One of them, Prajapati, was even sued for obscenity. However, many readers and critics see in them a daring experiment for portraying the degeneration of middle-class morality. But the writer seems to have by now recovered from the obsession, marking the 'return of the prodigal son' in his new novel Mahakaler Rather Ghora (The Chariot-horse of the Eternal Time, 1977), with its story woven around the naxalites.

Bose is also a fine writer of travelogues. Under the pseudonym "Kalkut" he has written a number of very readable travel stories including Amrita Kumbher Sandhane (In Quest of a Pitcher filled with Nectar, travel diary of Kumbha Mela, Prayag) and Kothai Pabo Tare (Where Shall I Find Him?–a touching narrative about the Bauls of Bengal). He was given the Sahitya Akademi award in 1980 for his novel Shamba, which offers a very perceptive interpretation of the life and mission of an epic personality.

N.C.

BOSE, SUNIRMAL (Bengali; b. 1902, d. 1957) is regarded as a major contributor to Bengali juvenile literature. He passed Matriculation examination from Patna in 1920 and had college education at Saint Paul's College, Calcutta. He was educated in the discipline of painting also.

He endeavoured in many branches of literature, viz. poetry, rhymes, story, drama, travelogue, etc. He wrote in different journals, like Prabasi, Sandesh, Ramdhanu, Alpana, Kishor, Asia, etc. Chhanabada, Bade Maja, Hai Chai, Maraner Dak, Sahure Mama, Kipte Thakurda, etc., are some of his many books that earned for him fame. His autobiography Jiban Khatar Kayek Pata, however, remained incomplete and came out only in part in 1955.

S.G.

BOTADKAR, DAMODAR KHUSHALLDA (Gujarati; b. 1870, d. 1924) served for most of his life as a primary school teacher in villages, subsisting on a meagre salary. Equipped with mastery over Sanskrit vocabulary and Sanskrit metres, he imbibed the impact of the 19th century English poetry, if only indirectly and also of Gujarati poetry of his time, and wrote poetry of a high order. He excels in portraying familiar scenes of country life to which he lends a poetic charm, and more so in depicting the various moods and situations in the life of women folk in their social and family contexts. This, in fact, can be said to be his forte. He has also written many songs employing traditional folk tunes and simpler and softer diction in contrast to the Sanskrit-laden one of his earlier poetry. In such compositions, which he termed rasa poems after Nanalal, he is second only to .that great poet. His collections of poems are Kallolini, Srotasvini, Nirjharini, Rasa–tarangini and Shaivalini.

An.R.

BRAHMA SADANANDA KABISURYA (Oriya; b. 1720, d. 1790) was a medieval Oriya poet. He changed his original name Sachidananda Oda on initiation into one of Vaishnative faith. An erudite Sanskrit scholar, he renounced worldly life and on initiation into Vaishnava faith of the Suddha Bhakti school travelled widely as a preacher of the faith throughout the areas along the Bay of Bengal, in course of which the title of Kabisurya Brahma was conferred on him by the Gajahati King of Puri in recognition of the poetic excellence in his writings. Patronized by the Raja (a local epithet for a feudal prince) Ghanasyama Narendra of Gadamadhupura, he established there his Matha (a saint's residence, monastery), and later set up another Matha at Diksita pada of Balia (now included in the Jaipura subdivision of Cuttack District) under the patronage of the childless landlord Indrajit Samanta Sinhara, who was blessed with a son as a result of the holy sacrifice performed by Kabisurya. Later he became the tutor of the boy as well as his preceptor in faith, and thus helped in the making of the illustrious Oriya poet Abhimanyu Samanta Sinhara.

Kabisurya's poetic works include Jugala Rasamrita Lahari, Jugala Rasamrita Bhamuri, Prema Tarangini, Lalita Lochana, Kunja Bihara, Mohanalata, Tatva Tarangini, Nistha Nilamani, Prema Kalpalata, Nistara Nilamani, etc., most of which have not been published so far. They have for their theme the love anecdotes of Lord Krishna. His inspiration for poetry is derived out of his ability to assimilate the theories and ideas of the Suddha Bhakti cult into real life situations which goes a long way to humanise the mythological characters. The works which are a happy blending of the excellences peculiar to both Goswami literature of the Madhura school and Riti poetry are unique examples of lucid musical composition rich in their lyrical appeal although punctuated with highly ornate products of imagination.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Mazumdar, Typical Selections from Oriya Literature (Calcutta, 1923).

G.C.U.

BRAHMAGITA (Maithili) Brahma is the name of the village deity. The devotional songs connected with a whole pantheon of rural deities in Mithila may be described as Brahmagita. It is the most numerous and most touching of the devotional songs prevalent among the rural population of Mithila.

A Brahma properly is the village deity who was in his life time a Brahmana who died before his upanayana ceremony. Obviously such Brahmas are innumerable. The most famous of them is Bira Bahu a village deity. Other rural deities are Bhairva, Govinda, Hanumana, Jalapa, Dharmaraja and others. There are also female deities such as Bamanti, Visahara Devi, Kati, etc.

Proverbially there are 14 deities known as Damans (Dewans, keepers of Fate like Chitragupta in Yamapuri); (i) Gahila, (ii) Bamanti (iii) Devi Bhavani, (iv) Phaku Rama, (v) Balapira, (vi) Kalika, (vii) Hanumana, (viii) Bhairava, (ix) Visahara (x) Dharamaraja (xi) Saheba Khavasa, (xii) Govinda, (xiii) Saka Somanatha, and (xiv) Jalapa.

There are, however, several other deities such as Salhes, Sokha, Sitala, Narasimhavatha, Bhimsena and the five Pandavas, Karikha, Raktamala, Sasia, Kevalasimha, Motirama, Karikauda, and Diwa Bhadri.

A full-fledged and scientific appraisal of Brahmagitas has not yet been made. But they are an important branch of Maithili folk poetry, full of devotion, mystery, magic and wonder.

J.M.

BRAHMANKANYA (Marathi) is a novel by Shridhar Vyankatesh Ketkar, who is best known as the illustrious writer of the Marathi encyclopaedia, Jnankosha. He was a versatile and prolific writer. This erudite scholar has written many novels, all of them rather controversial, and yet these novels have earned him a place of honour among Marathi novelists. He was not a born novelist and his major work is associated with scholarship. He was a man of vast knowledge and his novel is a by–product of his multifaceted power.It may be said that his deep study of the social sciences led him to the composition of novels, which depict man as the product of the social environment.

Brahmankanya, as its title suggests, is the story of a Brahmin's daughter, but though her father, a resident pleader of Pune, was a Brahmin, she was not the offspring of a Brahmin mother. Her mother was the daughter of a low-caste woman who was the 'keep' of a respectable doctor. It is the story of this innocent Brahmankanya, Kalindi, required to face many problems for which she was not responsible, the main problem being her search for a suitable husband. While she was a college student, many young men were infatuated by her charm and beauty; but not one among them had the courage to accept her as his lawful wife, because of the stain cast on her mother. So ultimately she had to stay with a wealthy Kannada contractor Shivsharanappa in an out-of-wedlock relationship. After his death, she leaves Pune for Bombay, where she happens to meet a liberal trade unionist, Ramarao, who offers to marry her. This, in short, is the story of Kalindi.

But the story was never the strong point of Ketkar's novels. The story is unusually thin and flimsy. He exploited the story, such as it was, for the expression of his opinions and view-points on many complicated contemporary issues—political, social, ethical, psychological, educational and economic. These rather irrelevant sidelights on various burning topics form the most attractive feature of his so-called novels. He delighted in writing unusual conversations, which were meant to project his unconventional opinions. Ketkar was a man of strong prejudices and his Brahmankanya became a bunch of detailed dialogues on a great many controversial issues like sex, psychology of love, experimental marriage, social reform, labour problems, political and religious sects and factions etc. One does not turn to such Shavian novels for mere entertainment. The reading of such novels is a sort of liberal education in itself.

The main story of Brahmankanya involves subsidiary story material like the story of Kalindi's father's relationship with her mother Shantabai, and her brother Satyavrata's relationship with Esther. The advent of Esther in the novel becomes the excuse for an extensive treatise on the Bene Israel Jewish community in India. Similarly, the novel is remarkable for its interesting vignette of one Vaijanatshastri, who resembles the great Marathi historian philosopher Rajwade. Vaijanatshastri is a Shastri in the proper sense of the term, well-versed in all the sciences. Ketkar has however made him his mouthpiece for the expression of his own strange 'commandments' for an ideal state adding an appendix entitled Vaijnath–Smriti which is a manual of rules and regulations for the guidance of his apocryphal State, wherein, he advocates matriarchy as an ideal social state and deals with a variety of issues relating to human relationships.

Brahmankanya may not be a novel in the strict sense of the term, for it reduces the fictional element to a mere scaffolding for controversial debate; and yet even as a novel it offers strong insights into human relationships. Alternatively it may be looked upon as a book of knowledge imparted in an entertaining manner. What Phadke says about Ketkar's novels is that they are not novels at all (of course, artwise), is quite true. But it is equally true that the Ketkar-novel is something much more than a mere novel. It is well-known that the novel can be cast in various forms and Brahmankanya may be one of such colourful forms.

M.M.

BRAHMANA LITERATURE (Sanskrit). According to tradition the Veda consists of the Mantras and the Brahmanas. The principal difference between these two parts of the Veda lies in the former being in the form of sacred verses either for invoking different deities or chanting at various sacrifices, and the latter embodying the speculations on the meaning of these Mantras and also their application to sacrificial rites. The exact connotation of the term Brahmana, however, has led to a lot of discussion. The author of the Mimamsasutras Jaimini finds no better explanation of the appellation than taking it to mean 'that which remains after separating the portion known as Mantra' (M.S. 2.1.77). Its derivation has been accepted by Winternitz as either from the neuter 'brahman' in the sense of 'sacred speech, prayer, sacred knowledge' or from the masculine 'brahma,' the Brahmana, the member of the priestly caste. In essence, however, it is a term expressing 'expansion' from the root–brih, to grow, to expand or increase, and the connection with 'brahman' the sacrificial prayer or brahma, the priest or even the Brahman is secondary. Consequently, the neuter 'brahmanam' in its earliest stages came to denote an explanation or elucidation of Mantra (as in the Aitareya 'iti ha brahmanam tasyoktam brahmanam') (VIII. 2) or as Winternitz puts it 'explanation or utterance of a learned priest, of a doctor of the science of sacrifice upon any point of the ritual'. It is also in this sense that the so-called Brahmana-like portions of the Krishna Yajurveda came to be associated with the Samhitas. The collective use of the neuter 'Brahmanam' to denote a class of literature came into vogue only when the Samhitas associated with separate schools (shakha) were incomplete without their own Brahmanas, Aranyakas, Upanishads and Shrautasutras. This tendency was also seen in the application of the name Brahmanam even to such texts which actually are in the form of Vedangas (the six limbs–supplementary texts explaining the vast Vedic Literature). Tradition asserts that the Veda is eternal and not created by any human being, and as the Brahmanas form a part thereof, they should also be looked upon as apâurusheya. In fact, however, the Brahmanas came to be associated with human beings such as the Aitareya being named after Mahidasa Aitareya. Panini uses the term puranaprokta for some Brahmanas and Kalpas–the names of which are not known to us, (IV.3.105). Thus it has been suggested that there must have been such texts which are not puranaprokta too, meaning thereby that Panini distinguishes between the older and the more recent Brahmanas. Katyayana, the Vartikakara and Patanjali, the Mahabhashyakara have tried to obviate this difficulty by pointing out that this has the purpose of making an exception with regard to Yajnavalkya, etc., because of contemporaneity (Katyayana on the same Sutra) with the Brahmanas proclaimed by Shatyayana, etc. This discussion points to the fact that the Brahmanas associated with Yajnavalkya, etc., are contemporaneous with Panini himself, although associated with the ancient sages or as Eggeling puts it these works 'though ascribed to old authorities, are in reality modern productions'. If one accepts that even Panini knew of older and later Brahmanas, one will not be going against the tradition if one discusses the comparative age of the extant Brahmanas. The Brahmanas constituting a class of literature had their beginnings in the days of the redaction of the Black Yajurveda and came to be traditionally associated with different schools in which were preserved the different recensions of the four Samhitas. Such schools are enumerated by works like the Atharvaparishishta, Vishnupurana, Devipurana, Prapanchahridaya, Mahabhashya, Divyavadana and the Charanavyuha. If one is to investigate into the possibility of contemplating different Brahmanas associated with each of the numerous schools mentioned in these works one would either have to conclude that most of the texts are lost today or that many of the schools presented only common texts. One thing, however, is clear that there were no schools which could be designated as exclusively preserving their Brahmanas, although there were exclusive Shrautacharanas.

Among the extant Brahmanas whose number is fairly large, the two Brahmanas of the Rigveda, the Aitareya and the Kaushitaki or Shankhayana belong to the school of the Bahvrichas, although no less than five schools are mentioned in the works quoted above. The Samaveda according to the Charanavyuha has two thousand divisions (III. 1) but the extant Brahmanas connected with this Veda are related only to the three schools of the Kauthumas, Ranayaniyas and the Jaiminiyas and named as Tandya, Shadvimsha and the Jaiminiya. Extracts are also found of the Samavidhana, Arsheya, Daivata, Samhitopanishad, Vamsha, and Upanishad, which are connected with the Kauthumaranayaniyas. With the Yajurveda, the tradition or notion of school has led to a laborious elaboration and the numerous schools of the three principal divisions of the Charakas, the Maitrayaniya and the Taittiriyas are mere names, and the best preserved extant Brahmana of the Black Yajurveda is the Taittiriya. With reference to the White Yajurveda although fifteen schools are mentioned, only one Brahmana, the Shatapatha is preserved today both in the Madhyandina and Kanva traditions. The accepted nine divisions of the Atharvaveda are more or less legendary and the position of the only Brahmana attached to it, the Gopatha, is not determined and as its name indicates desires to emulate the example of the Shatapatha. According to Wackernagel, a purely linguistic study of the Brahmanas leads to the conclusion that these texts have to be classified under four separate groups comprising of the ancient, intermediary, recent and the latest. To the first group the Jaiminiya and the Panchavimsha may be assigned, while the Aitareya and the Kaushitaki form the second group. The Shatapatha in both recensions makes up the third group and the Gopatha and the small Brahmanas come last in the classification. That among these the Kaushitaki is posterior to the Aitareya is proved beyond doubt. Again the Gopatha is unanimously accepted as the latest among the Brahmanas. The Taittiriyabrahmana is only an appendix to the Taittiriyasamhita and thus posterior to it. The position of the Shatapatha and the Tandya and the Jaiminiya has however led to a lot of discussions.

The development of the enormous bulk of the Brahmana literature must have taken place after the conclusion of the Rigveda hymn-poetry and extended through centuries when prayers and sacrifices were first made the subject of a special science. The Western scholars have placed the Brahmanas from 1200 B.C. to 200 B.C. and the Indian scholars assign to them a period between 3000 and 2000 B.C. mostly on astronomical data found therein.

The central theme of the Brahmanas is sacrifice, which is no longer the means to an end but an end in itself, indeed the highest aim of existence. It is in the Brahmanas that one comes across the concept of Prajapati as the Supreme Deity and his equation with sacrifice. The great sacrifices like the Vajapeya, Rajasuya and Ashvamedha figure prominently in these texts. Similarly the animal sacrifices and also the Soma sacrifices are dealt with in detail.

The characteristic way of delineating these sacrifices is to explain them in a symbolic manner by suggesting the connections (bandhu–a term which later came to be synonymous with brahmana) between them and also quoting the Mantras in pratika (abbreviated forms). Another significant departure from the older hymn verses is seen in the recourse to various myths, which are according to some modern scholars more real than reality and also legends (akhyanas), which support the contention that the human actions are just a recreation of the deeds of the Divinities. The Indravritra myth (among the myths) and the Shunahshepa Akhyana (among the Akhyanas) have undergone a special treatment in the Brahmanas. Apart from these technical devices, there is also the prevalence of etymologies, which are interesting as they throw light on the one hand on the linguistic concepts of those days and on the other on the means of penetrating into the reality lying beyond the phenomena.

The Brahmanas are written in prose which has on the one hand facilitated the task of the later Sutrakaras and on the other set the model for the later prose-compositions. The Brahmanic prose is simple in style and almost devoid of rhetorical embellishment. The myths which abound in the Brahmanas are written in a manner which preserve the mystery of these myths, and here at times the prose is very terse.

As far as the actual contents of the Brahmanas are concerned, the traditional view is that they are expressive of the cause (hetu), etymology (nirvachana), censure (ninda), doubt (samshaya), injunction (vidhi), actions of others (parakriya), acts of old (purakalpa) and the formulation of specific concepts (vyavadharanakalpana). These can be reduced to two injunctions (vidhi) and arthavada (additional explanations), and it is with these two as the principal parts of the Brahmana that the Mimamsakas are concerned.

The general apathy towards the reading of the Brahmanas was expressed in the first instance by Max Muller, who opined that they should be studied as the physician studies the twaddle of idiots and the raving of mad men, but later much modified by Winternitz who maintained that they are indispensable to the understanding of the whole later religious and philosophical literature of Indians and highly interesting for the general science of religion. It is now, however, felt by recent scholars that the Vedic myths and the Vedic ritual cannot be understood without the help of the Brahmanas. The Veda presents a great synthesis and as such no portion of the Veda can be read and appreciated in isolation.

The social set-up in the age of the Brahmanas undergoes no fundamental change as compared to that in the period of the Rigveda. The interrelation of classes and individuals, however, is more clearly defined. For the first time, the term 'varna' is used in the specific sense of class or caste. The Shatapatha clearly states that the varnas are four 'chatvaro vai varnah, brahmana rajanyo vaishyah shudro' V.5.4.9. The Rigvedic division of varna into arya and dasa is now replaced by that of the arya or daivya and anarya or shudra. In the context of the Mahavrata the symbolic striving for a piece of round hide results in the victory of the arya varna–'shudraryau charmani vyayachchete tayor aryam varnam ujjapayati' (Tandya, V.5.14). The pre-eminence of the Brahmin and the servility of the Shudra are fully established. The Taittiriya refers to the Brahmin as veritable gods (devah pratyaksham–1.7.3.1) and the Shatapatha refers to them as human gods (manushyadeva). The creation of the four varnas from the limbs of the Virat is now elaborated in the Brahmanas as the four varnas are created from the limbs of Prajapati together with respective seasons, stomas, metres, deities and also the animals (TS 7.1.1. Panchavimsha 6.1.6.11). The Aitareya testifies to the lowest level of the Shudra as being a servant who can be driven out and beaten at will (VII. 1.29). The same Brahmana lays down that the Brahmin is higher than the Kshatriya and the Rajanya and Vish or Vaishya are mutually interdependent. Apart form these social groups one comes across the functional groups of the Ayogava, Takshan and the Rathakara, Marutta, Avikshita, the Ayogava king performs the Ashvamedha, while the Rathakara has an Adhana mantra for the laying of Agni. The Rathakara or the chariot–maker is placed higher than the ordinary carpenter (takshan) as he operates on dead wood and thus is not unworthy of sacrifice (amedhya).

The Brahmanas contain various kinship terms also like the Bhratrivya, Anujavara, Jami, Sajata, Agredidhishu, which all go to show that family relationships were restricted by laws governing the society. The institution of marriage has also been extolled and the prohibited degrees are indirectly expressed and the principle of exogamy accepted. The family is patriarchal and polygamy was the practice of the day. (AB, III. 23, SB 1.3.1.9., TB 1.3.10). The position of the women is not very high, although she is a partner in the rituals as the patni or jaya and as a daughter-in-law, she attains a higher position than the sister. As a matter of socio-religious importance there is also the mention of the Vratyas and their practices in the context of the Vratya stomas. The identification of the Vratyas has been a matter of interest for all the Vedic scholars and might provide evidence of a traditional parallel to Vedic asserting itself in the period of the Brahmanas. This does not, however, in any way minimize the importance of the Brahmanas and all that they stand for. The Brahmanas apart from providing a rich source of information about the social structure of the time, also give us instances of lucid and simple literary style, of prose writing and a verse-defined framework explaining the symbolism of the various vedic rituals.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.C. Banerjee, Studies in the Brahmanas, Delhi, 1963. Baladeva Upadhyaya, Vaidika Sahitya aur Sanskriti (Hindi), Varanasi, 1958., F. Max Muller, A History of Ancient Sanskrit Literatures, Varanasi, 1968., Gaurinath Shastri, Vaidika Sahityer itihasa (Bengali), Calcutta., Hansraj Agarwal, History of Sanskrit Literature, Ludhiana, 1951., J. Gonda, A History of Indian Literature, Vol. I (Samhitas and Brahmanas) Netherlands, 1975., L. Renou, Les ecoles vediques et la formation du veda, Paris, 1947., M. Winternitz, History of Indian Literature, Vol. I part I, Calcutta University, 1959., V.M. Apte, Vedic Literature (in Encyclopaedia of Literature) Philosophical Library, New York, 1946.,

A.C.B.

BRAHMANAND (Gujarati; b. 1772, d. 1849) was an important poet of the Swaminarayan sect of Gujarat. He was the son of the court-poet Shirohi. His early name was Ladubarot. On abandoning worldly life and joining the Swaminarayan sect, he came to be known as Brahmanand Brahmamuni.

Born as a Barot charan (bard) with a natural mastery over language, Brahmanand received training in Pingal (prosody) and metrical composition for ten years at the Vrajbhasha Pathshala of Bhuj. This training made his poetic technique very effective.

This saint-poet, who was regarded as a friend of Sahajanand and who became the presiding priest of the Muli temple of the Swaminarayan sect, while discharging the customary duties of his religious office according to its strict traditions also carried out the vow of regularly composing a certain number of devotional poems. As a result he is said to have composed about eight thousand devotional poems, out of which only two thousand and five hundred religious poems are available in the printed form. He has composed devotional poems and poetic works connected with the Swaminarayan sect not only in Gujarati but also in Charani, Braj and Hindi. Of about twenty long compositions he composed, particularly notable are Brahmavilas and Danlila (Hindi) and a work discussing prosody, etc.entitled Chhandratnavali (Braj).

His Gujarati poems relating to the paths of knowledge and asceticism and showing an understanding of the essence of devotion, as well as those relating to a deep experience of love of God, show a uniform level of poetic achievement. This poet had a talent of making all his poems attractive and easily intelligible by using the embroidery of metaphors.

As a result, many of his devotional poems have become noteworthy from the point of view of poetic excellence as well as popular appeal. The portrayal of intense emotions, depiction with flowing grace and transparency and force of language exploiting the strength of colloquial speech found in his devotional poems, are a testimony to his natural poetic power at the same time, the use of various metres, verbal beauty flowing from the reasonance of alliteration and neatness to the external form of composition add to their fomal quality. Knowledge of music also lent rhythmic sweetness to his works. Even though one may hear echoes of the poetry of poets like Narsinha, Meera and Dayaram, Brahmanand's poetry has not become dull or repetitive from the point of view of poetic sweetness. In terms of skill in composition, he can be placed amongst the most notable poets of the middle ages.

Ra.S

BRAHMANAND, TIRTH (Dogri; b. 1891, d. 1962) was a distinguished poet, a descendant of Akhnur princely house. His original name was Sansar Singh. He had his schooling in local middle school, joined army service in Central Asian frontier of Gilgit and later resigned. He took up civil job where his services were greatly praised and awarded, resigned again, became a sanyasi (1923-24) on the line of Swami Ram Tirth, travelled on foot throughout India, became 'mahant' of Puramandal Tirth, led a secluded life, lived mostly at Jammu and at Gujaranwala (now in Pakistan) and after Independence, at Baruki, a secluded village in district Bijnaur, Uttar Pradesh. He began writing Vedantic verse in 1953-54 after listening to Dogri poets near his hermitage at Jammu and continued till 1960 when his health deteriorated. He was a prolific writer. His five works, Gunge da Guda (Jaggery for the Dumb, 1955), Mansarovara (Lake of the Mind, 1956), Gupta Ganga (The Hidden Ganga, 1958), Amrit Barkha (The Nectar Rain, 1959) and the Dogri Bhajan Mala (Garland of Dogri Hymns, 1961), were published by Dogri Sanstha, Jammu; his major collection Brahm-Sankirtan (The Song of Brahma, 1958) was published by Jammu and Kashmir Government and Bhagavati Stotram (Hymn to The Goddess, 1961) by a devotee. His works contain his teachings on Vedanta. He brought the sumptuous Vedantic lore to the nascent Dogri poetry. There being no sophistry or dogmatism in Vedanta, Swami's poetry too is couched in the same simple style and perfect repose. Every line of his is replete with simile and metaphor. There is complete identity in his thought and expression. Just as the Indian epics are written in simple couplets, the corpus of Swami's poetry is also written in a similar running style. It is absorbed in spiritual anguish, denouncing materialistic world with disdain. Rather than going into an ecstatic mood, he worked to activate such a fervour in man so that he may take pleasure in his spiritual growth. He motivated the layman, creating in him an urge to cultivate buoyancy of spiritual discipline for leading an advanced spiritual life. His poetry has a certain robustness and vigour and an element of commitment for spiritual redemption. Dogri was inter-connected by him with India's spiritual heritage and outlook while imparting this time-honoured ancient wisdom.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J.C. Sathe, Swami Brahmanand Tirth (Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi, 1982).

Ja.S

BRAHMASIVA (Kannada). Brahmasiva is the author of Samayapariksa, the first satirical work in Kannada, and as such, it occupies an important place in the history of Kannada literature. R. Narasimhachar places him in 1100 A.D. H. Devirappa contends that the writer belongs to the latter half of the 12th century. After taking note of the arguments of both the scholars, it may be stated that Brahmasiva lived and wrote during the middle of the 12th century. His birth-place was Pottalagere. He declares in Samayapariksa (1-58, 59) that he embraced Jainism as he found no worth in the Mahesvara sect of Saiva-Brahmana faith to which he was born. He claims that he was well versed in Vedic scriptures and Puranas, and in the religious texts of Saivism, Buddhism and Saura (Sun-worshipping) cult. But for the knowledge of these faiths, it would not have been possible for him to criticize them.

Brahmasiva has written another work entitled Trailokyachudamani, also called Chattisaratnamale (String of Thirty-six Gems). Each verse in the work is meant to be a thought-gem. Trailokyachudamani is so called because every stanza ends with that word which is an attribute of Jina and each verse is a hymn addressed to the Jina. The word 'Trailokyachudamani' serves as the conventional 'Makuta' (Crown-word) and the 'Mudrika' (Signature) of each verse, as in Sataka verses. The work describes 36 'vratas' (religious vows) as enjoined in Jaina religious texts; the mischievous tendency to parody the deities and tenets of other religious faiths is quite patent.

The reputation of Brahmasiva mainly rests on his bulky work Samayapariksa (Critique of Religious Faiths). It consists of 15 'adhikaras' (Chapters), and is written in 'Kanda' and 'Vritta' metres. Brahmasiva declares that he would elucidate both Jainism and 'aptagama dharma' (non-Jaina faiths). True to his declaration, he extols the virtues of his own religion and revels in denigrating the rival non-Jaina sects such as the 'Saiva', 'Vaisnava' and 'Saura' sects of the Vedic religion. There is no doubt that the contemporary society was bedevilled with inner contradictions, superstitious beliefs and low ethical standards. But on the whole the author seems to be partisan in his observations regarding non-Jaina faiths. All the same, an impartial critic or reader would admit that Brahmasiva, with all his predilections and prejudices, cynicism and self-righteousness, is certainly enjoyable on account of his argumentative wit, biting humour and incisive sarcasm, the essential literary qualities of a good satire.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: B.S. Kulkarni, (ed.); Samayapariksa, (Dharwad, 1958., H. Deveerappa and Pai Govinda, 'Brahmasivana Kala Vichara' (Prabuddha Karnataka, Vol. 24-5, 1940; Rashtrabandhu Silver Jubilee Souvenir, 1953). M.H. Krishnayya, Bramhasiva (Samagra Kannada Sahitya Charitre, Bangalore, 1976).,

M.V.S.

BRAHMAYYA SASTRI–KASHIBHATTA (Telugu; b. 1863, d. 1940) was born at Palivela in East Godavari District. His ancestors were inhabitants of Kadali, a village near Razole. His grand-father migrated to Kakinada. His parents, Subbamma and Brahmavadhani, were vedic scholars.

Brahmayya Sastry discontinued his English education while in F.A. class due to some domestic problems. He then took up the study of Vaiyyakarana Siddhanta Kaumudi, a Sanskrit grammar text. He was, by then, a scholar in Sanskrit and Telugu literatures. He published an essay, called 'Rapratyahara Khandana Mundanam'.

He began publishing critical essays on comparative studies of English and Telugu literatures. He had equal interest in literature and religion and philosophy. He replied to attacks on Hindu religion both from westernised Hindus and other religionists. His talks and articles on Hindu religion attracted the Telugu people.

A prolific writer and social reformer, Kandukuri Veeresalingam Pantulu was his contemporary. Much of Sastri's time and energies were spent in those days in giving replies and rejoinders to Veeresalingam Pantulu. Not only his religious writings, but also his novels like Rajasekharacharitram was subjected to criticism by Sastri. He was a great researcher and a pioneer in essay writing. He earned the title 'Vimarsakagresara' from the Andhra Saraswata Sabha. He became a synonym for criticism. He used to tackle the other's view point by point, never leaving out anything. He never tolerated even a simple flaw in poetry and got the reputation of being a perfectionist. Readers were then attracted to his writings.

He was a clerk in the Collector's office for quite a long time. Even while earning a living by dint of his hard labour, he did a great service to literature and literary criticism. He delivered lectures whenever he could find time, maybe during a vacation, or even while accompanying his officers on camp. He could run a periodical, called Aryamatabodhini for fifteen years. He founded a library by name, 'Vivekananda Pustaka Bhandagaram'. He ran even a dramatic society, 'Aryabrindanandanu Samdhayini' which staged several dramas, both his own and of others. He organised 'Bhakta Samajam' and 'Hindumata Bala Samajas' to foster religious spirit and piety. His 'kagada' (torch) brings out his knowledge of linguistics.

His writings on Sanskrit and Telugu grammar, philosophy, History, and Vedic learning baffled even those of erudition in these respective subjects. His critical essays had seen the light of the day under the title Upanyasa Payonidhi. His History of Peddapuram Samsthanam was a popular piece of reading.

An interesting incident occurred in 1930. When a person by name Kasibhatla Lingamurty died, newspapers wrote that Kasibhatla Brahmyya Sastri was dead. Then many condolence meetings, regret letters, sorrowing editorials flowed in, when actually the latter was happily immersed in writing books. Of course, profuse apologies followed very soon. This became the theme for his later piece of poetry, "Na Vibudha loka Sandarsanam' (Intellectual elite as I see).

Further Works Poetry: Bharatistava Gitamulu, Gaddiparaka, Kokila Gitamulu, Gomahisha Samvadam etc. Prose Works: Nannayabhattaraka Charitram, Kurupandava Dayabhaga Nirnayam, Taraka taravali, Parvata Samdarsandam, Manu Vasu Prakasika, Prayaschitta Pasu Nirnayam, Bhaskarodantam;–Essays in Telugu.

J.V.S.

BRAHMABHATT ANIRUDDHA (Gujarati; b. 1937, d. 1981) has contributed to genres like poetry, pen-pictures and reflective essays, but his contribution to the field of literary criticism is noteworthy. He started his literary career as an editor of a series on various Gujarati writers. The first in the series was Jhaverchand Meghani (1968). Aristotlenun Kavyashahtra (1969) is a translation of the Poetics of Aristotile. It is the first book of its kind. Anvikshd (1970) a survey, Puruadar (Forward and Backward; 1970) and Sannikarsha (From Close Range, 1981), the collections of critical essays, introduce him as a scholar of the latest trends in western criticism. His views are balanced and presented in a convincing manner. He deals with various literary forms, traces their historical development and discusses the recent trends in Gujarati literature. Absurd (1977) gives the philosophy of absurd, reflections on absurd theatre and some translations of Western models.

Kimpi (Something, 1982) is collection of his poems on diverse subjects, and in different poetic styles.

Namrup (1980) is a collection of character sketches of different persons in different walks of life.

Ra.S

BRAJA BHASHA (Hindi). The words 'Prakrit' and 'Apabhramsha' have been loosely used for non-Sanskrit dialects and languages. It is learnt from the Mahabhasya that each word gives rise to many 'Apabhramsha' (corrupt) forms (due to regional and climatic influences). Here the word 'Apabhramsha' means 'non-Sanskrit' or 'non-standard' form of words. In the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society (July, 1841) Stevenson wrote that 'People, indeed, in familiar conversations, call the spoken languages of India Prakit...' and further. 'the Prakrit must be studied in order that he may be able to diffuse beneficially among his countrymen, the knowledge he has acquired. . .', and Godabole, the Compiler of Marathi Navint (1854), used in the Marathi introduction the word 'Prakrit' in the same sense: . . . in this Prakrit there have been many poets like Mukund Raj, Jnanesvar, Eknath, etc. The word 'Prakrit' here stands for 'vernacular', or 'the language of the natives', or as we call it today 'modern Indian language'. In the North, however, the word 'Bhasha' gained currency as language whch came after Apabhramsha mediaeval languages. Chand Baradai used the phrase 'Shadh Bhasha' (Six languages), Tulsidas composed his Ramacharitmanas as Bhasha-Nibandham (Language Composition), and Keshav Das declared that even his servants did not use 'Bhasha' (they speak Sanskrit). therefore, 'Bhasha' generally stood for 'Braja Bhasha', since it was the commonly accepted language of literary expression in North India.

Shurasen, the grand-father of Sri Krishna, developed a particular part of land which later became famous as 'Shurasen Pradesh'. The dialect of the region was 'Shauraseni Prakrit'. The region was also known as 'Vraja or Braja. In the Rigveda, the word 'Vraja' is used in the sense of a 'pasture', 'hoard of cows', 'place for the cows to rest'. Abhiras, who inhabited that region in large numbers excelled in agriculture and cow-breeding. Sri Krishna, the leader of the community, gave respectability to this occupation and he was honoured with the title of 'Gopal' (the protector of the cows and of the land). The Shurasen Pradesh or the Braja region spreads around the river Yamuna, at places it crosses the river Ganga. This region has been named differently in different times; it was 'Madhya Desh', 'the Doaba' (the region of the two rivers), and 'the Gangetic Plain'.

In the modern set-up, the Braja Pradesh includes within its fold some parts of Haryana, some parts of Rajasthan, Gwalior area of Madhya Pradesh, whole of western Uttar Pradesh, and the plains of Kumayun and Garhwal. According to the tradition the Braja Pradesh, with Mathura as the centre, originally extended over a long area. Shauraseni and later Braja Bhasha developed in this Pradesh and from this region spread far and wide. The richness of the language was recognized even by those writers who did not speak this dialect. It is thus evident that like Shauraseni Prakrit, Braja Bhasha, which was a regional dialect, became so popular that it crossed geographical barriers, and was generally accepted as the most developed medium of literary expression and was faithfully enriched by the poets of the North India irrespective of their regions, beliefs and temperaments.

Braja Bhasha had three distinct stages of development: Apabhramsha stage, the Dingal stage and the Pingal stage. The Apabhramsha stage is witnessed in the works of the Nath Yogis, e.g., in the 'Gorakh Bani' of Gorakh Nath. Here Braja Bhasha is strewn in the framework of Apabhramsha. The Dingal stage is more tangible; it is evenly woven with Apabhramsha and Braja Bhasa. This stage provided a common ground for all the north-western languages, including Punjabi, Rajasthani and Gujarati. It can be witnessed in the 'Rasa' and 'Raso' works of the 12th and the 13th centuries. Prithviraj Raso, the premier work of this stage of language, has attracted the attention of the scholars both for its encyclopaedic content and for its variegated language pattern. The Pingal stage of Braja Bhasha has a perfectly established form; it is no more an 'earlier stage'. Shivprasad Singh enumerates as many as ten books of Pre-Surdas Braja Bhasha, besides a number of poets whose works present this shade of the language. Some of the poets are Vishnu Das of Gwalior, Namdev of Maharashtra and Kabir of Varanasi. The names of Shankar Dev of Assam and Vidyapati of Mithila may also be added to this list. Besides being the medium of the Nirgun and Sagun schools of the Bhakti-cult, this 'Bhasha' was commonly used in the folk-songs throughout the area which was once served by Shauraseni Prakrit.

With and around Surdas, Braja Bhasha emerged as a fully developed, matured and expressive literary language, ready to create a deep mark on the life and literature of the country. One can divide the ensuing centuries into two periods:

The earlier Mediaeval 1450 to 1650; and the later Mediaeval 1650 to 1850.

Amongst the revivalist philosophers, Vallabhacharya (1478-1530) was the first to appreciate the importance of Bhasha (in preference to Sanskrit). He established his headquarters at Govardhan in 1499 (U.P.) in Mathura District and patronised Braja culture, language, literature, music and painting. His son Vithal took another stride by selecting four to add to the four poet–disciples of his illustrious father and mentor and grouping them, under the name 'Ashtachhap' 1545, and by giving them place of honour in his congregations. Surdas is at the top of this octad. Bhakti, music and poetry flow spontaneously in a harmonious 'triveni' like Ganga, Yamuna and Saraswati, when the great blind poet exposes his heart before the deity. The language of this period is a perfect compound of Puranic and Gopalak influences–a meeting point of ideal and actual, of divine and human. The words come from Sanskrit, but the verbs are rounded off from Prakrit—Apabhramsha inheritacne. This Braja Bhasha has attracted even the foreigners with its mellifluous sweetness. It bubbles with freshness, vividness and richness. During this period Braja Bhasha evolved; and revolved round Bhakti–far away from the kings and courtiers. The Braja Bhasha of Bhakti period is a perfect evolution of India's rich heritage, unaffected by foreign influence, deep-rooted in India's national way of life, ready to replace Sanskrit as the common medium of expression.

The welcome accorded to Braja Bhasha literature by the royal courts had a degenerating effect not only on literature but on language also. Whereas literature lost its sanctity of the ideal and the divine, the language lost its spontaneity and catch; it became artificial, heavy and clumsy. Instead of coming in the open for freshness, the poets shut themselves in artificial luxuries and in ivory chambers. They wrote to please. The language of this later mediaeval period had developed some important features: (a) Besides the atmosphere of the royal courts, it imbibed the atmosphere of the battlefield also, with additional vocabulary and a different type of expression; (b) The variety of expression gave a kind of fickle richness to the language, permitting words and phrases not only from Persian of the Mughal Court but also from Marathi, Rajasthani, Punjabi, Bundelkhandi and Baghelkhandi dialects; (c) Because of the courtly and foreign influence, poetry largely lost its note of sincerity and developed ridiculous exaggerations, repetitions and discordant patches. There are piles of books and hoards of poets in the later mediaeval period but the achievement is quite negligible. Bihari Lal, the greatest poet of this period, tried to give stability to language but there are not many to toe his line. The Braja Bhasha of Surdas is spontaneous, natural and lively, but the Braja Bhasha of Bihari Lal is cultivated, craftly, artificial and pedantic.

The modern period, beginning with 1850, is an era of the decline of Braja Bhasha and its literature. In the modern age, Braja Bhasha has survived for more than a century and has adapted itself to the changed circumstances. Even during its retreat, Braja Bhasha has given good literature and has dressed itself according to the call. It has now only two functions to perform–to grow further as a regional language to be the medium of upcoming national aspirations, and to remain as a classical language with an antique glory of its own.

Some of the linguistic features of Braja Bhasha may now be mentioned. The main attraction of Braja Bhasha is its sweetness, which it inherited from Prakrit. Raj Shekhar in his Prakrit drama Karpuramanjari states: 'Sanskrit Bandh is harsh, Prakrit Bandh is tender; the difference between the two is the same as between a man and a woman'. This sweetness is not always in the choice of words but largely in the inherent music present all over, including the syntax and the metres. Braja Bhasha does have a rich estate of heroic poetry (which must have harsh and hard words and expressions) with a regular flow from Prithviraj Raso to Sujan Charit (19th cent.). When one takes the words 'Shushka' and 'Mishta' of Sanskrit; in Khari Boli they become 'sukha' and 'mitha', but they are 'sookan' and 'meethan' in Braja Bhasha. Similarly, 'Ksham' becomes 'chhin' and 'chola' becomes 'chalyau'. Two lines of Surdas may be quoted to illustrate the nature of Braja Bhasha– > tat chhin pran palati gayau merau, tan man hwai gayau karau ri.

> Main dekhyau Jasumati kau dhota, khelat angan barau ri;

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Dhirendra Varma, Vyakaran., Shivprasad Singh, Sur-Purva Braj Bhasha Aur Usaka Sahitya., Vararuchi, Prakrit Prakash.,

O.P.

BRAJ NANDAN SAHAY (Hindi; b. 1874, d. 1906) was a law graduate and practised law in Arrah, Bihar. He had an early fascination for novels. He wrote two emotional novels Saundaryopasak (1911) and Radha Kant (1912) which can be categorised as prose poetry. They have neither characterization nor a variety of incidents but have a speedy flow of feelings or emotions. Saundaryopasak is a novel which depicts a romantic situation based on a tragic love story. The hero of the novel, infatuated by his sister-in-law, starts loving her even before his marriage is solemenised. But Priya, his sister-in-law, is married away to some other person. Afflicted with tuberculosis, she dies. The hero's wife, when she comes to know of her husband's sentiments, suffers and ultimately dies. The hero alone survives to mourn the deaths of his wife and sister-in-law. Rajendramalati (1897) is also a novel representing almost the same tradition of quiet and passionate love. Lal Chin (1916) is a historical novel which narrates the story of the assassination of the treacherous Ghulam Lal Chin at the hands of Ghayasuddin, the ruler of Bahmani Kingdom. He was honoured by Bihar Rashtra Bhasha Parishad, Patna.

FURTHER WORKS: Adbhut Prayashchitta (1906), and Aranyabala (1915).

Gov.R.

BRAJABULI (Assamese), the language of Braja or region around Mathura is a misnomer. It is neither Brajabhasha nor the spoken language of the Mathura region. It is an artificial literary language used by the Vaishnava poets and dramatists of medieval Assam and Bengal. The medieval writers called it Brajavali in Assamese, meaning lines or writings relating to Brajalila of Krishna. The term Brajavali is however considered by some modern scholars as a debased form of Brajabuli i.e. the language depicting the Brajalila or sports of Gopala Krishna. It is an artificial language based on the Maithili language as found in the lyrics of Vidyapati of Mithila, admirably blended with Assamese forms and expressions, with a sprinkling of Awadhi and Brajabhasha forms here and there. This literary language was only used in writing Vaishnavite plays (Ankiya-nata) and devotional lyrics (Bargita), but it was never used in other metrical compositions. The reason for using more or less an artificial language in dramas and lyrics is not difficult to infer. The dramatists wanted to conjure up an illusory world of gods and demons. The Assamese language as used in the metrical composition might not help, they feared, create that world. So they instead of using Sanskrit which was mostly unintelligible to the people, preferred to choose a via-media through an artificial language which would be within the comprehension of the audience and at the same time contribute towards creating the illusory world.

S.S.

BRAJABULI (Bengali) is the name of a literary language in which a large number of Vaishnava lyrics were written from the 13th up to the 19th century in Eastern India. The language is believed to have been based on old Maithili. But it has been linguistically proved to have come down from Avahattha or the Proto-vernacular current in Eastern India in the 11th-12th century.

The early writers in this poetic language or mixed speech belonged to North Bihar and Nepal. Subsequently it spread over to Bengal and Assam. By the 15th century it had come to Orissa but there it did not take roots.

From the very start Brajabuli lyrics were cultivated in royal courts. In Bengal, however, it had escaped the confinement of the court and was cultivated by the common poets from the beginning of the 16th century. Chaitanya was a lover of Vaishnava lyrics and for that reason Brajabuli poetry found a very productive field in Bengal. And Brajabuli songs predominated in Bengali poetic literature till the middle of the 19th century.

The name Brajabuli indicated that it was considered as the language of "Vraja" or Vrindavan, as the songs are almost all concerned with the story of Radha and Krishna.

The main features of the poetic language are as follows: 1. Final vowels are never lost and conjunct consonants are seldom simplified. 2. The inflected forms are mostly archaic. 3. Sanskrit words are freely used, with or without mutilation. 4. Vocables from the native patois or language are not forbidden. 5. The metrical system is moraic and not syllabic as in Bengali and Assamese. 6. The poems are songs and therefore are short compositions.

Besides the songs on the Vraja legend, Brajabuli literature contains songs on Chaitanya and other masters of Vaishnavism in Bengal and Assam as well as purely devotional prayers.

A specimen of Brajabuli composition in verse is given below.

Ki kahaba re sakhi ananda ora
Chiradine madhava mandire mora
'How can I express my joy, O friend!
Madhava is for ever in the temple of my heart.'

In modern Bengali poetry, Rabindranath Tagore, when he was a teenager, had written some songs in Brajabuli, mixed largely with Bengali diction. Tagore set the songs in melody and these songs are still quite popular in Bengal and outside. Tagore imitated the manner of the Vaishnava poets and added a signature (i.e. Charita) to his poems. His signature was a pen name "Bhanu Singha". Tagore is the last poet of Brajabuli lyrics.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Sukumar Sen, A History of Brajabuli Literature, Calcutta University, 1955.

Su.S.

BRAJANGANA KAVYA (Bengali), a book of odes in Bengali by Michael Madhusudan Dutta, was first published in 1861, and underwent two editions during the author's lifetime. Though not one of his best, this book of Madhusudan has some interesting features, which make it historically important. Firstly this was the first attempt to write an ode in Bengali keeping in mind its counterpart in Western literature. Secondly, while the poet used blank verse in the other three poetical works (Tilottama, Meghnadbadh, Birangana), this book is written in rhymed metre. The subject matter of the odes has a direct link with the Vaishnava Padavali of medieval literature. The odes describe the love pang of Radha. But there is an important difference between the Radha of Brajangana and the Radha of Vaishnava Padavali. The religious and mystical connotation of Radha-Krishna theme is missing in Brajangana. Radha is here just a love-lorn woman separated from her husband. In Vaishnava Padavali, we have different stages of progress in Radha's love:– 'purbarag', 'man', 'biraha', 'milan', etc. But Brajangana deals only with Radha's 'biraha' or pangs of separation. Following the fashion of the western ode, all the poems (they are eighteen in number) are in the form of address, ten of these are addressed to Radha's sakhi (lady friends), seven to various aspects of nature, and one to a peahen.

Brajangana Kavya has the quality of a poetical pathos, and a logical evolution of thought. Radha is deeply moved by the separation of Krishna, but there is a dominance of reason instead of emotion in her expression. This conveys a certain amount of artificiality in the poems. The odes are mainly short in length, and are divided in stanzas. The number of stanzas varies between four to eight, only the third ode, 'Yamuna-tate' (On the Banks of the Yamuna) comprises eleven stanzas. Madhusudan has taken the outward structure of two conventional metrical system of Bengali payar and tripada, but the use of stanzas and the application of end-rhyming is marked by a certain amount of complexity and elaboration, which have been accepted as the habitual characteristics of the ode. The diction of Brajangana Kavya is a happy mixture of three different elements, a number of words used has been taken from the poetic language of Vaishnava Padavali, many words can be said to belong to the 'register' of a village woman. In addition to these two, epithets and compounds of Sanskrit words have also been employed which bear the distinctive marks of Madhusudan's poetic genius. Brajangana Kavya, thus, can be described as the poet's attempt to experiment with the Western poetic technique on a traditional theme.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Jogindranath Basu, Michael Madhusudan Datter Jibancharit; Nagendranath Som, Madhusmriti.

Ja.C.

BRIHADARANYAKOPANISHAD (Sanskrit) belongs to the White Yajurveda. It forms part of the Shatapatha-Brahmana. It is one of the oldest Upanishads and is also the most important of all Upanishads. It has six chapters having different Brahmanas or sub-chapters.

It describes the cosmic person considered as a sacrificial horse (1.1). Then it passes on to the theory of Death as the cause of all things (1.2). It describes the superiority of Breath among the bodily functions (1.3). Different types of creation—myths are given (1.4.6). The conversation between Balaki, the proud Brahmana and Ajatashatru, the King of Kashi regarding the progressive definitions of Brahman takes place; how Balaki begins by saying that true wisdom consists in regarding the sun as ultimate reality; how he goes on to say that the ultimate reality is to be found one after another, in such objects as the moon, the lightning, the thunder, the wind, the sky, the fire, the water, the mirror, the image, the echo, the sound, the body, the right eye and the left eye and then stops; how Ajatashatru leads Balaki to a man fallen in deep sleep and tells him that in the person who has gone to sleep, the sleeping consciousness may be regarded as ultimate reality (2.17). Breath embodied in a person and the two forms of reality are described (2.2.3). Yajnavalkya appears conversing with his wife Maitreyi on the Self. He teaches that all things are dear for the sake of the Self. All things exist for the Self. If we do not so regard them they would vanish for us (2.4). Madhuvidya or the doctrine of honey is described (2.5). The geneological tradition of the Upanishad is given (2.6). Yajnavalkya appears at the court of Janaka, the king of Videha, discussing various topics with a number of philosophers. Ashvala, the hotri priest of Janaka, the king of Videha asks several questions relating to ritualism all of which are answered by Yajnavalkya satisfactorily (3.1). Artabhaga Jaratkarava who is interested in eschatology, comes forward to put questions. After mentioning the disposal of the members of the human body at death-the eye of man goes to the sun, the breath to the wind, speech to fire, mind to the moon, the ear to the quarter of heaven, the body to the earth, the sound to the ether, the hair to the plant and trees, the blood and seed to the waters–Yajnavalkya is asked as to what remains of the individual. He takes Artabhaga apart, discusses with him in secret about the nature of deeds. In truth a man may become good by good deeds and evil by evil deeds (3.2). Bhujyulahyayani who is interested in para-psychology wants to know what became of the Parikshitas. Bhujyu is silenced by the simple answer that they went where those who perform horse-sacrifices go (3.3). Ushasta Chakrayana who is interested in the nature of ultimate reality wants to know the Brahman that is immediately present and directly perceived, that is the self in all things. "This is yourself that is within all things" answers Yajnavalkya. Clarifying further he says, "You cannot see the seer of seeing, you cannot hear the hearer of hearing, you cannot think the thinker of thinking, you cannot understand the understander of understanding. He is yourself which is in all things. Everything else is of evil" (3.4). Kohala Kaushitakeya who wants to know the practical way of the realisation of the self is advised to live as a child after finishing the learning. After that one becomes silent meditator. Having done with (both) the non-meditative and the meditative stages one becomes a Brahmana (a knower of Brahman) (3.5). Gargi Vachaknavi who is interested in the problem of immanence asks, "Since all this here is woven like warp and woof in water, on what pray, is water woven like warp and woof?" Yajnavalkya suggests several things one after another, beginning with air and ending with the worlds of Brahma. But Gargi goes on asking. Yajnavalkya silences her by warning her not to question too much (3.6). Uddalaka Aruni who is also interested in the problems of immanence asks about the inner controller. Yajnavalkya silences him by describing the world-spirit which binds together all beings from the highest to the lowest (3.7). Gargi rises up again with two questions both relating to the unqualified Brahman. Yajnavalkya describes the Brahman in negative terms indicating thereby that the Brahman is neither a substance nor a possessor of attributes (3.8). Vidagdha Shakalya, a theologist who asks about the number of gods, is easily disposed of (3, 9). A dialogue between King Janaka and Yajnavalkya takes place in which the latter shows the untenableness of six definitions set up by other teachers as to the nature of the Brahman, e.g. that it is identical with speech, breath, the eye, the ear, the mind and the heart (4.1). Both of them talk together further regarding the Self (4.2). Yajnavalkya describes different states of the Self, "There are just two states of the person, this world and the other world. There is an intermediate third state of being in sleep. By standing in the intermediate state one sees both these states of being in the world and of being in the other world ..... when he goes to sleep he takes along the material of this all embracing world, himself tears it apart, himself builds it up; he sleeps (dreams) by his own brightness, by his own light. In that state the person becomes self-illuminated. Even as a large fish moves along both banks of a river, hither and further, so also this person moves along both these states, the state of dream and the state of waking (4.3-4). The conversation between Yajnavalkya and his wife Maitreyi is repeated (4.5). The genealogical tradition of the Upanishad is given (4.5). A number of miscellaneous reflections on ethical, cosmological and eschatological matters occur in the fifth chapter. The superiority of Breath among six bodily functions is described again (6.1). The celebrated doctrine of "Five Fires" of the philosopher Pravahana Jaivali is described (6.2). Ceremonies like the means for the attainment of a great wish and procreation ceremonies are given (6.3-4). The genealogical tradition of the Upanishad is given.

The Brihadaranyakopanishad lays a great stress on the importance of the ethical life. In one passage of the Brihadaranyakopanishad (5.2) all the virtues are brought together under the 'das' which are heard in the voice of the thunder, namely, dama or self-restraint, dana or self-sacrifice and daya or compassion. Prajapati conveys it to the three classes of his creation, gods, men and demons. By the practice of the first injunction gods who have desires free themselves from the sway of desires. By the practice of the second injunction men who suffer from greed free themselves from the sway of greed. By the practice of the third injunction demons who suffer from anger free themselves from the sway of anger.

The Brihadaranyakopanishad is written in prose although a few verses are inserted here and there. Magnificent philosophical speculations at places having been matched with genuine poetic expressions have produced the sublime which has very few parallels in world literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: A.B. Keith, The Religion and Philosophy of the Veda and the Upanishad, 2 Vols., 1925; E. Roer (tr.): Brihadaranyakopanishad, 1856; F.Maxmuller, The Upanishads, S.B.E. Vol. I, 1879, Vol. II, 1884, Paul Deussen : Dir Philosophic der Upanishads, 1899, Eng.tr. 1906; S. Radhakrishnan, The Principal Upanishads, 1953.

H.M.

BRIHATKATHA (Sanskrit). Gunadhya, the author of Brihatkatha (The big story), compiled the various cycles of popular stories and knit them together in delightful harmony. In the history of the ancient Indian literature, he is one of the greatest legendary figures like Valmiki and Vyasa. The original work of Gunadhya is lost. But it was known in the 6th to 8th centuries A.D. to the poets Subandhu, Bana and Dandin. Buhler and Lacote place Gunadhya in the first century A.D., Levi in the third.

How Gunadhya came to write his voluminous work has itself been worked up into a story. This legendary account, with slight variations occurs in the two Kashmiri versions of Brihatkatha and in the apocryphal 'Nepal Mahatmya' of a pseudo-puranic character. Gunadhya is made here an incarnation of one of the attendants (ganas) of Lord Shiva, cursed by the goddess Parvati to be born as a human being at Pratishthana, the city ruled by the famous King Satavahana. Having lost a wager with Sharvavarman, a great scholar patronised by the king, Gunadhya abjures the use of Sanskrit and society, and retires to the wild Vindhya regions. There he learns the story of Brihatkatha from another incarnated gana of Shiva and records it in the newly picked up local dialect in 700 000 (!) verses, of which only $^1/_7$th could be saved from destruction. The Nepalese version places the birth of Gunadhya at Mathura, and makes him write the great story at the instance of a sage named Pulastya. The legend, in some form, was known to the poet Banabhatta and Dandin also. They speak of the work being written in metrical form, in the dialect of the wild people of Vindhya regions–called Paishachi. Dandin recalls that the work was written in Bhutabhasha, the language of the goblins. But he thinks that it was a type of prose romance known as Katha, in which verses are also allowed to be inserted.

The only conclusion that can be derived from the legends is that there certainly was a poet named Gunadhya in the pre-Christian era or in early Christian centuries, he probably belonged to the Pratishthana city of Andhra, and was patronised by one of the famous Satavahana kings.

It has its three adaptations in Sanskrit: Brihatkatha lokasamgraha, Brihatkathamanjari and Kathasaritsagara. There is a fourth adaptation also in the Nagpur University Manuscript Library, which requires examination.

The frame story centres around Naravahanadatta, son of the mythical king Udayana, his trips and falling in love with damsels of beauty, leading to as many as twenty six brides, the pride of the collection being Madanaman-juka, the heroine of this great story. This frame story is marked with hundreds of episodes and popular tales interwoven in it. Gunadhya's work portrays the stratum of the middle class Indian society in all its complexity and colourful variety. One meets here the poet, whose verses, unfortunately, make no impressioh upon the grocer, the loquacious barber, the astrologer who makes lavish pronouncements, the hoarder of gold, who starves by day and feasts his eyes upon his coins by night. The stories are characterised by subtle humour and a piquant sense of satire. There is plenty of comic relief also. There is a servant, who, bidden to protect the leather of the new trunk, takes out all the precious clothes from it and wraps them round the trunk to save it from rain. Here is the fool insisting that his father could never have been naughty and he must therefore be a mind-born son, a glutton filling his belly with seven cakes and then bitterly regretting that he had not eaten the seventh cake first. Gunadhya had a very realistic approach towards life and he reveals the layers of corruption deep-rooted in the society very unhesitatingly. Rogues, thiefs and villains are portrayed with rare authenticity. One of them dresses up as a rich merchant and seeks audience with the king promising a daily gift of five hundred gold coins to the latter for the honour of each interview. The courtiers begin to think very highly of him and bribe him for getting favours from the king, and finally the man, having amassed fifty million gold coins generously splits his wealth on a fifty-fifty basis with the king.

Gunadhya's is the only work to have exercied such a great influence and to have survived in different channels even after being lost. He proved to be an abiding source of inspiration for the litterateurs who came after him. Such was Gunadhya's impact on literary genres that Bhoja has classified and defined Brihatkatha as a form of literature. Dhananjaya, author of Dasharupaka, advised the play-wrights to fashion the plots of new dramas on the model of the epics and Brihatkatha. The example was followed by dramatists like Harsha, Bhavabhuti and others., Even though a work of quite a different level, the Brihatkatha can be ranked only with the Ramayana and the Mahabharata in respect of being a source of inspiration for the future tradition of creative writing, an upajivya kavya.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: C.D. Chatterji, Some Observations on the Brihat-katha and its alleged relation to the Mudrarakshasa; C.H. Tawney, Kathasaritsagara, (Ocean of Story) English Trans. (1880-81); Durga Prasad & K.P. Parab, (ed.) Kathasaritsagara, Bombay, 1915; F. Lacote (ed.) Brihatkathas' lokasamgraha (Paris, 1802-29), Essai Sur Gunadhya et la Brihatkatha (Paris, 1908); J.S. Speyer, Studies About Kathasaraitsagara, (Amsterdam, 1908); Narasimhachari, Old Sanskrit Version of Brihatkatha, JRAS, (London, 1913, pp. 389-90); Shiva Datta & K.P. Parab, Brihatkathamanjari, Nirnaya Sagar, Bombay, 1901.

R.T.

BRIHATKATHAMANJARI (Sanskrit) literally means 'The Bouquet of Great Story'. It is one of the two Kashmirian adaptations of the Brihatkatha of Gunadhya, written by Kshemendra. It is divided into eight lambakas (chapters) consisting of a total number of 7,500 verses. Being of the nature of a condensed abstract, Kshemendra's compilation is rapid and dreary. At some places the story has been made factually so short that it becomes almost unintelligible. On the other hand, erotic scenes have been painted rather lavishly.

The stories of Brihatkatha were very popular in the society, so that both Budhasvamin and Kshemendra seem to anticipate in the reader a good knowledge of the story before introducing them into this great realm.

Kshemendra has written two other Manjaris also, based on the two greatest of the Indian epics, where he has faithfully adhered to the original. On this basis, it is conjectured that he must have done justice to the original work of Gunadhya. S.K. De, however, is of the opinion that both Kshemendra and Somadeva were guided by the Kashmirian Sanskrit version of Brihatkatha which has also been lost-and which deviated considerably from the Prakrit original.

R.T.

BRIHATSAMHITA (Sanskrit). True to its name, the Brihatsamhita is a large treatise, both in size and contents. It cites, (amongst other authorities) the Manusmriti (200 B.C.-200 A.D.) and Aryabhata (born in 476 A.D.). Its author Varahamihira is well known for his many-sided contribution to Jyotisha (astronomy) literature. He has contributed to all the three branches of Jyotisha-Tantra (mathematical astronomy), Hora (horoscopy), and Samhita (mundane astrology). The Brihatsamhita, also called Varahi after the author, is of course his magnum opus, and his last composition; it is a product of the author's mature age and accumulated experience. In the 106 chapters of this metrical work, Varahamihira has brought in topics of varied interests, the motions of sun, moon, planets and constellations; planetary conflicts, rainfall, prognostics from the growth of fruits and flowers, earthquake, meteors, festival of Indra's banner, waving of lights, of horses, elephants and men; residential and temple architecture, iconometry and iconography, arbori-horticulture, cosmetics and perfumery etc.On some topics like the water-springs, breaking hard rocks, etc. the Brihatsamhita is the only or the earliest source. Many chapters are of such a highly specialised nature that they were studied as independent treatises. Alberuni remembers Varahamihira as an authority on architecture. The Brihatsamhita is a monument of encyclopaedic learning and a source-book of inestimable value to a student of Indian cultural history.

The text of the Brihatsamhita was edited by Kern (Calcutta, 1864). Sudhakara Dvivedi published it along with the valuable commentary of Utpala (Benaras, 1895-97). It has been translated into English by Kern and into Arabic by Alberuni. A.M. Shastri has made a systematic and detailed study of the Brihatsamhita in his India as seen in the Brihatsamhita of Varahamihira (Delhi, 1969).

S.S.J.

BRINDABANDAS (Bengali, 16th century) is one of the best biographers of Chaitanya, almost contemporaneous with him and a direct disciple of Nityananda. The master's magnetic personality, encyclopaedic erudition, divine devotion and profound identification with the Supreme typified in the famous Radha-Krishna symbol had already turned him into an incarnation of God. The first recorded life-story is in Murari Gupta's Karcha or journal. The honour, however, goes to Brindabandas at the instance of Nityananda as the first biographer of Chaitanya in Bengali popularly known as Chaitanya Mangal or renamed later as Chaitanya Bhagavata. This is more or less, a narrative poem divided into three khandas (parts) and fifty two adhyayas (chapters).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: D.C. Sen, Vaishnava Literature of Medieval Bengal 1917.

Si.B.

BROADCASTING AND TELEVISION (Kannada). Broadcasting in Karnataka was started when the All India Radio was still in its infancy. It was started at Mysore by Gopalswami, Professor of Psychology at the Mysore University, as an experimental venture and was adopted by the then Government of Mysore in 1942. It functioned as Mysore Akashvani till 1955 when it was taken over by the Government of India and shifted to Bangalore as part of the all-India network and as the main transmitting centre for Kannada programmes. The darwar Station was started a little earlier. In recent years a few more stations have been added at Bhadravati, Gulbarga, Mangalore and Mysore which, for the most part, relay programmes from the Bangalore and Dharwar stations and originate a small number in their own. Even if primarily all these stations serve Karnataka through the Kannada medium, they also cater to the needs of other language groups such as Konkani, Tulu, Urdu and Tamil within their respective jurisdictions.

Broadcasting and Television in Karnataka as in any other State in India is entirely under the control and direction of the Government of India. As such, the policies and programmes follow an all-India pattern except that the stations in Karnataka adopt Kannada as the langauge for a majority of programmes initiated from these stations. These are supplemented by relays from Delhi which are in English or Hindi.

The programmes can be broadly categorised under three heads: dissemination of knowledge, dissemination of news, both national and regional, and programmes of cultural and entertainment value. The first two consist of talks by experts on a variety of subjects, reports of seminars and discussions and news of important developments in India and abroad, weather forecast and other details of commercial value. The programmes of cultural and entertainment value consist of music, classical and light, film and folk, as well as broadcast plays and features.

Particularly related to the literary field are programmes of talks related to literature, discussions, reviews of important publications and interviews with prominent personalities in the field. Broadcast drama has made a significant contribution. Since it can only be heard and not seen, the writing of such plays demands a particular technique in which everything has to be conveyed though the spoken word and other sound effects. The broadcast play therefore, as a form of dramatic writing has developed in Kannada only after the arrival of the Radio Stations. Broadcasting may therefore claim credit for having originated and fostered a new literary form–the Radio Play or Feature. H.K. Ranganath, S.N. Sivaswami, N.K. Kulkarni and Kavali, all of whom have served in the All-India Radio for years, have contributed significantly to this branch of writing in Kannada. Many other writers have occasionally contributed either new plays for broadcast or adaptations of their stories and novels. Operas and musical features by writers like P.T. Narasimhachar and Shivaram Karanth have succeeded in enriching broadcast drama in Kannada with music. Another notable programme almost regularly broadcast is the singing or recitation of poetical compositions both contemporary and classical. This has helped in bringing to the listeners the works of new poets as well as old favourites. In addition, Kavi Sammelans are arranged on special occasions at which poets read or recite their own compositions.

Apart from programmes designed from the cultural or entertainment point of view, there are three other types which are intended to serve audiences, like school children, industrial workers and agriculturists. The school broadcasts are educative in character and convey information related to but outside the framework of their syllabi. The other two discuss problems connected with the life and work of those particular classes of the population. The agricultural forum particularly, is a regular daily feature and is intended to provide answers and offer suggestions to solve the many questions the working farmer has to face in the pursuit of his occupation.

Television in Karnataka is a comparatively recent arrival and has yet to establish itself to make its full impact. In the meantime, except for a very small number of original programmes, most programmes are relayed either from Madras or Delhi over a number of relay centres spread all over the State. Television has vast potentialities of popular appeal and it remains to be seen how usefully this powerful medium is going to be utilised. Being, like broadcasting, totally under the control of the Government, it is possible that redtape should stifle its creative potentialities. Only the future can reveal what Television can do in India.

V.M.I.

BROADCASTING AND T.V. (Konkani). Radio has contributed to the growth of Konkani literature immensely. In fact, the language got recognition by the Government of India in 1953 through the commencement of the Konkani section at the Bombay station of the All India Radio. Originally, the idea behind this was to rebut the anti-India propaganda of the Portuguese Government being aired through the then Goa Radio (Emissora da Goa). Somehow it was felt that Konkani was the right vehicle for the purpose. It is difficult to assess how much really was achieved in this direction. However, in the process the language and literature prospered with writers, lyricists, musicians, singers, etc., giving expression to their arts in Konkani. Konkani speaking community in Bombay, Goans in particular, got a forum which they did well to explore. Due credit for starting this section in right earnest goes to the then Prime Minister, Jawaharlal Nehru. He was advised in this matter by eminent Konkani protagonists like Kaka Kalelkar, B.B. Borkar and P.M. Lad, the Secretary in the Ministry of Information and Broadcasting. The contribution of Vishnu Naik in producing the programmes and running the section effectively and efficiently was immeasurable. Poets and lyricists like Manohar Rai, Vaman Sardesai (Abhijit), Yashwant Kelekar, etc. and Jitendra Abhisheki, the noted vocalist and composer, were some of those who fed the radio with necessary material. Mention must also be made of great contribution by stalwarts, like Fr. H.O. Mascarenhas, Alex Braganza, Vishwambhar Usgaokar, etc. The second line of Konkani activists included Shankar Bhandari, Krishna Karwar, Uday Bhembro, A. Na. Mhambro, etc.

The liberation of Goa shifted the focal point of Konkani activity to Goa with the Panaji station of the Radio contributing its due share. In due course of time, Konkani got its due place at this station and today it is the main language of programmes and announcements. Apart from the Bombay station which broadcasts news and other programmes spanning an hour per day, Konkani is represented also at radio stations at Delhi, Mangalore, Dharwad, Trichur, Alleppey, Calicut and Trivandrum. Most of the renowned writers and poets have worked with the All India Radio at some time or the other, some of them still continue to do so. This has gone a long way in the development of Konkani literature via the radio. In the absence of organized publishing activity and lack of regular magazines and periodicals most of the writing in Konkani is not yet seen in print. However, a large part of the literature seen in print in magazines or books often carries footnotes acknowledging the courtesy of the radio. This is enough proof of how much the Konkani literature depends on the broadcasting system.

Television has not yet been able to give any significant coverage or representation to Konkani. One reason is that, Goa, Konkani's heartland does not as yet have its own television centre.

P.G.T.

BROADCASTING AND TELEVISION (Punjabi). The role played by Akashvani and Door Darshan in promoting understanding and awareness about the Punjabi language and culture, has been, by far the most effective. Although the main aim of mass media is to educate, inform and entertain, its powerful impact had made tremendous effect upon the language, literature and culture of Punjab. The Punjabi literature, hitherto used didactic, pedantic and verbose language, for their literary expression. However, the new media refused to follow the age old diction and modified it in such a manner that it was understood and appreciated by both the intelligentsia and the common man. This gave birth to a new powerful spoken-word medium, usually called the broadcast language. It is very much like the Hindustani of the Bombay Films which has resulted from an intermingling of many languages. The broadcast language, too, became the common language of the people. As it was different from the written word, it became more colloquial and suitable to cater to the taste of the people representing different strata of the society. Before we discuss the impact of this media on Punjabi literature, it would be interesting to study the origin of Punjabi Broadcasts over Radio & TV.

The great influx of refugees coming from Western Pakistan, after partition in 1947, brought with it the colossal problems of rehabilitation. Thousands of families had been uprooted and scattered all over the country. It was almost impossible to reach them. The need of the hour was to contact them and instill in them the faith and hope for the future. It was a tremedous task which the ordinary media could hardly cope with. Realising the importance and magnitude of the task, the All India Radio, immediately pressed into service their Transmitters at Delhi and started a programme of Refugee messages which rendered yeoman service in bringing together the seperated families. This fact finds a mention in 'Maa Pio Jaye'—a novel by Kartar Singh Duggal

Taking into consideration the popularity of the message, the transmission was converted into a regular daily Punjabi Programme. During wars with China and Pakistan, the Punjabi Programme of Delhi station was used effectively and imaginatively, to counter the anti-national propaganda.

Soon after partition when the Lahore Radio Station could no longer be used by the Indian Authorities, it was felt that a new station must originate programmes in Punjabi for settlers in East Punjab. As it was, one fine morning Sh. Iqbal Singh vetern broadcaster and Sh. K.S. Duggal the well known author, who were both on the staff of All India Radio, were hurriedly dumped into a chartered plane at Jullunder, while the streets of Jullunder town were still agog with the haunting sounds of the passing caravans of refugees, limping through Grand Trunk Road. They went hunting all over the town and were finally successful in establishing a make shift studio in the garages of the then Chief Minister Sh. Gopichand Bhargava and started broadcast of Punjabi Programme. On 16th May 1949 the Jullunder station of All India Radio was formally inaugurated by the then Minister of Information and Broadcasting.

Literary figures like Amrita Pritam, Kartar Singh Duggal, B.S. Anand, Iqbal Singh, Surjit Singh Sethi, S.S. Misha, Lochan Buxi and Devinder who are established authors in their own literary fields, have been on the staff of AIR. They planned, organised & executed a plethora of programmes reflecting the life and culture of Punjab.

The impact of radio on Punjabi culture and vice versa is a story of mutual give and take. It is evident through the writings of those authors who have been associated with the media. Radio plays written by Duggal, Devinder, Sethi, G.S. Randhir and Harsaran Singh adapted the specific language suitable for broadcast medium. B.S. Anand's 'The Cruel Interlude' is a graphic commentry on the political upheavel caused by partition. Lochan in his short stories has made use of the typical spoken word, which has hightened his artistic skill. Playwrights, like G.S. Khosla, Balwant Gargi & Jassoja have also contributed to dramatic broadcasts, although their preliminary love for the stage has limited their contribution to radio. Similarly Sant Singh Sekhon has stuck to his guns and has continued to use his plays as the vehicle of literary expression. A fine example of the intermingling of radio art and literary expression may be seen through the well known story of Duggal entitled "Kahani Kiven Bani" which continues to be as powerful a story as it was originally conceived as a radio Drama.

Almost all the Punjabi authors have been associated with the media. Some of them were discovered by AIR and for the first time introduced through AIR programme. Ironically enough, an O.B. Programme arranged through the courtesy of AIR, Jullunder, discovered late Shiv Batalvi, known in Punjabi literature as the King of Pathos and late Inderjit Singh Tulsi, who later on became Raj Kavi of Punjabi.

The literary programmes in Punjabi, broadcast by Jullunder and Delhi Stations of AIR, consist of Talks, Drama & Music, representing a fair variety of Punjabi Culture. It is a pity that AIR as a department never thought of collecting and systemtising the valuable information, so painstakingly arranged and broadcast by the distinguished talkers. Unfortunately this was left to broadcasters, who thought of publishing their broadcast earlier were also reproduced by literary magazines and journals. Radio has also influenced printing in their columns. Indeed it was a two way service, where thoughts and ideas were exchanged between journalists and broadcasters. It may be added that the media gave impetus to the writers and poets to use their talents for boosting the morale of the masses during Indo-Pak and Indo-China conflicts. Thus radio gave birth to a new type of literature exclusively dealing with hero-worship, national integration and patriotism.

The two stations of Radio Kashmir, Jammu and Srinagar are broadcasting programmes in Punjabi for a duration of 30 minutes each on 4 days a week. External Services Division of AIR, which is primarily concerned with foreign audiences, addresses its programme to Punjabi settlers abroad, for 60 minutes every day.

An auxiliary studio of Door Darshan was put up in Amritsar on Nov. 29, 1973, but its programmes were pre-recorded at Delhi and fed to Amritsar. However, it was on the auspicious Baisakhi day of 1979 that the studios at Jullunder were finally commissioned. It is mainly a Punjabi Station which caters to a population of more than a crore.

With the coming up of the 2nd channel of Delhi Door Darshan, the long outstanding demand of the viewers in Delhi, has been partially fulfilled and it has started with a weekly programme.

News bulletin in Punjabi is orginated by the News Services Division of AIR.

The telecast of Punjabi News is done daily from Jullunder also.

L.S.B.

BROADCASTING AND T.V. (Tamil). Radio as well as TV programmes have made a great impact on the Tamil literary scene. In particular, they have led to a synthesis of spoken dialects with the written form of the language.

Voice culture has been developed. However, there is difference of opinion about the way Tamil words are pronounced by the announcers and other staff artists.

Radio talks given by a writer–scholar over a period of time and in different stations are collected and published as books. Apart from this, publishers bring out collections of serial speeches on a particular subject by different individuals. The nominal payment of royalty to AIR has encouraged such publishing.

Among the early morning programmes are talks on devotional subjects and exposition of Thirukkural.

Of the more popular evening programmes, pride of place goes to drama, in radio as well as TV. The plays meant for reading have, in the last two decades, given place to the plays written for acting in radio stations or TV studios. Professional as well as amateur playwrights are writing plays for telecast. The short-story writers and novelists are trying to adapt themselves to write TV plays.

Special literary meets are organised by Radio as well as TV and conducted before invited audience. These have earned great significance. Equally important are the increasingly popular poets' forums, debates (Patti-Manram), IIam Thenral (which gives maiden opportunity for the budding poet), interviews with eminent writers and book review programmes done by select persons.

Yet another feature looked forward to in Radio and TV by the intelligentsia as well as literary enthusiasts is the edited proceedings of Kamban Conferences and various other literary functions held throughout the state and on week-ends all the year round.

The Pondicherry station is making full use of the poets who have emerged as the Bharati Dasan School and the writers who have imbibed Tamil culture as well as French Culture. The Coimbatore station of AIR is noted for its innovative programmes. 'Naal Oru Aringar' (A new scholar every day) brings out to the listener a wealth of information on talented people. A 13-week orientation programme for youngsters aims at helping them to avoid grammatical mistakes in speech and writing.

Radio Malaysia scrupulously avoids non-Tamil words in Tamil programmes. This has resulted in coinage of hundreds of new words, most of which have now been accepted in Tamil usage everywhere.

Sankaramurti who is associated with Tamil Osai Programme in BBC since 1967 has rendered into Tamil, the drama of Shakespeare as well as some Greek plays.

So.

BROKER, GULABDAS (Gujarati; b. 1909,) has done distinguished work in Gujarati literature. His compositions have been translated into many Indian and foreign languages. Gulabdas Broker has created his own special world in nearly thirty books of his, besides giving a good glimpse of Indian and world literature through his other twenty translated and edited books. He is particularly known for his excellent stories. He has successfully tried his hand at the literary forms like one-act play, novel, travelogue, criticism, journalism, life-portrait, history, biography, etc. Deep observation of human nature and the meaningful search of life are the special characteristics of the works of Gulabdas Broker; the way in which he has dug through the man-woman relationship, should be considered his exclusive accomplishment. His insight into reality, pen portraiture of emotions, complexities of sexual life, psychological approach, meaningful dialogues, apt description, rich narration and technique suggest the extent of his achievements.

Nearly fifty of his books are an important contribution to Indian literature. Some of these are: Lata Ane Biji La vato (Lata and Other Stories), Vasundhara Ubhivate, (The earth), Dhumraser (The Smoky Way, with D.K. Mehta), Surya, etc.

Gulabdas Broker was born at Porbunder. His father Harijivandas Nemidas was a share-broker in the share market. His family name 'Dalal' translated into Broker in English became his surname. He passed his childhood and boyhood days in Porbunder.

The literary activities of Gulabdas began to widen when he was in jail as a freedom fighter in 1932-33. Even though the field of short stories was exclusively his own, he involved himself successfully in other fields of literature as well. As soon as he entered the field of drama, his interest began to grow. He remained a co-editor of a quarterly magazine One-Act Play with Jayanti Dalal. In 1956 his play Jwalaniagni (Flaming Fire) received a prize from the Government of Bombay.

He has been a member of the Gujarati Advisory Board of the Sahitya Akademi since 1956. In 1959, he went to Frankfurt in Germany as a representative of India to the P.E.N. International Conference.

When he went to Germany, he also travelled through the continent. Then in 1962 at the invitation of an American institution, he went to America as a writer from India. In 1963 he went to Germany at the invitation of the West German Government for three weeks. This travel of Europe-America gave Gujarati a travelogue Under the New Sky.

The literary personality of Gulabdas Broker calls for a special attention to his distinctive qualities: vigilance and harmony.

Even though he is a writer of the Gandhian era, he is familiar with the latest trends of literature - not only of the Gujarati literature but of the Western literary currents as well. Gulabdas Broker welcomed the unfamiliar new current in Gujarati literature by writing an introduction to the collection of short stories, Home Coming. His article 'From an Inner Essence' can be cited as an example. Because of this he is considered to be a connecting link between the writers of the Gandhian era and the modern times.

While going through his best stories, one enjoys a feeling that Gulabdas Broker is a born story-writer. The art of story-telling courses in his veins. Through it he sometimes shows us a glimpse of society which we may miss. The alchemy of reality and idealism discernible in the stories of Gulabdas is not very often seen in other Gujarati story writers. His place is among the greatest Gujarati authors, like R.V. Pathak, Dhumketu, Umashankar, Sundaram, Jayanti Dalal and Pannalal.

His observation of life's flow is deep and minute. He has a knack to transform all this experience into art. In the matter of language, he is careful and his style of expression is natural and subtle. In these stories the creative use of prose is noteworthy.

Gulabdas, the story writer loves man much so that his mind's layers open one after another before him. Because of this he is able to capture the moments of crisis correctly. The design of his story rests on this. From this a definite image of an impressive story is born. From this point of view the anatomy of story becomes interesting. Skilful piling of events, easy and flowing style of story telling, proportionate characterisation, ability and aptitude to fathom the depth of man's mind and his own angle of vision—all these create a special attraction for Gulabdas Broker's world of short stories.

The deftness of plan and the revelation of secret purport of life in his one-act plays are penetrating. In his poems even though he may not be a major poet, he is found leisurely enjoying the ephemeral and sweet moments of life.

Y.T.

BRONSON, MILES (Assamese; b. 1812, d. 1883) joined Christian missionary life in 1836. As Nathan Brown, who had just started evangelical work in the north-eastern corner of Assam at Sadiya, wanted a few members of the Order to work among the Singphos of the area and as Colonel. F. Jenkins, the Commissioner, also wrote to the American Board, Bronson and Jacob Thomas were deputed to Sadiya. Bronson experienced much hardship due to illness as he rowed up the wild Brahmaputra from Calcutta and his companion died in the river by accident. Bronson reached Sadiya on 17th July, 1837. As in April, 1839 the Khamtis rebelled, Bronson with his wife moved to another post, Jaipur. There he wrote a Spelling Book, The Catechism, etc., in the Nocte tongue, and living with the tribe opened an Assamese medium school. As he had terrible fever in May, 1840 he was put into a boat and carried to the erstwhile Ahom capital, Sibsagar. But he proceeded further west and made his station at Nowgong, where he opened schools and an orphanage from which came out the first generation of Assam valley Christians. This new move is known in Assam's Christian annals as the Nowgong Revial. The magnificent Orphan institute was pulled down at the instigation of Soloman Peck, Secretary of the American Board, and this was a hard hit on Bronson. But Bronson already had taken up the study of the Assamese language which he was also teaching now. He was in Sibsagar, the headquarters of the mission, from March to October, 1853, when he probably had to edit the Baptists' Assamese journal-cum-newspaper, Orunodoi, because the editor Brown was absent on a visit to Burma. As Brown left Assam in January, 1855, Bronson had to shoulder the responsibility of building up an agitation in favour of the Assamese language with a view to its reinstatement in Assam schools and courts, where it was substituted by Bengali since 1837. After twelve years of very hard labour Bronson published his Asamiya aru Ingraji Abhidan (Assamese-English Dictionary) in 1867. He continued the struggle for the survival of Assamese; he was the leader and the main spirit behind the efforts, which were ultimately crowned with success in 1873 when Assamese was ordered to be the medium of education and the official language in the Assam valley. He was in active evangelical service till the end of the eighth decade of the 19th century when he sailed back to the States, and died in the Michigan State. Bronson wrote regularly for the Orunodoi (1846) and composed a number of beautiful Christian hymnals in Assamese which are still sung. Earlier he published his Vocabulary in English, Assamese Singpho and Naga (1839) and Phrases in English and Singpho (1840); but his monumental work, which gave the Assamese language a great fillip in its struggle for academic and official existence, was his Assamese and English Dictionary (1867).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Dimbeswar Neog, Adhunik Asamiya Sahityar Buranji, Jorhat, 1937; V.H. Sword, Baptists in Assam, Chicago, 1935.

M.N.

BROWN, CHARLES PHILIP (Telugu; b. 1798. d. 1884) was born in Calcutta. His father, David Brown, was a church official. He encouraged his son to learn Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Arabic and Hindusthani. Enough foundation was thus laid for his future activities. He used to help his father in reading his proofs. After his father's death, he went to England but returned to India in 1817. He lived in Madras Presidency, particularly in the Telugu speaking area till his retirement in 1855 as an employee of the East India Company. He came into contact with Telugu and was very much attracted by its beauty and splendour. He rendered invaluable services to it in spite of the heavy responsibilities he had to discharge as a company official.

He brought to light Vemana's verses and got them published. He translated them into English in 1829. Vavilla Press published them with his commentary in English. He collected several palm leaf manuscripts and made them available to the reading public. Native pandits like Appaiah Pantulu Juluri, Gurumurti Sastri Ravipati, and Advita Brahma Sastri Vatyam assisted him in his magnificent endeavour. Great 'Prabandhas' like Manucharitra and Vasu Charitra were published with annotations and commentaries because of his effort. He endeavoured to produce English-Telugu and Telugu- English dictionaries in order to help the Telugus wishing to learn English and the Englishmen wishing to learn Telugu respectively. He published them in 1852-53 and the Misrabhasha Nighantuvu in 1854. The former two dictionaries were of immense service to the Telugu people and they were reprinted in 1984 by the Asian Educational Services, Delhi and by the Andhra Pradesh Sahitya Akademi.

He also published a grammar of Telugu in English in 1840. He prepared Telugu Readers for the use of students, wrote articles on prosody and other matters, some chronological tables pertaining to the Hindu and Muslim rulers and some write-ups on Christianity.

He collected a number of palm leaf manuscripts and worked tirelessly for setting up schools and running them. He had numerous friends among Andhra intellectuals of the time. One of them was Enugula Veeraswamiah who was among the first writers on tourism. With the help of his scholar friends he brought to light many aspects of Indian culture.

He left for England in 1855 after his retirement from service. But even there he continued his efforts in the service of Telugu. For a time he occupied the chair for Telugu in the London University and converted his household into an educational centre.

V.S.K.A.

BROWN, NATHAN (Assamese; b. 1807, d. 1886). The central figure and a sort of prima mobile among the Christian or Orunodoi circle of Assamese writers of the 19th century is Reverent Nathan Brown, the first editor of the Baptist journal-cum-newspaper the Orunodoi (1846 - 1854). His scholarship, his realistic consciousness about the surroundings and his Christian piety brought a new value to the epoch. Graduating in his twentieth year, he worked as a teacher for some time, after which he was ordained and he reached Moulmein in Burma, as a missionary in 1833. At the request of Col. F. Jenkins, Commissioner of Assam, the American Board sent Brown to Sadiya to build a Shan Mission there. He was accompanied by Oliver T.Cutter with a small printing-press. They reached Sadiya on 23 March, 1836. Brown learnt the Shan language of Burma even as he was sailing up the Brahmaputra and realised soon that the earlier notion of the identity of the Khamti and Singpho dialects of Assam and of the languages of Northern Burma was only a fallacy. The gates of the Celestial Empire too were barricaded by insurmountable ranges of mountains. But Brown soon acquired Assamese and could teach in that language and preach in it by 1837 and started translating the New Testament in 1838. The Gospel of Matthew was ready in Assamese and he expected to translate the books of Mark, Luke and John also very soon. He chose the Roman script for primers in Khamti and Singpho. The year 1839 saw the Khamti rising against the English. Brown with his company left Sadiya in May that year and joined Rev. Miles Bronson at Jaipur, and then moved to Sibsagar in July, 1841. There he worked quietly writing songs, books and tracts in Assamese; he edited Orunodoi, till December, 1854. He published his Assamese version of the New Testament and Grammatical Notices of the Assamese Language in 1848. When the Baptist Association of Assam was established in 1851 he became its president. Under his own stewardship were started quite a few Assamese–medium schools in Sibsagar and other places, and he saw to the making of books for teaching but as Soloman Peck, the deputy of the American Board disapproved this teaching programme, Brown was offended and he resigned his missionary duty and left Sibsagar for home on 13 February, 1855. Back in the States he edited the American Baptist and fought against slavery. He left for Japan in 1873 once again as a missionary, where he did the New Testament into Japanese. At first led into the notion that Assamese was only a patois of Bengali, he soon discovered the identity, beauty and richness of the Assam tongue, and became its votary. His studies and exercises in the languages gave it great courage to stand up and fight. He was also the pioneer in the collection of manuscripts and their editing and publishing. He published quite a few linguistic studies in the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, Journal of the America Oriental Society, etc. In his own journal Orunodoi, and his Assamese writings he enunciated and put into practice the simplification of spelling according to the pronunciation by reducing the double vowels to the shorter single and the aspirates to one. Even though his orthographic reform did not persist, he is still remembered as one of those bright men who laboured for the rehabilitation of the Assamese language in the face of the administrative onslaught on it in the mid-19th century.

BIBLIOGRAPHY Dimbeswar Neog, Adhunik Asamiya Sahityar Buranji, Jorhat 1937; V.H. Sword, Baptists in Assam, Chicago, 1935.

M.N.

BRUHAD PINGAL (Gujarati) is a book on Gujarati metres by Ramnarayan Pathak (1887-1955). It is a monumental work on Gujarati prosody. In the earlier works on prosody, the authors had discussed prosody in Gujarati based on traditional concepts. Moreover, the earlier authors did not cover the entire field of prosody, as they had left out metres in Jain poetry. Pathak has covered the entire field and he has given in fifteen chapters of the book his own cogent and coherent conception of the subject and in the appendices at the end of each chapter he has discussed in detail, questions arising from the conception itself, or matters distantly related to the conception. He has covered the entire poetic ages of medieval and modern literature, and given a picture of the historical evolution of the metres. Since his approach is novel and as it deals with metres used in most of the Indian languages the author has got the book printed in Devnagari script so that scholars of prosody in other Indian languages can also consider and assess the theory and methodology advanced by Pathak. The book won the Sahitya Akademi award for the year 1956.

C.M.

BUCCIBABU (Telugu; b. 1916, d. 1967) was an eminent short-story writer and novelist. His real name was Sivaraju Venkata Subba Rao. Born in a middle-class Brahmin family, educated at Guntur and Madras, he studied English literature for his M.A. at the Madras and Nagpur Universities, and taught in the colleges at Anantapur and Visakhapatnam (1943-45) before joining the All India Radio as Programme Assistant in 1945. His stories first appeared in Bharati, Navodaya, Yuva and other journals. They were published in several collections many times by different publishers. A series of 18 volumes was brought out by the Adarsha Grandha Mandali, Vijayawada, with three stories in each volume (1967). They are Asapriya, Amenida, Desam Na Kichina Sandesam, Na Gajumeda, Jnana-netram, Kala-chakram Nilichindi, Madu Kotulu, Kala-lo Jarina, Kanniru, Ellora Aruguru, Kathakalu Oka Nayika, Tadimanta-ki Podi Nillu, Tera, capa Dinchina Padava, Russel-ki Ankitamaina Rendu Kathalu, Yuva Pasam, Udina, Chakram, Vadani-pushpam, Anuraga-prastharam, Paschattapam Ledu, Poga-leni Nippu. Man-woman relationship dominates Buccibabu's stories. The psychological depth in delineation of character, fascinates the reader. There is a quest for the meaning of life, a reverence before its mystery, and above all a compassion for human frailty in the stories, which make their appeal universal.

Buccibabu's favourite predilection is to portray the passage of time and the changes wrought in the central character by time. Therefore quite a few stories read like mini-novels. In Asapriya and in Nannu Gurinchi Katha Rayavu, the heroines change not by the impact of events, but by sheer passage of time. In some stories, he uses characters as signs or symbols. The story Meda-mettlu has three names for its heroine appearing at different phases of life: Dhanan, Sarasvati and Rani, indicating her orientation towards wealth, knowledge and power respectively. In relationship with the heroine are delineated two men called the Possessor (Adhikari), the husband and the luckless one (Dar-bhagyudu) the lover. The story reads like a curious riddle with a solution embedded in it. Buccibabu as a storywriter has a number of followers.

The novel Chivaraku-migiledi is Buccibabu's magnum opus. Serialized in Navodaya (1946-47) and published in book-form in 1952, it became a best seller in its abridged version (1957) published by Adarsa Grantha Mandali subsidized by the Southern Languages Book Trust. Chivaraku-migiledi is a psychological novel with a hero who has a mother-fixation (Dayanidhi), whose quest for woman involves him in a conflict with society, and results in an agonizing reappraisal of life's values and finally leads him to self-knowledge, acceptance and peace. The novel yields meaning on several levels.

Buccibabu also wrote radio-plays and literary essays. He experimented with the stream of consciousness technique in one of his stories. His book, reviewing Shakespeare's works in Telugu, was awarded a prize by the Andhra Pradesh Sahitya Akademi. Antaranga Kathanamu, an autobiography is incomplete but yields interesting information about his childhood. Ajnanam is a prose-poem which is not well-known. Buccibabu is later years developed a flair for painting as a hobby.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: D. Vidyesvari, Telugu Navala Manovislesana (Hyderabad, 1980); Koduri Sriramamurty, Telugu Navala Sahityamlo Manovislesana (Rajahmundry, 1979); P. Padmaraju and others, Telugu Katha (Andhra Sarasvata Samiti, Machilipatnam) 1974); Pullabhotla Venkateswarlu, Telugu Navala Sahitya Vikasamu (Khammam, 1974); R.S. Sudarshanam, Samajanu-Sahityamu (Chittoor, 1972).,

R.S.S.

BUDDHA AND HIS LEGEND (Pali). Buddha (clan name Siddhartha Gautama) of Gotama clan (gotra), son of Shuddhodana elected ruling chief of the Shakya republic of Kapilavastu (modern, Piprahwa in Basti district) in the 6th entury B.C., lying in the southern belt of the Nepalese Terai, adjoining the modern Indian region in the Basti and Gorakhpur district of Uttar Pradesh, was born at Lumbini or Romindei (in Nepal) on the full moon day of Vaishakha in 563 B.C. The Shakyas claimed to be the descendants of Ikshvakus of the lineage of the great Rama, the hero of the Valmikiramayana and an incarnation (avatara) of Vishnu in the Tretayuga.

Prince Siddhartha was brought up in a rich, pleasant and lovely royal atmosphere but from his very childhood, he become unhappy with the world which was full of suffering, old age, decay, death and destruction. He was, as it followed, ordered to be kept aloof from the sufferings of the world and in the mansions of his father Shuddhodana, he was made to enjoy only the delightful lively pleasures of the world. One day it so happened that when Prince Siddhartha went on a routine visit of his kingdom with his charioteer, he saw in the way an old man, a corpse, a sick person and a hermit and after coming back he decided to discover the cause of suffering and show a way to the human beings to get deliverance from it. All efforts of his father, the royal delightful pleasures of the world, the young wife Yashodhara and the newly born son Rahula's affection, and also the affection of his step-mother Gotami who had reared him after the death of his mother Maya Devi who had died just after his birth, could not deter him from renouncing the world. One day, at the age of twenty-eight, in the night of the full-moon day of Vaishakha, Prince Siddhartha, went away from his royal mansions leaving his wife and son sleeping. This is known as the great departure (Mahabhinishkramana) in the life of Siddhartha Gotama. He wandered for several years in search of a real teacher, and went to Arada Kalama, the great Samkhya teacher of the time and many other teachers proficient in various shastras and sadhana-paddhatis leading to the realisation of truth. Dissatisfied with them, he went to the bank of river Niranjana (Pali-Neranjara) at Bodhgaya and practised self-mortifying penances for twelve full years. One day he became unconscious and a local girl Sujata gave him Payasa (rice cooked in milk), and when he ate it, beneath the great banyan tree where he was practising austere penances, he came to realise that truth can neither be realised and attained through attachment towards worldly pleasures, nor by self-torturing penances, but it could be realised by practising the 'middle way', (majjhimapatipada, skt. madhyama pratipada) adhering to neither of these two extremes. Mara, the deterring factor representing the devilish activities, created various hindrances, but in the end, through his manifold intuitive insight acquired through continued concentration of mind in the form of various dhyanas, he became enlightened (buddha) after a flash of Truth at midnight on a full-moon day of the month of Vaishakha and realised not only the root-cause of suffering, its origin from craving (trishna, Pali-tanhha) and the way of eradicating it, but he also realised the root-cause of the worldly texture as well as the knowledge of his innumerable previous births.

Thus, Gautama became Buddha, the enlightened one after realising the Truth in its totality.

The Buddha preached the truth discovered and realised by him to the suffering humanity for whose deliverance he had strived to realise it. He gave his first sermon to the Panchavargiya Bhikshus at Sarnatha's Mrigadavavana. In his first sermon, the Enlightened One taught that the Tathagata, the Thus-gone, Buddha realised the four Noble Truths (Chattari Ariya Sachchani) concerned with suffering (dukkham); its origin (dukkha sammudayo) from craving (tanha, skt. trishna) which explains the origin, decay and destruction of the five constituents (Khandhas) of the human personality (namely rupa, vedana, vinnana, sanna and sankhara) through the twelve causal links of avidya, samskara, vijnana, namarupa, shadayatana, sparsha, vedana, trishna upadana, bhava, jati, jaramarana, duhkha, daurmanasya, upayasa and upaklesha and its cessatiuon (duhkha-nirodho), and the way leading to the cessation of suffering (dukkhanirodhagaminipatipada), namely the eightfold noble path (ariya atthangiko maggo).

The main crux of the teachings of the Buddha was that all that is visible is full of suffering (sabbanidukkham), is evanascent and mutable (sabbamanichcham) and is void of its own instrinstic character (Sabbam Shunnam).There is no permanent entity whatsoever nor is there any permanent conscious soul (atta). The doctrine of the non-egoism best signifies the attitude of the Buddha towards the rejection of any permanent entity. Buddha preached only those doctrines which were conducive to the attainment of the ultimate deliverance from suffering namely nibbana.

The Buddha preached these doctrines for full forty years of his life, after the attainment of Bodhi. His was the most attractive and enigmatic personality who was easily approachable to all. He attracted all sorts of people, from various walks of life; the king, the ministers, the businessmen, the laity, the oppressed, the destitute, all approached him as his was a religion full of compassion for all and sundry, without discrimination for anybody.

The great Compassionate One, the Buddha, who had a good number of monks as his followers headed by his cousin Ananda, Sariputta and Moggallana breathed his last and attained the Great Liberation (mahaparinibbana) at the ripe age of eighty years on the fullmoon day in the month of Vaishakha at Kushinara (modern Kushinagara in Deoria district of Uttar Pradesh) in 483 B.C. The teachings of the Buddha were reported to the monks who assembled just after his death and collected in the three Pitakas, the Sutta, the Abhidhamma and the Vinaya finalised at a later stage in the Mahasamgitis, the great councils convened by the adherents of the Buddhist faith at different periods of time. When the compilation of the reported sayings of the Master was taken up after his death, it is supposed that a lot of material other than the actual sayings of the Buddha was added to it as his reported sayings.

Thus the historical Buddha who was in all probability, an actual man who permeated from the very beginnings of the formation and development of Buddhist Church, was regarded a trans-empirical entity (Lokottara) at a certain stage. He came to be identified with the dhamma he taught. One learns that towards the end of his life, when asked by a disciple "Whom shall we approach in moments of doubt after your death", the Buddha replied, 'the dhamma will be your torch-light, your guide, you yourselves will be your guides (Mahaparinibbanasutta, Dighanikaya). There is dhammata which is beyond speculative logical dogmas, understandable only by those having discursive knowledge at their command, it is quintessent, unfathomable and understood with difficulty.' (Brahmajalasutta, Dighanikaya).

Such was the transformation of history into a legend which became a part of the people's life.

The Mahasamghikas who evolved as a radically liberal group among his adherents developed a branch which regarded the Buddha as trans-empirical (lokottara) and this offshoot of the Buddhist Church came to be recognised as the sect leading to the rise of Mahayanism. The Buddhist samgha was divided into eighteen sub-divisions or sects (nikayas) and the transcendent (lokottara) character of the Buddha was one of reasons the for this division.

Buddha became the central theme of a vast literature comprising tales, poems and dramas. The traditional account of the Buddha's life consists of a substratum of historical facts upon which have been superimposed successive layers of 'legendary material' which is mostly fictitious. At least three distinct categories of material are found added to the historical stem of the life of the Master: (a) episodes which are legendary in the common men's view of the term, that is, which though represented as historical, did not really take place; (b) episodes that violate certain scientific notion of the possibility of their occurring; and (c) those which though presented in the form of external, historical events, in fact symbolise spiritual truths and experiences. Due to certain exaggerations in the analysis of the basic teachings of the Master, their development in the form of idealised doctrinal interpretations, and lastly the development of the various concepts and trends into off-shoots of the system were grossly responsible for the development of the personality of the Buddha into a legendary one.

Thus, three kayas (literally bodies, forms) of the Buddha were conceived instead of one. The historical kaya was named nirmanakaya, while the dharmakaya was regarded the real 'dharma' of the Buddha as indescribable and was indentified with the Absolute (parmarthasatya). The sambhogakaya was conceived of as the subtle body of the Buddha meant for the role of the Buddha as a preacher.

In view of these developments, the teachings of the Buddha were interpreted in a two-fold way, the nitartha or the real import of the Master's teachings and neyartha or the empirical import of his teachings. Similarly various Buddhist tenets came to be interpreted in view of these developed phases which were based on the interpretation of the Buddha's teachings in view of the ideals imposed on it through various legends.

The doctrine of the two or three grades of truth namely, the samvriti (Loka-aloka tathya mithya) and paramartha, as well as the parikalpita paratantra and parinishpannalakshana satyas and a development of the mantrayana from the Paramitayana and of the Tantrayana–the kalachakrayana and the sahajayana are distinct developments based on the legendary aspect of Buddha's personality. It is against this background that the Sarvastivada, the Mahasamghika, the Mahayana, and the Tantrayana traditions have their separate canons with different places of the instructions of the Buddha with different interlocutors changed from site to site. Thus three turning points in the history of Buddhism are said to have occurred, at Sarnatha, at Gridhrakuta and at several places in the Tantric texts. This led to the growth of an enormous literature on Buddhist theme in Sanskrit and mixed Sanskrit which even travelled to the South and East Asian countries and much of this literature is either preserved in translations and manuscripts or is lost to modern scholarship.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: E.J. Thomes, Life of the Buddha, Oxford, 1928., G.C. Pande, A Studies in the Origin of Buddhism, Allahbad, 1957. N. Dutt, Mahayana Buddhism, New Delhi, 1978., Sangharakahita The Three Jewels, London 1967.,

K.S.

BUDDHA GAN O DOHA (Bengali) are some of the mystic and esoteric songs and short lyrics believed to have been composed by some Buddhist tantrics, Siddhacharyas (spiritual masters who attained 'siddhi' or the final goal) of 8th to 12th centuries. The short lyrics, generally called 'Dohas' (couplets and quatrains), were written in the Avahattha or Laukika language, the proto-vernacular stage of Apabhramsha. They were specially known as 'Vajra-giti' (the song of the bolt). The mystic songs were termed 'Charya-giti' (play-part songs or 'songs on practices'). They were written in Old Bengali, rather in Proto-Bengali language. According to Sukumar Sen, these mystic Charya songs are "the only connected and copious specimens of the earliest literary productions in a New Indo Aryan speech", and as such they are priceless treasures of Eastern Indian literature.

The text of the mystic songs contained in an elaborate commentary in Sanskrit by Munidatta, was discovered in 1907 by Haraprasad Shastri in a post-14th century palm-leaf manuscript preserved in the Darbar Library of Nepal (now, the National Archives of Nepal). The manuscript has been written in Old Bengali script and each page of it contains five lines. There were in all fifty songs in the manuscript, but only 46 songs and half of one are now available. The original Charya songs and the Sanskrit commentary were tranlated into Tibetan in the 14th century. The songs were rendered into Tibetan by Silachari and the commentary written by Kirit-chandra (or Chandra-Kirti). In the Tibetan translation, the three lost songs and the concluding portion of the 23rd song of the Nepal manuscript can be found.

In 1907, Haraprasad Shastri discovered three more manuscripts from the Darbar Library of Nepal. Those were the Doha-Kosha of Saroja Vajra or Saraha-pada and its Sanskrit commentary Sahajamnaya-panjika by Advaya-vajra, the Doha-kosha of Krishnacharya or Kahna-pada and its Sanskrit commentary Makhala by Acharyapada and Dakarnava. In 1916 Shastri published from Vangiya Sahitya Parishat, Calcutta, all the four books in a single volume under the title 'Hajar Bachharer Purana Bangala Bhashay Bauddha Gan O Doha (Buddhistic songs and Dohas in 1000 years' old Bengali Language). Of these only the first book containing the Charya songs was written in Old Bengali language, but the others were in Avahattha. In 1938 Prabodhchandra Bagchi published in the Journal of the Department of Letters (Vol.-XXX) of the Calcutta University the Charya songs with Sanskrit and Tibetan translations in his paper entitled 'Materials for a Critical Edition of the Old Bengali Charyapadas'.

The Charyapadas were first published by Sastri under the title of Charya-charya-vinishchayah, this being the name found somewhere in the Nepal manuscript. In the opinion of Vidhusekhara Sastri, this name should have been Ashcharya-charya-chayah, according to the commentary of Munidatta. P.C. Bagchi holds that the correct name should be Charyascharya-vinishchayah! However, Sukumar Sen opines that the proper name of the manuscript should be Charya-giti-kosha.

The Charya songs were composed by 24 poets. Three of the songs ascribed to Vinapada and Savarapada by the commentator are actually anonymous compositions. The songs believed to have been composed by Kukkuripada, Dhendhanapada and Catilapada are in fact the handiwork of their disciples. Tadaka (derived from Sanskrit Tatanka, meaning armlet) and Kankana (meaning wristlet) were poetic pseudonyms. The poets mentioned by their personal names were as follows:

Luipada, Bhusukupada, Kahnapada (Krishnacharya), Kamali (Kambalambarapada), Dombipada, Shantipada, Ajadeva, Darikapada, Bhade, Jaya-Nandi, Dhama, Birua, Mahinda (Mahindharapada) and Ladidombipada.

The two names Tantripada and Gundaripada probably indicate their professions. The Charya songs were compositions of two to four generations of poets, if not more, for they bear the imprint of the disciples who represented their preceptors' tradition for centuries. Of the poets Luipada is traditionally believed to be the oldest.

While Rahul Sankrityayana and Kashiprasad Jayswal claimed that the Charya songs were written in old Bihari or Hindi, Jayakanta Misra held that the language was old Maithili. B.C. Majumdar maintained that the same was old Oriya. Some other scholars opined that it was old Assamese. But examining thoroughly the phonetics, morphology, syntax, idioms and metres of the Charyapadas, Sunitikumar Chatterjee in his The Origin and Development of the Bengali Language (1926) conclusively proved that "the language of the Charya is the genuine vernacular of Bengal at its basis".

As the songs carry a double, meaning their language was termed 'Sandhya-vachana' (literally meaning 'twilight-language' and suggesting code language), because their outward meaning was only a garb of their inner significance. This was done to keep the secrecy of their esoteric meaning away from the uninitiated. Outwardly the songs reflected vividly the social life, particularly of the lower class of people, of the contemporary Bengal through similes, metaphors and poetic imageries. The aspects highlighted by them included wood-cutting, constructing wooden bridge, weaving cloth and mattresses, making household goods from bamboo-sheets, cotton wool carding, ferrying, hunting deer, taming elephants, trading in liquor, drunken frenzy of Shavaras and Shavaris (hunters and huntresses), illicit love, piracy and plunder, setting fire on houses and cremation.

In the view of Shashibhushan Dasgupta the implicit significance of the Charya songs embodies "the religious tenets of Sahajiya Buddhism which was a later offshoot of Tantric Buddhism". The major theme conveyed by the charyapadas was the attainment of 'mahasukha' (supreme bliss) or 'sarva-shunyata' (absolute void) or 'nirvana' (final liberation), through the union of 'Prajna' (female or the left nerve) and 'Upaya' (male or the right nerve) in human bodies. This was called 'sahaja' (the innate human nature) or the attainment of the 'Absolute', where life and death were equated.

Primarily the Charyapadas were composed as songs in 10 lines with variations of 8, 12 and 14 lines. Most of the songs were in Padakulaka-Pajjhatika-Paddhadi-Chaupai metre containing 16 moras. It is from this that the later Bengali Payara metre originated. In some of the songs the Tripadi metre of 26 moras was used. In the songs, mention has been made of 18 Ragas and Raginis (tunes of Indian classical music). Of these as many as 12 songs are set to the tune of Raga Patamanjari. The other Ragas and Raginis include–Bhairavi, Kamod, Mallar, Malasi (Malava-Shri), Dhanasi, Gauda, Bengal, Devacri (Devagiri), Ramacri (Ramakeli), Gunjari, etc.

The tradition of the Charya songs and Dohas continued till 15th century as evident from the Doha-Kosha (1957) edited by Rahul Sankrityayana, containing dohas of Vinayasri, Sarua and Avadhu who must have been later poets. The 'Cha Cha' songs collected from Nepal by Shashibhushan Dasgupta include at least 79 compositions in the tradition of Charyapadas. They were written in between 13th and 15th centuries. These songs, entitled Nava Charyapada are expected to be published from the Calcutta University under the editorship of Asitkumar Bandyopadhyaya.

The Dohas composed in Avahattha language are in Chaupai metre. In the opinion of Sukumar Sen, "These are the didactic and directive couplets and quatrains for neophytes". Among the composers of Dohas, Saraha can be said to be the best. His Dohas are preserved in a Nepali manuscript of 1101 compiled by Divakara-Chanda. The Dohas also reflect the Sahajiya theological doctrine of tantric Buddhists. Compared with the Charya songs, the language of the Dohas is direct and simple. They are, at places, enlivened by the unconscious humour of the poets.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Muhammad Shahidullah, Buddhist Mystic Songs, Dacca, 1974; Nirmal Das, Charyagiti-parikrama, 2nd edn., Calcutta, 1981; Prabodhchandra Bagchi and Shanti Bikshu Shastri, Charyagitikosh of Buddhist Siddhas, Shantiniketan, 1955; Satyabrata Dey, Charyagiti-parichay, 2nd edn., Calcutta, 1977; Shashibushan Dasgupta, Obscure Religious Cults, 2nd edn., Calcutta, 1962; An Introduction to Tantric Buddhism. Calcutta, 1950; Sunitikumar Chatterjee, The Origin and Development of the Bengali Language, Calcutta, 1926.

K.G.

BUDDHACHARITA (Sanskrit) is the masterpiece of Ashvaghosha, dealing with the life-history of Buddha in twenty-eight cantos. It is a systematic description of the subject matter, free from any incoherent description and super-abundant employment of figures of speech which have lent a special charm to the poem. It is the artistic creation of the poet.

This epic is known to us up till now in the following five independent textual traditions:-

a) The first is represented by the two fragments of a paper manuscript unearthed in course of the Royal Prussian Turfan Expeditions carried out within the area of Sorcuq near Quarasar and Kurla in Central Asia. These two fragments are written carefully in Central Asian Brahmi. They may be said to have been written in the 6th-7th centuries A.D. The first fragment contains some portions of canto 3/16-29 and the second one some remnants of canto 16/20-36.

b) The second textual tradition is represented by the manuscript of the Sanskrit text preserved in the Library of the Nepal Durbar at Kathmandu. This manuscript is written in an early form of the Bengali script of circa 1300 A.D. The Sanskrit text in this manuscript is a torso and runs up to 14/31 only. Some verses and verse portions in cantos 1, 3, 9 and 12 are now missing. There are also some suspected interpolations in the extant text.

c) The third textual tradition is surmised from the Chinese translation (Fo-sho-hing-tsan-king) by an Indian monk named Dharmakshema (called Dharmaraksha and Dharmakshara by some) between 414 and 421 A.D. This translation runs up to the end of canto 28. It is not a literal rendering but an elaborate paraphrase of a pious Buddhist.

d) The fourth textual tradition is presupposed from the Fo pen hsing chi ching, another biography of the Buddha in Chinese (belonging probably to the Dharmaguptas) composed after Ashvaghosha. It consists of prose interspersed with gathas (verses) and is written in a verbose style.

e) The fifth textual tradition is presumed from the Tibetan translation made by Kshitindrabhadra (or Mahindrabhadra) and Matiraja in the 7th-8th centuries A.D. This translation is also complete.

The grand total of the verses existing in the entire Buddhacharita (ignoring the missing portions and the interpolations) comes roughly to 2,109 of which a little less than half of the Sanskrit text can be found today while the rest is not yet available to us.

Some verses and verse portions of the text of the Buddhacharita are found in later works like Ujjvaladatta's Unadisutravritti, Saranadeva's Durghatavritti, etc., either as quotations with some variants or as anonymous adaptations.

Some Greco-Buddhistic sculptural representations of Gandhara seem to illustrate the Buddhacharita.

B.B–R.T.

BUDHASVAMIN (Sanskrit), author of the Brihatkatha shlokasamgraha, one of the Sanskrit versions of Gunadhya's Brihatkatha in Paishachi Prakrit is believed to have flourished in 8th or 9th century A.D. Some scholars, including F. Lacôte and V.S. Agrawal place him before the 5th or 6th century A.D. In Nepalese tradition, as against the Kashmiri to which Kshemendra and Somadeva, the two other authors of adaptations of Brihatkatha belong, Brihatkathashlokasamgraha is considered to have presented the original more faithfully. However, it is now available only in fragment, containing 4,539 shlokas in 28 sargas or chapters, giving the tales of only 6 out of the twenty–eight marriages of the hero Naravahanadatta and presenting as the chief deity not Shiva but Kuvera.

S.Y.M.

BUDDHIST LITERATURE (Kannada). Buddhism stands for the multifarious forms of philosophic, religious, ethical and sociological writings, which the teachings of Gautama Buddha inspired. We have several works propagating Jainsm in Karnataka. But we don't find any significant development of Buddhist literature in Kannada. Buddhism died in Karnataka in the 12th century.

G.N.K.

BUDDHIST LITERATURE (Malayalam). The spread of Buddhism in Kerala may be traced back to two sources. It reached Kerala during the reign of Asoka, its greatest royal follower and patron. As one of the edicts says, "Missionaries were sent out to Kerala putram, Sathiyaputram, etc., to treat men and animals for diseases, to dig wells, to build parapet walls, etc." It made its way into Kerala from Sri Lanka where Ashoka had sent his son and daughter, Mahendra and Sangamitra. Thus it can be assumed that Buddhism began to spread in the southern most tip of Indian subcontinent in the third century B.C. This view is corroborated by the references to Buddhism in some of the poems of the Sangam period in Tamil Literature, i.e. the early centuries of the Christian Era. In Manimekhala, a later Sangam classic, its heroine is said to have visited Kodungalloor in Kerala. There are also accounts of Buddha Dharma in that and another classic named Silappadikaram written by Ilanko Adigal, a Jain monk.

Buddhism brought about a healthy reformation in the social life of the people of Kerala. The Buddhists were severe critics of the caste system, especially Brahminism. Though Buddha did not attack caste system directly he did not recognise it and there is no doubt that his attitude and activity weakened the system. Moreover, the Hindu scriptures were all written in Sanskrit, which was the language of the privileged few. So the majority did not understand the essence of Hinduism. Buddhist monks, on the other hand, spoke the language of the people and taught them and the occurrence of a large number of Pali words in Malayalam is the result of this influence. Pali, it may be remembered, was the language closer to the speech of the ordinary people in north India at that time.

The Buddhist started monasteries or viharas or sanghas and their centres of learning were called 'Ezhuthupallis' (small schools), a term that is familiar to Malayalis to this day. This type of school gave way to what is called 'Pallikkudam' (a modern school), another term still in use throughout Kerala.

Apart from teaching the language, the monks had profound interest in logic or Hetuvidya, Vyakarana (grammar), etc. and other branches of humanities and science, especially Ayurveda, and Astronomy. Even the lay man in Kerala knew the use of medicinal herbs and many were able to calculate the date, month and year from the planetary position given in the inscriptions. Ayurveda and Astronomy, still very popular in Kerala, have also been enriched by Keralites' contribution in the form of translation and original works.

Buddhism was democratic and the Buddhists were the first advocates of socio-political unity. They laid great stress on inner purity and explained the futility of external observations. The common people, attracted by their simplicity and sincerity, accepted their faith. The result was the numerous viharas throughout Kerala. Karunagapally, Karthikappally, etc, are now names of places where once the viharas stood. Later the suffix 'Palli' came to indicate Christian and Muslim places of worship and the word itself became a term of adoration as in 'Pallikettu' (Royal wedding).

Local kings contributed land to the viharas. Vikaramaditya Varaguna, the last of the 'Ay' kings, donated acres to Sreemoolavasa, the Buddhist pilgrim centre in Kerala. Mooshikavamsa of the famous poet Athula gives an account of the centre.

The life of Buddha was admired and adored by scholars all over the world and one of its results is the famous poem the Light of Asia (1879), of Edwin Arnold; Kumaran Asan's work Sreebuddhacharitam is a free rendering of the poem. Asan's two other poems, Karuna and Chandala Bhikshuki are also based on Buddhistic doctrines. Nalappat Narayana Menon's translation entitled Pourastyadeepam of the Light of Asia is important. Aswaghosha's Buddhacharitam has also been translated into Malayalam. So is the case with the Jataka stories. Many poets have been touched by Ambapali, the beautiful courtesan of Vaishali who surrenders all her riches at the feet of Lord Buddha and becomes a nun. Among them K.M. Panikkar's name stands out. Similarly Yasodhara, Gautama Buddha's wife, has inspired many a poet and G. Sankara Kurup's poem on her, though small, is memorable.

Though Buddhism was practically wiped out of India in the 12th century, its influence, apart from the above works, can still be seen in the idols of Buddha in places such as Ambalapuzha, in the temples at Trichur, Takazhi, Thiruvizha, etc., which were formerly viharas, in festivals, such as 'ratholsavas' and in certain religious observances such as the vow of celibacy and the 'Saranam vili' of the pilgrims going to the shrine at Sabarimala.

Thus Buddhism has left some indelible marks on the social and cultural life of the people of Kerala.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Anukulchandra Banerjee, Buddhism in India and Abroad, A. Sreedharan Menon, A Study of Kerala History. Jawaharlal Nehru, Discovery of India.

S.N.

BUDDHIST LITERATURE (Tamil). Before the first century A.D. there was nothing to infer from internal evidences about the influence of Buddhism in Tamilnadu. But the Girnar inscriptions of Ashoka found in Saurashtra (Rock Edict II) clearly indicate the institution of two kinds of medical treatment, for man and beast by the emperor Ashoka in the Kingdoms of he Cholas, the Pandiyas, the Satyaputras and Keralaputras. This is only an external evidence, but the rock edict at peshawar states more directly about the spread of Buddhist 'Dharma' in Chola and Pandiyan countries during the time of King Ashoka.

Mahavamsa and Dipavamsa of Sri Lanka refer to the spread of Buddhism in Tamilnadu during the 5th century A.D. Yuan Chuwang's travel record bears evidence about a few ruins of Buddhist monuments in 640 A.D. at Madurai and Kanchipuram. It may be assumed that even before the Christian era the Tamils were well informed of the great faith. Because of the revival of Shaivism and Vaishnavism, Buddhism began to decline from the seventh century onwards and almost disappeared from the 14th century A.D. Between the 3rd and 7th century A.D. it may well be considered that Buddhism was primarily the popular and well honoured religion of the Tamils.

There were many Buddhist centres in Tamilnadu. The most popular among them were situated in Kanchipuram Pattinam, Madurai, Nagapattinam, Buddhakudi, Uraiyoor, Thanjavoor, Vanchi and Potikai. Undoubtedly there were a lot of Buddhist settlements which would suggest the firm existence and popularity of the religion. Even now the dilapidated ruins of viharas and stupas are found in certain important places. The images of Buddha are found in abudance. In Nagapattam a Buddhist temple was allowed to be built by Raja Raja and Rajendra Chola (10th & 11th centuries A.D.). Even today an image of Buddha is well maintained with reverance in the corridors of the Kamakshi Temple of Kanchipuram.

The earlier literary works like Silappadikaram, Manimekalai and Kundalakesi bear ample information about the place and position of Buddhism in Tamilnadu, besides explaining in clear terms the teachings of Lord Buddha.

Bimbisara Gathi is a Buddhist work which was completely lost. Siddhartattohai and Tiruppatikam are both on Buddhist doctrines. Virasoliyam is a Tamil grammatical treatise by a Buddhist. The invocation poems of all these works provide materials to know something about Buddhist religion. As far as Sangam anthologies are concerned the word Sangam itself suggests a faint remembrance of the Buddhists. There were Sangam poets like Ilampotiyar, Sangamvarunan and Siruventeraiyar Terataram. These names are similar to Buddhist names. These poets composed poems on instability and condemned the mundane way of life. There are references to Kadavatpalli and Terapalli in Maturaikkanchi and Pattinappalai respectively, which mean the shrine of Lord Buddha.

The facts and principles laid out by Tiruvalluvar are very near to the way and life of Lord Buddha. Annihilation of desire stressed in Buddhism is powerfully expressed by Tiruvalluvar also. Most of the moral codes and ethical principles enunciated by Buddha are accepted by Tiruvalluvar. The greatness of renunciation, the instability of worldly affections and attachments, as spoken much of by Tiruvalluvar are closely related to Buddhist thoughts and ideas.

Silappadikaram (2nd century A.D.) contains some rare references to Buddhism. The famous dancer Madhavi met with difficulties of life and understood the miseries of the world. In her anxiety to relieve her only daughter Manimekalai from all kinds of sufferings, she allowed her to be converted to a Buddhist nun and embrace Buddhism. Manimekalai's conversion was done ceremoniously against the wish of the members of her family. Madhavi entered into a Buddha Vihara to receive religious instructions. She became a nun notwithstanding her birth as a professional dancer. She was accepted as a nun with promising prospects of salvation. The Sangam and seminaries took the responsibilities of emancipation and final attainment of salvation. When Kovalan's father heard about his son's murder he could not stand the heavy shock. So, he entered the seven Indira viharas to practise self-denial with the hope of obtaining liberation from the cycle of birth.

Manimekalai is composed as a Buddhist epic written to impress upon the people the value, wealth and worth of the religious doctrines. It is full of religious teaching. The ideas, philosophy, ethics and the principles of Buddhism are explained in an easy way for the quick understanding of the people. In spite of weakness as a work of literature, it is very rich in Buddhist thoughts and ideas. Through episodes, anecdotes, explanatory preachings, answering questions and argumentation the epic tries to state clearly the principles and doctrines on Buddhism.

The growth and spread of Buddhism in the famous cities of Vanchi, Kanchi and Kavirippumpattinam are known from this epic apart from our knowledge about its spreading to far off-lands like Java. Serving food to the poor through feeding centres, conversion of prisons into places of hospitality and kindness and monasteries were seen in those days. Female goddesses were added to the mythology of Buddhism and supernatural capacities of the monks were believed and respected. The Jataka stories were popular in Tamilnadu, which might have led to further impact on literature.

Manimekalai serves as the best record of Buddhist thoughts and ideas. The last part of the work is highly philosophical and argumentative. The birth of Lord Buddha, his teachings and the developed stages of Buddhism are well brought out in the various parts of the epic. The twelve conditions and their nature, the non-soul theory, the three steps towards the attainment of Nirvana and such theories are found explicitly stated.

Kundalakesi, one of the five great epics in Tamil, gave arguments in favour of Buddhism as against the views profusely given in Nilakesi in support of Jainism. Through the method of logical analysis the weak points of other faiths were brought out to give support to Buddhist doctrines.

In Puttamangalam, a place east of Thanjavur, a vihara was set up by Venudasar. There was another place called Pallivirutti, which means lands donated to Buddha vihara. Puttamangalam, Sangamangalam and Bodhimangalam are a few places which remain to remind one of the memories of Buddhism in Tamilnadu. Papanchasoodamani, a Buddhist work, suggests the existence of a vihara in Mayurappattinam in the 5th century A.D.

Nagappattinam was considered an important centre of Buddhism. It was said that Mahendra visited this place on his way to Sri Lanka. Pataratitta vihara and Naganana vihara were very famous. In 720 A.D. Narasimha Pattavarman, a Pallava King, built a Buddhist shrine at Nagapattinam at the request of a Chinese king. It was known as the Chinese temple or the Black temple.

In 1867, with the demolition of the Nagapattinam vihara to its last stone, the archaeological remains of Buddhism were totally removed from Tamilnadu. Now it remains in a few pieces of literature.

A.N.P.

BUDDHIST LITERATURE (Telugu). Andhra patronised Buddhism extensively and there is ample evidence in their land to prove this point beyond doubt. The stupas and exquisite sculptures depicting Buddha and his gospel obtained from Amaravati, Bhattiprolu, Nagarjuna parvatam speak volumes of the homage paid by Andhra to Lord Buddha. The Andhra kings who helped to spread Buddhism by depicting his life on rocks did not attempt to perpetuate the Buddhistic legends through versification in the form of Kavyas. Maybe Andhras could not boast of much Buddhistic literature in Telugu because Buddhism was fast disappearing from their land by the time the advent of Telugu literature took place.

However there is a rich crop of Buddhistic literature during modern period in Andhra in the form of Kavyas, Khand Kavyas (short poems), plays and novels.

The famous twin poets, Tirupati Venkata Kavulu, who are acclaimed as the harbingers of modern poetry in Telugu have compiled the life of Buddha as Buddha Charitra in verse form. They have shown uncanny skill in the narration of the story, in the portrayal of the characters in the picturesque descriptions and in picturing variegated feelings, moods and sentiments in the composition of this Kavya. Their pupils, Pingali and Katuri Kavulu, following the footsteps of their illustrious teachers wrote Saundaranandam, a short but sweet kavyam depicting the story of Bodhisatva. In this modern poem Bodhisatva administers dharma diksha (vow of righteousness) to his brother Nandudu and his wife Sundari. This is the story of the poem in brief. Saundarnandam is treated by the litterateurs as one of the five famous modern kavyas (Pancha Kavyas) in Telugu literature. The honey-throated Karuna Sri is well known for his mellifluous words, melodious diction and lyrical style. He described the compassionate life story of Buddha in sweet and simple style in the poem called Karuna Sri. None else could portray the story of Buddha in such honeyed words and melodious tones. Originally he thought of composing the story of Buddha in five parts, but he stopped with the first part of the story only. Edwin Arnold's Light of Asia was versified into Telugu under the heading Pragjyoti, yet another poem on Lord Buddha. A more detailed account of the life of Buddha was vividly delineated in Smt. Pindiprolu Vasanta Kumari Devi's work, Samagamam. The story was narrated in the form of memoirs recalled by Yasodhara Devi in this work. Prasadaroya Kulpati and Panduranga have jointly produced the work Karuna Sindhuvu. Lord Vishnu is born into this world as Buddha in response to the prayers of animals who met in a conference to make this request–this is the novelty of the story of this work in a nut shell. The court poet of Andhra Pradesh, Dasaradhi, produced a Kavya named Mahabodhi. This poem includes a few Jataka tales of Buddha. Giddaluri Venkateswarlu wrote the life of Buddha under the caption Dharma Gita–a title remainding one of Bhagavata Gita. Viplava Jyoti is the work of Kurra Venkala Subha Rao. This title suggests that Bodhisatva rebelled against the conduct of yajnas. The modern poet-emperor Jashuva made up a story entitled Kandiseekudu and eulogised the tenets and principles of Buddhism in it.

The deserting of the house-holder's life and journeying into woods by Bodhisatva is termed as Mahabhinishkramanam (The grand Exit) in Buddhistic literature. Adopting this scene as the primary theme, many poets have rendered their works immortal. G.V. Krishna Rao, the literary critic, poet and novelist, composed a kavyam called Siva Ratri. Here the poet feels that the deserting of his wife and child by Gautama is a nightmarish experience for his family but at the same time it proved to be a festive night to the whole humanity. Both Siddhayya Kavi's Mahabhinishkramanam and Darbha Rama Murty's Tyagam delineate the same theme. In Buddhistic literature 'Sujata Katha' is a famous tale. Gautama attained 'siddhi' after eating the sweet-rice cooked and served by Sujata. Taking this as his theme K.V.R. Narasimham penned the kavya called Sujata. Siddhayya Kavi also adopted the same theme and created a kavya under the same title. Azmbali Venkatappayya's Parivartanam deals with the story of the change of heart in Angulimala and others after listening to the teachings of the Bhagawan. Amrapali is one of the celebrated individuals blessed by Buddha. Sarada and Jnanananda Kavi, both versified the story of Amrapali, under the same title.

After the nirvana (demise) of Buddha, his disciples propagated his gospel and religion in different parts of the world. A few renowned stories of these followers have been versified. Bodduluri Narayana Rao, a poet adept in composing lovely poetry, produced a Buddhistic kavya under the title Santipatham, The story of the poem is that Upagupta, a Buddhistic monk, admits a prostitute girl Vasavadatta, who fell in love with him, into a Buddhistic monastery. Adopting the same story Bhattarum Gopala Sundarayya and Siddhayya Kavi both wrote two poems under the titles Prema Bhiksha and Sarasamitram respectively. Basing on the theme of Tagore's playlet Chandalika V.V.L. Narasimha Rao carved out an exquisite sculpture in the form of Ananda Bhikshuvu.

Jataka tales occupy an important place in the Buddhistic literature. These tales depict the legends regarding Bodhisatva's past births. Sannidhanam Suryanarayana Sastry versified a few of these Jataka tales. The source material for Siddhayya Kavi's Nandi Visala and Dharma Visala poems are these Jataka tales only. Siddhayya Kavi's Buddha Hridayani and Premanjali also belong to the genre of Buddhistic literature. Mudivarti Kondamacharyulu's Dharma Deeksha, Pilla Venkatasatna Kavi's Buddhayanamu, Bodipudi Venkata Rao's Kalakshetramn, Konduri Veera Raghavacharyulu's Amaravati and Gunturu Satyanarayana's Rajaneekriya are a few poems which earned their rightful place in the Buddhistic literature.

The Emperor Asoka was prominent amongst the Kings who propagated Buddhism, K. Narayana Rao versified the history of Asoka under the pen–name 'Bodharshe' into a matra Kavyam. Tishyarakshita was the consort of Asoka. And Kunaludu was the prince. The story of this empress and the prince is the same as that of Chitranga and Sarangadhara and this was very delicately and sensibly woven into a fine piece of poem by Karuturi Satyanarayana. Vidwan Jakka Venkateswarudu's 'Tishyarakshita' is a small poem. Nagarjuna Sagaram of Narayana Reddy and Ragaveena of Ramadugu Sreemanna Rayana Sarma are Buddhistic kavyas mainly based on the theme of tragic love stories. Vedula Suryanarayana Sarma translated and transmuted the treatise called 'Dharmapatham' into a poem called Buddha Geeta.'

The legends of Bodhisatva were also adopted in the form of plays and playlets. Acharya Atreya's Gautama Buddha, Kondamudi Gopalaroya Sarma's another Gautama Buddha, Roopanagudi Narayana Rao's Gautama Buddhudu, Bandla Subrahmanyam Kavi's Buddhavataramu Malayasri's Santipathamu, Disu Sri Ramulu's Navarasatarangini, Kotamraju Satyanarayana's Buddha, Panuganti Lakshmi Narasimha Rao's Buddha Bodha Sudha, Bodapati Sivarama Sarma's Buddha Natakam, Dasu Narayana Rao's Buddha are only a few of the noteworthy plays and playlets which dramatised the sacred life of Lord Buddha.

A few noteworthy operas (sangeeta rupa Kamulu) were also composed depicting the life and teachings of Buddha. Mahabhinishkramanam of Balantrapu Rajaneekantarao, Santipatham of Krishna Sastri, Yasodhara of Dasarathi and Amaravati of Karuna Sri are only a few operas composed in this form. Bhetavolu Ramabrahmam adapted the story of Saundarananda into a delectable musical Ballet (Sangeeta Nritya Natika). S.V. Bhujanagaroya Sarma, a reputed composer of ballets, adopted Tagore's Chandalika into a charming and pleasant dance drama.

Scores of writers in Telugu adopted drama as the literary form to express and convey their thoughts, feelings and reflections on Buddhism. Gautama of Sireesha, Buddha Pariniryanamu of Jillepalli Bhaskara Rao are two fine and pleasing plays enriching the Buddhistic literature in Telugu. We know that emperor Asoka was conferred the title 'Devanam Priya' for his undefatigable and relentless work in the propagation of Buddhism. Adopting this title for his play, K.V. Achaya presented an engaging account of the history of Asoka. To add to this galaxy of plays it can be mentioned that Asoka Samrat of Acharya Atreya, Asoka of Chaganti Sanyasi Raju, Parivartanam of Srinivasa Siromani and Asoka Rajyam of Seshu Babu are a few more examples of plays which dealt with the legends of Bodhisatva. The story of the court mistress of Bimbisara who got converted into a Buddhistic nun is the central theme of the play Dharma Ghakram written by Nandoori Ramakrishna Macharyulu. But differing from the common run of plays Amamcharla Gopala Rao produced a revolutionary play Viswantara deriding the demerits of Buddhism. Bucci Babu's Tishyarakshila is a character-centred revolutionary play. Mudigonda Sivaprasad also authored some anti-Buddhistic plays. P.V. Rajamannar produced a playlet Nagubamu portraying the story of a Buddhistic sculptor. G.V. Krishna Rao made a lasting contribution to the Buddhistic literature through his play Bomma Edchindi based on the popular legend of Arya Nagarjuna.

A good number of books on Buddhistic literature are also available in prose form. But most of them are only translations. Tripitakamulu of Chilukoori Narayana Rao, Vigraha Vuavartini of G.V. Krishna Rao and Lalita Vistarama of Tirumala Ramachandra are only a select few of these translated titles. Karuna Sri's Premamurti, Badi Gurava Reddy's Tyagiksha, Padala Rama Rao's Sakyamuni, Ratnakara Balaraju's Buddha Darsanam are important prose epics depicting the life story of Buddha. Siva Sankara Swami's Jatak Kathalu is a work of prose translation based on the Prakrita original. The glory and grandeur of Buddhism are vividly captured in the historical essays–Amaravati Stupam, Nagarjununi Konda, Prasanta Viplavamu etc of Mallampalli Somasekhara Sarma, the father of historical research in Andhra Pradesh. True to their convictions and faiths while Adavi Bapiraju eulogized Buddhism and its teachings in his novel Himabindu, Viswanatha and Mudigonda Siva Prasad denounced Buddhism in their novels and writings.

Jashuva, Veloori, Royaprolu, Karuna Sri and Korlapati Sri Rama Murty are only a few of the celebrated poets that sang in praise of Buddhism and its grandeur in their short poems (Khandikalu). Sri Karuturi Satyanarayana's work Karuna Saugatam is replete with Buddhistic verse.

G.P.

BUDH SINGH BAWA (Punjabi, b. 1878, d. 1931) was a descendent of the third Sikh Guru, Guru Amar Das. He was the son of Bawa Lehna Singh. He studied the elementary Persian in a mosque and then joined Mission School and passed his Matriculation Examination. During his school days, he used to visit the hermitage of Baba Khuda Singh and study Punjabi books. After, his Matriculation, he joined F.C. College, Lahore where the noted mystic Swami Ram Tirath made a great impact on him. Then he joined Engineering College, Roorki, where he studied for three years. He worked at Lyallpur, Sargodha, Mianwali, Rohtak, Hisar, Rawalpindi, Sargodha, Sheikhupura and Multan. He rose to the rank of Superintending Engineer at Lahore. He died in a car-accident.

His compositions exhibit him as a multisided writer in the domain of literature. He was a poet, novelist, dramatist, translator, critic and researcher. His poems, preserved in his collection entitled Pritam Chhoh, are mainly mystic in character. His novel Daler Kaur follows the style of Bhai Vir Singh. His plays include Chandar Hari Natak, Mundari Chhal Natak, Damani Natak and Nar Naveli. He combines the old Indian and western styles in his plays. In Nar Naveli he has presented a contrast between eastern and western culture. He translated three 'Sataks' in Punjabi verse, viz. Niti Satak, Vairag Satak and Shingar Satak. He did a pioneering work in preserving the old Punjabi poetry, as was done by Maulana Hali and Muhammad Husain Azad in the field of Urdu literature. His works entitled Hans Chog (1913), Khoikoo (1916), Bambiha Bol (1925), Prem Kahani (in Persian Script) and Raja Rasalu reveal him as a talented critic and a fine researcher.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Jaginder Singh Ramdev (ed), Punjabi Likhari Kosh, Jullundur, 1964., Piara Singh Padam, Kalam de Dhanni, Part II.

S.S.K.

BULBUL, LAKHIMANJOOH 'KOUL',–(Kashmiri; b. 1812–d. 1884) is prominent for his Samnama which is an adaptation of Firdousi's famous epic narrative Shahnama. Bulbul accepted the century old tradition of the Kashmir epic but he at the same time showed bold departures in the use of epic similes, description of battle scenes and conception of the hero. His clever use of the supernatural is also unsurpassed. His image of a giant in Samnama namely, Makokal, is really a poetic masterpiece. He employs exaggeration and cartoonist's craft in developing the profile of the giant but with a semblance of verisimilitude. Bulbul is also famous for his satirical and devotional verses. Some of his works including Radhasuyamvar, Nal-va-daman and Sikandarnama are still in the manuscript form. Bulbul will be ranked as one of the most eminent Kashmiri poets when all his works are published and properly evaluated.

N.M.

BULCKE CAMILLE (Hindi; b. 1909), was born in a far-flung mofussil of Belgium. Bulcke's father was a businessman and wanted all his three sons to join him in business eventually. After completing his school education, Bulcke was therefore admitted to an Engineering College to prepare for the eventual plunge into business and a rich life of pleasure and plenty. But Bulcke had a religious bent of mind from his very childhood and his mother had an inkling that her son was destined to become a churchman. After successfully completing his engineering education, Bulcke expressed a desire to work as a missionary of the Roman Catholic Church and chose India as the centre of his religious activity. He tried to know as much of India as possible through books and landed in this country in the year 1935.

To fulfil zealously the onerous duties of a missionary monk, Bulcke stayed for quite some time in Darjeeling to make an in-depth study of the scriptures, being deeply interested in Philosophy, but to acquire a systematic knowledge of Indian philosophy and literature, he studied for his M.A. degree in Hindi from the University of Allahbad. It was, during this period of preparation for his M.A. in Allahabad that he had an occasion to read and study the Ramacharitmanas of Tulsidas. The more he studied it, the deeper became his attachment to it. His sublime sense of righteous goodness, the lofty values and ideals of its characters and its poetic excellence fascinated him to such an extent that it almost became an object of worship for him. He found a striking resemblance between the ethical aspect of righteous conduct and values of life as portrayed by the author of the Manas and those propounded by Jesus Christ in his discourses. He, therefore, took up a relevant topic, viz. Ramkatha: Utpatti aur Vikas (The tale of Rama, its origin and development) and obtained his D. Phil degree from the University of Allahabad on the subject. His thesis was hailed by scholars all over India and his name became known to litterateurs outside the Hindi world also.

After the completion of his Ph.D. thesis, Bulcke shifted to Ranchi as head of the Deptt. of Hindi in the St. Xavier's College there. He stayed there for the rest of his life and served the language he loved so much, viz. Hindi, with all the resources at his command. His English-Hindi Dictionary is a significant contribution to a none-too-rich segment of Hindi. His glossary of day-to-day words titled A technical English-Hindi Glossary is quite popular.

He also translated the gospels into Hindi. He, thereafter, translated the New Testament into Hindi as Naya Vidhan. His translations into standard Hindi are so simple and spontaneous that one does not feel one is reading a translated work. He compiled the more touching portions of the Ramacharitmanas into Manas Kaumudi and had a deep attachment to this work.

Although Bulcke's own mother tongue was Flemish, he eventually acquired Indian citizenship and revised the mission of his life to serve India and to serve literature through the medium of Hindi. He headed the college Deptt. of Hindi and Sanskrit for twenty seven years and gave enlightened guidance to his research students. He called himself a 'Bihari' after acquiring Indian citizenship.

He died in the All India Institute of Medical Sciences, Delhi after a prolonged illness.

Born a foreigner, this ascetic turned into a staunch Indian knew many foreign languages like English, French, Flemish, Irish, German--yet his love for India and Indian languages led him to learn many a Indian language besides Hindi. He considered Hindi to be India's national language and he was proud of the rich heritage of Indian literature, culture, philosophy, history and languages like other Indians.

Vi.S.

BULLEH SHAH (Punjabi; b. 1680 d. 1758-59) was born at Pandoke Village of Tehsil, Kasur, Distt. Lahore (now in Pakistan). He was one of the foremost sufi saints and poets. Bulleh Shah is at a high peak in Punjabi Sufi poetry. His poetry is a mixture of traditional mystic thought and intellectualism. Being a disciple of Sai Inayat Shah, he owes allegiance to the Qadiri Silsila of the Sufis. He himself confesses this fact in one of his Kafis. His real name was Abdullah and that of his father Sakhi Mohammad Darvesh, who was also considered to be a Muslim saint. Bulleh Shah's verses are available in manuscripts at the Punjab University Library, Lahore, (now in Pakistan) which were edited by Mohan Singh entitled Sufian da Kalam (Poetry of the Sufis). While writing his thesis on Punjabi Sufi Poets, Lajwanti Ramakrishna translated many of his famous Kafis into English. Among English scholars C.L. Osborne was the pioneer in writing a monograph on his life and works. Later on many Punjabi scholars and writers have edited his works with critical analysis and appreciation. He wrote Kafis, Baramah, Gandham, Dohrand Athwara.

Lajwanti has divided Bulleh Shah's life into three phases. The first phase belongs to his life as a disciple of Sai Inayat Shah, the second one concerns assimilation of the Indian tradition, i.e. Vaishnava and Vedantic study. The third phase is that unique period of mysticism when Bulleh Shah's soul merges into the eternal soul (i.e., God).

Bulleh Shah's Murshid (Guru) Inayat Shah had forbidden him to reveal whatever he attained (Jo Kuchh Pavain Bahar na Allavain). But Bulleh Shah bursts out with the following Kafi:

Munch Aia Bat Na Rahandi

(One cannot help uttering what comes to the lips). At this Inayat Shah was displeased with Bulleh Shah, but embraced him after he had realised his mistakes. This story (or myth) has been popularised by narrators of his life like Maula Bakhsh Kushta (in Punjab De Heere) and Bawa Prem Singh (in Koel Koo), Abdul Garur Qureshi and Lajwanti Ramakrishna.

Puran Singh has graded his mystic attainment as the highest peak of sufism by saying that 'Bulleh Shah awakens the eternal silence by his tremendous voice' (The spirit of Oriental Poetry).

Bulleh Shah was also very much conscious of the contemporary social, political and religious situations. His time marks the downfall of the Mughal empire after Aurangzeb, when anarchy prevailed everywhere. In Punjab the Sikhs were rising to power but due to unstable government some people, particularly those professing Muslim faith, were not happy, for Bulleh Shah says, 'The People wearing rough blankets are becoming rulers and the Mughals the real kings are obliged to quaff cups of poison.'

BIBLIOGRAPHY: C.F. Osborne, Sai Bulleh Shah, Jit Singh Sital, Bulleh Shah, Jiwan te Rachna, Punjabi University, Patiala. Gurdev Singh, Kalam Bulleh Shah, Ludhiana, 1970. Ramakrishna Lajwanti, Punjabi Sufi Poets, New Delhi, 1973.

K.S.K.

BUND AUR SAMUDRA (Hindi) is by far the best of Amritlal Nagar's novels. In this novel he has brought out the interdependence of the individual and the society emphasizing the need for their healthy adjustment. The drop (bund) in the context of this novel symbolises the individual and the ocean (Samudra) stands for the society. Underlining the importance of the individual in the social order, the author probes into the genesis of disintegration of the society: 'Every drop has its own importance, because that is the ocean itself; why should even one drop go waste, it must be properly utilised. But how can it be properly utilised. How should this drop experience itself as the inseparable part of the ocean? It is absolutely alone in this vast ocean'. (From the text of the novel).

Everybody has raised walls around himself, thus, cutting him apart from others. How can the society hold itself and function in such a situation? The novel provides the solution thus: 'The self-confidence in the man must be aroused. Faith must be aroused in his life. Then only will he have the sense of sharing the happiness and sorrows of others and will have unbreakable ties with one another in the same way as one drop is integrated with the other and one wave with the other. The ocean is composed of waves and thus, the drop contains the ocean within it.'

All the three main characters of the novel Sajjan, Mahipal and Vankanya–intensely feel the gap between the individual and the society and devote themselves wholeheartedly to bridge it. Sajjan renounces the considerable wealth he had inherited and gets lost in the masses by hiring a modest room in a 'mohalla' for devoting himself fully to the art of painting. Vankanya, who is a rare blend of the traditional and modern woman leaves her house to join him in the fulfilment of his mission. Mahipal attempts to bridge the gap between the individual and the society through his creative writings.

But time and again these characters confine themselves within the four-walls of their ego and become self-centred by falling apart from the society, though the inner urge compels them to come out of their shells. Their attempts get the right direction only when they come into contact with Baba Ramji who has imbibed in him the ideology of complete adjustment of the individual and society. They are attracted by the magnetic personality of the Baba and under his benign influence Sajjan overcomes his egocentricities, donates a major part of his wealth to the 'ashram' and takes to social service along with Vankanya; Mahipal, on the other hand, develops an inferiority complex because of his unbridled ego and goes astray. His tragic end and Baba Ramji's teachings echo the belief of the author that the individual must transcend his ego in the interest of both the individual and the society.

Bund Aur Samudra (1956) is rated as one of the best novels of Hindi. From the point of view of the content, it is a magnificent novel, but its plot gets scattered as one approaches the end. This novel will also be remembered for giving the Hindi literature a unique character in Taei an orthodox old woman, held in awe for her tantric pursuits coupled with her outspoken, sharp and merciless criticism of all that she does not approve.

Ran. R.

BUWA, V.A. (Marathi, b. 1926) is a prolific humour-writer. He was born and brought up in an orthodox family of Pandharpur, a renowned place of pilgrimage in Maharashtra. Having completed his secondary education he came to Bombay.

Buwa's handwriting is superb and he is good at drawing too. He, therefore, started his own handwritten magazine wherein he started writing humorous articles and drawing caricatures. By chance, this was noticed by Prabhakar Padhye, an editor of daily Navashakti of Bombay. He requested him in 1952 to write a regular column which proved to be quite popular.

Buwa's first book of humorous articles was published in 1953, titled as Akaleche Tare. In 1960, he published his tenth book. His selected articles can be seen in Nivadak Buwa.

Along with short stories, Buwa has also written novels, scripts for Tamashas and Cinemas, one-act plays, essays, etc. He has written all this in a humorous style. To enrich his style Buwa has developed many faculties. His command over words, penetrating insight and subtle observation of human behaviour have given depth to his writing. He has excelled in writing parodies of many famous works and the specialised styles of renowned writers. His humour bursts out of our day-to-day life. He has about 90 books to his credit. There is a magazine called Buwa named after him.

M.V.G.

BYARTHATAR DAN (Assamese) is a collection of five short stories (Byarthatar Dan, Vidrohini, Usa, Siraj and Nina) by Laksmidhar Sarma. The first story Byarthatar Dan, speaks of the disappointment in love of a girl Lalita. The story Siraj deals with the love outside wed-lock. Kandarpa, a college youth had an illicit love affair with Savitri. Savitri had conceived and fled away from her parental home to avoid a possible marriage. She was given shelter by a pious Muslim gentieman Siraj. Savitri gave birth to a girl and died at his home. The baby later grew into a beautiful girl Sita. She was taken to Calcutta by Kandarpa for higher education. Sita fell in love with Anil while in Calcutta. But Anil knowing somehow the antecedents of her birth rejected her. Deprived of love from every quarter Sita returned to her foster father. The betrayal of Kandarpa and Anil and the magninamity of the old muslim gentleman, Siraj are well depicted by the author. This story was later developed into an Assemese feature film. A bold criticism of the modern civilization and irrational social practices is nicely reflected in most of the stories of Byarthatar Dan (Gift of Disappointment 1958).

C.K.

C

CAREY, WILLIAM (Bengali; b. 1761, d. 1834) was a Christian missionary and scholar of Oriental languages. He was born in Northamptonshire in the family of a cobbler. He had little or no formal education but learnt several European languages and showed keen interest in Botany and Theology from his young days. Because of his zeal and enthusiasm in propagating the Gospel among the non-christians he wrote a pamphlet on the subject in 1792. He was sent to Calcutta in 1793 by the Baptist Mission. The first few years of his life in Bengal were indeed miserable. He was not allowed to settle in Calcutta, where missionary activities were banned by the East India Company. He settled in Madanbati in North Bengal and inspite of great difficulties and personal misfortunes he learnt Bengali and translated the Bible into that language. In 1800 when a mission was established by Hoshua Marshman and William Ward at Serampore, a territory under the Dutch protection, Carey joined it and settled down there. He lived the rest of his life there actively working for the propagation of Christianity as well as for pursuing scholarly activities.

In 1800 an institution, known as the College of Fort William, was established in Calcutta for the training of the British Civilians in Indian languages. Carey was invited there to join the Department of Sanskrit and Bengali. In course of his teaching these two languages, as well as Marathi, Carey supervised and planned the teaching programmes of Indian languages, encouraged his Indian colleagues to prepare text books in their languages, and to experiment with different styles. He himself wrote several grammars of great value. Between 1801 and 1825 he published six grammars of six different languages–Bengali (1801) Marathi (1805), Sanskrit (1806), Punjabi (1812), Telugu (1814) and Kannada (1817) and two dictionaries, one of Marathi (1810) and the other of Bengali. His Bengali to English Dictionary (1815-25) is one of the earliest lexical works in Bengali which has not lost its usefulness even today. In 1812 he compiled A Universal Dictionary of the Oriental Languages, involving thirteen Indian languages. But more than half of the manuscript perished in a fire. He also compiled two collections: Dialogues or Kathopakathan, an interesting collection of specimens of various styles of Bengali representing various social and occupational groups; and Itihasmala is (1812), a collection of stories and anecdotes in Bengali.

Carey retired from the College of Fort William in 1831 and also from the post of the Principal of Serampore College next year. He was a member of the Asiatic Society of Bengal and of the London Geological Society. He was the founder of Agri-Horticulture Society in India (1823) and also of the newspaper Friend of India, edited by his friend J. Marshman. Carey is remembered today as the first translator of the Bible in the Bengali language and one of the pioneers of Bengali literary prose. His translation of the Bible inspite of its many imperfections and stylistic inelegance served as a model for the later translators and helped create a new religious language for the Bengali Christians. Though a man of great erudition and of wide interest, Carey did not have much imaginative power or literary flair. His works are mainly of pedagogic value and of philological interest. But he did yeomen service to Indian linguistic studies by writing grammars and compiling lexicons. His greatest single contribution is perhaps his leadership in creating literary prose in Bengali. He has been often claimed as one of the makers of modern Bengali prose.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Sajanikanta Das, William Carey, Sahitya Sadhak Charitmala, Vol. I (Calcutta, 1954)., Sisirkumar Das, Early Bengali Prose: Carey to Vidyasagar (Calcutta, 1966)., S.K. De, Bengali Literature in the 19th century (Calcutta, 1962).

S.D.

CARMELINE (Konkani,) by Damodar Mauzo is a novel depicting the tale of two worlds: the imtimate world of a compact Goan village and the far-off prosperous world of Middle-East with its glittering petro-dollars tainted with lust and blood. However, it is primarily a psychological novel, for the main concern of the author appears to be not so much to offer a colourful fresco of the two worlds as presenting a finely-etched portrait of Carmeline who willingly loses her own soul in order to save that of her daughter.

The first scene is set in Kuwait, on Carmeline's birthday. It happens to be a Friday, a holiday there. Obviously the most natural beginning, for it focusses our attention on the two important aspects of Carmeline's life--her sexual life with the Arab boss and the news of her husband's death in Goa. Here there is a flashback. Carmeline's mind rushes back to Goa, to her childhood days. The whole village is in the grip of a deadly epidemic. It claims her brother, mother and father. She is looked after by her uncle and aunt. When thirteen she attains womanhood and falls in love with her cousin Agnel. But he marries another girl. Carmeline marries Jose who is a footballer. He is a drunkard, irresponsible and unscrupulous. A daughter is born. Once when Jose is dead drunl and fast asleep, his friend Rosario makes love to her out o which a son is born. Feeling that the son is the result of he adulterous act, she hates and neglects him. The son dies ir an accident. Jose does not give up his ways. His drunkenness and dishonesty result in the loss of his job. Carmeline decides to go to Kuwait to make money. She became the mistress of her Arab boss. At first she revolts against herself but later comes to terms with her new condition. When her husband dies she comes to Goa not so much out of love and respect for the departed husband but to see her daughter. She will soon return to Kuwait to make some more money and then come back to Goa, never to return to Kuwait. She would send Belinda to college. But pat she gets this answer from her daughter: "No mummy, I shall not go to college . . . I shall start earning now. I shall go to Kuwait." Carmeline slaps her in the face and the novel ends.

Mauzo exposes a problem without imposing any solution and deeply disturbs even the most complacent reader. Every Goan is vaguely aware of this problem which for the first time is exposed so boldly and effectively. Carmeline is not merely an isolated case but she represents the ever increasing number of Goan women attracted towards the Gulf countries. The novel (1982) thus is both a human tale and a social document. It is almost classic in its clarity, simplicity and restraint. The winner of Sahitya Akademi Award in 1983, the novel has an unmistakable ring of authenticity, for the characters are realistic and firmly rooted in the soil.

M.S.

CASTES OF POETS (Rajasthani). The history of Rajasthani literature reveals that certain specific communities have been more devoted to the art of poetry than others. The Charanas definitely rank the highest, followed by the Bhatas. The Charanas are generally known by their caste-surnames which have been traditionally enumerated as one hundred and twenty. Beliefs and facts of their origin, religious faith, social customs and practices, details of profession, etc. have been authentically reported by Munshi Deviprasad, a historian of repute. A few of the prominent sub-castes which have produced good poets, are–Asiya, Adha, Kaviya, Vithu, Dadhawadiya, Gadana, Lalasa, and others. Some others are known by the surname Barahatha, essentially an honorific title, their sub-castes being separately counted along with others. Barahatha Kesarisinha (of Sauda sub caste); Barahatha Ummedarama (of Palhawata sub-caste) and Barahatha Narharidasa (of Rohadiya sub-caste) are some such names. There are several other synonyms by which the Charanas prefer themselves to be called, e.g. Pata, Takava, Gadhavi, Ihaga, Kiva, Vidaga and Magana, etc. The Charanas call themselves sons of Sakti (goddess of power). Though they may also follow any other gods of Hindu mythology, they continue to worship the manifestations of Sakti of whom there have been many in their own community. Hingalaja, Temadaraya, Awada, Karani, Sayami and Raja Bai are some of them. All these women, except the first one, belonged to the Charana community and are known for the supernatural feats believed to have been performed by them. The tradition still continues, and there have been such Charana women in very recent times who are treated as manifestations of Sakti. To show their respect for these god-figures the Charanas have been deriving their names from them. Hingalajadana Karanidana, Avadadana and Durgadana, etc. are some such names. Though the Charanas have also been engaged in other minor professions, such as, breeding of and trading in horses, cattle grazing and agriculture, etc., the majority have devoted themselves to the art of poetry which has proved more lucrative as a profession too. The Rajputs, as a ruling class, have been their chief patrons. Persons of high social status, and enjoying influence in the Government, have also patronised them. Their modes of living, dresses, food habits, manners and etiquette resemble those of the Rajputas, with the only exception that they do not follow the law of primogeniture like their patrons, and divide the property equally among their male heirs. They have been eulogising their patrons and have also been serving as panegyrists to the Rajputas who honoured them by land grants and cash rewards. On the occasions of marriages and other ceremonies they exercised much pressure on their patrons for giving them sufficient amount as charity. The British Government regularised the practice by establishing the Rajputa Hitakarini Sabha. Their earliest historical references are found in Harshacharita by Banabhatta, (7th century). Anargha Raghava by Murari Kavi (9th century) approx.) and Prabandha Chintamani by Merutungacharya (1304)

Bhata : (Rava) The origin of the word lies in the Sanskrit word, Bhatta, which also denotes eulogy as one of its several meanings. The Bhatas are honorifically called Ravas, though some of the literary historians are of the view that the latter is a separate community exclusively attached to the Rajput. Munshi Deviprasada, has, however, made no such difference in his Report Mardum Sumari Raja Marawada. He has included Brahma Bhatta, Jaga, Badawa and others in the category of Bhattas. The Ranimangas, who are genealogical record-keepers to the royal ladies only, are also one of them. These sections of the community treat themselves as distinct from each other, and so observe their own social practices. No inter marriage takes place between them. Their main profession has been that of creation and recital of poems in honour of their patrons. The Bhatas are believed to have come to Rajasthan from the eastern part of the country, and so a number of them are still called as Purabiyas. Chanda, the great poet of the immortal epic, Prithviraj Raso, is also believed to have belonged to Lahore. Most of the sections of this community act as panegyrists to their patrons who belong to different castes of the Hindu society. The Bhatas have their own important names of poets hailing from the Brahma Bhattas or Ravas e.g. Sadas (18th century), Kavirava Mohansinha (i) (13th century), Bhandan (ii) (16th century), Narapati (iii) (17th century) (iv) (20th century), Kalyandas and so on Like the Charanas, the Bhatas were also honoured by the ruling class in cash and land grants. A number of Bhatas acted as highly placed messengers to the Muhamadan rulers in times of wars. The principal language of the Bhatas in their poetical compositions was Pingala, which is based on the structure of Brajabhasa grammar and contains some specialities of Rajasthani. Later, however, they also adopted Dingala as the medium of their expression, and acquired equal proficiency in the same, just as the Charanas did in Pingala besides their own, eg., Dingala. The famous Prithviraj Raso is a Pingala work. The earliest references of Brahma-Bhata and Bhata poets are found in the Prabandha Chintamani of Merutungacharya (1304) though there are reasons to believe that the Bhatas must have existed much earlier as poets of Rajasthani language. Motisaras as a community were entirely related to the Charanas and patronised by them. It is believed that a Charana girl was married to a Rajput and the offspring of this union were the first originators of the Motisaras. Their number is very limited. They are divided into eight branches. They are much respected by the Charanas whom they visit every year after the monsoon. Though the Motisaras are comparatively illiterate they possess special acumen for composing Dingala Gitas. Chatar Motisar was an eminent poet of his time (17th century)

Ravala : They are also dependent on the Charanas. They also act as entertainers to the Charanas by putting up different shows with interesting themes. They are efficient at acting and imitating the manners and lifestyles of various characters of the society. They act as panegyrists to the Charanas and also eulogise them by self composed poems. They are held in esteem by the Charanas for their service as priests to the god-head Karana Mata, in her temples at various places. Their number in Rajasthan is limited to a few thousand only. An interesting anecdote of their origin tells that a King of Junagadha (Gujarat) tried to take away some beautiful Charana women by force. He was, however, turned into a eunuch by their curse. Thus made helpless the king, carrying the title of Ravala, began entertaining the Charana ladies. A Brahmana, who also accompanied the Ravala (king), was also cursed to be called a Ravala and to act as entertainer to the Charanas. The progeny of the said Brahamana also came to be known as Ravlas, attached to the Charanas. Some of the prominent Ravala poets are–Ravala Shankaradana (1574), Ravala Ramachanda (1653), Ravala Sagata (1802) and so on.

Dhadhi: Dhadhis are found among both Hindu and Muslims. They act as eulogisers and genealogists to the Jatas and Bishnois, along with the Sunaras (goldsmiths), Chipas (cloth printers), Khatris, etc. The Ain-i-Akbari tells us that the Dhadhis eulogised the warriors by reciting couplets suited to the occasion. It has been observed that the Dhadhis, mostly Muhamadan were more concerned with the converted Muslims. Dhadhi Bahadara, an eminent poet, composed a work popularly called Viramayana which describes the battles fought between the Rathaudas and Johiyas (converted Muslims from the ancient Ayudhaya) in the 16th century. The famous Bahaliman ri vata and Rahaba Sahaba ri vata are also believed to have been composed by Dhadhis. The survey of the subject is likely to lead to more findings.

Sewagas act as priests in the Jain temples and are dependent on the Jains. They hail from the Sakadwipiya class of priests, and are also known as Bhojakas. Some more names of the Jain priestly order are Jati, Matherana, Guran and Mahatma. The Sewagas and Jatis have been more concerned with literature, while the Matheranas and Mahatmas were efficient scribes. Manch Kavi, a famous prosodist of the 18th-19th century and writer of Raghunath Rupak Gitan ro was a Sewaga by caste. Jati Jaya Chanda composed his Saiki in the 16th century. Another prominent name is that of Vrind Kavi (17th century). The Jains, as a religious sect have also contributed immensely towards Rajasthani literature. Among other important communities concerned with Rajasthani literature were those of the Rajaput, Brahmanas and Kayasthas, though they were not professionaly expected to deal with this literature. Among the Rajaputas, there may be scores of names, out of whom those of Prithviraj Rathaud, (16th century), Karamasi Sainkhala (15th century approx.), Maharaja Jaswant Sinha (17th century), Ajit Sinha (18th-19th century) and Chatarasinha (19th-20th century) are only a few examples. The Brahmanas, being concerned with learning and knowledge, have been first-rate poets. Vyas Sridhar wrote Ranamallachanda (14th-15th century) and Saptasati Padmanabha (14th-15th century) composed Kanhadade Prabandha (15th century) and Asiga wrote his Hansavali (14th century). These are only a few examples. Almost all religious sects, such as, Visnoi, Dadu-panthi, Jasanathi, Ramasnehi, Niranjani, etc. have produced hundreds of poets. As a rule, all major saints composed verses on their own spiritual experience.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Deviprasad Munshi, Report Mardum Sumari Raja Marawada,Jodhpur, 1889; H.L. Maheshwari, History of Rajasthani Literature, New Delhi,1980; M.L. Menariya, Rajasthani Bhasa aur Sahitya, Prayag, 1948; Rawat Saraswat, ed. Maruvani monthly, Vol. I, No. 4, Jaipur, 1953; Rawat Saraswat, Identity of Ravalas, Jaipur, 1982; Suryamalla Mishra Vamsa Bhaskar Jodhpur 1899.

Raw.S.

CHABKHA (Gujarati) means lashes. The pada in which social evils or the persons considered to be the embodiment of evils are denounced in a language which is rude as well as crude is called Chabkha. The poet hits hard on the society and therefore the poem is termed as Chabkha (lashes). The term Chabkha was first used by the poet Bhojo (1785-1850) to describe his Padas, denouncing the social evils, which polluted the society. He denounces the persons posing as men of God, who in saffron garb exploit the religious sentiments of the gullible. Except Bhojo none else has used the word Chabkha for the poems in which social evils are depicted.

C.M.

CHACKO, CHEMMANAM (Malayalam, b. 1926) is a noted satirical poet in Malayalam. Since 1968 he has been Director, Publication Department, Kerala University. A post-graduate in Malayalam, he taught for a while in the Trivandrum University College before taking up the present post.

His first poetical work was Vilambaram (Proclamation). He has to his credit 17 publications, of which 11 are satirical works. Kanakaksharangal (Golden Letters, 1967), Nellu (Paddy, 1968), Innu (Today, 1969), Puthari (New Rice, 1970), Astram (Arrow, 1971), Agneyastram (Arrow of Fire, 1972), Dukhathinte Chiri (The Laughter of Sorrow, 1973), Avanazhi (Quiver, 1974), Jaitrayatra (Triumphant March, 1975), Rajapatha (The Royal Avenue, 1978), and Chemmanam Kavithakal (An anthology) are his principal satirical works.

These poems seek to awaken the conscience of the individual when faced with socio-political injustice. For his simple style, impressive diction and the genial mood he exudes, Chacko is read and appreciated widely. Rajapatha won the Kerala Sahitya Akademi award in 1977.

K.R.P.

CHACKO, I.C. (Malayalam, b. 1876, d; 1966) was an eminent grammarian. He graduated from the Maharaja's College, Trivandrum in 1899 with Sanskrit as an optional subject. In 1901 he proceeded to England for higher studies. He studied for four years in the Imperial College, London and took the degree of B.Sc. (Hons) in Physics. Returning home, he joined the Geological Survey of India.

Chacko has earned distinction from his authorship of a commentary in Malayalam on the work Astadhyayi of the Sanskrit grammarian Panini. This lucid and brilliant commentary is named Paniniyapradyotam (Light on Panini's Grammar, 1955). The work was the result of a painstaking effort of some twenty five years and when a part of it was published in 1944 at Trichur it was at once hailed as important. It was completed and published at Ernakulam in 1955 and received the Sahitya Akademi's award in 1956. The Paniniyapradyotam is important in more ways than one. It showed the author's grasp of Sanskrit grammar and his ability to explain the sutras lucidly.

Chacko also wrote on other subjects. He wrote on Puranas and their heroes. In his work Valmikiyute Lokattil (In the world of Valmiki, 1957-2nd edn.) he critically examines the events and personalities in the Ramayana. In the six essays included in this work he writes on the interrupted coronation of Rama, Dasaratha's death and Bharata's return, Jabali's advice and Hanuman's leap over the sea.

Chacko has also written on scientific subjects. His Jivitasmaranakal (Reminiscences, 1957) is well known, although his Paniniyapradyotam is his chief claim to fame.

K.R.P.

CHADA LAIHUI (Manipuri) is a book which records the names of kings who ascended the throne of Manipur from the time of Nongda Lairen Pakhangba the names and other related accounts of their parentage, origin and the important incidents connected with their reign. The book contains the above accounts of the kings till the 19th century. The exact date and time of the composition of the book are not definitely known. The book narrates that the accounts had been entered in the book during the reign of kings by Pandits at the behest of the kings. There are quite a few versions of the books; some contain accounts up to a certain period of time and others contain a few more accounts covering wider period of time. Therefore, a combined study of all the available manuscripts only will give a correct picture. Cheitharol Kumbaba, the royal chronicle of Manipur records that during the reign of Maharaja Chandrakirti Singh (1834-1844), Khumujamba Purnachandra Singh who was the royal pandit was asked to incorporate the remaining entries in Chada Laihui who again delegated the job to Chingakhamba Chaoton, Sarangthemcha Swarupananda and Thoudamcha Chaoton. The present edition of N. Khelkchandra Singh published in 1966 in Bengali-Assamese scripts is a modified and combined edition of two versions of the book which contained different accounts of the different periods of time. One version, he says, is from Khulem Rudra Singh and the other is from Nameirakpam Dinachandra Singh which contained accounts of Maharaj Labanyachandra (1978-1801), Maharaja Madhuchandra (1801-1803), etc. containing accounts till the time of Maharaja Gambhir Singh who ascended the throne of Manipur after Maharaja Bhagyachandra (1763-1798).

Chada Laihui is a supplementary reader to Cheitharol Kumbaba, the royal chronicle of Manipur. The language is archaic and difficult to understand without a sound background of ancient Meitei language. The transliteration in current Manipuri helps in the understanding of the book.

I.R.B.S.

CHADURANGA (Kannada b. 1916) is the pseudonym of M. Subramanyaraj Urs, the popular short story writer, novelist and playwright.Born at Kallahalli in Mysore District he gave up education for agriculture but finally made writing his vocation. He has to his credit five collections of short stories, three novels and two plays. Urs came under a variety of influences. The progressive movement of the forties first claimed his attention and then the art of the master story teller in Kannada, Masti. Later he was attracted by the rebel movement supporting the causes of the depressed classes. These influences have shaped his attitude and fostered his deep humanism which underlies all his writings.

His short stories have been popular, but his three novels have enhanced his reputation. Sarvamangala, a tragic story placed against a rural background, was made into an offbeat film by himself. The film won state awards for both story and direction. Uyyale tells the story of a young woman caught between loyalty to her husband and love for his friend. This too was made into a film. His third and recent novel, Vyshakha, which won the Sahitya Akademi Award for 1982, is more complex than the other two. It is the story of a widow whose taste of sex from her father-in-law drives her in desperation to a Harijan youth and of the trails and travails they have to face on this account. The novel ends on a note of hope for the forlorn and suffering characters.

Kumararama is a historical play depicting the tragedy of the legendary hero who had to pay with his life for resisting the advances of his step-mother. Ili Bonu is an experiment in writing an absurd play in which the desperate and rough adventures of the modern man are shown to be no more than the helpless struggles of a rat in a trap. Though not a voluminous writer, Chaduranga has maintained quality.

V.M.I.

CHAITABARA (Maithili) is one of the important forms of Maithili lyric which represents a class of folk poetry. As the very name suggests it conveys emotions of love in the month of Chaitra (March-April) when the spring is in full swing. Also known as Chaita, its rhyming refrain is 'ho Rama', 'he Rama' or 'Rama'.

These folk-poems were mostly composed by village people portraying a vivid picture of the contemporary life. Folk culture is amply reflected in these songs with expression of genuine desires, aspirations and emotions of the people. They further express the latent desires and cherished ideals of the community. In Chaitabara songs we have sometimes a series of parallel images with new symbols and innovations rarely found elsewhere. They are meant for a particular period (i.e. Chaitra) and are sung accordingly and any departure from the accepted conventions is not allowed. The main themes of these songs chiefly relate to the frustration resulting from separation of the beloved or wife from her lover or husband, the reasons being mainly economic. The month of Chaitra is the month of spring having its own charms and reactions on the feeling of the separated partners. The 'Phaga' (holy songs) and the 'Chaiti' (chaitra songs) are in fact colourful and enchanting parts of this series.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Jayakanta Mishra, A History of Maithili Literature, Allahabad.

U.T.

CHAITANYA AND HIS SCHOOL OF THOUGHT (Sanskrit). Chaitanya or Shri Krishna Chaitanya (1486-1532) whose name in his pre-monk's life (purva-ashrama) was Vishvambhara, Nimai and Gauranga, is to be remembered equally in the fields of Gaudiya Vaishnava Philosophy and its related Bhakti movement. In the Chaitanya Sampradaya of his followers and admirers Bhakti was not only glorified but also analysed in the light of the classical rasa theories standardised by Anandavardhana, Abhinavagupta and others of the dhvani school of thought. The magical attraction of Chaitanya's personality and his philosophy about Krishna-bhakti was very great indeed. It ushered in the golden age of Bengali and Sanskrit literature in medieval Bengal. Many of Chaitanya's companions and disciples were famous as poets and aestheticians. A good account of biographical and non-biographical works that arose in the wake of the Chaitanya movement, as written at the time and later, can be found in works, like S.K. De's Early History of the Vaishnava Faith and Movement in Bengal; Jadunath Sarkar's Chaitanya's Life and Teachings; D.C. Sen's The Vaishnava Literature of Medieval Bengal; and A.K. Majumdar's Chaitanya, His Life and Doctrine.

The main contributions of Gaudiya Vaishnavism to Indian thought are—the category of Achintya-shakti (the inconceivable power) of the Lord, ontology of Radha, and the development of the Bhakti–rasa theory. The central idea of the Achintya-bhedabheda philosophy is that an individual (jiva), after his journey through innumerable cycles of birth and death, is at last released, not in a vacuum, nor indeed to be merged in an indefinable union with the ultimate reality, but to retain his identity and enjoy His Bliss. Madhurya is central to Gaudiya Vaishnavism. In this idealistic structural frame-work of bliss Krishna is the substratum, Radha is the embodiment of bliss, and the consummation of the ideal is the identification of the dual conception of Radha and Krishna as Radha-Krishna, representing Shakti and Shaktimat, as the ultimate conception of divine bliss in its limitless plenitude.

The Gaudiya Vaishnavism is essentially a system of practical religious emotionalism. Therefore their emphasis is not so much on epistemology, as on the delineation of the various types of religious emotions, their nomenclature and classification. The most important texts on this subject are the Bhaktirasamritasindhu and Ujjvalanilamani of Rupa Gosvamin, and Bhaktisandarbha of Jiva Gosvamin.

Bhakti or devotion to God has been indeed considered of great importance from time immemorial in India. Amongst rhetoricians, Dandin (6th century from Kanchi in South India) in his Kavyadarsha, illustrated his figure of speech 'preyas' with two instances of devotion to God. It is natural that in India this sentiment of devotion should have been accepted as a rasa. But Abhinavagupta and others proposed to bring it under shanta, which is the rasa relating to the final purushartha or moksha. The three paths of bhakti, karma and jnana are well known. It may be that bhakti which is in some cases a part (anga) of shanta developed on lines of jnana. But Chaitanya and his followers added prema or bhakti as the fifth purushartha, and developed bhakti as a supreme rasa by itself. They made jnana and karma an aid to bhakti. Just as the nine rasas have the sub-divisions according to the different conditions, bhakti has the four varieties–madhura or shringara or ujjvala, love as in the case of gopis towards Krishna; sakhya or friendship as in the case of Arjuna; vatsalya or affection as in the case of Devaki, Yashoda, Vasudeva and Nanda; dasya or servitude as in the case of other devotees.

S.S.J.

CHAITANYA BHAGAVATA (Bengali) is the first biography of Chaitanya Dev (1486-1533) in Bengali. Brindavan Das, the author, composed it in verse about the middle of the 16th century. Whether the title of the book was Chaitanya Bhagavata, as found in the colophon and popularly known, or Chaitanya Mangal, as stated in Krishnadas Kaviraj's Chaitanya Charitamrita, is a matter of academic dispute. It is the only extant work of Brindavan Das, probably the only book he wrote. Brindavan was the son of Narayani, the name of his father is unknown. Narayani was a niece of Shrivasa Pandit and a disciple of Nityananda, a close associate of Chaitanya. Brindavan collected materials for his work from oral and written sources of Nityananda, Advaita Acharya, Gadadhar, Murari Gupta and others.

The work is divided into three parts–the First deals with the life of young Chaitanya (then called Visvambhar), from his birth till his visit to Gaya, in 12 chapters; the Second depicts his preparations for mounting a vigorous Vaishnava movement and encompasses the period between his return from Gaya and his becoming an ascetic. It has 26 chapters. The Third relates his departure from Navadvipa to Puri in 11 chapters.

According to the Navadvipa School of the Vaishnavas, Chaitanya was Lord Krishna incarnate and not the combined incarnation of Radha and Krishna, as declared later by Svarupa-Damodara of the Virndavana School of the Vaishnavas (Chaitanya Charitamrita). The name of Radha is not found anywhere in Chaitanya Bhagavata. In Brindavana's opinion, Krishna was born as Chaitanya in order to preach the Bhakti Dharma (i.e., Religion of Devotion) and to relieve people of their sufferings by spreading the Holy Name of the Lord. This biography of his is an inspired work full of human interest. In it one may have valuable glimpses of the social, political, economic and other aspects of Navadvipa, then a famous centre of Sanskrit learning and culture, under the reign of Hussein Shah.

The work, of course, has its flaws. For one thing, it is incomplete as a biography. Chaitanya's date of birth is nowhere mentioned, nor is there any coverage of his life at Puri. Chronological order has not been strictly adhered to. Some of the incidents described in it differ from the accounts of Chaitanya's biographies in Sanskrit written by Murari Gupta (Sri Krishna Chaitanya Charitamritam) and Kavi Karnapura (Chaitanya Charitmarita Mahakavyam, Chaitanya-Chandrodaya Natakam). But after all Brindavan had no model of the genre of biography before him, and he did the best he could with the meagre material he could collect, nevertheless succeeding in throwing considerable light on Chaitanya's life and his age.

This popular book has been printed quite often since 1842. Some of its most famous editors are Iswarchandra Nyayaratna, Atulkrishna Gosvami, Radhagovinda Nath, etc.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Bimanbihari Majumdar, Chaitanya Chariter Upadan, Calcutta, 1959; Prabhat Mukherjee, History of the Chaitanya Faith in Orissa, New Delhi 1979.

M.G.

CHAITANYA CHARITAMRITA (Bengali) is the biography of Chaitanya Mahaprabhu composed by Krishnadas Kaviraj (1527-1607) in the last quarter of the 16th century (1575-1595). The early hagiographies of Chaitanya were inspired by Nityananda, considered the closest follower of Sri Chaitanya, through whom Gauriya Vaishnava Dharma was preached in Bengal. Before the Bengali biographies were written, two Mahakavyas in Sanskrit on the life of Chaitanya had already been written by Murari Gupta and Paramananda Sen (Kavi Karnapura). Naturally the early Bengali hagiographies were greatly influenced by them.

Considered by most eminent critics, as the only epic in mediaeval Bengali literature, Krishnadas Kaviraj's Chaitanya Charitamrita belongs to that rank of hagiography, where imagination mingles with erudition, thus making the Mahakavya, also a shastra–both great poetry and serene religious treatise, with a touch of genuine spiritual fervour. The Chaitanya Bhagavata of Brindavan Das came out first. The biographical details of Chaitanya, upto his renunciation have been depicted in the Chaitanya Bhagavata. But Chaitanya's life and activities are depicted in Krishnadas's Charitamrita with deeper significance of philosophy and devotion.

Like Chaitanya Bhagavata, Chaitanya Charitamrita is also divided in three parts. The first part or Adilila deals with the neo-vaishnava theology of Gaudiya Vaishnavism, with stress on the spiritual cause of Chaitanya's advent. Following Swarup Damodar, Krishnadas explains Chaitanya's advent as Lila (Eternal Play) of Krishna, i.e. Krishna enjoying his own sweet divine self through Sri Radha and for that purpose takes the beauty of Radha in his outward body, while inside being Sri Krishna, thus combining the eternal enjoyer and the enjoyed. Throughout the Charitamrita this inherent merger of Krishna and Radha is maintained in the personality of Chaitanya. In the second part Krishnadas Kaviraj begins the story of Chaitanya's life, where Brindaban Das's Kavya virtually ends, i.e. the renunciation of Chaitanya. While Brindaban Das's book depicts first half of Chaitanya's life with picturesque precision, Krishnadas draws the picture of the monk Chaitanya wandering throughout the length and breadth of India, and explaining and preaching his religion of love to various people, some of whom later developed the philosophy of Gauriya Vaishnavism. Vasudeva Sarvabhaum, Ramananda Roy, Swarup Damodar, Sanatan Goswami, Rup Goswami are a few of those through whom a particular branch of Vishishtadvaita Philosophy, known as Gauriya Vaishnavism gradually developed. With their philosophical and poetic genius these Goswamis and Pandits laid the foundation of Gauriya Vaishnava philosophy, which was expounded in Krishnadas Kaviraj's epic. With a rare mixture of poetic insight and philosophical genius Krishnadas imbued in the Madhyalila of Chaitanya Charitamrita the wisdom and bhakti of Chaitanya. In this respect the sixth, eighth, nineteenth, twentieth to twentythird chapterrs of Madhyalila are most valuable.

In the Antyalila portion of the Charitamrita the last twelve years of Sri Chaitanya have been described with great spiritual insight. In his last days, he was all absorbed in the love of his God, his beloved Krishna, pining for him in each and every moment. Thus the fire of Viraha (separation of the beloved) gradually enveloped Chaitanya's life upto his last moment. The poet in Krishndas unfolds its innermost treasures in this portion and makes the Kavya as true nectar (amrita), thus justifying the name of the epic Chaitanya Charitamrita.

In many places, inspired by Bhagavata, Gita Govinda, Krishna Karnamrita and other famous Kavyas, Krishnadas developed beautiful lyrical passages which can be accepted as outstanding examples of lyrical poetry in Bengali mediaeval literature.

Krishnadas has developed the dramatic elements of Chaitanya's life in many places of his hagiography. His narration is lucid, at the same time it glitters with his flashing imaginative quality. All along his Mahakavya he has maintained a fine balance between Chaitanya's simple way of life and conversation with his philosophical depth and erudite scholarship, as the occasion required. In Brindavandas's Chaitanya Bhagavata, the background of the first half of Chaitanya's life is depicted against the background of Bengal, while in Krishnadas Kaviraj's biography South India (in Chaitanya's travel in Vaishnava Tirthas), Vrindavan, Prayag and Benaras and many other places of pilgrimage in India are depicted with an eye towards the unfolding of Chaitanya movement as a whole. Firstly Bengal, secondly Orissa remained the centre of this movement, which after his demise shifted to Vrindavan. Thus Chaitanya became an all-India figure in Krishnadas's pen, fulfilling his mission of love in various ways. Breaking the barrier of caste, religion and parochialism this saint influenced the people of all strata of life. From the intellectuals, kings, and ministers to untouchables, downtrodden and helpless poor masses of India–all were equally influenced by this essentially humanist saint. In Charitamrita we find this total personality of Chaitanya and feel the presence of a Divine personality illuminating our earthly life.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Asitkumar Banerjee, Bangla Sahityer Itibritia; Shashibhushan Dasgupta, Sri Radhar Kramabikash. Sushilkumar De, Early History of the Vaishnava Faith & Movements in Bengal.

Pra.G.

CHAITANYA LITERATURE (Bengali) Though it is technically a part of the vast Vaishnava culture based on the older legends and traditions of the Bhagavata, various Puranas and Bhakti-Sutras, Naradiya and other Narayaniya cults were systematized into a separate stream by the advent and impact of Chaitanya (b. 1486, d. 1532) whose magnetic personality and the sense of divinity in humanity and pure devotion had electrified the masses and gave rise to a body of literature as biographies and homage paid to the master. Under the impact of his movement, a part of Eastern India in the 16th and 17th centuries became literally deluged by emotional fervour. Chaitanya became the symphony of India, a consummation of two thousand years of spiritual life of millions of men and women, to quote a Romain Rolland simile (which he had applied in the case of Sri Ramakrishna). Chaitanya was like him a phenomenon. Here was a scholarly boy, a God-drunk youth, almost out of tune with his surroundings, rolling and rollicking in Krishna-Radha consciousness, behaving like an unbalanced one and yet he was a stark reality, a definite historical personage and had his Being and Becoming, only the other day–not a phantom figure in the limbo of oblivion world of fancy, details of whose life we have to pick up from traditional legends, historical tid-bits or epigraphic records. This was reflected in the of literature that grew up after his disappearance and may be defined as Chaitanya literature.

He himself, though a perfectly erudite scholar, was not a writer. We have however eight beautiful poetic verses attributed to him known as Sikshashtaka (eight lessons of self-education). An idea of one of these is rendered below:–

"I do not want a principality, or wealth or authority over people nor do I hanker after a lovely maiden, the cynosure of all eyes. O Lord, give me this boon that I may hanker after thee in every thing and for thee alone"

Chaitanya literature may be divided into two groups:

1. Brindaban school, mainly in Sanskrit, of the six Goswamis and others like Damodar Swarup.

2. Navadwip school mainly in Bengali beginning with Chaitanya Bhagavata of Brindaban Das. Of course some in Bengal also wrote in Sanskrit such as (a) Murari Gupta who did this in his Karcha (b) Raghunath Das in his poems, (c) Paramananda Sen Kavi-Karnapura (Ear ornament of poets) in his Chaitanya Chandrodaya (1538) and (d) Chaitanya Charitamrita (1542; not to be confused with the great work of Krishnadas Kaviraj), and (e) Lochandas in Chaitanya Mangal in the form of a Purana. He introduced also Dhamali songs, somewhat unorthodox in character and erotic in taste. These songs had a mystic touch also and were in Bengali. Before the end of the 16th century Chaitanya stories had become regular and popular features of the Bengali literature where incidents from the epics and the Puranas were also integrated and introduced in the same work as in Lochandas or (f) in Chaitanya Mangal by Jayananda, a popular narrative type of poem. (g) Mention should also be made of Gauranga Bijaya by Churamani, a disciple of Nityananda. (h) There were also adaptations in Bengali of Chaitanya Chandrodaya of Paramanand by Purushottam Misra known as Chaitanya Chandrodaya Kaumudi. (i) Bhagirath Bandhu, another scholar, wrote a smaller work called Chaitanya-Samhita in the pattern of an Agama text, in which Shiva was answering Parvati's queries. (j) The finest of all is Chaitanya Charitamrita, really the nectar of Chaitanya's life history by Krishnadas Kaviraj (1575-1595). (k) In the 17th and 18th centuries Chaitanya songs became mixed up with Baul mystic songs. (l) In the 18th century we find Chaitanya literature influencing Harivamsha by Bhabananda and songs written by Saiyad Murtuza and Nasir Mahmud. (m) Another work which deserves mention is Ramgopal Das's Radha-Krishna-Rasa Kalpaballi. (n) The tradition was still carried on in the Mahatma Sisir Ghosh's Amiya Nimai Charit, in Tridandi Swami Bon Maharaj's book, in Kumaresh Ghosh's Chaitanya Bhagavata, besides in minor poems of many established poets such as Kumudranjan Mullick, etc.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Hemchandra Rai Chaudhuri's, Materials for the Study of the Early History of the Vaishnava Sect., Calcutta 1936; R.G. Bhandarkar–Vaishnavism, Shaivism and Minor Religious Systems, Poona 1928; Sushilkumar Dey, Early History of the Vaishnava Faith and Movement in Bengal, Calcutta 1962, Si.B.

CHAKBAST, BRIJ NARAIN (Urdu; b. 1882, d. 1926) was a product of Lucknawi culture. He was admitted to the degree in law in 1908 and soon became a leading lawyer of Lucknow. On February 12, 1926, he fell a victim to paralysis at Raibaraily railway station and although medical aid was made readily available, his life could not be saved. Even though he died so early and produced only one book of poetry, Subh-e-Watan (The Morning of Motherland; 1926) his position as a significant poet in Urdu is secure. An ardent admirer of great masters like Atish, Ghalib and Anis, who, in some measure, influenced his art, he worked out a fresh future of Urdu poetry.

Chakbast sang songs of Rama and Krishna (heroes of the ancient epics in the Ramayana and the Mahabharata) and of Gokhale and Bal Gangadhar Tilak of the contemporary India. This goes to show his literary roots firm in the soil of India. It is the type of poetry inspired by one's tradition and environment, that saves art from becoming pale and inane and evidences a search for enduring human values. The poems of Subh-e-Watan dwell on national and social themes besides reflecting personal sentiments of the poet. The poems, 'Ramayana ka ek Scene' (A Scene from the Ramayana) and Krishna Kanahiya, superbly bring into focus Rama and Krishna of the Ramayana and the Mahabharta. Another outstanding poem Gaye (The Cow) carries poetic echoes of the Hindu belief in the sacred animal. The book includes eight elegies of persons who symbolise our national ideals and the poet cherished their memory owing to his association with them. The ghazals which he meaningfully captions Mazahab-e-Shairana (The Religion of Poetry) comprise couplets, each independent of the other in meaning and yet accords, despite the constraints of the art, the freedom irresistibly tempting for a poet. As a model of the culture of Lucknow, Chakbast could not have avoided this prevalent poetic form. Some of his couplets serve as quotes today for convenient understanding of intricate human situations. The concluding section of Subh-e-Watan is rather limited in scope and contains his earliest poems which the poet justly regards as his initial exercises. It also has four 'Rubaiyat' and a satirical poem Lord Curzon se Jhapat' (An Encounter with Lord Curzon).

Chakbast's access to western literature and his devoted involvement in native life and letters gave him a capacity for a cultivated and reliable opinion as critic. The famous literary debate known as Marka-e-Chakbast-o-Sharar' bears adequate testimony to his knowledge and reasoning. Besides his critical views and appraisals, which were regularly published in such magazines as the Subh-e-Ummid, the Kashmiri Darpan and the Zamana, point out how he always held himself way from extravagance and exaggeration. His language both in poetry and prose, is distinguished for its refreshing simplicity and ampleness. Quite often the use of appropriate Hindi words gives a distinctive flavour.

Tej Bahadur Sapru observed in his Preface to Chakbast's collection of poetry that, 'in years to come, when Urdu poetry no longer relies so much on artifice and grows larger in an atmosphere of freedom, future generations will know Brij Narain as a leader of the modern era.' (Trans.)

*BIBLIOGRAPHY:*Kalidas Gupta 'Raza', Kuliyat-e-Chakbast (Bombay, 1982) and Bakiyat-e-Chakbast (Bombay, 1983); Ram Babu Saxena, Supplement to Tarikh-e-Adab-e-Urdu. Raj Narain Raz (ed.) Chakbast Number of 'Ajkal Urdu (1984); Tej Bahadur Sapru, Preface to Subh-e-Watan (Allahabad, 1926).

J.P.

CHAKKEECHANKARAM (Malayalam). There are two parodies bearing the same title Chakkeechankaram, one called the 'southern' (1893) written by Rama Kurup, P (1848-1897) and the other the 'northern' (1893) by Narayanan Nampiar, K.C. (1873-1922). We shall talk about the former here.

This parodical play was a kind of shock treatment concocted and applied by Rama Kurup to put an end to the nauseating proliferation of plays either as translations from Sanskrit or as imitations of Sanskrit or Tamil models that flooded the theatre in Malayalam at that time. The scene is Trivandrum, nicknamed Vasukipuri, the capital of the former Travancore State, which in its turn, is nicknamed Kalpitamcode. The actual hero Sukumaran, a Magistrate's son, and the heroine Madhavikutty, the daughter of the hero's maternal uncle, are perceptibly dwarfed by the mock hero and heroine, Chankaran and Chacki, a male and a female cook. The names, Chacki and Chankaran themselves have a ridiculous ring about them. The play has all the technical paraphernalia of a classical Sanskrit drama. The dialogues, (often interpersed with highly satirical verses,) and action are so managed as to hold up to ridicule the incompetent writers, especially playwrights, along with the anachronistic technique of drama.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: G. Sankara Pillai, Malayala Nataka Sahitya Charitram (1979)., Ulloor S. Parameswara Iyer, Kerala Sahitya Charitram, Vol. V (1955).

K.S.N.

CHAKRA (Marathi) is a novel published in 1963 which has in a way revolutionized the concept of the Marathi novel. Haribhau Apte had started the trend of the so-called social novel with his Mi and Pan Lakshyat Kon Gheto, and later on helped novelists like V.M. Joshi, Ketkar, Phadke, Khandekar and Madkholkar compose a considerable body of Marathi novels, which depicted the middle-class and its milieu. The middle-class is in fact a negligible part of the total population, but the major part of society had, till the advent of Chakra, been usually kept out of Marathi novel.

Jayavant Dalvi's Chakra was a forerunner of novels which dealt with the lower strata of society and its trials and tribulations. The author himself as usual belongs to the middle class. But while working as a reporter for some Marathi periodicals, he had the opportunity to observe the life in the raw in the slum-areas in and around Bombay.

Zopadpatti had just appeared on the scene, and it was inhabited by all kinds of poor people of all kinds of religions, castes and creeds whose common need was of food. They had come together from the far ends of the country, and their means of communication was a slang, which incorporated the traits of various Indian languages and their dialects. They had to struggle for their very existence, and any kind of moral code was anathema to them.

Jayavant Dalvi has been a keen observer of life as lived in Zopadpatti, and his observation was marked by his desire to understand the life style without any sense of involvement. His objective outlook covered all the areas of the Zopadpatti life, and his Chakra is a record of all such objective observations.

Benva happens to be a young hoodlum, who is taking his lessons from Luka, a confirmed criminal and his mother's lover. His mother Amma is kept by Anna, a Brahmin truck driver, and Benva is the only child of her murdered husband. Amma sleeps comfortably with her guardian Anna as well as her lover Luka, and for her son Benva his mother's sexual relationship with the two men makes no difference. Chakra offers a vast panorama of different kinds of people staying together in the Zopadpatti, and their ways of life are described with an eye for minute detail.

Chakra again is a loose story of the child Benva growing up into a man. His mother Amma yearned for a small place of her own, which Anna had promised her. In the meantime Benva was trying very hard to earn his livelihood, and there is a short episode of Benva's attachment for Amala, who lived in an adjacent Zopadpatti. No sooner had he brought her as his wife to his new home, than he found himself homeless once again. The story of Chakra abounds in many incidents, humorous, pathetic and otherwise, which are linked together by the incidents from other resident's lives. Chakra offers a diffused picture of the destitute slum-areas, the very first one of its kind. Chakra undoubtedly is a landmark in the history of the Marathi novel.

M.M.

CHAKRABARTI, AJITKUMAR (Bengali; b. 1886, d. 1918) was a teacher and writer of varied talents; he will always be remembered as the first serious critic of Rabindranath Tagore. Completing his college career at the age of eighteen he joined Shantiniketan Brahmacharya Ashram as a teacher. He was a very successful teacher taking prominent part in the extracurricular activities of the Ashram. He could sing well and was a good actor too. In 1910 he left for London; he had been married to Labanyalekha before the trip. His first booklet on Tagore was Brahmavidyalaya (1911) in which he discussed the poet's ideal of education. The most well-known of his books, Kavyaparikrama with its undated title page, must have been published in the twenties. The eassay on Jivandevata has for obvious reasons been the most important part of the book. Rabindranath (1912) was a guide to the readers of Tagore's poetry. This book might well be called a record of the progress of Tagore's genius. Another of his great works is the biography of Maharshi Devendranath Tagore, which still now is the most authentic book on the subject. He wrote two tracts on Jesus Christ and Raja Rammohun Roy. He also collected and edited the works of Satishchandra Roy, his illustrious colleague at Shantiniketan. He translated many of Tagore's poems into English. During the short period of three months that he was in London he worked hard to introduce Tagore's poetry to the elite of Europe. It was from him that the German philosopher Rudolph Eucken first came to know of Tagore. Some of his translations of Tagore's poems were sent to Rothenstein. He translated Dohas from Kabir and Evelyn Underhill in her introduction to the One Hundred Poems of Kabir by Tagore referred to the great assistance she got from Ajitkumar's version.

So.B.

CHAKRABARTI, AMIYA (Bengali; b. 1901, d. 1985) was educated in Calcutta, Hazaribag, Patna and Oxford, and taught at various places including Calcutta and Boston. As Tagore's literature secretary for some time, he also knew Gandhi and Schweitzer. For some three decades he lived in the United States. Of all the poets of his generation (the so-called 1930's) he perhaps felt closest to Tagore, yet his first book Khasra (First Draft, 1938) had the marks of an absolute 'modern' in its smart images, its uneven rhythm with a hint of free verse and vocabulary not far from everyday speech. Ek Mutho (Just A Handful, 1939) had more of these mosaics; but Matir Deyal (Earth Wall, 1942), Abhijnanavasanta (Spring Signs, 1943) and Durayani (Travelling Far, 1944) added an involvement. The next Parapar (Crossings and Recrossings, 1953), perhaps his greatest book, brought new landscapes to Bengali poetry and a sense of harmony. Palabadal (Change of Scene, 1955) too was a wanderer's book, and so was Ghare Pherar Din (Time to come back Home, 1961). He has been to so many places that in Harano Orchid (Lost Orchids, 1966) his main role was that of a witness. He had been since striving towards a fullness, as seen in Pushpita Image (Images in Bloom, 1967), Amaravati (Heaven, 1972) and Anihshesh (The Inexhaustible, 1975). He has written little prose, one book of essays so far, Sampratik (The Present, 1963). There is a relaxed air about Amiya Cakravarti's poetry which gives him a unique place among the major poets of his generation, borne out by his rather singular style, urbane with an occasional touch of humour, yet meditative, and by his equally singular rhythm, sometimes considered the Bengali approximation to Hopkins' 'sprung rhythm'.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Ashrukumar Sikdar, Adhunik Kavitar Digvalaya (Calcutta, 1980); Buddhadeva Bose, An Acre of Green Grass (Calcutta, 1948),

A.D.

CHAKRABARTI, BIHARILAL (Bengali; b. 1834, d. 1894) was the son of Dinanath. After completing his school and college studies by the age of fifteen he started writing songs. He learnt Sanskrit quite well and was interested in English literature also. The other poets of the time Madhusudan Dutta, Hemchandra Banerji, Navinchandra Sen were all trying to write full size epics. Biharilal decided to take a new path. He wrote subjective poems in the romantic vein and it was through him that the English romantic poetry of the 19th century started projecting itself on the modern Bengali poetry. He is chiefly remembered as a Guru to Rabindranath Tagore and to the romantic movement in Bengali poetry. He was a deeply sensitive poet who created a new romantic diction for modern Bengali poetry. The most famous of his writings is Saradamangal (1879), a book of poems on Goddess Saraswati. A part of this writing had some direct influence on Rabindranath who wrote Valmiki Pratibha on more or less the same theme. Of his other poems Tagore admitted, "they were the most appealing of all the poems of the time." He was closely associated with the Tagore family and wrote Sadher Asan (1888-89), a long poem on being presented a cushion by Kadambari Devi, wife of Jyotirindranath Tagore.

His other writings are Svapnadarshan (prose, 1858), Sangit-Shatak (1862), Banga Sundari (1869), Nisarga Sandarshan (1869), Bandhu Biyoga and Prempra vahini. He also founded and edited certain journals of which Abodhbandhu (1866-69) was the most remarkable. Tagore commented that Abodbandhu was the first monthly journal which catered to varied tastes. It could be called the morning star of the Bengali literature. Other journals published by him were Purnima (1858) and Sahitya Samskriti (1879).

So.B.

CHAKRABARTI, CHARUCHANDRA (Bengali; b. 1901) is an M.A. of the Calcutta University. Charuchandra in his service life worked as a jailer in several district jails of Bengal, having retired as Superintendent, Alipur Central Jail, Calcutta. His pen name is Jarasandha. The wide experience he thus gained of jail life in his direct daily contact with the prisoners, convicts and criminals of all sorts–he put to good use as a writer; and in his four volumes of Lauha Kapat (The Iron Gate, the first volume of which had appeared in 1953, his maiden venture), Tamasa (1958), Nyaydanda (The Sceptre of Justice, 1961) and other novels he practically built up a whole world with them. With sympathetic insight he penetrated the other side of his characters and presented them as very human, some of them even lovable inspite of their records of misdeeds. Because of this and his easy flow of narration Jarasandha is now almost a household word in the literary arena of Bengal. Many of his books have been translated into other languages of India.

FURTHER WORKS: Parhi (The Sailing, 1962), Parashmoni (The Touch-stone, 1966), Uttaradhikar (The Inheritance, 1972), Nishanga Pathik (The Lone Traveller, First Part 1971, Second Part, 1973), etc.

N.C

CHAKRABARTI, CHINTAHARANA (Bengali; b. 1902, d. 1972) was a Sanskrit scholar and bibliographer. He took his M.A. in Sanskrit and Bengali from Calcutta University. A member of Bengal Educational Service, he finally retired from Presidency College, Calcutta and became the Secretary, Bengali Publication Department of the University. Chintaharana distinguished himself as a scholar specialising in Jainism, Buddhism and Tantric literature and wrote a number of books both in English and Bengali on these subjects. He was also well known as a bibliographer and editor of old texts. He presided over the classical Sanskrit section of the All India Oriental Conference held in Delhi in 1953. Chintaharana was actively associated with the Sanskrita Sahitya Parishad and Asiatic Society (Bengal) during 1961-64. He was elected a fellow of the Society in 1963. He also presided over the Tantric Culture section of the All India Tantra Conference held at Varanasi in 1965. In 1967, Calcutta University awarded him the Sarojini Basu Gold Medal in recognition of his services towards Bengali literature.

FURTHER WORKS: Bengali: Jaina-dharmer vaishishtya, Calcutta, 1925; Bangala Puthir Vivarana, Bangiya Sahitya Parishad, Calcutta, 1944-45; Banglar Pala Parvan, Calcutta, 1952; Bhasha, Sahitya Samskriti, Calcutta, 1960; Tantrakatha, Calcutta, 1965; Hindur Acharanushthan, Calcutta, 1970. English: A Descriptive Catalogue of the Sanskrit Mss. in the Bangiya Sahitya Parishad, Calcutta 1935; Descriptive Cataloque of Sanskrit Mss. in the Asiatic Society, Calcutta, 1940-1955; Tantras, Studies on their Religion and Literature, Calcutta, 1963.

G.S.

CHAKRABARTI, GHANARAM (Bengali) was decidedly the most representative exponent of Dharmamangal Kavya, a poetic lore that had grown around the cult of 'Dharmathakur' prevalent in some western districts of Bengal like Birbhum, Burdwan and Bankura. Ghanaram Chakrabarti is believed to have flourished in the earlier part of the 18th century. The printing press had by then come into existence and this is one of the reasons why this Chakrabarti is believed to have flourished in the earlier part (this particular line of verse compositions was being practised during the whole length of the preceding two hundred years), of the century.

'Dharmathakur' was a god of the so-called lower castes of the Hindu society, especially the 'Doms' (a people belonging to the scavenger class who also burnt dead bodies). They worshipped this deity in their own crude way, the dom priests having evolved a smattering of broken Sanskrit and Bengali punched together to serve as 'mantra' (incantation) to propitiate him. But such was the impact of this particular cult of worship in the countryside, it being related in the main to agriculture and a desire to augment harvest yields, that in course of time this primitive god came to be accepted in the hierarchy of Brahmanical gods and goddesses and poets like Ghanaram Chakrabarti, Manik Ganguly, Sahadev Chakravarti, all Brahmins, composed their works around Dharmathakur, hitherto regarded as untouchable. The artistic qualities of Ghanaram's Kavya may not be very high but it is important from the standpoint of social history of rural Bengal of the 17th-18th centuries. It is huge in bulk like that of an epic but its tone is more akin to 'panchali' (doggerel verse) than heroic poems of old. Yet in his own characteristic way Ghanaram was able to construct a more or less imposing structure around the two most popular tales of the 'Dharma' cult—those of Harishchandra and Lausen. Lausen's manliness and valour, deep sense of morality and regard for women were depicted so feelingly that it had the effect of introducing a sort of ennobling influence in an otherwise corrupt atmosphere of the then decadent society. In bringing out the best in Lausen the demarcation line between the real and the unreal was no doubt obliterated but the supernatural elements heightened rather than lowered the key of acceptability to the readers of a predominantly gullible age.

Ghanaram was reticent about himself and his lineage. Yet from whatever little information was available from his work it is known that he was born in Krishnapur, a village of Burdwan district, and possibly enjoyed some patronage from Bardhamanraj Kirtichandra who finds mention in his poem. His parents were Gaurikanta and Sita. He had four sons. He is believed to have completed his work in 1711.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Amalendu Mitra, Rarher Sanskriti, Calcutta, 1972., Asitkumar Banerjee, Bangla Sahityer Sampurna Itibritta, Calcutta, 1966; Asutosh Bhattacharya, Bharatkosh, 3rd Vol., Calcutta.

N.C.

CHAKRABARTI, KABIKANKAN MUKUNDARAM (Bengali) was a 16th century Bengali poet who has often been described by the critics as a poet with the novelist's qualities. The dates of his birth and death are uncertain; probably he lived during Akbar's reign. The life-sketch given by Mukundaram himself in his Abhayamangal (Chandimangal) tells us that he, the younger son of Hriday Misra of Damunya in Burdwan, had to flee from his home with his family to escape the wrath of the local administrative chief. After many hardships, he got a shelter and the job of a private tutor. His master, Bankura Ray, was a zamindar of Adra, Midnapore.

Even in that remote medieval age, Mukundaram laid emphasis more on man than on the gods. He portrayed life's sorrows and happiness with the skill of a socially conscious author. His forte was scholarship blended with wit and humour. He infused a new vigour into the traditional monotony of the Mangalkavyas. The rustic simplicity of Kalketu, the womanly expressions of Phullara, Lahana and Khullana, the ups-and-downs in the life of Dhanapati, the villainies of Murari Sil and Bhandu Datta display his skill in building up characters and situations.

His sympathy for the suffering people, to which he is considered to have belonged, had been symbolically expressed through the medium of the animal's prayers to goddess Chandi. His similes and metaphors, all drawn from the lives of the common-folk, were of superb qualities. Mukundaram's influence over the later poets was immense; his treatment of the Dhanapati-story and portraiture of Shiva-Durga as commoners, served as models for more than two centuries.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Asutosh Bhattacharyya, Bangla Mangalkabyer Itihas (Calcutta 1964)., Brajendra Bhattacaryya, Jiban-rasik Kabi Mukundaram (Calcutta 1966).

P.S.

CHAKRABARTI, NARAHARI (Bengali) In the late 17th and early 18th century (exact dates are not known) the name of Narahari Chakravarti was an honoured one in the Vaishnava literary world as a pioneer of a cyclopaedia of Vaishnava lore. The book referred to is known as Bhakti-Ratnakar which with Laldas's Bhaktamal (an adaptation of Brajabuli poems by Nabha and its commentary by Priyadas) were considered to be authentic source books of Vaishnava lore.

Narahari Chakravarti was a man of Nuddeah and was known by his other name of Ghanashyam Chakrabarti. He was the disciple of Viswanath Chakrabarti and of Shrinivasa Acharya. He was in Vrindavan for sometime and served as the cook in Govindaji's temple founded by Sri Rup Goswami. Apart from the work mentioned above, his Gaur-Charit-Chintamani, Narottam-Bilas, Braja-Parikrama, Chhanda-Samudra, and Lila-Samudra are also well-known compositions written mostly in Sanskrit.

Si.B.

CHAKRABARTI, NIRENDRANATH (Bengali; b. 1924) is a well known Bengali poet. A journalist by profession and editor of the children's fortnightly Anandamela, Chakrabarti is chiefly known as a modern poet. Felicity of expression and perspicacity of diction are among the main traits of his compositions distinguishing him from the rest of his tribe. His principal works include Nil Nirjan (The Blue Loneliness, 1954), Andhakar Baranda (The Dark Corridor, 1960), Kolkatar Jishu (Jesus of Calcutta, 1969), Shreshtha Kavita (Best Poems, 1970) and Ulanga Raja (The naked King). For his last named book of poems he was awarded the Sahitya Akademi Prize in 1974. He discusses the technicalities of poetry-writing in his book Kavitar Klas (Class for Poetry Compositions, 1975). He is also an able translator.

N.C.

CHAKRABARTI, RUPRAM (Bengali) was one of the earliest writers of Bengali Dharmamangala poems, which eulogise Dharma. He was born in Shrirampore (Burdwan District, West Bengal) and his parents were Shrirama and Damayanti.

Rupram's Dharmamangala is quite readable. The warfare and social conditions of those days have been vividly described in this poem.

The date of composition of Rupram's poem has been given in a riddle. Scholars differ about its interpretation. From some of the manuscripts we learn that Rupram started the composition of his poem, when Shuja was governing Bengal from Rajmahal, i.e. in the middle of the 17th century.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Sukhamay Mukhopadhyay, Madhyayuger Bangla Sahityer Tathya O Kalakrama (Calcutta, 1974).

Su.M.

CHAKRABARTI, SIBRAM (Bengali; b. 1903, d. 1980) was a poet, playwright and essayist, though known now mainly as a humorist. Originally he had been a serious writer with his attention divided among poetry, drama and criticism in almost equal measure. His Manush (The Man) and Chumban (Kiss), both published in 1929, were two books in which he had shown promise as a poet of finer sensibilities extolling humanity in the former and glorifying the beauty of woman in the latter. In his one-act plays of the period he had definitely established himself as a dramatist of power, his Chakar Niche (Under the Wheels) showing genuine concern for the misery of the downtrodden and the destitute a là Gorky's Lower Depths. He also wrote in that period some very bold essays, highly irreverential in tone in which he sought to demolish the facade of one or two reputed cultural religious institutions of the country.

But a perceptible change overtook him in later years. He threw aside his hitherto accustomed serious tone and put upon himself the mantle of a seeming court-jester, making it his avowed aim to entertain the children above everything else. Countless juvenile stories, replete with fun, frolic and mirth, began to roll from his pen as effortlessly as water from a fountain. The gay abandon with which he heaped ridicule upon himself, the highly inventive nature of his plots and his inexhaustible play of words in the shape of spontaneous pun and alliteration at once made him a 'rage' with all classes of children. Judging by his mode of writing some critics compare him with Mark Twain, some others with Jermoe K. Jerome. Perhaps both the comparisons are right in a sense.

FURTHER WORKS : Atha Bivaha Ghatita, Kamala book Depot, Calcutta, 1946; Maner Mata Bau, M.C. Sarkar & Sons, Calcutta, 1946; Premer Path Ghoralo, Standard Publishers, Calcutta, 1946; Premer Pratham Bhag, Book Emporium, Calcutta, 1948; Udor Pindi Budhor Gharhe, Subodh Majumdar, Calcutta, 1949; Rasamayer Rasikata, Sahityayan, Calcutta, 1950; Harano Prapti Niruddesh, Book World, Calcutta, 1951; Bhalobasar Anek Nam, Ananda Publishers, Calcutta, 1966; Lejer Privilege, Katha Shilpa, Calcutta, 1967; Keramater Keramati, Newscript, Calcutta, 1967; Totapakhir Pakami, Indian Associated Publishers, Calcutta, 1968; Ishwar, Prithibi, Bhalobasa, an autobiography, 1974; Ek Meye Byomkesher Kahini, Ananda Publishers, Calcutta, 1975.

N.C.

CHAKRABARTI, SURESHCHANDRA (Bengali; b. 1891) was a poet, storywriter and essayist of distinction. Sureshchandra came under the influence of Pramatha Chaudhuri, the renowned editor of Sabuj Patra (The Green Leaf) at an early age and became a regular contributor to this literary magazine known for its progressive views, liberalism in tastes and zeal in reform of the Bengali prose style, along with a number of other powerful young writers among whom were Atulchandra Gupta, Kiranshankar Roy, Sureshchandra Ghatak, Sunitikumar Chatterjee and Dhurjatiprasad Mukherjee.

He made his debut with poetry and created a sensation by one or two of his poems which broke fetters of conventional morality then current among the middle ranks of the society. In storywriting the symbolical form suited his pen very much and in this genre of composition he wrote quite a number of books of which mention may be made of: Natun Rupkatha O Ekti Rupak Galpa (New Fairytale and a Symbolic Story, 1920), Sagarika (The Maiden of the Sea, 1924), Aindrajalik (The Magical, 1925), Sakshi (The Witness, 1926), Indhradhanu (Rainbow, 1928), etc.

But he was probably at his best in the domain of the essay. Endowed with a sharp intellect and a progressive mode of thinking, his essays were remarkable for their clarity of style, a trait which he had successfully imbibed from his acknowledged literary mentor. His essay collections included Nabayuger Katha (Talk of the New Epoch, 1919), Sabuj Katha (Fresh Talk, 1921) and Urochithi (The Unidentifiable Letter, 1922). He sometimes wrote under the pseudonym 'Kamalakanta'.

In later life Sureshchandra forsook literature in favour of a spiritual quest. He repaired to Pondicherry and became a permanent inmate of the Aurobindo Ashram.

N.C.

CHAKRAPANI, VARYAR ERUVAYIL (Malayalam, b. 1857, d. 1951) was a noted scholar and author of musicals. He was a bachelor all his life and a lawyer by profession. His major contribution to Malayalam literature was in the realm of musicals, for musicals were popular in Kerla in the last decades of the 19th century and the early decades of the twentieth century. The touring Tamil companies increased popular taste for these plays. Varyar's main works are (1) Ganasamghatitamaya Harishchandra Charitam ('Harishchandra's Story–A Musical Play', 1901 3rd ed. Quilon), (2) Sangitasakuntalam ('Sakuntala–A Musical Play' 1901 Tankacherry), (3) Sangitsamghatitamaya Rugmangadacharitam Bhashanatkam (A Malayalam Musical on the Rugmangada Story', 1906, Quilon) 4) Madhvisekharam Bhashabhanam (Madhvisekharam–A Bhana in Malayalam, 1893, Pattambi). The last one is a type of play known in Sanskrit dramaturgy as Bhana. This is one of the five Bhanas available in Malayalam.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Ullur S. Parameswara Iyer, Kerala Sahitya Charitram, Vols. 4 and 5.

K.R.P.

CHAKRAVYUHA (Hindi) is the first anthology of poems by Kunwar Narayan, the poet who represents the 'Nai Kavita' movement. Like Matthew Arnold, he regards poetry as criticism of life and upholds the intellectual freedom which prods a poet to raise fearless and searching questions in regard to life. Through his poems, he has posed questions about the life arising out of the conflict of the individual and reality as well as that of the individual and social environment. He has been conscious of and sensitive to the inequities of the modern life ever since he started writing poems.

Chakravyuha (1956) is a collection of about 70 poems by Kunwar Narayan. These poems give expression to poet's genuine effort to achieve a positive and serious approach to life and to that end the poet himself rubs shoulders against the stark inequalities that make the profound intricacies of life which is one of the basic psychological necessities for a new poet to establish his identity. Kunwar Narayan's poetry reflects the modern individuality which, though essentially Indian, presents a combination of alien qualities, tastes and trends which he seems to have acquired from his studies, reflections and more likely from the influence of contacts with others. The poems of Chakravyuha cross swords with life, pass its real materialistic form through artistic experience, point to a trend seeking to provide a kind of stability to it. 'Paitrik Yuddha' presents a fine example of this trend. The poet (Abhimanyu) in the poem asks:

'Kaun kal tak mera kavach ban sakega?
Mera yuddha mujhe hi larna hai
Yah Vyuha mere liye hai
Mujh hi ko yah aghat sahna hai."

(Who on earth shall be my armour? It is a battle which I have to fight alone. This array is set against me. None else but I have to face every blow.)

In this poem which seeks to compare the present war-torn age with that of the Mahabharata, the modern poet finds himself closest to Abhimanyu. This poem mainly depicts the individual form of the psychological conflict that the new poet experiences in the midst of social inequalities. This forms the basic note of Kunwar Narayan's poetry and the title of the book Chakravyuha only underscores the importance of this note. The concluding poem 'Chakravyuha' of this anthology provides an explanation of this basic note. In terms of poetic beauty 'Paitrik Yuddha' and 'Virasat' are the best poems of this anthology.

'Nai Kavita' signifies in an adequate measure the attempt to impart new significance to the myths. Kunwar Narayan's subsequent poem entitled 'Atmajaya' forms part of this tradition. He competently employs a myth as the vehicle of new contexts and successfully carries it to its logical end which can be seen in such poems as 'Paitrik Yuddha' and 'Chakravyuha'

Kunwar Narayan, like other poets, lays emphasis on the momentary feeling. He is aware of his responsibility to the contemporary life's indifference to the realities of life but a desire for escape into eternity is against his grain. The natural indivisibility of the sequence of life, even in a momentary experience, adequately provides the poet with these elements which, in fact, are eternal. This note is prominent in his poem 'Main tha na tha', 'Atoot Kram' and 'Swayam ki Abhivyaktiyan'.

In several poems, which mainly focus on the body, the lingering agony of life eroded by the traditional restlessness to undo the peace is clearly brought out. In this context may be mentioned 'Neeli Satah Par', 'Dharini', 'Deh ke Phool', 'Aashay', 'Tan Paush', 'Mitti ke Garbh Mein', 'Swapna Chitra', 'Surya Santati', 'Krititva' and 'Dhalati Mitti'. These poems are spread over all the four parts of the anthology and present a deep undercurrent running in its variegated forms in the mind of the poet.

Kunwar Narayan struggles against his own personality which appears so small when viewed in the context of the historical traditions. The personality characterised by egoism suffers defeat in the entire struggle of the forces of history and tradition. Kunwar Narayan borrows the symbol of Chakravyuha from the Mahabharata with the sole purpose of giving voice to this modern mood.

The numerous facts of the world have been expressed in Kunwar Narayan's poems in their live picturesqueness. His imagery reveals the delicacy of feelings and the discerning eye for beauty. He has made attempts through his coordinated personality to express the subtle conflicts, impediments and sensibilities of the human mind in terms of absolutely individual images and ideograms.

'Panktiyan mere nikat ayee Nahin,
Main hi gaya unke nikat unko Manane'.

In his poem 'Madhyam' from Chakravyuha he shows his creative approach towards language. The poem reveals that the poet's constant endeavour has been to recapture in words the genuineness of experience.

Gov.R.

CHALIHA, KAMALESWAR (Assamese; b. 1904) is essentially a poet of the older generation of the modern Assamese poetry; but he has, made significant contributions to other branches of the Assamese literature also, that is, the drama, the novel, and the biography. He had his education upto the Entrance stage and served in various capacities and retired ultimately in 1968 from the Gandhi Smarak Nidhi, Assam.

Kamaleswar's major works in the domain of poetry are his literal translation works from original Sanskrit into Assamese in the old Brajabuli verse style of Shankaradeva. The works of this genre are: Uttara-Kanda-Ramayana (1960) and Gita (1961). A voluminous translation work into Assamese of the entire Saptakanda-Ramayana of Valmiki is also completed and ready for publication. In the other poetical works Kamaleswar belongs to the romantic period of the pre-Independence time. And his works are mystical lyrics based on personal experiences of the illusive earthly life and of the glimpses of the life eternal. A deep current of Indian spiritual philosophy is flowing through his lyric poetry. His most important works of this genre are: Gungun (1930), Kanmou (1931), Mukuti (1937), Samsari (1937), Rita (1940), Chhandita (1941), Ahinar Hahi (1963) and Arunima (1970).

His dramas are Chad Sadagar published in the magazine Banhi, Dhuli (1930), Barala (1930) published in the Banhi, and Gandhi-Thal-Kamal. Of these Dhuli (The Dust) is a bold attempt at the symbolic play in Assamese. It is a one-act play with three scenes personifying dust, autumn and wind as human characters. Dhuli in the person of a woman stands for the down-trodden, suffering humanity..

His social novels are: Priya Baligarat (1951) and Sundarar Aghat (1955), wherein love and affection of the common man and woman are dealt with in a plain story-telling manner.

Kamaleswar's contribution to the domain of biography is also significant. His Bishwarakhik Lakshminath Bezbarua (1939) is a biography of Lakshminath Bezbarua written in a dignified prose style. His other biographical works, meant primarily for children, are: Dinabandhu Charles Andrews (1940), Larar Shankardeva, Sarbashreshtha Manab Madhabdeva (1953), Kirttanar Sadhu, Iswar Chandra Vidyasagar (1957), Vishwakavi Rabindranath Thakur (1957), Abraham Lincoln and Marshal Stalin. His rendering into Assamese of the Discovery of India is called Bharat Sambhed (1967) which was published by the Publication Board, Assam.

On his unpublished novel Rupahi a film was produced in 1935 by the renowned artist, Parbatiprasad Barua.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Harichandra Bhattacharya, Asamiya Natya Sahityar Jilingani (Gauhati, 1968). Satyendranath Sarma, Asamiya Upanyakhar Gatidhara (Gauhati, 1976).

Pu.S.

CHALIHA, PADMADHAR (Assamese; b. 1895) had his early education in Sibsagar, the place of his birth. He took his M.A. and Law degrees from Calcutta University.

His poetical collection, Phulani (Garden), published in 1914, contains poems which he composed while he was a student in the M.A. class. These songs became popular all over Assam. About this time he composed also a farce entitled Nimantran (The Invitation), a dance drama named Kenemaja and an adaptation of Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet which he called Amar Lila. His dramas were widely staged on almost every Assamese stage. He was a good actor himself.

Though he began his life as a teacher, later he switched over to law and devoted himself to a number of social activities. In 1920 he joined the non-co-operation movement launched by Gandhiji. The patriotic songs which he composed during those revolutionary times were later collected into the book Swaraj Sangit. These songs were sung in processions, Bhawonas and also as opening songs in numerous meetings. These songs grew very popular and contributed in no small measure to the resurgence of the nationalistic spirit.

In 1928 was published his poetical collection Sarai. About this time also appeared his Gitilahari. From 1931 to 1934 he edited with ability, the bi-weekly and the weekly magazine, Asomiya. In 1939 he in collaboration with Singha Dutta Dev Adhikari brought out another fortnightly paper, the Argha. In 1934 he presided over the music section of the Asom Sahitya Sabha held at Mangaldai. He was then the editor of the newspaper Asomiya and the co-editor of the journal Banhi. A few years later he became the president of the Asam Sahitya Sabha in its Tinsukia Session. He was the founder Principal of Sibsagar College.

The dramatic monologue, entitled Rongpure Katha Koy (1956) was a composition of later years. The book paints the past glories of Rongpur's tradition (Sibsagar). Two other books, viz, Asomiya Sahityalai Rongpurar Barangani and Mahabir Lachit Barphukan were written at about the same period.

The autobiographical, Jiban Binar Sur was Chaliha's last composition. In addition to this he composed in English a book entitled Sahitya Rathi of Assam. His pages bespeak of his glowing patriotism. He was one of the foremost promoters of unity between the plains and hills of Assam.

Ni.B.

CHALIHA, SAURABHKUMAR (Assamese) is the pen-name of Surendranath Medhi who graduated in science from Cotton College, Gauhati, with Honours in Physics in 1950. Later on he had his master-degree in Physics. He is currently engaged as a Lecturer in Physics in the Assam Engineering College.

Chaliha began his career as a short story writer early in life, in the middle of the forties. In a story entitled Karl Marx Era (Karl Marx? Yes.), published in the magazine Banhi on December 2, 1945, the young Saurabh Chaliha appeared on the Assamese literary scene with the enthusiasm and dreams of an adolescent advocate of a socio-economic revolution. It was, however, only during the next decade, the fifties, that Chaliha's first significant short story Ashanta Electron (The Restless Electron) was published. By this time, Chaliha has outgrown his initial optimism and become a disillusioned, self-conscious, almost cynical observer of the realities of life around him and an analyst of the conflicts within the modern mind. In Ashanta Electron he has used the modern scientific discovery of the electrons restlessly moving around the nucleus and sometimes away from it as the symbol of the restlessness, centrifugal tendencies and disintegration in modern life and the universe. The story expresses the writer's sense of things falling apart and there being no moorings in life either in the form of firm beliefs or values.

Since the publication of Ashanta Electron, Chaliha has emerged as the most distinguished Assamese writer of the short story with a distictly 'modern' sensibility, intellectual breadth and technique. Since then he has brought out four anthologies of short stories. These are: Ashanta Electron, Dupariya (The Midday), Ehat Daba (A Game of Chess) and Golam (The Serf). The last title won him the Sahitya Akademi award for the year 1974.

In Ashanta Electron, we find the writer faced with a social set up where both traditional values and revolutionary idealism appear hollow and most individuals are engaged in the pursuit of their selfish interests. The hero of Ashanta Electron is, therefore, a disillusioned man, locked in his own world of impotence and frustration.

In another short story, Golam, which was written following his long sojourn in Germany for the purpose of higher education, Chaliha attempts a satiric exposure of the servile attitude, the dishonesty and self-centred mind of a middle class Assamese character.

In his second collection of short stories, Dupariya the writer's moods vary from one of high hopes in the glorious prospects of man's exploration of outer space and the setting up of a space laboratory as in the story 'Uparat' to that of frustration as in the story 'Dupariya'.

In Ehat Daba, Chaliha is at his best, both in his subtle, sensitive portrayal of contemporary realities and his intellectual depth and probing of the inner psychology of man. In the title story, 'Ehat Daba' we are presented with two characters playing chess. The game itself seems to symbolize the competitive world of modern capitalism. The real focus, however, is not on the game of chess, but on the character of one of the players, Benu Misra, a defeated artist. The volume contains some of the best short stories by Chaliha. In another significant short story, Doorbin' the writer probes into the inferiority complex of a character through a telescopic view of an incident occurring in his childhood.

E.U.

CHAMAN, CHAMANLAL (Kashmiri; b. 1937) is a reputed Kashmiri poet. He was born in a middle class Kashmiri Pandit family. After passing his B.A. from Jammu and Kashmir University in 1957, Chaman worked for some time in the Administrative section of Jammu and Kashmir University. At present, Chaman is the editor of Bi-monthly Kashmiri Sheeraza, which is published by the State Cultural Academy of arts and languages.

Chaman made his appearance as a poet somewhere between 1954-55. Some of his compositions appeared in monthly Kong Posh and Tameer when he was still in his teens. Chaman published his first verse collection Shabnami shar in 1963. His very first anthology brought him State Cultural Academy award in 1964. Some of his poems have been translated into Hindi and Punjabi and have appeared in various anthologies.

Besides Kashmiri Sheeraza, Chaman edits Son Adale the annual anthology of the state Cultural Academy of Arts and Language for the last four years. He has also edited an anthology of patriotic songs Yi Chu Soun Vatan (This land of ours). He is the co-author of Ahwalnama, the first biographical dictionary of Kashmiri writers, published by the Kashmir University in 1978.

He is a journalist in his own right and worked on the staff of daily Atab a reputed Urdu newspaper published from Srinagar for about six years.

In his earlier days he was influenced by the progressive writers, movement and composed a good number of poems in progressive strain. At present he is not attached to any particular school of poets. Some of his earlier poems like 'Miyon muhabal kamyab' (My love is destined to be victorious) are glowing with the sweet longings of youth and the lovely memories of the past.

Chaman is basically the poet of 'Nazm' but composed ghazals also. His full command on language has added grace and charm to his style of composition .

Mo.S.

CHAMARASA (Kannada, 15th century) is the author of Prabhulingalile, a work in Satpadi meter. He lived during the reign of Praudhadevaraya (1419-1446) who honoured him after having listened to his work in the royal court. Practically nothing is known about the poet from his own work. He has, however, made one significant remark that his story is not about ordinary mortals (Sattavara Katheyalla), thereby indirectly alluding to the characters of the Mahabharata, perhaps the Kannada version of it by Kumara Vyasa. It is stated that Kumara Vyasa was married to the sister of Chamarasa. It is quite likely that Kumara Vyasa and Chamarasa were contemporaries, and that the former might have even composed his work in a spirit of rivalry. There existed a rivalry between the followers of the Visvana and the Virasaiva faiths during the reign of Praudhadevarva. In the view of the followers of the Virasaiva faith the Ramayana and the Mahabharta were stories of mortals (Sattavaru); they wanted a story to be written about the immortals (nityaru) namely 'Siva Ganas', by a capable poet. And Chamarasa gave them such a story Prabhu lingalile. The work was said to be translated into Telugu and Tamil by Praudhadevaraya. It was later translated into Sanskrit and Marathi.

Whether or not Chamarasa was one of 101 'Viraktas' (Ascetics) as Adrisya Kavi and others or not, he was certainly an ascetic by temperament: he would not have chosen a great 'Virakta' like Allama Prabhu as the hero of his immortal work which though not of the same magnitude as that of Kumara Vyasa Bharata, is a classic in its own right. Allama was a senior held in high esteem by him and his other associate Sivasaranas. Allama and Akka were noted for their Vairagya (asceticism). Allama was also Jnani and a mystic yogi. All these and other 'saranas' were historical persons. Hirihara's Prabhudevara Ragale centres round the passionate love of Allama for Kamalate, his beloved, and his great renunciation after her sudden death. In Prabhulingalile Chamarasa has developed an allegorical story round the central character of Allama the motif being the inner conflict between Moha ((intense attachment to worldly desire) symbolized by Maya Devi, incarnation of the tamasa the dark evil, aspect of Goddess Parvati and Vairagya, illustrated by Mahadevi, an incarnation of the Sattvika, the good aspect of Parvati. The Kavya ends with the encounter of Allama with Goraksha, Basava and Siddharama, signifying the superiority of Jnana and Vairagya over Hatha Yoga Bhakti and Karma, as the means to achieve the supreme end of Life.

BIBLIOGRAPHY : K.Marasaiddapa, Chamarasa (Saepadi Shitya, Bangalore, 1975)., M.R. Shrinivasamurthy, Introduction to Prabhulingalileya Sangraha (1940); R. Narasimhachar, Kavicharita (Vol. 11, 1972). R.S. Mugali, Kannada Sahitya Charitre, 1953., S.S. Basavanal, Introduction to Prabhulingalile, 1956.

M.S.V.R.

CHAMPU (Hindi) has been scarce in Hindi literature. The Yashodhara of Maithilisharan Gupta (20th century) somewhat approximates to this poetic form. In Yashodhara it is verse which dominates but a few pieces of prose, that appear in between, do form a part of the main story. The style of Yashodhara is certainly different from that of the Sanskrit Champus. While in the Sanskrit Champus prose dominates over verse, in the Yashodhara it is the verse that dominates over prose.

Ma.C.

CHAMPU (Kannada). Scholars differ about the origin of the word 'champu'. Some have tried to trace its origin in Sanskrit and some Kannada etymologists aver that it is derived from the Kannada word 'chen', meaning beautiful (chen + pu). Be that as it may, it may be said without fear of contradiction that it is a generic name for poetry consisting of both prose and verse, the former playing a minor role.

But then, even the Vedas consist of prose and verse. They are not Champu Kavyas. Something more is needed to make this admixture of prose and verse a 'Champu Kavya'. It is composed in Sanskrit 'Vrittas', mostly in the six 'Khyata Karnatakam' vrittas of champakamala, utpalamala, Mattebha Vikridita, Shardula Vikridita, Sragdhara and Maha Sradhara. There may be a sprinkling of Kannada verse forms like Tripadi, Akkara etc. and Ragala sparingly. It is an epic consisting of Lamba, Sandhi and Ashwasas. The themes are usually the Ramayana, Mahabharata and Bhagavata stories, or stories employed by followers of various faiths to extol their own faith, or stories of saints and sages. It is not uncommon to see stories of one faith adapted to suit the purposes of other faiths. The predominant Rasas are Shringara, Veera, 'Shanta', the other finding their place according to the requirements of the main Rasas.

A Champu Kavya is supposed to contain Ashtadasha Varnanas'—(eighteen descriptions) invariably. These are descriptions of ocean, mountain, city, marriage of the prince, birth of a son to him, sun rise, seasons, forest aquatic sports, drink, desperation, union, consultation, gamble, travel, war and victory. It starts with an invocation to the 'Ishta Daiva' of the poet, followed by his homage to the earlier poets he likes, the characteristics of his kavya, his genealogy, the main story and finally the beneficence that the reading of his Kavya would bestow on its readers.

As stated earlier, the Vedas contain both prose and verse, the Upanishads, Mahabharata, Bhagavata and Vishnu Purana also contain both; Panchatantras and the Buddhist works Lalita Vistara and Jataka Mala also contain both. But Nala Champu by Irivikrama Bhatta and Yashastilaka Champu by Somadeva—both belonging to the 10th century—are considered by some scholars as the earliest Champu Kavyas in Sanskrit.

As against this, Champu Kavya appears to have made its debut much earlier in Kannada. There is evidence to believe that Gunavarma I, the Kannada poet who flourished at the court of King Ereyappa—on whom Ganga King had conferred the title of 'Mahendrantaka', wrote the Champu Kavyas—'Harivamsha' and 'Shudraka'. These are not available to us: but extracts from these—both in verse and prose—have been included in subsequent anthologies and in works of grammars and poetics as illustrations. Since these extracts have come down to us in both prose and verse, Kannada scholars have come to the conclusion that they must have been Champu Kavyas.

The earliest Kannada work available to us is Kaviraja Marga (850 A.D.). It is a work on poetics, Such a work is possible only when there are poetical works written prior to it. This work in fact mentions earlier poets like Vimatodaya, Nagarjuna, Gaya Gandhu, Durvinita, Srivijaya, Kaveeshwara, Pandita Chandra, Loka Pal, etc. who composed their works both in prose and verse. What is more important is stanza 27 of its first chapter wherein it has been clearly stated that these Kannada works are consisting of both Gadya and Padya. This, and the interesting fact that the authors of the earliest Champu Kavyas in Sanskrit—Nala Champu and Yashastilaka Champu—were from Karnataka have encouraged some Kannada scholars to conclude that the Champu Kavya was first born in Kannada and was subsequently adopted by Sanskrit poets.

As stated earlier, Gunavarma I is probably the first

Kannada poet to compose Champu Kavyas. His patron, King Ereyappa, ruled from 864 to 913 A.D. Hence his two works—Harivamsha and Shudraka—must have been the products of this period. It is presumed that this poet set the pattern of future Jain poets like Pampa in the sense that the several references to the titles of Ereyappa in the stanzas of Shudraka appear to imply the poet's wish to identify his patron with the hero of his epic—a trend which found its consummation in Pampa's work and continued less successfully in the works of some other Jain poets. Some scholars go to the extent of attributing the tradition of writing one secular and one religious Kavya to Gunavarma I on the presumption that Harivamsha might have contained the life of Neminatha and Shudraka might have been a collection of stories associated with Shudraka.

Ponna (950 A.D.) contends that he is hundred times superior to Asaga in poetic excellence. In his work on prosody—Chchandanuphasana—Jayakirti says that Asaga wrote Kumarasambhava in Kannada. Probably, Asaga mentioned by Ponna and Jayakirti are one and the same. There is one more Asaga who has written two Puranas in Sanskrit—Vardhamana Purana and Shanti Purana. Is this Asaga and Asaga of Kannada works one and the same? Scholars are not unanimous on this point.

Mallikarjuna of the 15th century says that his anthology—Sookti Sudharnava contains verses of Guna Nandi. The famous grammarian, Kashiraja states that his Shabda-Mani Darpana contains stanzas from Guna Nandis' works. Who is this Guna Nandi? What are his works? When and where did he flourish? Nothing is known.

It is clear from the foregoing paragraphs that Champu Kavyas in Kannada did exist prior to Kaviraj Marga and were in fact composed during the period after Kaviraja Marga and prior to Pampa. It may be summed up that this form of poetry took roots in Kannada first and then spread to Sanskrit. As a result of this, several eminent poets wrote Champu Kavyas of a very high order in subsequent years and have left a rich legacy of Champu literature in Kannada.

Among these, Pampa is the most outstanding. He is not only the father of Champu literature in Kannada, but its type-phenomenon and chief glory also. In him were blended beautifully the blood stream of an ancient Brahmin family with the new aspirations of the faith his forefathers had embraced, Jainism; the divine gift of poetry with profound scholarship which claimed all knowledge as its province, intense emotional response to beauty in nature and life with remarkable restraint in its expression, swordsmanship with penmanship, love for the good things of life with renunciation transcending all earthly pleasures and pains, enormous confidence in his own powers with absolute humility of spirit in the presence of old masters, ripeness with richness, and crowning it all, the ideal with the real.

He flourished as a poet in the court of Arikesari II, a prince of the Chalukya family and a feudatory of the Rashtrakuta monarch, Krishna III. He composed his maiden work, Adipurana, in 942 A.D. when he was 39 years old, and a few years later he produced his magnum opus, Vikramarjuna Vijaya popularly known as Pampa Bharata.

The Adipurana, depicting the story of Adinatha or Purudeva, the first of the twenty four Tirthankaras of Jainism, is the Pilgrim's Progress of Jaina hagiology. It is, no doubt, an adaptation of the Sanskrit Adipurana of Jinasena II; but Pampa has fashioned altogether a new image out of old gold. In all respects, it is a greater work of art than the original. It was the genius of Pampa which perceived a unifying principle behind the unconnected stories of the ten previous births of the Tirthankara that welded them all into a harmonius whole. The desire for enjoyment loses its intensity from birth to birth and ultimately yields place to infinite and everlasting happiness through self-abnegation. It is the victory of Tyaga over Bhoga of selflessness over selfishness, of desirelessness over desire, and of the tranquillity of the soul over the torments of the mind.

His second work, the Bharata, is a work of vaster magnitude. Pampa himself states that he wrote Adipurana to propound Jinagama and Bharata to present the proprieties of secular life (laukiks). How we wish he had not made this differentiation! Had he produced a work without this distinction, blending both 'jinagama' and 'laukika' in the same work, he would have been assured an honoured place in the galaxy of world poets. Even now he has his place there.

It is not possible to do full justice to Pampa Bharata in this short note. Suffice it to say that Pampa has achieved astonishing success in the difficult task of considering the mighty epic in a sizeable compass without omitting anything of significance and without damaging the over-all plan and structure of the story. In the words of D.L. Narasimhachari, he has converted the jungle of the Mahabharata into a park. In doing so, he sometimes compresses a whole episode into a single verse without sacrificing its essence or beauty, expands and elaborates where necessary, takes liberties with the sequence of events in the story and inserts new incidents according to his master plan, and concentrates on essentials and eliminates non-essentials. As he goes on narrating this intersting human drama, scene after scene unrolls itself before our bewildered gaze in swift and slow marches as the occasion demands, and by the time we come to the close of this panorama of Pampa Bhatata we are constrained to exclaim with him "Ee Bharatam Loka Pujyam—world venerated is this Bharata".

Pampa's Udita Marga, continued to evoke the admiration of succeeding poets and is admired even today. But none of the subsequent poets could go anywhere near him except one—Ranna. Ponna (936-969), though known as 'Ubhaya Kavi' Chakravarti—a title conferred on him by his patrons, King Krishna III of the Rashtrakuta dynasty, and despite his boastful claim that he is hundred fold superior to Kalidasa in poetic excellence, is only a Vidvatkavi', not a genius. Two of his extant works are Jinaksharamale, Jiaina stotra in 39 kandas, and Shanti Purana the story of Shantinatha—the sixteenth Tirthankara and fifth emperor of Jainism. Out of twelve Ashwasas in this Purana, the first nine depict Shantinath's eleven previous births and the last three give us a brief biography of this Tirthankara. Here and there he rises to rare heights in description of great beauty: but he himself falsifies his boast of superiority over Kalidasa by borrowing freely and copiously from Kalidasa's works. His Shantipurana is at best an important Jaina purana not a great Kavya.

Thus it was left to Ranna to achieve the closest possible approximation to Pampa. True to the tradition initiated by Pampa, he also wrote a Jain purana and a 'laukika kavya'. These are Ajit Purana and Gada Yuddha respectively. The former depicts the life of the second Thirthankara—Ajit Swamy. It also contains an interesting account of Attimabbe's life. She was a great philanthrophist of her times. This Purana rises to great heights while dealing with the renunciation of 'Vimala Vahana', the domestic life of 'Sagara' etc. But Ranna's poetic faculities have reached their zenith in his Loukika Kavya, Gada Yudha.

The great classic is an elaboration of the thirteenth chapter of Pampa's Bharatam, and aims at the identification of Ranna's patron—Satyashraya—with Bhima. Hence it is Bhima who is coronated at the end of the Mahabharatha war—not Yudhishthira. The influence of Bhasa's Urubhanga, Bhatta Narayanas Veni Samhara and Pampa's Bharata on Gada Yudha is clear. Ranna has followed Pampa in everything—even in characterization. Whereas Pampa glorified Karna in his Bharata, Ranna sublimated the character of Duryodhana in his Gada Yudha. He calls him Mahanubhava . The transformation of a villain into a 'Mahanubhava is the surprising achievement of Ranna. Besides, his summation of the earlier story of the Mahabharata in 'Simhavalokana Krama', the dramatic effect given to the whole work, the enormous power displayed in language, diction and style throughout have assured Ranna a place among the immortals of Kannada literature. B.M. Srikanth has recast Gadayudhha in the form of a drama with minor changes and Mahakavi Kuvempu has rightly called him Shakti Kavi.

Naga Chandra (1100-1126) is the next great name in Champu literature. His Mallinath Puran depicts the life of the nineteenth Thirthankara. with captivating description. This is a popular Jaina purana. But his Ramachandra Charita Purana, popularly known as Pampa Ramayana is a greater work of art. This is Ramayana with a Jain slant. Ravana has become a Mahapurusha here and joins the select band of other sublimated tragic heroes— Pampa's Karna and Ranna's Duryodhana. Nagachandra's lucid style, understanding of human nature, apt characterization and beauty of language have made him one of the most widely read Champu poets in Kannada.

Naya Sena wrote his Dharmamrita in 1112. The language used by him is very close to the spoken word. He has assailed a highly sanskritised Kannada style. A collection of fourteen different stories told in simple language to propagate Jainism, Dharmamrita is a unique work.

Nemichandra, who flourished at the court of Ratta King Laxmana at the close of the 12th century and the beginning of the 13th century, continued Pampa Marga by writing a Jain Purana—Neminath puran—and a 'laukika kavya'—Leelavati. The former is the story of the 22nd Tirthankara and the latter is a romantic Kavya. Both are of a high order.

Janna, one of the great names in Kannada Champu literature, wrote his Yashodhara Charita in 1209 and Anantanath Purana in 1230. He was Katakopadhyaya (Rajaguru) and Commander of Hoopala Narasimha. Hailing from an illustrious family of poets and Panditas, his is a multi-dimensional personality. His Yashodhara Charite is a unique work in Kannada dealing with perverted sex. Anantanatha purana is the story of the fourteenth Thirthankara. This, too is an accomplished work of art.

Nagavarma I has given us a beautiful translation of Bana Bhatta's Kadambari in Champu form. It is not a literal translation. He has shown enough originality throughout.

Similarly, Durga Sinha (1012-42) has given us a fine translation of Vasubhaga Bhatta's Panchatantra. Vasubhaga Bhatta is alive today due to Durga Sinha's translation. Hence this work assumes special significance.

Rudra Bhatta (1180) is the author of Jagannatha Vijaya—a scholarly work; Chikkupadhyaya (1691) is the author of eight Champu Kavyas of average standard.

Among the Virashaiva poets who have enriched Champu literature in Kannada, Harihara (1200) and Shadakshara Deva (17th century) are outstanding. Harihara is essentially a Ragale poet, and a great one at that. His only Champu Kavya, Girija Kalyana is not Hariharalike. Nevertheless, it is a rare work of art in many respects. Shadakshara Deva's Rajasekhara Vilas is one of the most popular Kavyas in Kannada. His Basavaraj Vijaya depicts the life of Sri Basaveshwara, the great prophet, social reformer and vachanakara of the 12th century. His Sabara Sankara Vilas deals with the fight between Siva in Kirata form and Arjuna. Shadakshara Deva is considered by many as the last of the giants in Kannada Champu literature.

Mention might be made of Nagavarma II (1042) author of Vardhamana Purana, Shantinath (1065) author of Sukumara Charita, Karnaparya (1140) author of Neminatha Purana, Brahma Shiva (1189) author of Samya Pariksha, Andayya (1217) author of Kabbigara Kava—a work using only Kannada and Tadbhava words, and Suranga (15th or 16th century) author of Trishasti-Puratana Charitam.

An assessment of the over-all worth of Champu literature in Kannada is outside the purview of this brief survey. Suffice it to say that Pampa Bharata, Gadayudha, Pampa Ramayana, Yashodhara Charita, Girija Kalyana and Dharmamrita can adorn any literature in the world.

Su.P.

CHAMPU (Maithili) is a kind of elaborate and highly artificial composition in which the same subject is continued through alternations in prose and verse. The Champu style of narrative was in vogue in ancient and mediaeval literatures of India and occasionally we come across traces of this kind of mixed composition even in some of the modern literatures, Maithili being one of them. It is still one of the common forms in which the Maithili authors take pride. The Champu Kavya, generally consisting of prose and poetry, is divided into Unnhavas and is devoid of Ukti, Pratyukti and Viskambhaka (prelude). It is a Sravya Kavya with the admixture of prose and poetry with appropriate alankaras and rasas, having different forms such as Nala-Champu, Bhoja-Champu, Bharata-Champu, etc. It is wrong to say that the Champus have "neither sinewy strength and efficiency of real prose, nor the weight and power of real poetry: the forms no doubt afford scope for versatility, but the Champu written as a rule, has no original voice of its own". Somadeva's, Yasastilaka Champus written properly can be compared with any other form of poetry such as Mahakavya, Khanda-Kavya, etc.

A study of the Champu Kavyas written in Sanskrit and Maithili leaves no doubt that they are largely influenced by Bhakti movement and their social and political environment. It is interesting to note that while in north India only fortysix champus were written, this form of poetry in fact found favour with the royalties and religious institutions in the south under whose patronage these poets flourished.

The champus have to be valued in the context of their narration, i.e., in terms and degree of their own nature. While the Champus have received greater attention in local languages such as Maithili, Hindi, etc. they have received scanty treatment from the Sanskrit writers.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Chhabinath Tripathi, Champu-Kavya Ka Alchanantmak evam Atihasik Adhyayana (Varanasi, 1965); Jayakanta Mishra, A History of Maithili Literature, Vol. I (Allahabad, 1949); Vishvanatha's Sahitya Darpana (6/298); S.W. Fallon, A New Hindustani-English Dictionary, Benaras, 1879.

U.T.

CHAMPU (Malayalam). As in Sanskrit, in Malayalam also Champu is a literary work in which prose and verse are intermingled but with a difference: while verse is usually in Sanskrit metres, prose is written in varying rhythms adopted from Dravidian folk metres. The earliest Champus in Malayalam are Unniyachi Charitham, Unnichiruthevi Charitham and Unniyati Charitham which were first brought to light by the Travancore University Manuscripts Library, Trivandrum in 1949, 1954 and 1956 respectively. All these champus represent the early phase of Manipravalam literature. Unniyachi Charitam, according to an internal evidence, was written by Thevan Chirikuman (13th cent.) and Unniyati Charitham, a work of a later period, was by Damodara Chakyar. Unni Chiruthevi Charitham is an anonymous work in which one finds hardly two stanzas written in Sanskrit metre while the remaining portion is written in varying rhythms adopted from the most popular Dravidian metres of the time. Still, this also is called a Champu!

In later periods many 'Champu' works came to be written. Punam Namboodiri's Ramayanam Champu is the first and foremost among the works of this period. Though the poet has imbibed a lot from Sanskrit works bearing on the Ramayana themes, the work has originality.

Bhasha Naishadha Champu by Mazhamangalam Namboodiri is an outstanding work in which one finds the sweetest form of Manipravala style. Mazhamangalam is believed to have written three other champus: Kodiyaviraham, Rajaratnavaleeyam and Banayudham. 'Bhakti' (devotion) is the predominent sentiment in the works of Neelakanta Kavi. His works, Narayaneeyam, Chelloornadhodayam and Thenkailanadhodayam are based on legends pertaining to the origin of the temples at Trippunithura, Perinchellur and Thrisivaperoor (Trichur) re spectively. He also wrote a Sanskrit Champu, Ashtamiprabandham, about the famous Shiva temple at Vaikom. It is believed that Chakyars made use of the texts of these champus for their stage-performance and that they are believed to have interpolated many stanzas from Sanskrit classics in these works. Kunchan Nambiar, the exponent of 'Thullalppattu', is very much indebted to the authors of these champus, especially Punam Namboodiri, for the humorous and colourful style of narration.

There was an attempt by the neo-classical poets to revive this literary form during the early period of the twentieth century. Ravivarma Koil Thampuran wrote Usha Kalyanam Champu and Ulloor Parameswara Iyer and Sirdar K.M. Panicker followed Thampuran by writing Sujathodvaham and Hyder Naicken respectively. The only novelty of the last two champus is that their theme is not 'puranic' but are based on the history of India.

T.G.R.P.

CHAMPU (Marathi). There is only one work of this type in Marathi i.e. Subhadraswayamvar Champu (1768) of Niranjan Madhav. This is a Swayamvar Kavya describing the marriage between Arjun and Subhadra. This is the work on the line of Panchmahakavyas in Sanskrit literature having Churnikas in between written in prose. It has seven Sargas in different metres. Its treatment resembles Pandit Kavyas in Marathi literature.

Bh.K.

CHAMPU (Oriya). Following the Sanskrit tradition a good number of Sanskrit scholars of Orissa belonging to the 18th and 19th centuries composed champus on various themes. Names of poets like Chakrapani Pattanaik, author of Gundicha Champu and Bhagaban Bramha, author of Mrigaya Champu may be mentioned in this context. Gundicha Champu and Chandan Jatra Champu describe the Car festival and Chandan festival of Lord Jagannath at Puri. Subsequently, a few champus were written in Sanskrit and appended with thirty four Oriya songs of Oriya alphebetic sequence, pertaining to the context of the Sanskrit portion.

The practice of appending Oriya lyrics to Sanskrit champus were perhaps introduced in Oriya literature after the composition of Kishore Chandrananda Champu of Kabisurya Baladev Ratha (1789-1845). This particular champu is a work in Sanskrit, having in its appendix thirty four Oriya lyrics written in alphabetic sequence, the first letter of each line beginning with one consonant. Those lyrics written in a stylized language in the sequence of a long dialogue earned great popular acclaim in Orissa. The Oriya readers did not show much interest in the Sanskrit champu. On the other hand they accepted the lyrics or chaupadis which were composed in the sequence of each letter of Oriya consonants as the real champu. As a result, many Oriya poets who came after Kabisurya Baladev became tempted to append Oriya lyrics to their own Sanskrit champus. Thus in the post-Kabisurya period many poets composing the thirty four Oriya songs in the alphabetic sequence named the whole bunch as champu. Names of Brindabanchandra Champu of Govind Raiguru (1861-1902), Jeeban Champu (1888) of Damodar Pattanaik, Jatiya Champu (1908) of Shyambandhu Das, Premlahari (1904) of Harihar Misra, Mohanananda Champu (1927) of Nityananda, Kishori Vilash Champu (1933) of Nabakishore Mahanto, Brahmajnana Champu and Mahima Vajan Champu of Ananta Chandra may be mentioned in this context.

In this connection it may also be mentioned that Kabisurya's songs in the Kishore Chandrananda Champu depict the age-old story of love between Radha and Krishna and their happy union through the clever mediation of Lalita. The poet's power as manifested in the witty and dramatized dialogues of these lyrics is unparalleled in the whole of Oriya lyrical literature. Damodar Pattanaik's Jeeban Champu is a collection of thirty-four devotional lyrics. They depict the value of renunciation along with advice to the sinners who have gone on wrong paths. In respect of theme and language Shyambandhu's Jatiya Champu shows the author's originality as it deals with social and political problems in simple language highlighting the ideals of Vandemataram movement.

Hence any bunch of poems, thirty four in number according to the order of Oriya consonants, and wrongly regarded as champu, gained wide currency. But basically they are only collection of lyrics as they depict the subjective feelings and emotions of the poet. But during the period under discussion a few champus were also composed in Oriya which rightly followed the Sanskrit pattern of champu, a composite composition of both poetry and stylized prose. From this point of view, Brindaban Chandra Binod (1894) of Mahendra Singha Samanta (1878-1927) may be regarded as the first Oriya champu that followed the Sanskrit model. The author has named it as Prakrit-Natya Prabandha and has followed the Sanskrit Kavya convention such as invocation, Nandi and the introduction of Sutradhara (Stage manager) in the beginning and has written this portion in Sanskrit. The rest of the work has been written in Oriya in the form of champu. The work consists of thirty four poems in the form of dialogues between Radha, Krishna, Lalita and Madhumangala and each lyric is prefixed with Oriya passages which maintain the thematic sequence. The prose passages are highly alliterative and are written in the churnika style of Sanskrit. The composition is divided into three Acts, but the Acts are not further divided into scenes. As this Oriya composition does not conform to other features of dramatic form, and comprises both prose and poetry, it has been appropriately classified as champu. Though the thirty four lyrics of this work follow the formal pattern of Kabisurya's champu, it does not demonstrate any influence of Kabisurya on its language and theme.

The next champu worth mentioning is Chataka Chandrashala Champu, written by Laxmikanta Mohapatra (1889-1953). This, in fact, is a parody of Kabisurya's champu mentioned above. This champu contains both prose and poetry and humorously depicts the love between an educated modern youngman and a woman.

In the later times Gopinath Singh Deo, under the pseudonym, Nirdhuma Dhumaketu Mistry composed a champu in Oriya having both poetry and churnika (prose) in imitation of Sanskrit champu. His Samanta Sambahana Champu (1936) humorously depicts the socio-political condition through the poetic dialogues between a Samanta (master) and his servant. At places it is an excellent parody of Kabisurya's champu. The significance of this work lies in the Oriya shlokas composed in imitation of Sanskrit metrical pattern, and in a few churnikas and humorous songs. Panchajanya by Nityananda Mohapatra (1953), a work combining prose and poetry, dealing with the theme of patriotism, can also be regarded as a champu written during the post-Independence period.

Oriya lyrics known as champus can be thematically classified into four classes, such as devotional, social, humorous and mythological, mainly depicting the love of Radha and Krishna. But at the same time it may be pointed out that champu as a form of poetry could not gain popularity in the ever-changing arena of modern literature.

J.B.M.

CHAMPU (Sanskrit). "Gadyapadyamayam Kavyam Champurityabhidhiyate." (Sahityadarpana of Vishvanatha Kaviraja, "Gadyapadyamayi Kachichchampurityabhidhiyate." (Kavyadarsha of Dandin. That is, "Champu is a kind of mixed literature of prose and poetry together."

This is a new kind of attempt, necessitating an equal skill in prose and poetry compositions on the part of the author. But according to some, this craze for novelty has resulted only in a kind of elaborate and highly artificial composition, in which the same subject is continued through alterations in prose and verse. Whatever that may be, there is no doubt that Champu literature has come to occupy an important place in Sanskrit literature.

In Sanskrit specimens are not rare where verses have been purposely mingled with prose for serving this or that specific end.

But the novelty of the Champu literature lies in the fact that here verses have been brought forward, not for a limited and particular purpose, but simply for their own sake; simply because the authors wanted to have compositions, where verse and prose would have the same subject described in a random and haphazard way, alternately and indifferently in verse or prose. However that may be, there is no doubt that the rise of Champu literature was necessitated by the exigencies of the then prevalent situation.

Although Dandin mentions Champu as a form of Sanskrit literature (in his Kavyadarsha. I. 3I), and although he is supposed to have flourished not later than 7th/8th century A.D., the oldest known extant Champu is Nalachampu or Damayantikatha of Trivikramabhatta (915). Regarding its composition, it has been said here that Trivikramabhatta's father, Devaditya, a great scholar and a court-poet was absent from the station when an outsider rival arrived there to challenge him. To save his father's honour Trivikramabhatta himself ventured to compose a Champu, called Nalachampu with the very kind help of Sarasvati or the Goddess of learning; but he could not finish the same as his father returned soon, and so it was not necessary for him to continue.

The Nalachampu or Damayantikatha, as the name implies, is concerned with the full account of the enchanting love-episode between King Nala and Damayanti. But, that expectation is not at all fulfilled, when we find that in the seven Uchchhvasas or chapters, only a very small part of the magnificent story has been referred to. The rest is an irritating and meaningless kind of poetic and rhetorical outpourings. In fact, he openly follows the complex style of quite a few prose-writers of earlier days—to some extent of Subandhu and Banabhatta, well-known authors of Vasavadatta, and Kadambari and Harshacharita respectively.

But inspite of all these, his excellence as a poet of high merit has been recognised unstintingly by anthologists of fame; and all the verses, quoted in Sharangadharapaddhati of Sharangadhara, Padyavali of Rupa Gosvamin are traceable in the Nalachampu.

In the Nalachampu, we find that the last stanza in each chapter has the word Haracharanasaroja. Here, the advice given to Nala by the minister Shalankayana is like that given by Shukanasa to Chandrapida in Banabhatta's Kadambari.

Trivikramabhatta is the author of Nausari inscription of the Rashtrakuta king Indra III (915 A.D.). He is also credited with another Champu, entitled Madalasachampu.

Another Champu of fame is Yashastilakachampu of Digambara Jaina Somaprabhasuri (959 A.D.)

These two earlier Champus may very well be taken as good specimens of this type of Sanskrit literature. There is, however, a host of late Champus which do not seem to have improved the standard or added to the glory of Champu literature in Sanskrit. Mention may be made to just a few of the more well-known ones:-

Jivandharachampu of Harichandra is another Jain Champu of fame, on the life of the Jaina saint Jivandhara in eleven lambakas. This work is based on the Uttarapurana of Gunabhadra, completed about 850 A.D. He is probably identical with Digambara Jaina Harichandra who composed the Dharmasharmabhyudaya in twenty-one cantos; although this has not been definitely proved. He is a good imitator of Magha and Vakpati.

The Hindu authors of later Champus, composed their works on the basis of Epics and Puranas. Of these, perhaps the most well-known Champu is Ramayanachampu ascribed to Bhoja and Lakshmanabhatta.

Similarly, Anantabhatta's Bharatachampu, too, is quite well known.

Of the Bhagavatachampus, three, that is, those by Chidambara in three stavakas, Ramabhadra and Rajanatha are perhaps the most well-known.

There is also a large number of Champus, based on the Puranas. Of these, Nrisimhachampu of Keshavabhat-ta, son of Narayana, in six stavakas, Daivajnasurya in five Uchchhvasas and Samkarshana in four Uchchhvasas are all based on the well-known episode of Prahlada and Nrisimha Deva or the Man-Lion incarnation of Vishnu.

Bhagavatachampu of Abhinavakalidasa, dealing with the story of Bhagavata in six chapters, was composed in 1050. There were a number of poets who held this title and so the exact name of the author is not known.

Another Champu of about the same period is Udaya Sundarikatha of Soddhala, a Kayastha of Lata, who flourished in the 10th century A.D. under the patronage of King Mummuniraja of Konkan. This work consists of six Uchchhvasas and describes the marriage of Udaya sundari, a princess of the Nagas and Malayavahana, a king of Pratishthana. The first chapter is autobiographical and the style is quite attractive. The writer took the Harshacharita of Banahatta as his model, and following him, he gives a full account of his own lineage, as well as about earlier poets. Regarding Bana, he says feelingly– "On seeing the sharp spear of Bana in his Harshacharita who would not lose all delight in the aims of poetry?"

Another Champu writer is Someshvara Deva (1240), who composed Surathotsava. His Kirtikaumudi is written in the Champu style. It gives an account of the life of Vastupala, the minister of Viradhavala.

Mitramishra (1620), the author of Viramitrodaya composed Anandakandachampu on the early life of Shri Krishna.

Chidambara (1600), the author of Raghavapandaviyayadaviya composed Bhagavatachampu on the story of Bhagavata.

Parijataharanachampu of Shesha Krishna, in five chapters, is based on the well-known Purana legends regarding Shri Krishna's divine deeds, such as bringing of the Parijata flower from the Heaven, etc. The author flourished in the second half of the 16th century A.D.

Nilakanthavijayachampu of the South Indian author Nilakantha Dikshita was composed in 1637. It is based on the well-known mythological account of the churning of the ocean (Samudra-manthana) by gods.

Nilakantha Dikshita (1650) composed Nilakanthavijayachampu in five chapters. This is one of the wonderful feats of Shiva. This work clearly reveals the author's great mastery over vakrokti, and his special skill in revealing the different modes of sentiments.

Rajachudamani Dikshita (1600) composed another Bharatachampu.

Chakra Kavi (1650) who composed Draupadiparinayachampu. Venkatadhvarin (1650) is the author of four Champus, viz., Vishvagunadarsha, Varadabhyudaya, Uttarachampu and Shrinivasachampu.

The Vishvagunadarsha gives a vivid and realistic portrait of both the good and bad sides of life. The defects and derelictions of the then society, especially of the Tamil land, are clearly brought out here in vivid colours; and he spares none from his criticism. His skill in using alliteration off and on is very well brought out here.

His Varadabhyudaya is a work composed in praise of the greatness, glory and grandeurs of God at Kanchi. It is also called Hastigirichampu. His Uttarachampu is based on the story of Uttarakanda of Ramayana. His Shrinivasachampu in ten chapters sings the glory of the deity in Tirumalai near Tirupati.

Amongst the above four Champus, the first one, viz. Vishvagunadarshachampu is very popular and well-known in the Tamil land. Here, he conceived the novel idea of enriching Champu literature by including in it social criticism and satire. Thus, here two Gandharvas, Vishvavasu and Krishna take a bird's eye view of different countries from their aerial car, former praising their good qualities, the later criticizing their bad ones.

Venkatadhavarin, son of Raghunatha and Sitamba, of Atreyagotra of Coojevaram, was almost equal to Nilakantha Dikshita in his literary activities and was a voluminous writer of fame. He also composed Yadavaraghaviya as a supplement to Bhoja's Ramayanachampu.

Baneshvara composed his Chitrachampu as a quasi-historical kavya, on the life of King Chitrasena of Burdwan family who died in 1744. So, this work might have been composed during the later half of the 18th century A.D.

Krishna Kavi composed Mandaramardanachampu. The date is unknown. This Champu is rhetorically important, as it is a good treatise on rhetoric and prosody, with elaborate definitions and illustrations. It contains good examples of different metres and the poetics.

The Champu literature seems to have been specially popular in Southern India, as some of the examples will show.

Samarapumgava Dikshita, son of Venkatesha and Anantamma of Vadhulagotra, composed Yatraprabandha or Tirthayatraprabandha towards the third quarter of the 16th century A.D. in nine Ashvasas, describing his pilgrimage to the holy shrines of Southern India, with his elder brother. It contains a large number of verses; and also attractive descriptions of six seasons, sunrise, sunset, erotic sports and the like.

The Tattvagunadarshachampu of Annayarya adopts the pattern of Venkatadhvarin's Vishvagunadarsha and dwells on the comparative merits and demerits of Shaivism and Vaishnavism.

Vidvanmodataranginichampu of Ramachandra Chiranjiva Bhattacharya, a comparatively modern work, contains expositions and discussions of the different doctrines and faiths of different schools and sects by their respective followers; and in this way, brings out their real essences.

Svahasudhakarachampu of Narayana was composed in the 17th century A.D. It dwells on the love of Agni's wife Svaha and the Moon in an idyllic manner.

Champus have been composed on very worldy subjects, like local legends, common festivals, well-known local personalities, local deities and the like.

Vedantacharyavijayachampu of Kavitarkika Simha Vedantacharya dwells on the life of the South India teacher Vedantadeshika, how he entered into argumentation with Advaita Vedantists and came out victorious, etc.

Like Jaina writers, Vaishnava writers too, have used the Champus for religious propaganda, i.e., propagation of the Krishna cult and Krishna legends.

Muktacharitrachampu of Raghunatha Dasa, a disciple of Shri Chaitanya, is a beautiful tale, showing as to how Krishna demonstrated that pearls could be grown as crops, by sowing and watering them with milk. But the real object of the Champu is to prove that Shri Krishna's love for Radha is far superior to his love for his wife Satyabhama.

Gopalachampu of Jiva Gosvamin, nephew of Rupa Gosvamin, elaborately and extensively describes the early childhood and youth of Shri Krishna in a very emotional style, after the Harivamsha and Shrimadbhagavata. This huge work describes the entire career of Shri Krishna, specially in accordance with the Bengal school of Vaishnavism, and may be called Sidhantagrantha or a manual of the same order.

Anandavrindavanachampu of Paramananda Dasa Sena Kavikarnapura is of the same theme and deals with the early life of Shri Krishna at Vrindavana only.

The only known woman Champu writer is Tirumalamba, who composed Varadambikaparinayachampu, a highly artificial historical Champu, describing the romance and wedding of Varadambika with her own husband or lover Achyutaraya who became king of Vijayanagara at about 1530.

This brief account of the Champu literature is enough to show its very extensive and variegated nature, as well as its universal appeal to public sentiments, in spite of its not being held in very high esteem by literary critics. According to most critics, combining prose and poetry in Champu has not succeeded, mainly because of a want of a proper sense of proportion on the part of the writers themselves. And the whole Champu literature in Sanskrit is a telling illustration of the same.

Yashastilakachampu is one of the two comparatively ancient Champus. It was composed by Digambara Jaina Somaprabha or Somadeva Suri, and is an elaborate work in eight Ashvasas, composed in 959 in the reign of the Rashtrakuta king Krishna, under the patronage of his feudatory, a son of Chalukya Arikesarin III. Like other Jainas, he composed the work for showing all the way to mukti or salvation by means of the Jaina faith. That is why, we find here that the last three sections of the Champu are devoted to propounding the main principles of Jainism for the layman. It is based on the legend of Yashodhara, king of Avanti, the cunning devices of his wife, his death, repeated rebirths and final conversion into the Jaina faith, leading to mukti or salvation. A large part of the work is devoted to narrating the experience of the hero in different births, and at long last, he resolves to get rid of this samsarachakra or seemingly endless cycle of births and re-births and the consequent sorrows and sufferings by accepting and following the fundamental tenets and teachings of Jainism. This didactic motive and philosophical leaning run clearly through the entire work, making it not only really a work of art, but also a Jaina manual of great value, e.g., the eternal question of ahimsa or non-violence and love towards not only fellow beings, but towards all including lower animals, is discussed here, and the king establishes the great truth that killing of animals in sacrifices is entirely wrong and sinful. The hero is shown here not only as a moralist, a philosopher and philanthropist, but also as an absolute politician, as proved through his learned discussions on political subjects with his ministers. All these go to show the author's deep scholarship, side by side with his great poetical skill as a writer of both magnificent prose and soul-stirring poetry, both descriptive and sentimental. According to some critics, however, Somadeva's underlying ethical and philosophical motive hampers his literary efforts as a real author to whom a Kavya is an end in itself, a work of art, pure and simple; and not a means to an end, viz., propagation and popularisation of a particular creed or a system of thought. The plot of the Yashastilakachampu is quite attractive and briefly as follows:

In the prosperous Yodheya country, there was a beautiful city, called Rajapura, ruled by Maridatta, given wholly to sensual pleasures and worldly cravings for selfish ends. For securing the same, he, on the advice of his family priest, decided to offer to the family Goddess Chandimari-Devata, a pair of all living beings, including human. He is ready to sacrifice, when there appears before him an ascetic pair, a young boy and a young girl who are twins. Their sudden appearance there is explained by the author like this:- An ascetic, Sudatta by name, has just then arrived at the outskirts of the city, and he roams about for choosing an abode. He first sees a beautiful city garden, but thinks it too sensuous for him, as gardens are ordinarily associated with secret love-episodes and the like. Then, he sees a burning place, but thinks that too, much too repulsive. So, finally, he chooses a small hill as his fittest abode. Now, his disciples include two young persons, the children of Maridatta's own sister. The wise sage Sudatta sends them to the king, because he is fully confident that the royal guard will accost them at the gate and take them to the king for sacrifice. But the king receives them very affably and questions them regarding their life-histories. Accordingly, in Ashvasa II, the boy, gifted like his twin sister, with the rare power of knowing his own past lives, tells the king a very interesting tale, which is as follows:-

There was a king at Ujjain, called Yashoratha and his wife Chandramati bore him a son, named Yashodhara. The elderly king soon makes him the king and retires from public life for contemplation. King Yashodhara proves himself to be a very able monarch–also a good politician and an administrator of high repute. His discourses with one of his ministers on difficult political problems amply prove his ability. Here, it is emphasised that special precautions are to be taken to avoid the choosing of a bad minister, as well as the casting aside of faithful servants. However, in this way, the king seems to be very happy in his regal duties, as well as scholarly pursuits, like the reading of the Vedas, etc. But once he discovers at night that the Queen, his very dearest wife leaves him for an illicit love affair. Greatly enraged, the king at first wants to kill her, but is refrained from this heinous act by the fear of public scandal. Then, he is advised by his mother, who suspects the truth by thus seeing him given to ascetic way of life, to perform a sacrifice where all kinds of animals would be sacrificed to the family deity. As Jaina faith strictly forbids Himsa of any kind whatsoever, the pious king vehemently protests against this; a long discussion follows, in which the king points out that offering to the dead is absurd and that the crows alone are the recipients of the offerings thus made, and also that the idea of offering water as purifier is wholly absurd. In this connection, the learned king adduces a long array of evidences from the sayings of almost all the great poets, down to Rajashekhara. Wearied by this long and sharp argumentations, the Queen-Mother finally is content to have a cock of flour for sacrifice. But the wicked wife sees her chance and mixes poison with the flour and thus slays her husband, the king and mother-in-law, the Queen-Mother (Ashvasa III). In Ashvasa IV, the fate of the king, his mother and his wife is narrated. The wicked wife repeats her misdeeds in each birth. But the king and his mother at long last repent for their past crimes, are reborn as the twin children of Yashomati and the sister of Maridatta. On hearing this strange tale, King Maridatta approaches the Jaina saint Sudatta, takes instructions from him regarding Jaina faith and teachings and is, at the end, converted into the Jaina faith with all his subjects.

Somadeva here follows the pattern of Banabhatta's well-known prose kavya Kadambari and includes often tales within tales with the usual cumbrous result. But his poetry is of quite a high order; and in the introductory verses, he takes pains tó mention Bharavi, Bhavabhuti, Bhartrihari, Gunadhya, Bhasa, Kalidasa, Bana, Mayura, Narayana, Magha, and Rajashekhara together.

Another major Champu work is the Ramayanachampu ascribed to Bhoja and Lakshmanbhatta. It is the colophons in the printed text which refer to the author as Vidarbharaja, without mentioning any names. According to Indian traditions, Bhoja of Dhara in Malva is the author of the work. Vidarbha and Malva were two different places and the kings of these two places must have been different. From the evidences now available, it is not possible to explain the epithet Vidharbharaja, as applied to Bhoja. On the strength of this tradition, the date of the work may be taken to be the first half of the 11th century A.D, since King Bhoja ruled during 1005-1054. Bhoja composed the Champu up to the end of the Sundarakanda of Ramayana and the Yuddhakanda was composed later on by Lakshmana, son of Gangadhara and Gangambika. This Champu is written in the Vaidarbhi style - where equal stress is laid on the inner thought and outer expression. According to some manuscripts, there was a seventh Uttarakanda by Venkataraja.

Anantabhatta's quite well-known work Bharatachampu has been quoted by Narayanabhatta (1602). So he must have flourished in about 1500.

Champu literature in Sanskrit is, undoubtedly, quite a heart-captivating one, in spite of its inherent defects from the strictly technical or rhetorical point of view. In Sanskrit it has come to stay and delight all with its grandeur, narration of undaunted courage and eternal human desire for adventure.

So, the eulogy of the Champu literature in Sanskrit as the lovely combination of vocal and instrumental music (Bhoja's Champuramayana, Balakanda) and of grapes and honey (Venkatadhvarin's Vishvagunadarsha) is fully justified.

Ro.C.

CHAMPU (Telugu). In early Telugu literature there were no complete poetic or complete prose works. Panditaradhya Charitra and Harischandropakhyanam, written in couplets could be considered complete poetic works besides Thikkana's Nirvachanottara Ramayana (Uttara Ramayana without Prose). Siddheswara Charitra and Pratapa Charitra by Ekanuranadha and Simhagiri Vachanam by Krishnamacharya were prose works of later times.

Telugu literature starting with Nannaya's Bharatam mostly comes under the category of Champu. Some critics feel that Nannaya and others wanted to prove that they were equally facile both in prose and poetry unlike lesser writers who were adept in one of the two. And they chose the champu form. Others think that poetry, usually recited, had some 'prose plateau' where the reader could rest for a while, like in a landing in staircase. Still others are of the opinion that one poet used poetry to convey something spirited and emotional and used prose to cover drab areas.

Nannaya started his epic Bharatam with a Sanskrit shloka and immediately took up prose and only later came to poetry, whereas Thikkana started his epic work with poetry and then came down to prose. The ancient works in south Indian literatures were mostly Champus. Thus the neighbouring literatures too might have influenced Telugu literature. Apart from rhetorical definition, a poetic work is widely known as Champu Kavya and a prose work as Gadya Kavya. As Nannaya's Bharatham is known to be a poetic work, Thikkana had to describe his Uttara Ramayana, as Nirvachana, that is, 'proseless.' This cue was taken by his successors.

Pillalamani Pina Veerana, while translating Jaimini Bharatam from Sanskrit into Telugu said he would do it in Champu style. Other characteristics of a Champu Kavya coincide with the characteristics of mahakavya or a great epic.

J.V.S.

CHANAKYA (Maithili), the only poetical work of a Maithili poet, Dinanath Pathak (B .idhu), posthumously published (1965). Chanakya has been edited by Chandranath Misra 'Amar'. The book deserves special mention, as an attempt in new direction of narrative poetry in Maithili. Free from the adaptation of sacred texts, its subject-matter has been derived from a glorious chapter of Indian history. Unfettered and independent from religious obsession, with almost entirely secular outlook and inspired by pure human interest, the book presents a remarkable innovation besides the intrinsic qualities it bears. Chanakya, the hero of the poem, who is a great historical figure, a patriot and statesman, full of fire and feeling, with his simple living and high thinking, with sincerity and devotion manages to crown Chandragupta as the first emperor of the great Mauryan empire. The plot of this Mahakavya is well known. It begins with the advent of Chanakya, leading till then the life of an Acharya, a preceptor, on the political scene of the country. as an upright leader of the masses, taking up the cause to incite his countrymen against the impending danger of external invasion by the Greek Emperor, Alexander the great, who was just at the door. In the process, Chanakya cautions Mahananda, the ruler of Magadha, who indulged in lust and luxury, but he takes it otherwise and insults him. Being provoked, Chanakya takes a vow to overthrow the Nanda dynasty. Alexander the great, sensing the resolute determination of the people to face any chanllenge, is deterred from proceeding further and turns back. Then Chanakya organises popular upheaval against the misrule of Mahananda who is ultimately overthrown and assassinated. Chandragupta, a brave and trusted disciple of Chanakya is crowned the king of Magadha. Thus discharging his duties, Chanakya takes leave for Mithila, his homeland, to live in peace and write a book on Arthashastra, for the proper functioning of the states.

In Chanakya, the tenets of Mahakavya have not been rigidly followed. Still some of the general traits are well maintained i.e. sargabandh, having several cantos, the hero Chanakya is a well known-historical person, the plot is popular and full of descriptions, rather than a strictly definable genre, it manifests the epic spirit, in the scale, the scope and the profound human importance of the subject. The very conception of Chanakya is marked by grandeur and sagacity. The whole poem is replete with patriotic fervour. The portrayal of a true leader (1st canto) is remarkable. In historical perspective the poem reflects the existing political condition of the country. It has much more contemporary relevance in it. The poet has conceived Chankya as a mass leader who knew how to rouse the enthusiam of the people in times of national crisis.

The lucidity of language, organic unity which is achieved by images and symbols which come in profusion, deft masetry over rhythm and diction, frank and forceful verbal vigour, powerful and effective style have, doubtlessly, made this poem a great achievement.

S.J.

CHAND KA MUNH TEDHA HAI (Hindi) was the first volume of the late Gajanan Madhav Muktibodh's poems, published posthumously. The selection of the poems was made by the late poet's friend Shrikant Verma and the preface 'Ek Vilakshan Pratibha' (A rare genius) was written by another poet (and a close friend) Shamsher Bahadur Singh. The first edition of the book was released on the 15th August, 1964. The selection of the poems and their order was finalised in consultation with the poet, just a little before his death.

The twenty eight poems included in the volume consist of some of Muktibodh's best known poems like 'Andhere Mein', 'Brahm Rakshas', 'Chand ka Munh Tedha Hai', and 'Chambal ki Ghati Mein'. Most of these are long narrative poems, which create strange mythical worlds that teether on the verge of insanity and yet a careful craftsmanship is discernible. Shamsher Bahadur Singh, in his preface to the volume, compares them to vast mural paintings in which each shape is interwoven carefully with the other to create a picture of awesome proportions.

The poems in the volume have a hard crystalline brilliance. Muktibodh, like 'Nirala' before him, felt the rot that had set in the smug and self-seeking middle class he was a member of and in poems, like 'Bhul-Galati' and 'Shunya' and 'Brahm Rakshas', reveal it acutely through a fantasy so carefully controlled, and developed, that the ghostly protagonist of the poem, the Brahm Rakshas, sitting in an ancient well and chanting mantras and quoting western scholars in a mad outburst, becomes a startlingly real symbol of the decadence of our own intellectual tradition, and an intellectual's tormented search for the truth.

In poems like ' Chand ka Munh Tedha Hai', the romantic dichotomy between emotion and reason disappears entirely. The greatness of poems like this lies in the fact that the poet's personal sufferings are continually being diffused and disinfected by a very genuine hostility to all 'cults'' of suffering. The steadily flickering, somewhat saturnine, humour of his verse is never unaware of the supreme irony of human life.

At his best, as in 'Brahm Rakshas' or 'Andhere Mein', Muktibodh is a dramatic poet. In his long poems in the volume, he does not present just themes or generalisations, but rather an entire world of fantasy at the centre of which is the poet—not as artist, but as a consciousness. And it is thus that the crisis in the life of the poet can be seen as national and cultural as well, and the poem can retain both its rhetoric and its lyricism.

In the critical writings, the Marxist bias of Muktiboth comes out strongly, but it is a mark of his greatness that in his creative writing, he maintains, by a supreme effort of will, an open and questioning attitude to his rational self, and so poems like 'Andhere Mein', which strain beyond the poet's own beliefs and convictions, become truly a creative piece of writing.

M.P.

CHANDALIKA (Bengali) is a play and dance-drama by Rabindranath Tagore. As a short play, it has two scenes with three characters–Prakriti, Ma and Ananda. The dance-drama Chandalika consists of three scenes, with some additional roles of Daiwala (curd-seller), Churiwala (bangle-seller) and Rajbarir anuchar (a messenger of the King's house), besides the three characters already mentioned. The play was written in 1933; after five years, in 1938 Tagore converted the play into a dance-drama with the same title.

The story of Chandalika is taken from Shardulkarnavadan incorporated in The Sanskrit Buddhist Literature of Nepal, edited by Rajendralal Mitra. However, Tagore has modified both the theme and the story in his play. While in Tagore's play, purity of human love is the central theme, it is also free from any religious creed whatsoever. Tagore believes that true love is something beyond the physical passion.

In the first scene of the play, we find that Prakriti and her mother are talking together; mother comes to know that her daughter has fallen in love with Ananda, a disciple of Lord Buddha. She warns her daughter saying that being untouchable, she should not have loved him. But Prakriti, now a changed woman, bows down at the altar of Ananda, begging forgiveness and dies. With Ananda blessing the departed soul, the play ends.

Rabindranath developed this play into a dance drama with the same story, except for the conclusion. In the dance-drama, Prakriti reawakens with the blessings of Ananda at the end. In the dance-drama, of course, the sting of untouchability has been depicted with vividness by introducing the characters of the village girls, Daiwala and Churiwala, as well as through the inner conflict and the mental struggle of Prakriti. Mother's exercise of the witchcraft is also very attractive and a vital part of the drama.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Edward Thompson, Rabindranath Tagore: Poet and Dramatist.

Pr. K

CHANDARWAKAR PUSHKAR PRABHASHANKAR PUSHPAJANYA (Gujarati; b. 1922) is a research scholar in folk-lore, journalist, novelist, writer of one-act plays and stories.

He was born at Chandarwa in Ahmedabad district. He passed Matriculation in 1939. He had been an underground worker for freedom right since 1942. He passed his B.A. examination from Gujarat College, Ahmedabad in 1944 and M.A. examination from Post-Graduate Centre of Gujarat Vidyasabha in 1946, taking Gujarati as his principal subject, at both the examinations.

In 1947 he had joined H.L. College, Ahmedabad as Lecturer in Gujarati, and later on joined B.D. Mahila Arts College, Ahmedabad, in 1956. He worked as Principal, Rajni Parekh Arts College, Khambhat, from 1960 to 1963, and as a Professor in Madhwani College, Porbandar, upto 1965. Thereafter, he worked in Unjha College as Principal during the year 1966, and also in Dhrangadhra College upto 1969 as a Professor of Gujarati. After this, he worked as a Reader in Saurashtra University, Rajkot upto 1976, where he was associated with the Department of Folk-lore and Charani Literature. From 1976, he has been working as a Professor and Hon. Director of Lokayatan, an institute in Chandarwa.

His contribution to the field of Folk-Culture and Folk-lore is significant. His critical books are: Dhool ane Dhefa, Dharti Fore-Fore, Rasamrit and Lokrang, Vadlo ane Vadvai, Lokamrit. His approach towards literature is clear from a number of his articles, such as 'Gujaratna Nathna Adharbeejo', 'Harmirji Gohil', 'Loktattviya Adhyayan', etc. It has been his chief object of study to see how ancient culture and Indian values of life are reflected in a composition, and how a composition assumes an exquisite form of art. Lokvarta dealing with the form of Folk-Tale is one of his remarkable books.

It contains a good number of articles on a comparative study of Indian narrative literature, motif-oriented study, etc. Padhar, Ek Adhyayan is yet another volume of its own kind, dealing with Padhar tribes. For the first time, the culture and literature of this tribe have been brought to light by wide and extensive research work.

Angad-Vishti and Kundaliya Jasraj Hardholanira are two model studies of Charani Literature edited by him.

With the publication of these works which are representatives of a great tradition of Charani literature, both Gujarati and Rajasthani literatures have come closer.

His other edited works of Folk-lore and Folk-songs are Khetarno Khedu (1958), Okhamandalni Lok-Kathao, Sompya Tujne Shish, Sonani Zaal, Navo Halko Chander Ugye Chalvun (1964), Vage Rudi Vansali, Olya Kanthana Ame Pankhida. He collects the data in a systematic, scientific manner, and then gives his own findings and observations. For example, the subjectwise classification of 'Navo Halko', and the Folk-Songs of various regions in Olya Kanthana Ame Pankhida prove to be extremely useful to scholars of this subject because of this systematic study. It is largely owing to these publications that copious new literature has been made available.

Among his novels which exceed the number of fifteen, worth mentioning are Rankna Ratan (1946), Liluda Lejo, Bavdana Vale (1954), Manvino Malo (1955), Dharti Bhar She Zilshe ? Vol. 1, 2 (1964), Gir Amari Chhe, Bhavni Kamani (3rd edn., 1976), Rank Haiyana (1976), etc. Chandarwakar is evidently a realist, a regional novelist, who vividly depicts the real experiences of simple rustic life and its social activity. These novels, dealing with the customs and conventions, manners and morals of rustic tribes like Padhar, Koli, etc., directly point out the good-will of the writer towards simple village folk, which may also be one of the reasons of their popularity.

His career as a dramatist mainly rests upon a bunch of One-Act plays, such as Piyarno Padoshi (1947), Yagna (1952), Mahina Olare (1956), and Sahkarman as also his editing of One-Act plays having no heroine, Rang-Leela (1957). All of them candidly reflect his art as a dramatist. His dexterity in dialogue and conflict marks some of his excellent One-Act plays. His preface, running into 77 pages, given at the beginning of Rang-Leela bears ample testimony to his studious outlook and zeal.

His short stories are collected in various volumes such as Bandhni (1954), Anterdeep and Shukanvanti (1956). His short stories generally depict provincial atmosphere, and are centred around some of the most common human problems.

B.J.

CHANDBARDAI (Hindi; 1168-1192). The life history of Chandbardai is shrouded in mystery. Most probably he was born in Lahore (now in Pakistan) in the 12th century and for many years served as a court-poet of Prithviraj Chauhan, the famous king of Delhi. It is assumed that both the king and the poet were born, and died on the same day, though this statement seems to be incredible. His father's name was Venarava or Mallarava. He, himself, had ten sons. He composed an epic entitled Prithviraj-Raso, which on his instructions was completed posthumously by his son Jallana, but there is no historicity attached to this legend. Buhler is of the opinion that any poet of this name did not exist at all at the court of Prithviraj. Even the inscriptions of the time of the king do not mention the poet's name.

Four recensions are now available of the work Prithviraj-Raso: (i) a large one (containing 13 to 17 thousands verses); (ii) a medium one (9 to 12 thousand verses); (iii) a short one (2400 verses); and (iv) the shortest one (containing only 1300 verses). It is difficult to ascertain which of the four is authentic. In almost all of them we find mention of events that occurred not only many centuries before the birth of Prithviraj, but also many centuries after his death. Moreover, many of the events mentioned do not tally with the inscriptions. In fact this epic, originally written by Chandbardai, has been interpolated by the bards and minstrels for centuries, in the language in vogue from time to time. As a whole its language is known as 'Dingal'–a variety of Brajabhasha profusely mixed with Rajasthani language. We come across numberless words of other languages like Sanskrit, Apabhramsha, Arabic, Persian and Khari-boli. It, thus, has not much importance from the historical point of view, yet it presents fine pieces of poetry specially steeped in heroism and eroticism for the following obvious reasons. The hero of this epic–Prithviraj, a brave and sensuous king that he was, had to fight battles against other native kings to forcibly acquire their beautiful daughters and after his glorious victories was eventually married to the princesses. Such incidents gave a vast scope to the poets to deal with the heroic and erotic sentiments. He presented vivid and graphic descriptions of the army marching towards the battle-field on land and war-tuned drum-beats of the battle itself, the clinking and rattling sounds of the swords and other weapons, the neighing of the horses, the horrid and fierce sounds of the dying soldiers, and then the joyous noise of his victorious army, the trot of the galloping horses carrying away Prithviraj Chauhan along with his new find—the charming princess–on its back and behind them the futile chase of the handful of faithful and militant soldiers of the defeated king and in the end meeting of the two newly weds enjoying all sorts of erotic pleasures.

The marriages with Icchani, Sashivrata and Sanyogita are considered to be the best episodes in this respect. His battles with the Muslim king Mohammad Ghori present heroic scenes of confrontation of vast magnitude of the two armies in the last of which Prithviraj ultimately died a hero's death.

This epic consisting of 69 cantos is composed in about 70 different metres in an elegant diction and picturesque style expressing vigour and virility, full of alliterations, similes and metaphors and is considered to be the first major epic in Hindi, and, therefore, its author the first major poet of Hindi literature.

Sa.C.

CHANDI CHARITRA (Hindi): Dasham Granth is the collection of the works of the Dasham (tenth) Guru–Guru Gobind Singh. Three of the 13 works relate to Chandi, the mother of the universe, who assumes different forms to perform different duties towards the creation. One of the three books is in Punjabi and the other two are in Hindi (Braja Bhasha). Chandi Charitra Ukti Vilas is considered to be more important and Chandi Charitra is said to be the 'second'. In general reference Chandi Charitra signifies the Chandi Charitra Ukti Vilas.

The story of Chandi is related in Markandeya Puran (Sanskrit) in the form of 'Durga Saptashati' (700 verses about Durga). As a part of the Dasham Granth, Chandi Charitra is available only in Gurumukhi script, but it has also been published independently in the Devanagari script. It is divided into 8 chapters (unlike in Sanskrit which has 13 chapters). The goddess performed 3 important deeds to help her devotees. The first was the slaying of the demons–Madhu and Kaitabha. As a part of the second deed, the second chapter describes the slaying of another demon–Mahishasur. The death of Dhumra nayan, Chand Mund, and Rakta Bij is described in the following chapters. The sixth and the seventh chapters are most important as they narrate her most important deed–her fight with the most powerful demons–Shumbha and Nishumbha.

It is evident that the dominant sentiment of Chandi Charitra is devotion (Bhakti). Tulsidas had written Ramcharitamanas to propagate 'Ram Bhakti', and Guru Gobind Singh wrote Chandi Charitra to awaken in the people devotion to the mother Chandi. As a bhakti Kavya of the later medieval period Chandi Charitra has no parallel. The Bhakti of Guru Gobind Singh is the devotion of a soldier. He worshipped to get himself charged to act. Devotion is the wire which connects the devotee with the Mother and which conducts her powers to him. Charged with the spirit, the book bubbles with the heroic sentiment—Vira rasa. While Bhushan Lal Sudan, etc, revived the Raso-tradition of Vira rasa, Gobind Singh developed his style on the foundation of Bhakti.

Guru Gobind Singh is a master in the matter of descriptions. At every step we realise that it is the manifestation of the poet's own experience. His descriptions are fascinating on account of their originality. His language is chaste, metres correct and according to the environment, narrative fresh and impressive. As a saint, as a soldier, as a poet, and above all as a person Guru Gobind Singh is a legend of his times and Chandi Charitra is his best work. This small book combines the mundane with the divine, 'Vira Rasa' with 'Bhakti Rasa', and poetic art with didactic candidness.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Maheep Singh, Guru Gobind Singh aur Unki Hindi Kavita; P. Sehgal, Guru Gobind Singh aur Unka Kavya; Ratna Singh Juggi, Dasham Granth ki Pauranic Prishthabhumi.

O.P.

CHANDI DI VAR (Punjabi) is a composition of Guru Gobind Singh included in the Dasam Granth. It is almost the only work he wrote in Punjabi. For its subject, Guru Gobind Singh has chosen a mythological story from Markandeya Purana in which Devtas (gods) having been defeated by Daityas (the demons) seek the shelter of Durga, the symbol of power and energy according to the Hindu belief. She helps them with all her force; the demons are defeated and Indra regains his lost paradise.

Chandi is another name of Bhagavati but the actual title, as given in the Dasam Granth is Var Sri Bhagavati Ji Ki. The philosophy behind this composition can be interpreted as a hint to the Indian people that the oppressive Mughal rule can be subverted only by the power of the sword. The word Bhagavati has been interpreted to mean 'sword'. In a fight between virtue and evil, virtue always wins in the end. Some people have misconstrued that Guru Gobind Singh was a worshipper of the goddess Durga or Chandi. It is a heroic poem of excellence with resounding word pictures, appropriate imagery and onomatopoeic diction.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Harbans Singh Gyani, Chandi di Var Nirnai, Sunder Book Depot, Jullunder, third edition, 1979; Jagjit Singh, Var Sri Bhagvati Ji, Sahit Sangram, Ludhiana, 1968; Kasel, Kripal Singh and Parminder Singh, Chandi di Var.

K.S.K.

CHANDIDAS (Bengali; 15th Century) represents the culminating point of Bhakti lyricism only comparable to Surdas (1478-1563) in its grandeur, depth and simplicity. Owing to the mythical aura associated with his name, it has not yet been possible for literary historians to establish his identity in concrete terms of biographical details. Judging by the varied character of the poetry contained in between one thousand and twelve hundred lyrics attributed to him, critics are of opinion that there have been at least three poets bearing the same name, although with different epithets.

The first one of these is Badu Chandidas, who wrote Sri Krishna Kirtan. He existed in the pre-Chaitanya era and wrote dramatic poetry about Krishna, drawing largely on Jayadeva's Gitagovinda. Sri Krishna Kirtan is a ballad elaborately dealing with the Radha-Krishna episode based on a rural theme. The story is sub-divided into 11 chapters, some incomplete due to non-availability or wear and tear of pages of the only manuscript discovered so far. The theme harps again and again on the forbidden love between a village maid and her wooing mate: Radha and Krishna have indeed been depicted as such therein. The book has been condemned, at some conservative quarters, for its obscenity.

At once crops up the controversy as to the identity of the Chandidas relished by Chaitanya. Badu Chandidas, in all probability, preceded Chaitanya; yet devout Vaishnavas would not agree to his getting absorbed in a story so 'crude' and 'immoral'. Some scholars, of late, have been able to establish with some amount of conviction that out of quite a number of 'Padakarta' Chandidasas, one might have flourished before Chaitanya, and it was he who had impressed Chaitanya with a series of splendorous verses.

Taking all these points into consideration, it may be logically surmised that Badu Chandidas and a 'Padakarta' Chandidas also belonged to the pre-Chaitanya era, that is, to the 15th century.

The second is known as Dvija (literally, twice–born). His contemporaneity with Chaitanya can be legitimately derived from the internal evidence of his poetry. Actually, it is this poet whose emotive and devotional poetry moved Chaitanya; yet it also appeals to readers widely, irrespective of their secular or sectarian dispositions. The post-Chaitanya Chandidas is termed Dina (literally, humble). Elements of Sahajiya and Vaishnavism are discernible in what he, or his successor also termed Chandidas, wrote. The latest poetry by this author (or authors) is singulary esoteric and devoid of lyricism.

The first might have flourished in the village of Chaitanya in the district of Bankura, and the other might be associated with Ketugram in Burdwan, and Nanur and Kirnahar in Birbhum. Apart from the question of plagiarism and interpolation, there cannot be any doubt as to the poetical integrity of Badu and Dvija Chandidas. And yet the name of Chandidas which is often mentioned without any epithet has for posterity the stature of one who is the doyen of Vaishnava poets. Chaitanya's inclination towards his poetry rests on the unique blend of personal and depersonalised strains of the latter's poetry. It reveals the poetic personality of a lyricist who expressed the emotions he experienced in a direct way which is at the same time subtle and replete with metaphors not culled from any rhetorical source or exercise. Hence his universality has an authentic ring about it. His touchstone lines like 'Chale nil sari ningadi ningadi paran sahite mor' (the blue sari passes by taking my life with it) may compare with Herrick's 'when in silk my Julia goes/then, (methinks), how swiftly flows/liquifaction of her clothes'. A second look reveals that Chandidas universalizes his experiences without naming or localizing his idol. Similarly, countless couplets such as 'ghar Kainu bahir, bahir Kainu ghar/bujhite narinu ami tomar antar' (I turned the home inside out, and still I could not grasp what is inside you, my friend) have become a part of the Bengali psyche and its poetic heritage. The untarnished intensity of this poetry has helped much towards the moulding of the Bengali (Gauriya) school of Vaishnavism.

Apart from all that has been said above, manuscript evidence has been discovered about another post-Chaitanya Chandidas, possibly belonging to the 17th century. He, identified as Dina Chandidas, had written volumes of verses almost of no consequence.

Of the number of other Chandidasas one Tarani, or more aptly, Taruniraman Chandidas is credited with the writing of the Sahajiya Padas; and the Rami legend is also associated with him. According to that, Chandidas, the Brahmin poet, achieved his success, both in his poetic activities and also in his religious pursuits, through the graceful association of the washer-woman Rami, with whom the poet had been involved in a forbidden yet deep and intimate love affair. They are said to have been united by the ties of 'sahajiya sadhana'. This also may be an episode of not earlier than the 17th century.

The name of Chandidas in itself has been an exhilarating experience for the reader of Bengali literature with so many abiding verses of so varied interests. The problem of identification has added to the thrilling experience, particularly for the scholars of literary history.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Bimanbihari Majumdar, (ed.) Chandidaser Padavali; Bhudab Chauadhuri, Bangla Sahityer Itikatha (Vol. I) Manindramohan Basu, (ed.), Dina Chandidaser Padavali; Srikumar Bandyopadhyay, Bangla Sahityer Katha.

A.D.

CHANDILYAN (Tamil; b. 1910). Well-versed in English, Sanskrit and Tamil, he makes his living by writing. His real name is S. Bhasyam. According to Kamil Veith Zvelebil Chandilyan is the fourth most popular Tamil writer. At any point of time, one of the high-circulation Tamil journals will serialize his novels. Currently, Kumudam is serializing his Vijaya Mahadevi, a novel set in ancient Kalinga. Most of his novels are long with vivid descriptions of places and persons, and are on some well-known historical personages in Tamil history. Kadal pura is about Kulottunga I, Chola King, 1070-1178, and is in 3 vols 1967; Yavana rani is about a princess from Greece and is in 2 vols. Raja Tilakam is about Narasimhavarman II, Pallava King, 690-715; Pallava tilakam is about Dantivarman, 779-830, Pallava King; Jala dipam (1973, 3 vols); Raja muttirai is on Jatavarman Sundara Pandya I, 1251-1268, and is in 2 vols. Chandilyan has written Cenpakat tottam (Garden of a sweet-smelling flower) Puratcip pen (Progressive girl, 1958) Raniyin Kanavu (The Queen's dream, 1963) short stories, two books of criticism, the first on Tiruppavai, Vaishnavite hymn by Andal, and the second, Kamban kanta penkal (Women characters in Kamba Ramayanam, 9th century Tamil epic on Rama, 1979) and an autobiography entitled Porattangal (My struggles, 1978). Chandilyan writes for films too. He has his detractors also. The historical romance, projected by him chiefly as didactic literature, degenerated into many pseudo-historical novels, naive and immature, tales of escape and make-believe. Typical of this kind of writing of Chandilyan may be seeen in his long, pseudohistorical fantasies in hard cover couched in a style with long, involved sentences.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Leo Hyacinth, 'The historical novel of the mid-century', Proceedings of the Second International Conference-Seminar of Tamil studies, Madras, 1971.,

V.K.S.

CHANDIMANGALA-KAVYA (Bengali). Like all other Mangala Kavyas of mediaeval Bengali literature, the Chandimangala-Kavya also represents a cult behind it, - the cult of Chandi. The goddess Chandi is an admixture of various deities: the folk - deity, the deity of non - Aryan origin, and the mythic deities of Durga and Chandi of Brahmanic cult. It is round about the 10th century A.D. that the goddesses Durga and Chandi merged into one.

The Chandimangala-Kavya has two different tales: the first is the tale of Kalaketu, the huntsman; and the second, the tale of Dhanapati and Shrimanta, the merchants. Like all other Mangala-Kavyas, the present tales have several parts: the 'Deva'-part, the 'Akshetika' (a huntsman) part and the 'Vanika' (a merchant) part. In the Deva part, the conjugal life of Lord Hara and his divine consort Parvati, has been depicted. The goddess Parvati with a view to find herself worshipped on the earth, uttered a curse against Nilambara, the son of Indra and his wife Chhaya. They were born as Kalaketu and Phullara respectively in the family of a huntsman. The goddess Chandi took kindly to Kalaketu, and through her grace Kalaketu founded the city of Gujarata, and became a king there. Here appears the notorious character Bhandu Dutta, who was insulted in the estate of Kalaketu, and then as a retaliative measure he joined the party of the king of Kalinga state; a severe battle was fought between Kalaketu and the king of Kalinga. Kalaketu won the battle ultimately, and the villain Bhandu was punished. Kalaketu and Phullara rose to heaven, fulfilling all the wishes of the goddess Chandi.

The tale of Dhanapati (and of Shrimanta, his son) is a longer one and naturally its continuity has been broken in many places. Unlike the tale of Kalaketu the huntsman, it tells the story of a merchant of higher social status. It is from this episode, that one is tempted to conclude that the goddess had established herself in the life and lore of a primitive society at first and thereafter she made her way into the higher social status, the merchants being the elites at that time. Khullana, Dhanapati's second wife, was also a cursed lady, a resident of the heaven; Ratnamala was her former name. Dhanapati (= a rich man) was a Shaivite, and had no faith in the goddess Chandi. He went on a sea-voyage with his argosy, met a great disaster in the Kalidaha (the lake of Kali) because of the anger of Chandi. It is through the activities of Srimanta, his son, and Khullana, his second wife, who appeased the goddess Chandi, that Dhanapati found a happy life at last.

Like all other Mangala-Kavyas, the tale of the Chandimangala also follows a traditional line in the works of all the poets. Manika Datta, who has been supposed to be a poet of pre-Chaitanya era, has also been accepted as the pioneerpoet of the Chandikavya. Most probably Datta hailed from Maldah (a district in North Bengal). Next comes Dwija Madhava, in all probability a resident of West Bengal, but he composed his poem in Chittagong (now in Bangladesh), because most of his manuscripts have been found there, some of which have also been published. He composed his poem most probably sometime between 1578 and 1580. The most striking feature of his narrative is the killing of Mangala the demon by the goddess Chandi. The tale is an abridged one and the manner is that of a Vrata-tale.

Mukundarama Chakrabarti, the most celebrated poet of the Chandi-trend, is also the central figure of the whole of mediaeval Bengali literature. Chakrabarti won the title 'Kavikankana' (bangle of all poets) by showing his poetic ability and talent of high order. From authentic manuscripts we come to know that the poet's forefathers were the residents of a village Damunya, in the district of Burdwan. Being persecuted by a political ruler, the poet had to leave his hearth and home in about 1544. He took refuge in the court of Bankura Raya, a Brahmin king in the district of Midnapore, and was appointed private tutor of the Prince Raghunatha; the poet composed his poem in about 1590-91, during the reign of Raghunatha.

Mukundarama has added new dimensions to the old and traditional tale through his subtle power of observations, rare capability to understand the whole human life, sense of pleasant humour, deployment of dramatic incidents, and above all, through his characterisation.

Other minor poets of the Chandi-mangala are: Valarama Kavikankana, Dwija Janardana, Dwija Ramadeva, Dwija Harirama, Muktarama Sena, Ramananda Yati, Jayanarayana Dewa. Dwija Ramadeva's work (1650) has been published by the University of Calcutta.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Ashutosh Bhattacharjee, Bangla Mangala-Kavyer Itihas; D.C. Sen, Banga Bhasha O Sahitya.

N.B.

CHANDRAGOMIN (or Chandra; Sanskrit), was an inhabitant of Eastern India. He flourished around 5th century A.D. As a follower of some Mahayana Buddhistic sect, he admired and emulated the altruistic ideal of a Bodhisattva. He was held in high esteem by his contemporaries.

Chandragomin's works, both authentic and apocryphal, may be classed conveniently under three categories, viz., (i) vyakarana, (ii) kavya and (iii) sadhana (including healing magic). All these works are found in their Tibetan translation in the Bstan-Hgyur. Under the first category come the (a) Chandravyakaranasutra, (b) Vimshatyupasargavritti, (c) Varnasutra, (d) Adhikarasamgraha, (e) Unadi and (f) Chandravyakaranavarnasutravritti. All these have already been edited and published by Bruno Liebich of Breslau University (Leipzig, 1902 and 1918). Chandragomin's Vyakarana with his svopajnavritti (auto-commentary) has also been edited later on by Kshitishchandra Chatterji (Poona, 1953 and 1961). Chandragomin's Sanskrit Grammar is a full-fledged system modelled on Panini's. An authoritative grammarian of his times, Chandragomin discovered from a mountain in South India a single manuscript of Patanjali's Mahabhashya on Panini's Ashtadhyayi and revived at the bidding of King Abhimanyu of Kashmir the tradition of study and teaching of the Mahabhashya which became extinct due to the hostile criticism of the adversary scholars like Baiji, Saubhava and Haryaksha (Bhartrihari's Vakyapadiya, 2/487-489 and Kalhana's Rajatarangini, 1/176). In his grammar Chandragomin has followed Katyayana's Varttikas and Patanjali's Mahabhashya in most cases. Chandragomin's views have been referred to by the later grammarians.

Under the second category come the (a) Shishyalekhadharmakavya, a literary epistle from a Guru to his disciple dealing with Buddhistic teachings (after the fashion of Nagarjuna's Suhrillekha written to a friend), (b) Lokanandanataka, a drama delighting the public, extant only in the Tibetan translation (ed. with a German retranslation by M.Hahn, Wiesbaden, 1974) and (c) Aryavalokiteshvarastotra and some other stotras.

Lastly, under the third category come the (a) Simhanadasadhana, (b) Ashtashatasadhana, (c) Kushthachikitsopaya, and (d) Jvararakshavidhi, etc.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Biswanath Bhattacharya, Chandragomin's Lokanandanataka: Critical Observations on its Nandi verses, an original research paper, in the Vishveshvaranada Indological Journal, Hoshiarpur, Punjab, Vol. XVI, Part I, March, 1978; Yudhishthir Mimamasak, Sanskrit Vyakaranashastra ka Itihas in Hindi.

B.B.

CHANDRAGUPTA (Bengali) is a historical drama by Dwijendralal Roy published in 1911. Chandragupta is written against the backdrop of the distant past of Indian history. It centres round an account of extermination of the Nanda regime by Chandragupta at the behest of and in collusion with Chanakya (or Kautilya) who was humiliated by Nanda. The drama carried an anecdote loosely grafted to the main theme. Chandragupta, disgraced by Nanda, received training under Selukas in the Greek camp near the Indus. Subsequently, after ascendancy to the throne, he decided to wipe out the Greeks from India. Treaty of peace by Selukas, and matrimony between Chandragupta and Helen, daughter of Selukas brought the two streams of events together rather artificially.

In depicting Chanakya's character the dramatist was guided by the Machiavellian doctrine. The Brahmin, left alone and cynical by turn of fate took a vow of exterminating Nanda through fraud, force and cruelty. Chandragupta's aspiration of expelling the invaders also tends to echo Machiavellian theory of uniting Italy.

D.L. Roy might have been influenced by the Mudrarakshasa, a Sanskrit drama and its translated version of Jyotirindranath Tagore (1901). Inspite of Roy's admission in the preface that he had meagre information from history, he appears to have developed the main events and characters from history, extant texts and puranic traditions. Fidelity to facts however is not a basic feature of literary work. Roy introduced minor events and characters of imaginary import. Sparks of flame from the boiling heart of Chanakya have been depicted vividly. The founder of the Maurya dynasty is completely eclipsed by his counsellor.

The work by all means has the flavour of a historical drama. Roy strikes a note of decadence of the Brahmanic traditions and ideals, and the hero of the drama sounds a note of emergence of Buddhism which would usher in a new social order (Act 5/2). D.L. Roy, a poet as he was, not only displayed lyrical exuberance in dialogue but also gave vent to a feeling of humanistic ideology in all his historical plays.

Su. B.

CHANDRAGUPTA VIDYALANKAR (Hindi; b. 1906, d. 1982) was a story writer, playwright, essayist and journalist of repute. Chandragupta was born in the district Muzaffargarh (now in Pakistan). Vidyalankar sometimes betrays his over-consciousness for his style, which robs his stories of human touch. He, however, opts to create a romantic atmosphere in his stories.

As a Playwright, he was more successful in one-act plays. His undue elaboration of human emotions and feelings and his refinement and delicacy are impediments to the success of full-length dramas. Although his poetic emotionality creates the melo-dramatic element in the plays, yet his gracefulness, warmth of intense feelings, power of harmonising ideas and images are of considerable merit. As a journalist, Chandragupta has successfully edited the monthly journal Ajkal (Hindi) for a number of years.

His works: Collection of stories–Vapasi (Return, 1954); Chandrakala (Lunar Crescent).

Collection of One-act plays–Cosmopolitan Club (1945).

Complete dramas–Ashok (1934). Dev aur Manav–(God and Man, 1956) and Nyay ki Rat (Night of Justice, 1958).

S.D.M.

CHANDRAKANTA (Hindi). Devakinandan Khatri entered the field of Hindi novel with a bang, with his maiden effort, viz. Chandrakanta (1888) which attracted the attention of a large readership itching for entertainment and the impact of this work on the popular mind was so astoundingly obvious when thousands and thousands of men started learning Hindi in order to be able to read Chandrakanta at first hand. Its lure has not abated with the change of taste of the average Hindi reader as a result of the publication of numerous, mature, socially relevant and purposeful novels. Even today it has a lrage number of fans which is evidenced by the fact that it has so far gone into about fifty editions.

Chandrakanta introduced a new type of novels based on miraculousness (tilasma) and cunning and devoted exclusively to entertainment. Divested of the diffusion caused by miraculous performances long-winding intrigues and thrilling adventures, Chandrakanta is, in essence, a love story between the prince of Navgarh Virendra Singh and princess Chandrakanta of Vijaygarh. Their love affair is mutually responsive. The third side of the triangle is constituted by Krur Singh, Vijaygarh Dewan's son, who also loves the princess and seeks the help of the king of Chunargarh, Shivdutt Singh, to see his wily dream materialized. As his ill luck would have it, king Shivdutt Singh himself feels infatuated by Chandrakanta just by the superlative praises he hears about her charm and beauty from Krur Singh. The many-aided confrontation continues on its labyrinthine course, matching intrigue for intrigue, adventure for adventure and wiliness for wiliness till Virendra Singh's love reaches a triumphal conclusion with active help from his trusted 'Aiyars' Jit Singh and Tej Singh who succeed in resurrecting not only the princess from the clutches of Shivdutt Singh but also secure a huge treasure found buried in the den where she was interned.

The attraction of Devakinandan Khatri's plot structure and improvisation lies in the slick manner in which he joins and links together the various episodes of the novel, leaving no loose ends in suspense inspite of their diffused numerousness and in his ability to constantly maintain the curiousity and inquisitiveness of his reader as to the next turn of events. This forms the basic strength of the novel. The language used is simple, fluent and intelligibile.

Devakinandan Khatri was a force to reckon with in the earliest phase of the development of Hindi novel. The credit for creating readership for a neglected and even condemned genre of novel undoubtedly goes to this man who was a genius in his own way. His wide popularity compelled even Ramachandra Shukla to hail him as 'the first original novelist whose novels created a stir amongst the people at large'.

Ma.C.

CHANDRAKANTA SANTATI (Hindi) is a popular novel by Devakinandan Khatri. It was first published in 1896 in 24 parts. The tradition of 'Tilasmi' (miraculous; tiliasmanic) and 'Airyari' (wiliness) novels in Hindi originated with Chandrakanta and Chandrakanta Santati. It gained extraordinary popularity among the readers, so much so that people learnt Hindi in order to be able to read and enjoy the novel. Khatri transported the reader into a magical world so that, for a while, he forgot the hard realities of life. Inspite of the fact that it is not a literary novel of high quality, it is unique in its entertainment aspect. It is the story of two sons of Chandrakanta - Indrajit Singh and Anand Singh. That's why it has been named Chandrakanta Santati. The foundation of the novel is based on free, uninhibited imagination. The novel depicts the romances of princes and youthful gaiety of princesses and has no place for the struggles of the common man and for social realities. Khatri has kept himself far away from the question of the true and false and has created an extremely interesting world of wonder and curiosity. He does not aim at the wealth of emotions or profound characterization. The threads of the story keep on a pattern of intricate interweaving of incidents that emerge out of nothingness and are not bound by the normal casual relationship.

K.P.

CHANDRASAKHI (Rajasthani; b. 1643, d. 1733) originally known as Chandra, was the third son of Gopikanta, a descendant of the famous saint-poet Harirama Vyasa. He was a sanadhya Brahmana born in Dacha. In the prime of his life he served as a 'Thanedar' (Incharge of a Police or Customs station) at Motha near Dacha (Bundel Khand). He had a devotional bent of mind which inspired him to leave the job and all the worldly affairs, including his own family to settle at Vrindavan. He was initiated in the Radhavallabha faith by Balakrishna Swami, where after he started composing devotional songs, he appended the name of his guru (Balakrishna) along with his own, to every concluding foot of his verses, as a mark of respect. His name was now changed from Chandra to Chandrasakhi, while his elder brother Vijaya was initiated as Vijayasakhi. He travelled far and wide and also visited Rajasthan and Malwa. He propagated the 'Rasa' form of dance and music during these tours and composed a large number of Bhajans and folk songs which gained popularity. He built a large sized 'kunja' at Vrindavan which came to be known as 'Chandrasakhi ki kunja'. Compelled by the circumstances, he had to move to Dacha at the fag end of his life and died at that place at the age of 90. He had a number of disciples of whom one 'Rasikasakhi' was the most prominent. The fast growing number of his line of disciples gained him an important place in the Vaishnavite Akhadas. One such Ani-Akhada of Chandrasakhi tradition is located at Nima-ka-thana (Sikar-Rajasthan).

The Bhajans of Chandrasakhi are so popular in Rajasthan that it is well-nigh impossible to deny that they are composed by a non-Rajasthani poet. Verses and songs already known by the name of other saint poets are also available in his name. His compositions were preserved in the oral tradition of the common people. Manohar Sharma of Bissau, an eminent scholar of folk literature, has published about 320 songs in his name. The Bhajans are available in various kinds of publication sold at footpaths and fairs, which speak of their immense popularity. The ladies in households sing them as 'Harajasa' (a synonym of 'Bhajan') in the early mornings while doing household chores.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Manohar Sharma, Chandrasakhi ki Lok Prachalita Padavali, ek paryalochana, Bissau, 1969. Prabhudayal Mittal, Chandrasakhi ka Jivan aur Sahitya.

Raw.S.

CHANDRASEKHARAN NAIR VAIKOM (Malayalam b. 1930) is a native of Vaikom. He has a creditable record of journalistic experience spread over decades. His started his career as a sub-editor of the Malayala Manorama. Later he founded the Janayugam weekly and worked as its editor for a few years. The dailies Keralam and Pourapprabha are the two other periodicals that were benefited by his editorial services. Kumkumam, and Chitra Karthika, both weeklies, also made use of his experience. At present he is associated with Kumari, another weekly of wide circulation.

His works include drama, novels, travelogues, literary studies and caricatures. He is a prolific writer and has written several scripts for Malayalam films. His drama Jatugriham won the state Sahitya Akademi Award. The Doctor, Kuttavum Sikshayam, Tanneerpanthal and Aalohari are some of his other dramas and Miss Mayavati, Gotradaham, Nakhangal, Madhavikutty, etc. are some of his wellknown novels.

Three of the above works have been filmed. He was the Chairman of the Kerala Sangita Nataka Akademi.

K.S.N.

CHANDRASINHA (Rajasthani; b. first decade of the 20th century) is considered to be the first creative poet of the modern period. His book, Badali (The Cloud) was first published in 1941 from Bikaner (Rajasthan). The book was widely appreciated equally by the traditional bards as well as the modern writers. The Nagari Pracharini Sabha, Varanasi (U.P.) honoured the poet by the 'Ratnakar Puraskar' and 'Baldevdas Padak' (Medal). The book has proved extremely popular, so much so that its fifth edition was published in 1968 which also has gone out of print. It is still to be surpassed by any other book of its calibre and stature. Though written in the traditional 'Duha' metre, it excels all others in rich poetic descriptions of the rainy season in the desert villages. His second book of nature poetry is Lu (the hotwind of summer), was published in 1968 for the second time, the first one had been published at Jaipur in 1956. Critics are generally of the opinion that this description of the summer in the desert land is far superior in poetic excellence to that of his earlier creation, Badali In the style of 'Mukari' said to have been written by Amir Khusrau in the 14th century, Chandrasinha also published his Kaha Mukarani (denying what is said by others). The book contains seventy independent stanzas. The book has seen more than one edition but there is no indication of the year of publication. According to the author, the first edition was, however, published at Bikaner before 1941. Balasada (the child's speech) - Jaipur, 1968 is a collection of his miscellaneous writings, such as, mini stories, lyrics, lullabies, didactic couplets and poetic prose. He has maintained a flair for translations and has given three such books, Dilip (Kalidasa's Raghuvansh's cantos I to III), Kalajai ri Kora (core of the heart, selected slokas of Gatha Saptashati of Hala) and Chitrangada Tagores's play of the same name). Amongst them the first two were published in 1962 and 1968 respectively by the author himself from Jaipur, while Chitrangada was published by the Rajasthani Sahitya Academy from Udaipur in 1961. His translations were appreciated by eminment scholars. The poet's minute observations of natural phenomena have found poetic expression in his books. His long and close association with village-life and all its surroundings has inculcated in him a natural and deep understanding of the life of the people, the animal world and the entire creation of all animate and inanimate objects. That is why his sympathies with them can be seen reflected in his works. The seasonal circle of the desert land of Rajasthan, together with all its peculiarities, can also be better treated by his powerful pen.

Raw. S.

CHANDRAYANA (Rajasthani) is a metre of four 'Padas', of twenty one 'Matra' each. Bhanu Kavi prescribes two slabs of eleven and ten 'matra' in each pada, ending with a 'Jagana' and 'Ragana', respectively. Adha Kisana, in his Raghuvarajasha Prakasha (1824) has imposed no such restrictions, which of course are there, and just prescribes three portions of six 'matras' each having a short and long 'matra' at the end of the pada. Ratnashekhar Suri (14th century) in his Chandahakosh, however, differs by defining it as a metre having the first part of the 'Duha' (13 matra) in the beginning followed by another of seven 'matras', thus making a total of twenty matras in each 'Pada'. This definition does not stand supported by others.

The metre has been widely used by the medieval poets, along with others, in their bigger works. There are very rare instances of its being used exclusively. Mention may be made of a few important ones, such as, Bhagat Bhav ra Chandrayana (210 in all) by Sodhi Nathi (1673), Chandrayana by Vajinda (17th century), Haridasa (17th century) and Mathen Amichanda (18th century). But this lapse on the part of authors has been all well compensated by many others who have used the metre in their longer poems. Ratan Virbhan in his Rajarupaka (18th century, Khidiya Jagga in his Rav Ratan Mahesh Adasotri Vachanika (17th century), Keshavdasa Gadana in his Gajaguna Pupaka Bandha (17th century), Kavia Karanidhana in his Surajprakash (18th century, Jodhpur), and many more of them have done so. The last line of the verse of this metre of ten contains the word 'Parihari'.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H.L. Maheshwari, History of Rajasthani Literature, Sahitya Akademi New Delhi, 1980; M.L. Menariya, Rajasthani Bhasha aur Sahitya, Prayag, 1948.

Raw.S.

CHANDROTSAVAM (Malayalam) is a narrative poem belonging to the early Manipravala school of poetry. It was composed during the later half of the 15th century. Little is known about the author. He must have been a gifted poet belonging to the north of Kerala, presumably from the upper stratum of society. The complete text of the work was published for the first time in Kavanodayam in 1900.

Chandrotsavam consisting of five parts, exhibits all the qualities of a narrative poem. It has a well-knit story, told in an organised form. The main theme of the work is the organisation of Chandrotsavam, or the festival of the moon by the Devadasi, Medinichandrika. After propitiating the Gods Shiva, Parvati, and Kama and eulogising Sanskrit poets such as Vyasa, Valmiki and Kalidasa at the outset, the poet introduces the theme in an indirect way, through the words of a Gandharva. On the heights of the Marakataparvata, the Gandharva and the Kinnara girl meet and while they are in the pleasure of romantic love, the girl is attracted by a strange fragrance. Thinking that the fragrance is coming from a wonderful flower she entreats her lover to go and fetch it for her. The Gandharva goes in search of the flower, guided by the strange fragrance in the air. He at last arrives at Chittilappalli and finds several celestial chariots going down to the earth at that particular place. He too goes down and solves the mystery of the strange fragrance. The source is not a flower as imagined by his sweetheart; it comes from a big pastille worshipped at the festival of the moon by Medinichandrika. The Gandharva is captivated by the wonderful story of the Medinichandrika. Unable to come away from Chittilapalli before six days,naturally he has to justify his long absence to his sweet heart and thus in the words of the Gandharva, the poet narrated the story of Medinichandrika.

Medinichandrika was born to Mati, a famed Devadasi of Chittilappalli. Mati, like Urvashi, ruled over the vast empire of Kama, but she had one desire: she did severe penance to win the Gods and Kama ultimately blessed her granting her the coveted boon. Kama also told her that her daughter would be the incarnation of Chandrika, the consort of the moon-god. The child was born and she grew up to be a charming damsel. In course of time she too carried on the family tradition. Once the moon-god appeared before her and told her that she was none other than his consort Chandrika, destined to live on earth for a hundred 'human' years. He also directed her to conduct the moon festival. Accordingly Medinichandrika began preparations for the celebrations. A palatial new building, Srimangalam was built. A conference of courtesans was organised to seek their co-operation for the festival. Varakapalli Nambuthiri was appointed as the chief priest and under his supervision the festival got on its way. Set amidst the splendour of the autumn season, the festival attracted people from far and near, belonging to the different strata of society. Raja Kantan Kota was the patron; but the pride of place at the festival naturally went to devadasis who came from several reputed centres such as Odanadu, Kantiyoor Niranam and Matilakam. Many of them came in palanquins accompanied by poets, singing their glories in charming lyrics. Seated on a raised platform, studded with moon-gems and gold, and surrounded on all sides by jewelled lamps, Medinichandrika wearing a saffron silken scarf over her shoulders and adorning her fair breasts with a single pearl necklece, shone as bright and beautiful as the very incarnation of the presiding deity of the festival. Four eventful days passed by and on the fifth and final day Medinichandrika arrived in a royal procession with all the splendour due to a queen and the throbbing crowd on both sides of the route gave her a magnificent ovation. The moon-god accompanied by Kama, his consorts and the retinue of stars, finally arrived to bestow his blessings on Medinichandrika. He declared that she would live as the golden lamp of the god of love and her fame would spread to the ends of the earth. Thus the glorious festival of the moon came to a close.

CHANNABASAVA

Chandrotsavam occupies a significant place in early Malayalam poetry. Felicitous descriptions and colourful imagery combined with a simple transparent style give the work an abiding charm. The narration is lively, characters are delineated with precision and the festival atmosphere is captured in all its glory. The work also mirrors, to a certain extent, the decadence and the moral ways of living practised by the men and women of those days.

K.R.N.

CHANNABASAVA (Kannada b. 143, d. 1168), occupies a very important place among the Vachanakaras of the 12th century. He was the son of Basaveshvara's sister Akkangamma. A lot of controversy has loomed over his birth and his father. Old works dealing with Channabasava are also not unanimous on these issues. The epics and puranas describe him as an incarnation, as one not born of a woman, or as one born by virtue of the blessed food (prasada). Singiraja (1500 A.D.) has in singirajapurana stated that one Shivaswamy was his father.

Basavanna was Channabasava's master and mentor, guide and philosopher. Channabasava's vachanas themselves bear testimony to this. Actually he stood by Basavanna, and was mainly responsible for the culmination of all his works into reality.

Channabasava's personality was rather exemplary. Elderly ones, contemporaries and juniors have all uniformly praised him for his astounding scholarship which he had attained even in his young age. With his deep knowledge of Virashaiyism he was even titled Atmajanani (knowner of self) and 'Satsthalachakravarti' (The monarch of the six stages of devotion). His became an authentic voice by virtue of his deep knowledge and experience of the eight masks, the five principles and devotion to Shiva etc.,

Channabasava's role in the assembly of Virashaiva saints and the followers of that religion namely, the Anubhavamandapa–was unique. If fact the Anubhavamandapa, which was the very embodiment of the divine vision of Basavanna, proved to be the foundation of the philosophy and principles of the new religion and society. Much of its credit goes to him. Many, including the chairman of the Anubhavamandapa namely Allamaprabhu are full of praise for him:

> What if one is younger or older? Does knowledge differentiate between the young and the old when the primeval force and the one without the beginning were not there, the multitude of the universes had not even taken their shape as yet, you were the only one enlightened, and great to be found in the Phallus, oh, Channabasavanna.

These words have come forth from no less a person than Allamaprabhu, who was virtually renunciation incarnate.

Channabasava's was a multifaceted personality. He in fact succeeded Allamaprabhu to adorn the Chairmanship of the Anubhavamanapa. It goes to his credit that he carried out both the duties of the Mahamane (arrangements regarding boarding, etc. of the Virashaiva saints) and the Anubhavamadapa (forum of religious activities and spiritual discussions) perfectly well. Every one has showered the deepest affection in surnaming him 'the little commander'. Among the Shunyasampadanes, we have one exclusively devoted to Channabasava. In addition to a few works in Telugu and Sanskrit, several works in Kannada have him as the theme.

After the revolution of Kalyana, a huge band of the Virashaiva saranas migrated to Ulive. Ulive has a temple erected in his name. Even to this day, an annual fare is held in his name at this place.

There is no unanimity with regard to his place of birth, and his union with the lord. Some of the epics and inscriptions declare that he lived only for about 24 years.

Channa Basava is one of the best Vacanakaras in Kanada. His signature is 'Kudala Channasangamadeva'. 1503 of his vachanas have come to light. Some of his compositions are very lengthy. Though some of his vachanas revel only in religious processes and practices, quite a few of his vachanas do carry a literary flavour. To cite a few:

"Knowledge means knowing; action means doing; one should not commit adultery with another woman—this is knowledge; conducting one's self according to this dictum is action. If one does not behave so, o! then it is ignorance, mal-acquisition, oh lord Kudala Channasangamadeva".

"How can one become a true worshipper of the Phallus, if one is not devoid of desire and anger, and only revels in the eightfold worship and sixteen observances to please the diety?

"So does this being hanker after land, wealth, and women and one's own nearer and dearer ones, As does a sparrow which takes it for granted that it is its own house while it belongs to some-body else'.

In addition to the vachanas, Channabasava has contributed several other works bearing the titles Karanahasige, Misrarpana, Hiriya Mantragopya, Padamantragopya and Sakilada Vachanagalu. Some other works like Rudrabharata, Meghacakra, Bhuchakra, Janapada Sakila, Kalajnana etc., are also ascribed to him. But their authorship is open to doubt.

Channabasava has attained a venerable place in the history of Virashiva literature by his vacanas and the scriptural works. Though young in age, his acquision of astounding scriptural and religious knowledge lend him to be adored as an ideal by the young and old alike.

M.Ba.

CHANTU MENON. (Malayalam; b. 1847 d. 1900) was born as a member of the Oyyarathu house. His early education had interruptions. He moved about with his father who was a Tahsildar and was frequently transferred from place to place. When his father died, he had not completed his education. However, before long he passed the uncovenanted Civil Service Examination and accepted a job as sixth clerk in the Small Court at Tellicherry. Later he became a Sub-judge, in which capacity he retired. He was awarded the title of Rao Bahadur by the British Government.

Indulekha is Menon's first and great contribution to Malayalam literature and its continued popularity is something unique.

Menon's second novel is Sarada, which gets its name from the heroine. It is an incomplete work. The author published the first eight chapters of the novel in August 1882 with plans to publish the rest before the end of the year. However, he was able to write only three more chapters, which formed part of the book when his son-in-law republished it in 1904.

In Sarada, Chantu Menon throws light on an aspect of the joint Nair family different from that projected in the other novel. It is its inclination to litigation. The novel itself opens with the storm-clouds of such a litigation. There is the return of a man who had years before eloped with a lady from an aristrocratic Nair family. Now he is back to claim his daughter's rights in the family. Sarada is the daughter. When her rights are rejected, litigation becomes inevitable. As the novel is incomplete, it is the unforgettable picture of litigation-minded families and of the vakils, court agents and others who make capital out of such a situation that hold the attention of the reader.

Perhaps, as some critics have pointed out, Chantu Menon's powers as a novelist are more in evidence in this unfinished work from the pages of which there emerge such indelible figures as the unscrupulous Vaithipattar and the court agent who takes amusing liberties in his use of English legal terms.

Two novelists, C. Antappayi (1863-1936) and Payyampallil Gopala Pillai, have completed Sarada but the results are distinctly inferior in quality.

Chantu was a genial personality. His humour is one of the reasons for the popularity of his novels. He was gracious and kindly in picturing human beings. But in his approach to social problems he was serious. The need for reforms in the customs and laws of the major communities in Kerala was badly felt even in the 19th century. The feudal aristorcarcy was crumbling owing to its own contradictions. Suri Nambuthiri symbolises the decadence that had crept into the land-holding Nambuthiri community. The aristocratic Nair families insisted on Nambuthiri alliances for their women. There was also a lesser world of parasites, hangers-on and the sychopants - a shrewd set who fattened themselves on the foibles of the rich. It is such a real world that Chantu Menon has presented with artistic perfection and imaginative insight.

His fame as a novelist has stood the test of time. He is respected as a father-figure in the world of novels.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: K. Raghavan Pillai, Sharadanirupanam (1934); Kunnathu Janardana Menon, Indulakhaniroopanam (1933); Murkothu Kumaran, Rao Bhadur. Chantu Menon O (1933); P.K. Balakrishnan, Chantu Menon, Oru Padhanam (1957); Uloor S. Parameswara Iyer, Kerala Sahitya Charitram, Vol. 5.

K.R.P.

CHAPEKAR, NARAYAN GOVIND (Marathi; b. 1869) was a research scholar and writer on sociological themes in Marathi. Chapekar was born at Bombay. He was educated at various places such as Badlapur, Revadanda and Bombay. He passed his B.A. in 1891 and L.L.B. in 1895. He was a teacher for sometime and practised law for a while. He was appointed as a District Judge in which capacity he worked at various places in Maharashtra. His career as a Chief Judge of erstwhile Aundh State was very much appreciated. He retired in 1940. His writings brought him the reputation as a social thinker of considerable importance. He was executive president of the 'Maharashtra Sahitya Parishad', a pioneer literary institution of Poona for ten years (1927-37). He was also the editor of Maharashtra Sahitya Patrika during this time. He was instrumental in bringing the Sahitya Parishad from Bombay to Poona. He was elected President of the 'All India Marathi Literary Conference' held at Baroda in 1934.

Chapekar started his literary career immediately after his college days. He edited Bana's Harshacharita (1893). As a student of History he was fascinated by the French revolution and a biography of Edmund Burke (1897) was its outcome; his next book Paisa traces monetary dealings as the means of exchange from ancient times. He wanted to write a biography of Dadabhoy Naoroji, on the lines of the biography of Johnson, but Dadabhoy did not respond to his proposal.

Chapekar wrote extensively after his retirement. His motto was 'I write to learn something from society and not to teach or advise'. Gacchivaril Gappa (Talks on the terrace, 1926) provoked a Satyashodhak leader, D.S. Javalkar so much that he filed a suit against him for defamation. Chapekar was acquited by the magistrate of Kalyan. Aamacha Gav: Badlapur (1933) is his magnum opus, which gives copious and minute details of the village life of Badlapur about 45 miles from Bombay. This volume contains 500 closely printed pages replete with information about the village life which will serve as a model to understand any village in India. He refused to write this book in English out of his love for Marathi Rajahkana (grains of dust, 1943) deals with the social behaviours of our countrymen. His extensive research on social and religious matter is reflected in the Vaidik Nibandha (1929). Tarpana (1948) is another such book dealing with Hindu religious rituals. Peshavaichya Savlit (1937) is a book of patient research about the economic and social aspects of Maharashtra during the Peshva regime (1707 to 1818). Chittapavan (1938) traces the history of the Brahmins known as Konkanasths (to which Ranade, Tilak, Gokhale belonged) of Maharashtra. Himalayat (1941) is a book of travels that he undertook in Himalayan regions. Jivankatha (1943) is his autobiography, Nivadak Lekh (selected articles, 1932) in two parts is a collection of articles on social and economic matters, and Sahitya–Samikshan (1935) is a collection of his articles of book-reviews. Chapekar (1940) traces the history of the Brahmins belonging to this family.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: D.D. Wadekar (ed), Chapekar-Samsmriti (Chapekar Commemorations volume), Poona, 1946.

Bh.K.

CHAPPAYA (Rajasthani) is a metrical form based on 'matra' metre and is a combined form of two separate metres 'Rola' and 'Ullala'. Out of its six 'padas', the first four, of twenty four 'matras' each with 'Uati' on eleventh and thirteenth, are of 'Rola' and the rest two of twenty-six or twenty-eight 'matras' each with 'Uati' on fifteenth and eleventh are of 'ullala'. Thus, the total number of 'matra' in the entire metre of six 'padas', is sometimes $24+24+24+24+26+26=148$, while at others 152, there being a difference of two 'matras' in the 'ullala' at times. The long and the short 'matra' sequence in the arrangement of the metre results in seventy one varieties. This exhaustive definition has been provided by Bhanu Kavi in his Chanda Prabhakar (1926) and Adha Kisana (Raghuvarajas Prakasa, 19th century) has supplied us with all the seventy one names and has also explained in detail the technical procedure to find out the serial number of the 'chappaya', as enumerated by him. It is also called a 'matra'–dandaka' metre, being the mixture of two separate ones. Adha Kisana has carried the discussion further and provided another twentytwo forms of this metre with illustrations, as described by the famed prosodist Nagaraja .

The metre has found special favour with the bards who have used it in their panegyric and eulogistic poetry. This is also known as 'Kavitta' though the latter has been described as a separate and prominent metre varying from 31 to 33 letters, extensively used by medieval poets.

The longest poem, composed entirely in 'Chappaya' is the 'Chappaya Satasai' by Nanurama Samskarta. Among the earlier prominent writings, mention may be made of 'Kirtaka Bawami' by Adha Durasa (17th century), 'Kavitta' (Chappaya) by Mayana Bhatts. (16th century) and 'Kairtts' by Alu-ji-Kavia. As a matter of fact the Rajasthani poets have used 'Chappaya' and called it 'Kavitta' in almost all cases. The anthologies known as Prabandha Kosa Prabhandha Chintamani and Puratana Prabandha Sangraha, along with Prabhavaka charita contain a good–number of 'Kavitta' (Chappaya) written during the 13 to 15th centuries.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H.L. Maheshwari, History of Rajasthani Literature. New Delhi 1980. Rawat Saraswat, Adha Durasa, New Delhi 1983.

Raw. S.

CHARAIRONGBA (Manipuri; b. 1672, d. 1709). was the king of Manipur from 1697 to 1709. His reign saw perceptible change of Manipuri society from the original beliefs and customs into those of the Hindus. There was a marked development in architecture and also worship of idols was introduced. There was a flowering of Manipuri literature during his reign. He was well versed in archaic Manipuri language. He was specially credited with the composition of a long poetic work called Leirol giving description of the varieties of the beautiful flowers, mainly orchid in Manipuri.

Manuscripts of the work were found with Pandit Madhop Singh, Thangjam Deva Singh, Pandit Chandra Singh, R.K. Sanahal Singh and N. Khelchandra Singh.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: N. Khelchandra Singh, History of Old Manipuri Literature.

C.M.S.

CHARAJA (Rajasthani) is probably derived from the Sanskrit word 'Charya' which means performance of religious rites and practices, worthy of wandering ascetics, such as meditation, penance, etc. (Sabdartha Chintamani-Sukhananda Nath, Agra, 1864). The Prakrita lexicons mentions 'conduct' and 'religious rituals' as some of its meanings under the word 'Chariya.' Hindi dictionaries also give similar meanings 'conduct', regulated actions–and add one more. 'Sewa'-service is another meaning added by Hindi Sabdasagar Pt. III. 'Charya', according to Rajasthani lexicons stands for prayer to the goddess sung in musical modes. It is of two types. The prayer composed as a call for rescue from ailments and difficulties is styled as 'Chadau' or 'Chodau,' while the other sung in eulogical terms by the devotee is called 'Sighau'. In the Buddhist philosophy of the 'Mahayana' branch, 'Charya' indicates the whole range of practices observed to help, the ultimate goal. In the 'Vajrayana' branch, however, 'Charya' denotes 'Tantrika' performances when some 'padas' were sung which came to be known as 'Charya pada'. These 'padas' form an important part of the literature of Vajrayani Siddhas, along with the 'Dohas', both collectively known as 'Siddha Sahitya'. Some fifty odd 'Charyapada' or 'Charyagiti,' were traced out in Nepal and Tibet. Rahul Sankrityayana has published Hindi transliteration of some 'Charyagitis' from 'Bhota' language. These 'Charyagitis', however, are purely philosophic and no emotional expressions in the way of a prayer are to be seen. The discovery of these charayapadas, however, has led to claims and counter claims about their being the origin of some of the East Indian languages. Though the name might suggest some connection between to two, there is realy none. In fact some scholars even think that the charyagitas might have been the original of many of the modern Indian languages. But charja in Rajasthani has nothing to do with the mystical or linguistic aspects of the charyapadas.

The process by which the 'Charyagiti' sung by the Buddha Siddhas came to be associated with the Rajasthani Charaja sung by the 'Charanas' in praise of their own goddesses, is yet to be investigated. The number of Charajas composed by the Charanas, Rawalas, Rajputas, etc. is unlimited. No major attempt has so far been made to collect them. The Charanas had their own goddesses, women of their own caste who were treated as incarnations of the mother goddess and believed to have possessed supernatural powers. Some of the modern age are still living The. 'Charyas' are sung at their places, while performing routine religious rites in the attached temples. These temples are mostly of the deity-Karani, whose main seat is at Deshnok (Bikaner). The Charajas have, probably been inspired by the prayers available in the sacred texts of the Hindus. A Charaja by Rawal Sangrama (19th) mentions various names of historical Charana women treated as manifestations of the mother goddess. It is on the pattern of Sahasranama (thousand names) of Sanskrit literature. The Rawalas who have often composed Charajas are patronised by the Charanas, and act as priests at these temples A collection of poems in praise of the goddess has been published by Gulaba Bai of Jaipur, under the title Sakti Suyasa which contains Charajas also. Almost every Charni poet has composed some Charajas.

Raw.S.

CHARAKA (Sanskrit; 1st century A.D.) is one of the two ancient authorities in Ayurveda (Indian Medical Science), the other being Sushruta. He was, very probably, the court physician of King Kanishka whose queen he is said to have helped out of a critical condition. His treatise Charakasamhita is the most fundamental, comprehensive and standard work of Ayurveda. In 8 sections (120 chapters) it deals with a variety of medical topics. The sections are called I. Shlokasthana (dealing with miscellaneous topics like origin and tradition of Ayurveda, medical herbs and their properties, diet, senses and elements, ideal physician, longevity, fat, perspiration, medical instrument, diseases and symptoms, swelling, defects of constitution, fasting, etc., blood, soul, six tastes, foods and beverages, vital organs, heart, and so on); II. Nidanasthana (symptoms of 8 major fatal diseases–Fever, Plethora, Leprosy, Consumption, Mania, Epilepsy, Spleen Enlargement, Urinary diseases); III. Vimanasthana (six tastes, digestion, diagnosis, modes of studying medicine, professional etiquette, general pathology); IV. Sharirasthana (anatomy and embryology); V. Indriyasthana (mortology, i.e. colours, smells, tastes, feelings, dreams, omens and all sorts of symptoms and signs prognosticating death); VI. Chikitsasthana (special therapy, i.e. treatment of diseases like Fever, Plethora, etc., Piles, Dysentry, Pallor, Hiccough, Catarrh, Diarrhoea, Vomitting, Erysipelas, Poisoning diseases of the three cavities of head, heart and belly, of generating organs, Paralysis, Flatulency, Gout, etc.); VII. Kalpasthana (general therapy description of properties and classification of some 600 medicines); VIII. Siddhisthana (general therapy, administering medicines by syringes, tubes, etc., restrictions of the uses of emetics, purgatives, enemas, treatment of internal injuries). The work is written in prose. The chapters are generally in the form of lectures by the master sage Punarvasu Atreya in answer to the topic-setting questions of pupil Agnivesha. The format confirms the tradition recorded by Charaka himself: sage Bharadvaja learnt this science enunciated by Lord Brahma from Lord Indra and taught it to compassionate sages who passed it on. Eventually, sage Atreya taught the science to his six pupils–Agnivesha, Bhela, Jatukarna, etc., each of whom composed a medical treatise. Agnivesha's Tantra was known to many ancient commentators. Charaka either revised it or based his work on it. Charaka's work, in its turn, was thoroughly revised by Dridhabala (9th century AD), son of Kapilabala, of Kashmir, who claims to have also added 17 chapters in Sections VI and the entire last two Sections, i.e. 41 chapters or about one third of the entire work.

Charaka commanded such a great reverence that he was considered to be an incarnation of Shesha Naga, and identified with Patanjali. His work deals mainly with medicine, while that of Sushruta treats of surgery. The two together provide the groundwork of Ayurveda. But Charaka is better of the two in accuracy of description, in classification of diseases and in general plan of treatment.

R.N.

CHARANA LITERATURE (Rajasthani) The Charana is a caste or panegyrist bards traditionally engaged in the keeping of genealogies, maintaining of historical and family records and last but not the least, in composing of poems serving as eulogies, timely warnings and censures for their patrons and benefactors. The caste has been blessed with a number of outstanding poets, historians, faithful courtiers and scholars in different walks of life. Traces of Charana poetry are available right from the 10th century. A countless number of Gitas, Duhas, composite works, historical writings, and a variety of other metrical and prose compositions are attributed to them. There has been a constant flow of their writings during the last over six centuries.

The Charanas talk of their mythical origin in company with the 'Gandharvas' and 'Yakshas'. It seems, however that they immigrated from the Middle East, somewhere above the 'Gandhara' (Kandhara) and settled in the Sindha and gradually bifurcated themselves in two branches of which one went straight to the 'Kachha' (Gujarat) and the other advanced towards the desert states of Rajasthan. Since then they are known as 'Kachelsland Maru'. They are 'Sakta' and non-vegetarians like the Rajputs. They have their own dieties who necessarily hail from their own fold. Dozens of such deities are known to have existed who have influenced the course of Rajput history. Karani, who is worshipped at Deshnoka (Bikaner) is the most revered one to them at present.

The literature of the Charanas mainly consists of Dingala Gitas, Duhas and other metrical writings. They have been well versed historians as well. Suryamall, Bamkidasa, Dayaladasa and Syamaladasa are the giants in the field. As poets they mainly composed heroic poems, and secondly those of devotion to gods, and rarely of erotic nature and other kinds. This literature has proved very inspiring to the Rajaputs who fought until death for the honour of their land, religion, women-folk and the oppressed ones. They were honoured by the ruling chiefs by the gift of fiefs, valuable presents and above all by a show of personal respect which heightened their position in the society.

It is true to say that this literature mostly abounds in superficial treatment of the subject and bombastic verbosity of the superlative degree, derived from the age-old traditions of epic and classical literature. Still, there are poets who have shunned the stereotyped motifs and shown originality of thought and style both. Naturally, such instances are always rare even in the great literatures of the world. Moreover, this dogmatic approach was also followed by other contemporary poets, such as the Bhatas, Dhadhis, Sewakas and others including those from the Jain religious fold. But for these limitations it was very much a living and forceful literature, and that was why it played a very important and significant role in shaping and moulding the destiny of this desert land and its heroes.

Raw.S.

CHARANA, REVATADANA KALPITA (Rajasthani; b. 1923). is more known as a popular stage poet. Some of his poems, for example 'Barakha Binani' (the rain-bride) have proved superhits and many a young poet has tried to imitate his style of expression and recitation. An active member of the socialist party and an advocate by profession, Revatadana has naturally injected his specialist convictions in his poems. His publications are as follows: 1. Cheta Manakha (poems), Nehruji nai Olabo (poems) and Dharati ra gita (songs). His poems are primarily concerned with the peasantry. They are also anti-feudal and anti-capitalist. Though coming from a traditional family of bards (Charanas), who have been closely connected with the ruling class of the Rajputas, and have been virtually patronised by them, Revatadana has vehemently opposed them. This change of attitude is perhaps due to the change in the social pattern corresponding to the political change in the Government and of course to the poet's own education. He believes in revolution and talks of bloodshed by the peasants. The background of such poems also reflects the feudal tradition of Rajasthan. Some of his poems are purely romantic and are in sharp contrast to his care for the underfed and downtrodden rural masses. His book Cheta Manakha (wake up, O'man) was first published in 1957, at Jodhpur and second time at Borunda in 1968.

Raw.S.

CHARAN SINGH (Dogri; b. 1941, d.1969) was a Dogri poet. Born into a soldiering Dogra Rajput family, he developed a love for literature while he was still a student in the college at Jammu. He started writing poetry in Dogri, his mother tongue, around 1960. By 1963, he had written sufficient number of poems to publish a thin collection called Jot which was published in 1964. This was a selection of 29 poems made by himself out of his compositions till then. He got the second prize of the J & K Academy for this book. He worked as a school teacher from 1963 to 1966 but his progressive views and radical behaviour lost him his job. He passed his Intermediate examination in 1966 and Joined the J & K Academy office as a senior literary assistant for Dogri. Then he passed his B. A. degree examination and Dogri proficiency examinations. On the night of 22–23 June 1969, he died of electrocution. The great promise that he had shown in the poems of Jot and some other poems published in journals and read at Kavi Sammelans was cut short pre-maturely. J & K Academy of Art, Culture and Languages brought out a volume on him posthumously in 1975, called Kalamkar Charan Singh edited by Ramnath Shastri. It contains 80 poems and ghazals of his. While he was working in the Academy office, he edited two compilations of Dogri folksongs and a volume on the elder Dogri poet Raghunath Singh Samyal titled Kavita Ratna. Besides being a poet, he was also a good and serious prose writer, as shown in his only short story 'Kalpana', his essay on poet Lakhu and the few pages of his personal diary which is remarkable for its self-revelation and excellent prose style.

Charan Singh is considered a significant poet in Dogri because he set new trends. He popularised what is called the poetry of personal intimate expression and experimented with form, using blank verse and free verse according to the requirements of the themes. Although the canvas of his poetry was narrow hopes and frustrations of adolescence, childhood memories and anxieties of daily existence and feeling of helplessness in the face of inevitability of death, the depth of his emotional experience and the genuine honest experssion of this experience command attention. His sensitiveness to nature enables him to weave fresh and charming images in his poems.

Ram.S.

CHARAN SINGH (Punjabi; b. 1891,d. 1935) was a Punjabi poet, novelist, essayist and journalist. His father Suba Singh was a deeply religious man whose personality made strong impact on Charan Singh. Hazara Singh Giani introduced young Charan Singh into the domain of litera ture. After matriculation, in about 1906 Charan Singh joined the staff of Khalsa Samachar weekly and came under the influence of Bhai Vir Singh. Like Dhani Ram 'Chatrik'. In 1907 he published his maiden work, a novel, entitled Sham Sundar. Then he joined the staff of another paper Bir and after some time became its Chief Editor. In 1911, he started a new Punjabi daily named Shahid. He served for some time in the princely states of Nabha and Patiala. Here he came in contact with eminent litterateurs like Bhai Kahn Singh and Giani Gian Singh. In 1922, he started his short-lived paper Jathedar. His real worth as journalist revealed itself in Mauji, a weekly started by him in 1926. He also started a short-lived monthly magazine named Hans. In 1931, he became the president of the newly established Central Punjabi Sabha.
He will also be remembered for his humrous writings both in poetry and fiction. His collections of poetry include Badshahian (Kingdoms), Beparwahian, Shehanshahian (Empires), Arehi Kingre (Celestial Firnges), Rajsi Hulare (Political Swins), and Ishq-Mushk (Love and lust). His humorous short stories are contained in his collection entitled Hasde Hanjoo. His novels include Sham Sundari, Chanchal Murti, Daler Kaur (two parts); Ranjit Kaur and Do Vohtian (Two wives). His humorous essays present a novel character named Baba Waryama in the style of Sir Roger de Coverley of Addison and Steele. Through his multi-sided contribution his bent of mind as a religious and social reformer becomes apparent. There are about two dozen other minor works to his credit including works of translation, fiction, ethics and other such topics. Besides pennames of 'Shahid', and 'Charan', he also used 'Suthra' after the popular poet of the same name, who flourished in the time of the sixth Sikh Guru and composed humorous verses.

S.S.K.

CHARANDAS (Rajasthani; b. 1703, d. 1782) was a medieval Sadhak, Yogi, Bhakta poet, and founder of Suka or Charandasi sect. His domestic name was Ranjitlal. By caste he was a Dhusar; whether Brahmin (Bhargava) or Vaisya, is not firmly known. His father's name was Muralidhar and mother's Kunjodevi. After the death of his father, when he was seven years old, his mother brought him to her father's home at Delhi. He was a life-long celibate. According to him, his Guru (preceptor) was Sukadev, the mythological narrator of Srimad Bhagvata Purana. Sukadev is said to have appeared before him, first at the age of five and then at nineteen at Sukatae alias Sukratal (Muzaffarnagar, U.P.) and initiated him by preaching Srikrishna Mantra. The only moral conclusion we can draw from these episodes is that he deemed Sukadev as his supreme preceptor. Thereafter, upto the age of 33, he performed the Yoga -practice at Delhi. Although he visited Vrindavan and other places yet he made Delhi his permanent abode. He started a 'Vaiṣṇavaite sect known as 'Suka' or 'Charandasi', and named it after his Guru and himself in 1753. He is reported to have been held in high esteem by Mughal Emperor-Muhammad Shah, Aalamgir II, Shah Aalam and the rulers of Jaipur-Sawai Ishwarisinha, Pratpsinha, and even by Nadirshah who invaded India.

He treated every being as a form of God, and made no distinction of caste, creed, sex or position. He accepted and followed Srimad Bhagvat Purana in his entirety. In accordance with the receipient's abilitiy and competence, he preached knowledge, meditation, Yoga and devotion, but his main emphasis was more on 'Navadha-Bhakti' (Devotion of Nine kinds) and in that too on 'Niskam-Prema Bhakti.' The above coupled with narration of 'Lilas' (Divine deeds) of Srikrishna form the main theme of his poems. He believed in incarnation. For him devotion is superior to Yoga; no method is successful without it. The Supreme being is indefinable '(anirvachaniya), but attempt is made to define it as both definable and indefinable (Sagun and Nirgun) both. In fact the conception of God does belong to both but runs beyond them also. Almighty's abode (Dham), Name (Nam), form (Rupa) and deeds (Lila) are eternal. Universe is the manifestation of God. He emphasized purity and virtuousness of actions.

The following are his works: Brajacharita Amariok Akhand Dham Varnan, Dharmajahaj, Gyanswaroday, Astang jog, Panchopanishad, Yogsandehsagar, Brhmagyanasagar, Bhaktisagar, Sabadvarnan (310 padas, to be sung in different musical tunes). Miscellaneous stray 'padas,' 'Kavitta', etc. Jagaran Mahatmaya' and Narrative poems having suffix 'lila' –Sridhar Brahmin, Makhan Chori Mataki, Dan, Kali Nathan, Chir Haran, Chauban, Anurag, Raas, Hori, Gopivirah, Samyog, Beni-gunthan, Kurukshetra and Nasket.

Several editions of his poems have been published from different places under the title Bhakti Sagar (Jaipur-Lucknow), but there is still need for a critical edition. A manuscript dated 1780 said to have been scribed by Satyavadi Ram, a disciple of Ramrup and signed by Charandas, is available (Jaipur).

Of his many disciples, Ramrup and Jagjit have narrated his life in verse during his own time. Some other writers of this tradition are-Akhairam Das, Manmohan Das, Saras Madhuri Sharan and others. Sahajo Bai, Daya Bai and Nupa Bai alias Biba Das were notable saint poetesses. His poems are in mixed language, i.e. Rajasthani, 'Khari Boli' and 'Braja.'

BIBLIOGRAPHY Hiralal Maheshwari, History of Rajasthani Literature. M.L. Menaria, Rajasthani Bhas aur Sahitya.

Hi.M.

CHARCHARI (Rajasthani) is a 'Varnika' metre consisting of four pada of eighteen Varnas each. The 'Yati' should be at the eighth and subsequent tenth varna. Giving this definition, Bhanu Kavi (1926) has also called it 'Vibudhapriya'. While prakrit Paingalam (14th Century) and Raghuvarajasaprakasa (19th Century), agree with the above definition, the Swayambhu chandah (10th Century) defines it as a 'matra' metre with 'yati' on the fourteenth and subsequent twenty second. Rajasekhara, the author of chandah Sekhara (11th Century) gives yet another definition. Krishna Batta (18th Century) in his Vrittamiktavali, has however, supported the earlier one. It was originally a twenty six 'matra' metre, but its association with the dance of the same name, has brought about changes and hence this diference.

It is found frequently used in Kalidasa's Vikramorurvashi. As it was a metre to be sung in accompaniment with a Tala instrument, the 'matra' naturally varied from time to time. Though it was originally a 'matra' metre, it was gradually taken to be a 'varna' one having five 'ganas'.

It was rather a common name for all metres which were later on limited to this very from by the Bhatta poets.

It is one of the earliest classical metres handed down by the Apabhramsha tradition and has been a favourite one to the Jaina poets. Some of the earliest 'Charchari' writings are 'Kalaswarupa Kusala' and 'Upadesha Rasamaya' by Jinadatta Suri (11th Century), 'Jinaprabodha Suri charchari'(13th Century), by Somamuritikavi and 'Jinachandra suri charchari' (13th Century) by Hemabhushana Mani.

Though the metre gradually lost support of the Prabandha Kavya there is a co-ordination in it of the poets, and though it became rather obsolete by its absence in standard works of the language, it gained considerable ground in the folk literature where it existed in the name of 'Chanchar', a dance-cum-play-cum-song, till recently. The 'Brajabhasa' poets have described Krishna variously in this form.

Raw. S.

CHARITA (Maithili) is a long poem on the life and deeds of some eminent heroes or persons of eminence. Late in the nineteenth century some such Charitas were written. The form, however, did not flourish long and is extinct today.

J.M.

CHARITA KAVYA (Rajasthani) is a kind or form of 'Prabandha Kavya'. There is a co-ordination in it of the characteristics of 'Prabandha Kavya', 'Katha-Kavya' and puranic stories. The style of 'Charita Kavya' is of three types–Puranic, Historical and Romantic. Jambhasara by Sahabarama Rahada, is a 'Charita Kavya' of the puranic style which describes in details the life and deeds of Jambhoji, Guna Jodhayana by Gadanapasaita is a work of the historical style describing the heroic deeds of Rav Jodha of Marwad, Madhavanala Kamakandala Chaupai by Kusalalabha is a 'Charita–Kavya' of the romantic style which mainly describes the life and deeds of Madhava. There is a slight difference between 'Katha Kavya' and 'Charita Kavya'. In the 'Charita Kavya' emphasis is laid upon the life and deeds of an individual, while in 'Katha Kavya' the element of story is predominant. In the 'Katha Kavya' there is an independent importance of the story which has sequence of its own, while in the 'Charita Kavya' the story or stories are mainly used only to depict the life of the hero. The Apabharamsa writers, perhaps observed no difference between a 'Katha-Kavya' and a 'Charita-Kavya' but the same is found in the 'Kavyas' written in Rajasthan, for example, Katha Chittoda ki by Kesoji Godara is a Katha–Kavya which also mentions in part the life of Jambhoji alongwith the main story, while in Katha Autara Pata though it is titled as 'katha', is a 'Charita-Kavya' by Vilhoji. The child-life of Jambhoji has been described through the medium of several incidents. From the structural point of view the 'Charita Kavyas' are of two kinds–first, those which are concerned with a special period of the life of the hero, as the above one mentioned by Vilhoji, and such others composed by him; and secondly, those which deal with the entire life of the hero, such as, Katha Autara Pata and Katha Parasidha by Surajanaji which contain the account of the whole life of Jambhoji. Quantitatively, the works dealing with the whole life are both small and big. The two works referred to above of Surajanaji are smaller in comparison with Jambhasara of Sahabarama which is a sufficiently big one. Some of the common traits of Rajasthani 'Charita Kavyas may appear to be those of a biography. But there is a palpable difference between the two as well. The treatment in a charit kavya is more imaginative and the purpose is to build up a hero through the narration. Though in the process many of the biographical traits also get revealed, yet it will be wrong to call it a biography as we understand it today. The following are the general characteristics of a charit kavya.

1. The style is biographical which is more narrative than descriptive; 2. The references to the virtues, deeds and magnitude of the hero are particularly highlighted. 3. Such references also contain the idealistic, super-human and at times supernatural aspects of the life of the hero. 4. The construction is interlinked from the beginning to the end, like that of the ancient stories. 5. The language used is easy and the style simple and pretty attractive for the folk psyche. 6. It is mainly aimed at depicting the noble character of the hero, inspiring the spirit of mass welfare and prompting the readers to do right deeds. 7. It is mainly composed in Duha and 'Chaupai' metres.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Devendra Kumar Jain, Apabarama Bhasa aur Sahitya, Bharatiya Jnanpith, Delhi, 1965.

Hi. M.

CHARITRAHIN (Bengali) is a novel by Saratchandra Chatterji, first published in 1917, as a book. Four years before this, a part of it was published in a magazine named Yamuna. The publication of this novel created an alarming sensation among the members of the Bengali literary public. The theme of Charitrahin (The immoral man) is the unsocial and forbidden love and author's scathing criticism of social prejudices and snobbery and his revaluation of the relations between the sexes. The story centres mainly around two women and two male characters namely Savitri, Kiranmoyee, Satish and Upendra. Savitri, widowed at an early age, has gone through severe hardships in life and is at the time of the story a housemaid in a mess (private lodging). Here Savitri and Satish, a boarder of the mess fall in love with each other. This episode creates a scandal among all Satish's acquaintances, and he leaves the mess. Kiranmoyee is an extremely beautiful woman and also a very remarkable personality. She is very well read and can discuss the nuances of Sanskrit texts. She defies social conventions and laughs at popular beliefs. Upendra is a distant cousin of Satish, and a close friend of Kiranmoyee's husband. He is a chaste and ideal man. Kiranmoyee's is attracted by Upendra's nobleness, and soon after she becomes a widow, she declares to him her love. When Upendra repudiates her love, she decides to avenge herself by hurting him in one of his tenderest spots. She weaves a diabolical plot to seduce Dibakar, who is Upendra's ward and almost like his son. When she succeeds, she discovers that she has found neither satisfaction nor peace. Upendra loses his faithful wife Surabala, and falls seriously ill himself. He, however, realises Savitri's greatness of character, and gives her shelter as his sister. Savitri suffers, as she watches Satish's growing affection for Sarojini. She brings back Dibakar and Kiranmoyee from Arakan. But Kiranmoyee becomes raving mad and Upendra succumbs to his illness. The plot construction, characterisation and diction of Charitrahin vary remarkably from the beginning to the later part of the book. This is probably because of the long interval of time between the author's first writing of the book and later re-writing of it for publishing. The story of Satish and Savitri gets prominence at the beginning of the novel, while in the latter half the author gives all his attention to Kiranmoyee, neglecting Savitri, almost cruelly. A review of Kiranmoyee's character raises doubt about its consistency and naturalness. It is difficult to believe that such extremely different characteristics can be harmonized in one person. We do not find an easy flow of the narrative which is a characteristic of most of Saratchandra's works. The slow moving incidents at the beginning of the novel run too fast at the end. Nevertheless, Charitrahin is one of Saratchandra's best novels from the point of view of both intellectual strength and imaginative daring.

In the title itself Saratchandra has ridiculed our conventional moral codes. Satish is supposed to be a man of easy morals, after whom the novel has been named. But it appears to the reader that the strength and directness of his character touch the heart deeper than the abstract and lifeless idealism of Upendra. The episode of love between Savitri, a poor maid-servant low caste and Satish, a rich Brahmin boy raised a great uproar in the contemporary society; it shows the author's rebellion against social tradition. Charitrahin is a novel in which we find the range and depth of Saratchanda's experience. It offers us a large cross-section of Bengali Society. On the one hand we meet Surabala, the embodiment of an almost devotionally faithful Hindu wife, Sarojini the romantic heroine, and Upendra and the guardian of institution and tradition and on the other, we meet Savitri, who has been exploited by the society. Saratchandra sees the futility and the waste and his deepest sympathies are stirred but he suggests no solution or remedy. On the other hand an element of conservatism is noticeable in his delineation of this character. Savitri must live a loveless and frustrated life, and she also reveals a regard for the tradition that has little or no value. Kiranmoyee is modern almost with a vengeance, with no regard for religion, or tradition. In the portrayal of Kiranmoyee's character, the author's purpose of unveiling the innate hypocrisy of social customs becomes more prominent, resulting in propaganda. On the whole we can say, Charitrahin is a true representative of Saratchandra's genius. It expresses the social awareness by describing with acute observation and detailed analysis the sorrows and sufferings of the oppressed and the descredited in the society. Inspite of the defects in plot construction and characterisation, Saratchandra has remained the most popular writer that Bengal has ever known. And the presence of a profound social consciousness has made Charitrahin one of the best novels written in Bengali. Charitrahin has been translated into English and many Indian languages.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Humayun Kabir, Saratchandra Chatterjee (1963).

Ja.C.

CHARITTAR UPAKHAYAN (Punjabi) is a major portion of the (Dasam Granth 1696). The authenticity of its authorship is a controversial issue. Majority of the scholars uphold the view that a portion of Dasam Granth was written by Guru Gobind Singh–the tenth and the last Guru of the Sikhs–and the remaining portions were composed by his fifty two court poets. The Granth was compiled by Bhai Mani Singh in 1734

For the timely warning of his followers these tales depicting the wiles of women, were included. Their total number is 403 (tale No. 325 being missing and the first being a 'Devi Mangal'). Virtue guarded only by ignorance is never secure. All these stories are used as illustrations for the strange situation created in the first tale. The King Chittar Singh issues orders to get his son killed for molesting his queen–his step mother–but his minister being sure of the innocence of the prince, tries to convince the king of the treachery of the queen by narrating these tales.

All these tales can be divided into four categories, (a) Sex-tales (b) love tales (c) heroic tales and (d) general tales. The first category has the largest number of tales being the main topic.

The second type of love tales also comprise historical romances of Punjab such as Hir Ranjha, Mirza Sahiban, Sohni Mahiwal and alien lovers Yusaf Zulekha.

The heroic tales are of the third category, as the heroic deeds are performed in battles fought in defence of love. The fourth category of general tales is for providing variety and general relief to the reader.

In fact these stories were borrowed from various aviailable sources, but they have been retold with certain modifications.

Their significance lies in their craft–a new pattern of story-telling. The framing story sets the ball rolling and the remaining stories are narrated as illustrations but these maintain an independent character and do not run in cycles as was the previous practice in our oriental works of stories. Moreover, the stress is always on the narrative aspect of the story and its singleness of purpose.

Charittar Upakhayan is a milestone in the evolution of modern Punjabi short story as it represents the end of a tradition and the beginning of a new era.

S.S.U.

CHARUDATTA (Sanskrit). a play in four Acts, is found in the cycle of Bhasa plays. There are reasons to assume that it belongs to the Bhasa group. The unusual prologue suggesting the pre-classical or the old purvaranga mode of introducing a dramatic performance; the similarity of its main theme to that in Bhasa's Avimaraka; scene of night-burglary and the nocturnal adventure of Avimaraka and the tutelary deities invoked in this context; the atmosphere of night and the descriptive verse found in Charudatta, Avimaraka and Balacharita; motive of rain and storm, sleep scene; similarity of dramatic technique, including 'zonal division' of stage for playing simultaneous scenes, etc., are special features of Bhasa's writing.

The story of Charudatta is one of the love between the impoverished Brahmin merchant Charudatta and the professional ganika Vasantasena. Both are in love with each other; but Charudatta is very reticent and Vasantasena, though ready to take the intitiative, is handicapped by the stigma of her profession. Charudatta's poverty, a consequence of his noble generosity, and the social low status of Vasantasena are obvious difficulties in the fulfilment of this love. The king's brother-in-law Shakara also wants Vasantasena for himself and is openly using threatening language against Charudatta who stands in his way.

The astounding similarity of Charudatta to the first four Acts of Mrichchhakatika in point of story, events, characters (except two names: Sajjalaka for Sharvilaka, Brahmani for Dhuta), dialogue and verses, raises a ticklish problem of the mutual relation of the two plays. Devadhar thinks that Charudatta is an abridged version of Mrichchhakatika made especially for turning out 'a pleasing comedy' by omitting violent scenes like the law-suit and the conflict. But this is not convincing. Charudatta, as it stands, is not free from the element of violence. Charudatta has 55 verses for 143 in the corresponding portion of Mrichchhakatika; but 11 verses are altogether new, and they are not 'songs' as supposed. Further, the verses common to the two plays lack smoothness and polish in Charudatta as compared to the verses in Mrichchhakatika. It is no use assuming, for convenience, that the writer who prepared the abridged version as Charudatta was a poor artist. On the contrary, the difference in poetic styles could be better explained on the assumption that Mrichchhakatika is a later and a better version of the Charudatta story.

There are obvious signs in Charudatta of its incompleteness. Vasantasena and Charudatta have met only once (Act 1). Their love may be obvious to others; but they have yet to confess to each other; and for this another meeting is necessary. As the fourth Act closes, Vasantasena is preparing to go out to meet Charudatta; the fulfilment of love is only awaited. Besides, the other motives in the play, like those of Samvahaka, turning a monk, denial of the opportunity to him to serve Vasantasena and repay her obligation, Shakara's threat of physical violence to Charudatta and vengeance on Vasantasena for refusing his offer, Vasantasena's intention of approaching Charudatta as an 'abhisarika', demand a development. The implication is Charudatta must extend beyond four Acts.

Rhetoricians quote from Charudatta. Vamana quotes two verses from Charudatta it and one from Mrichchhakatika. Sagaranandin quotes a verse which obviously has the context of the trial scene but is not found in Mrichchhakatika. It is likely that the lost Daridracharudatta in literary allusions may be the full version of Charudatta.

It is more reasonable to suppose that Charudatta is an incomplete play and that it is the earlier story which finds a better expanded form in Mrichchhakatika.

G.K.B.

CHARYAPADA (Bengali) are the only extant specimens of the earliest stage of any modern language belonging to the Indo-Aryan family of languages. Charyapadas were found in a manuscript discovered by Haraprasad Shastri in the Nepal Darbar Library and were published by him in 1916 under the title Hajar Bachharer Purana Bangla Bhasay Rachita Bauddha Gan O Doha (Buddhist songs and verses written in Bengali thousand years ago). The edition of Shastri contained four books, Charyacharya Vinishchaya, Doha-Kosha of Saroja Vajra and Doha-kosha of Kanhapada and Dakarnava. Shastri thought that all the four books were written in old Bengali but he later realised that all but Charyacharya Vinishchaya were written in the Apabhramsha, the last stage of the Prakrit languages. Few years later Sunitikumar Chatterji put forward strong evidence mostly based on morphological features of the language of the text claiming that the text of the Charyacharya Vinishchaya was written in Bengali. Scholars, however, are not unanimous on the point. It has been claimed by scholars of Oriya, Assamese and Maithili as part of their linguistic and literary history.

The manuscript discovered by Shastri neither contains any date nor the title of the work. Shastri called it Charyacharya Vinishchaya (though according to some scholars it should be Charyashcharya Vinishchaya) on the evidence of Sanskrit commentary on the poems which the manuscript contains. These poems, however, are popularly known as Charyapada or Charyagiti.

The word Charya is the name of a particular type of song. Sangita Ratnakara of Sarngadeva mentions that a class of religious songs with specific metrical and musical features are known as Charyagiti. This word means "practice" and is a part of the religious terminology of the Sahajiyas, a sect of late Buddhism. The poems in the manuscript are songs also, as the names of ragas and talas have been indicated on the top of each verse in the manuscript. These songs were composed by the Siddhacharyas primarily for the benefit of the members of the sect.

It is difficult to ascertain the date of the composition of these songs. However, in all probability they were composed between the tenth and the twelfth century. The manuscript discovered by Shastri is a collection of Charya songs written over two centuries ago with commentaries on them in Sanskrit by Munidatta. The name of the commentator does not occur in the manuscript but is known from a Tibetan translation of the songs as well as of their Sanskrit commentaries. The Charyapada manuscript contains forty-seven songs, one of which is not complete. These forty-seven songs are compositions of more than twenty different poets, most important of whom are Kanhapada, Bhusukupada, Sarahapada and Luipada. Most of the songs are short consisting of ten lines, though some of them are a little longer. Every song has a 'bhanita' (colophon) which contains the name of its author.

The diction in which the Charya songs were written is known as Sandhyabhasha. This is a particular style prevalent among the religious sects in many parts of India. It is a kind of code language current among the esoteric sects which cannot be fully comprehended by the layman not familiar with the doctrines of a given sect and with the technical jargons employed by them. The writers of these songs were known as Siddhacharya (i.e. masters who have attained the spiritual goal). They wrote these songs for a limited audience interested in the mystic practice and the doctrines of Sahaja. Some of the songs are indeed written in the language of allegory and riddle and some are infested with technical words, but some of them are quite simple and straight-forward. The metaphors and images employed in the songs are derived from everyday life and familiar situations and experience. Although the inner meaning of the songs is obscure and abstruse to the common reader, at the surface level there is a vividness and realism in most of them. References are quite frequent to the normal activities of the common people such as the plying of a tiny boat, building a bridge on the river, chess-playing, marriage ceremonies, musical performances, boat-journey and of course, love making. The chief theological concept in these songs is that of Sahaja which is a state where duality is dissolved. S.B. Dasgupta has given an elaborate account of the Sahajiya doctrines in his Obscure Religious Cults of Bengal (1941) and shown very clearly that the Charya songs have evolved out of various Buddhist doctrines and of Tantric and Yogic practices. The chief value of the songs, however, is linguistic, they being the only extant recorded evidence of the early stages of the New Indo-Aryan languages, though they are not altogether devoid of literary value.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Mohammad Sahidulla, Buddhist Mystic Songs, (Dacca, 1960); Nilratan Sen, Charyagitir Chhanda Parichaya, (Kalyani 1974); Prabodhchandra Bagchi and Shanti Bhikshu, (ed.) Charyagiti-Kosha (Santiniketan, 1956); S.K. Chatterjee, The Origin and Development of the Bengali language, (Calcutta, 1926); Subhadara Jha, The Formation of the Maithili Language, (London 1958); Sukumar Sen, Charyagiti Padavali, (Burdwan, 1966); T.P. Mukherjee, The Old Bengali Language and Text, (Calcutta, 1963).

S.D.

CHARYAPADA (Maithili) or 'Charyapada Vinishchaya' of Siddhas was composed during the period between 8th century 11th century. It is considered to be the oldest specimen of literature in Maithili. Harprasad Shastri discovered the text in Nepal in 1907. On the grounds of its thoughts, sentiments, language, grammar, phonetics and wordings it appears to be a composition in Maithili, for it contains the true picture of the social, cultural and political life of that time. This also contains the description of agriculture and particularly the importance of family, marriage and local ways, etc. This book also tried to explain the philosophical truth and religious obligations in the language of the common men. It is also very important so far as 'kavya tattva' is concerned. It deals also with the sex in its so many padas which are melodious in tone. Its symbolic language is also known as 'sandhyabhasha', a language which is musical and somewhat obscure to the modern reader.

B.

CHARYAPADA (Oriya). The origin of the Oriya literature can be traced to Bauddha Gan O Doha, otherwise known as Charyapada written by the Buddhist Siddhas. The verses written by Kanhu Pa, Lui Pa and other Siddhas have been claimed to be the earliest specimens of Oriya literature.

Mystic experiences as well as Buddhist religious principles and practices are allegorically expressed through these dohas or songs. Naturally for a common reader it becomes difficult to grasp the inner meaning of these poems. The apparent meaning would rather be misleading because the dohas outwardly appear to talk about this ordinary day-to-day material world. But it is the inner philosophical meaning which really matters in them along with the suggestions of deep religious experience and profound spiritual realisation. The language being close to Prakrit is not always very clear to the modern reader.

It is naturally presumed that these songs were written during the period when Buddhism as a religion was dominating India and the Prakrit-Apabhramsha language was the main vehicle of expression. For the first time an anthology of such songs was discovered from Nepal in 1907, by Haraprasad Shastri. A portion of this anthology known as Charyacharya Binishchaya or Ashcharya Charyachaya is called Charyapada. It contains fifty songs of twenty three poets that reflect the principle of Bajrajana school or Tantric procedure of the Buddhist kind.

According to Karunakar Kar, who had edited Ashcharya Charyachaya in Oriya, Orissa was the land of origin of the Bajrajana school of Buddishm which for the first time introduced the worship of Female Principle in Buddhism. This resulted in the worship of goddesses, like Matri Dakini and the practice of Kaya Sadhana. From available evidence it has been ascertained that the great Buddhist saints and scholars like Indrabhuti, Laxminkara and Padmasambhava were born in Orissa. In the lyrics of the Charyapada the ideas and the experience of Kaya Sadhana and worship of Shakti (Female Principle) introduced by the Adi Siddhas, found poetic expression. These were in fact the first manifestations of literary activities in Prakrit and Apabhramsha.

The language of these songs is of mixed type exhibiting the form of Prakrit-Apabhramsha current in the eastern region of India at that time. Hence it is presumed that its authors also belonged to this area and flourished between the 8th and 11th century. Among these poets a few were also resident of the land now named as Orissa, and propagated their religion there. Subsequently we also get the references related to these poets in the religious literature of Orissa. The impact of the thought and styles of these songs on Oriya lyrics of the early phase of Oriya literature is quite evident in the devotional songs of the celebrated group of five saint-poets of the 16th century, popularly known as Panchasakha poets.

According to Pandit Suryanarayana Das, the literary historian, the Buddhist saint-poets like Sarah Pad, Birupa Pad, Kanhu Pad, Bhisuku Pad (Shanti Dev) belonged to Orissa which was then known as the Uddian Peetha in the contemporary Buddhist literature. Some of them attained perfection through Sadhana (religious practice) in different Tantric centres of Orissa and went abroad for propagating the faith. According to Rahul Sankritayana's account, Lui Pa, Dari Pa and Kambal Pa were the inhabitants of Orissa. Ragnyee, the birth place of Saraha, has been identified as modern Ranipur (Jharial) in the district of Bolangir in western Orissa. This was an ancient Tantric centre of historical importance and contained many Buddhist monuments. Bhisuku or Shanti Dev, it has been ascertained, was born in Jaher, in today's Keonjhar district in Orissa. Saher or Sambar known as the place of meditatopm of Indrabhuti, Lakshminkara and Padmasambhaba has been identified as the geographical zone of modern Bolangir and Sambalpur districits of Orissa. The centre of religious activities of Lui Pa was Mayurbhanj, a district in Orissa. A village named after him is still to be seen there and the worship of Lui Pa is performed in this area.

In the social tradition of Orissa the memory of a few poets of Charyas may be traced. The names of Hadi Pa, Kanhu Pa, Tanti Pa, Chouranginath, Gorakhanath, Maschendranath or Lui Pa are well-known among the saints of Natha sect in Orissa. Hadi Pa and Kanhu Pa have been mentioned in Govinda-chandra tika of Yashovanta Das of the 14th century. We find clear references to Gorakhanath in the Mahabharata of Sarala Das (15th century) and in Shunya Samhita of Achyutananda Das (16th century). A sacred place devoted to Gorakhanath is to be found in Cuttack district in Orissa.

The metres or Ragas such as Guzari, Patta Manjari, Kamod, Baradi, Ramakri (Ramakeri), Dhanasi (Dhanashri), Desakha, Malashri, Bhairavi, etc. used in the Charyas have also been widely used in the poems of the ancient and medieval poets of Orissa. Of course, in Oriya poetry the patterns of the said Ragas are different.

When we consider the linguistic aspects in respect of vocabulary, inflection, pronoun, verbal form, vocation and syntax of the Charya songs they appear to be quite close to the modern Oriya language. According to Suryanarayan Das, one hundred and twenty five words in total, including nouns, adjectives, pronouns and verbs, are found in the Charya songs, which are basically Oriya words. Thus the Charyapada poems, or at least a number of them are considered by scholars as providing some of the earliest specimens of Oriya literature both in its use of language as well as in the direction of the content.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: B. Acharya, Oriya Sahityara Sankhipta Parichaya., K. Mohapatra, Charya Gitika, S. Mohanty, Oriya Sahityara Adiparva., S.N. Das, Oriya Sahityara Itihas.

J.B.M.

CHASMADITH GAWAHA (Rajasthani) is a collection of 16 short stories written by Mool Chand 'Pranesh' of Bikaner. The Sahitya Akademi, gave the award on this work in 1982. Earlier to its publication in 1980 by the Rajasthani Bhasha Sahitya Sangam (Academy), Bikaner, the author had published one such collection under the title Ukalata Antara Sila Sansa (1973). All the stories of his award winning book carry a strictly rural perspective. The problems raised by the author are also more concerned with those who live in villages. Some of them are adulteration in food articles, curse of unplanned child-births, lack of medical facilities, dearth of employment, vice of dowry, rumour-mongerings, superstitions, rape and murder in a government hospital, bride-burning by the mother-in-law, corruption in elections, woman's revenge on her lover, mis-matched marriages, miracle of sex, corrupt police officals, true spirit of a Rajputa, etc.

In his introductory statement in the book the author speaks of his personal knowledge of the facts contained in the stories. A number of these problems are still faced by the rural masses. It is but natural for an author to talk of the society around him, sympathise with them in their sorrows and work for their welfare, 'Pranesh' has been very much alive to this fundamental principle of literary creation. Though none of the problems is new to us, nevertheless, they demand active attention of all right-thinking people, and certainly of the litterateurs. The use of language, phraseology, maxims and sayings is suitable to the characters, and the style of expression and that of the dialogues is perfectly normal and natural. At places he has used original Sanskrit words for want of better synonyms in the common parlance.

The overall structural compactness and weaving of the plots and events conform to artistic standards. Still, there is much to be achieved in the craft of story telling and in fathoming the depths of the inner self as a motivating factor for physical actions.

Raw.S.

CHATHUKKUTTY MANNADIAR, CHAMPATHIL (Malayalam; b. 1857, d. 1907) was a scholar and a translator of Sanskrit plays. His literary work spanned the last decades of the 19th century and the early decades of the twentieth. He was a lawyer by profession and had most of his practice in Trichur in the former Cochin State.

Mannadiar has few works to his credit. His fame rests mostly on his translation (1882) of Bhavabhuti's Sanskrit drama Uttararamacharitam into Malayalam. Critics have gone to the extent of opining that the translation excels the original. His other works are translations of Janakipar- inayam (The Marriage of Janaki, 2nd edition, 1901) and Halasyamahatmyam a play, as a Kilippattu of the Sanskrit work of the same name.

K.R.P.

CHATTERJEE, BANKIMCHANDRA (Bengali; b. 1838, d. 1894) is acknowledged to be one of the greatest novelists in Bengali literature. He was the third son of Jadavchandra Chatterji, who was a Deputy Collector. His three brothers, Shyamacharan, Sanjibchandra and Purnachandra were all highly educated and connected with literary activities.

Bankimchandra had his early education in his village primary school and later on, he was admitted into the Hooghly College and studied there for seven years. He proved his proficiency as a student by winning many prizes in his college career. While studying in the college he began writing poems and prose pieces in Sambad Prabhakar, a periodical edited by Ishwarchandra Gupta. From Hooghly College he took a transfer to Presidency College for studying law. In 1858 he appeared in the B.A. examination from that college and stood first by obtaining the highest marks in the aggregate. He and his classmate Jadunath Basu were the first graduates of the Calcutta University.

After his graduation Bankimchandra was appointed Deputy Magistrate and Collector, Jessore. While in service he passed the B.L. examination with credit in 1869. For long thirty three years he was in service and was posted in different places of Bengal where he gathered valuable experience of the land and the people. While posted in Jessore he came in contact with Dinabandhu Mitra, the foremost dramatist of the time and both were intimate friends in no time. His first wife died in 1859 and he married for the second time Rajlakshmi Devi who was a life-long partner to her husband.

The first noteworthy contribution of Bankimchandra was a serial novel in English named Rajmohan's Wife in the Indian Field, edited by Kisorychand Mitra. But he was not satisfied with his writings in English and switched over to his mother tongue and wrote his epoch-making first historical romance named Durgeshnandini (1865). His second romance Kapalkundala (1866) deals with the mysteries of the mind of a woman brought up in the midst of virgin nature far away from human society. Bankimchandra stormed the literary field by his sweep of imagination, vastness of vision, master craftsmanship and superb power of characterisation. His third work Mrinalini (1869) bears first traces of his patriotism. When he was posted at Berhampore he contributed English articles on religion, philosophy, history and literature to various contemporary journals.

The second phase of his literary career began at Berhampore with the publication of the monthly journal Bangadarshan (1872) under his editorship, around which a galaxy of literary talents assembled enriching the paper with their valuable contributions. As the editor of Bangadarshan Bankimchandra took upon himself the dual task of writing his original stories and novels and preventing the trash writings of his petty contemporaries by his ruthless criticism. Bishbriksha (1873) is the first social novel dealing with the widow problem. Indira (1873) and Jugalanguriya (1874) are stories though having subject matters proper to novels. So also is Radharani. Chandrashekhar (1875) based on a historical theme is mainly a tragedy of two lives passionately in love with each other but torn asunder by fate and social morality. Rajani (1877) inspired by The Last Days of Pompeii of Lord Lytton is a blend of a romance and a novel–the main plot is a romance with a happy ending but the sub-plot is based on the tragedy of unrequited love. Krishnakanter Will (1878), perhaps the most realistic of his social novels, is based on socially inhibited love of a widow and its grim tragedy. His best humorous work is Kamalakanter Daptar (1875), later enlarged as Kamalakanta (1885); a collection of satirical essays named Lokrahasya (1874) and the scientific essays collected in Bijnanrahasya were all first published in Bangadarshan.

The last phase of his literary career is marked by his approach to a synthesis of religion and nationalism. Rajsimha (1882) is perhaps the only true historical novel. Anandamath (1884) is a soul-stirring novel where Bankimchandra has presented the Vandemataram song. The plot is based on the Sannyasi rebellion that erupted in North Bengal in 1773. Chatterjee gives it an interesting politico-religious twist. Devi Chaudhurani (1884) is a glorious testimony to the valour and prowess of unfettered womanhood and Sitaram (1887) is a tragedy of unbridled passsion. Bankimchandra wrote many famous essays during this period. Vividha Prabandha (1887) is a collection of essays on various subjects. Krishna Charitra (1886) is a scholarly study of the historicity of the life of the Lord Sri Krishna and Dharmatattva (1888) is an exposition of Bankimchandra's concept of religion.

The last years of Bankimchandra were spent in Calcutta. He purchased a house in central Calcutta which became a meeting place of the leading litterateurs of his time. He was nominated a member of the Calcutta University Senate, associated with academic bodies and edited text books and Selections.

Bankimchandra is really the father of the Bengali novel besides being also a forerunner in the field of literary criticism and intellectual exploration. Before him there were stories and sketches, but it was only he who introduced the modern novel on the western model and developed this art to perfection. He wrote romances based on the past history, showed perfect mastery over the structure of plot which unfolded the quick course of events to an inexorable finish engulfing a lot of people who were involved in life's problems, who fought, suffered and proceeded towards the inevitable end. His characters are strong, brave and relentless; they wage dauntless war against the external adversaries but are subject to an intense inward stuggle. Their greatness and their fall arouse our awe and wonder. Their tragedy has something almost like the tragedy of Shakespearean characters. Though a novelist par excellence he had the genius of a dramatist and a poet. Like a dramatist he created dramatic situations, tense and exciting and made the characters always acting, moving, fighting and suffering. Like a poet he soared high on the wings of imagination and portrayed nature's beauty in full splendour and glory. He painted human beauty in all its exquisite details like an absorbed artist. His literary style is inimitable with rich vocabulary, colourful description, exquisite images and enthralling music.

Bankimchandra did not believe in art for art's sake. As a true artist, he showed the bright side as well as the dark side of human nature; the good and the evil interested him equally, but he was essentially an upholder of social morality. In his later novels he preached the religious ideals of the Gita and held aloft the banner of staunch nationalism. He had a fine sense of refined humour but he was at his best in going deep into the tragic aspects of life. In the last phase of his literary activity he was more of a critic than a creative writer. In the later years he devoted his attention to the study of religion and philosophy. He had his own idea about religion. To him the best religion was humanitarianism.

Bankimchandra's novels were dramatised and produced on the stage with phenomenal success. Almost all his novels have been translated into the major Indian languages and also into English, German and other foreign languages.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Akshaykumar Dattagupta, Bankimchandra; Brajendranath Banerjee and Sajanikanta Das (Sahitya Sadhak Charitmala), Bankimchandra Chattopadhyay; Sachishchandra Chattopadhyay, Bankim Jibani; Srikumar Banerjee, Banga Sahitye Upanyaser Dhara; Subodhchandra Sengupta, Bankimchandra.

Aj.G.

CHATTERJEE, BIRENDRA (Bengali; b. 1920) studied in Calcutta but did not complete graduation. He earned his reputation as a translator. A believer in revolutionary socialism, he was in gaol (1967) for his political ideology. He has been writing poems since 1940 and has published about 30 books and booklets of original poems and translation. Some of his better known works are Ranur Janya, Lakhindar, Jatak, Amar Raja Howar Spardha, Visa Officer Samme, Rastay Hente Jai, and Mahaprithivir Kavita (translated work), etc. He was awarded Rabindra Puraskar in 1982.

Birendra has his own way of looking at things; it is sarcastic, melancholy and angry. Impatient and frustrated, he is too conscious of the socio-political malady to lose himself in conventional romanticism but at the same time a spirit of broad humanism never fails him. He appears to have received inspiration from his elders like Bishnu Dey and Samar Sen but has evolved his own style of unconventional use of words and imagery with a slant towards subdued lyricism.

FURTHER WORKS: Birendra Chattopadhyayer Shreshtha Kavita (2nd edn. Calcutta 1980).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Nirmal Ghosh (ed.), Studies in Modern Bengali Poetry (Calcutta, 1968).

B.D.

CHATTERJEE, HARINDRANATH (English; b. 1898), the younger brother of the noted Indo-English poet, Sarojini Naidu, and husband of Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya, the noted freedom fighter and social worker, Harindranath has been interested in diverse fields including poetry, drama, films, music and painting, and was a member of the Rajya Sabha for some time. Far more prolific than his better known sister, Harindranath has, during a poetic career spread over more than half a century, published numerous volumes of verse including The Feast of Youth (1918), The Magic Tree (1922), Blood of Stones (1944), Spring in Winter (1955) and Virgins and Vineyards (1967). Essentially a romantic lyricist, his occasional attempts at the long poem and the sonnet sequence have not perhaps been very successful. His themes are the staple of all romantic poetry—nostalgia, melancholy, passion for beauty, the changing moods of love, idealism and humanitarian compassion (which in his later verse takes on Marxian overtones). Full of direct echoes from the British romantics, his verse, unlike that of his sister, seems to find an individual voice only occasionally. Less of a singer than his sister, he is however capable of greater trenchancy of expression and can also surprise us with a sudden flash of wit. His later verse is more bare, and shows an increasing capacity for abstract thought.

Among Harindranath's equally numerous play are Abu Hassan (1918, a light fantasy), brief verse plays dealing with the lives of saints like Tukaram and Pundalik (1977) etc., short prose plays expressive of socialistic sympathies like The Window and The Sentry's Lantern Kannappan or The Hunter of Kalahasti, a lyric play and Siddhartha–Man of Peace, a rather long play on the Buddha's life in prose and verse. While the verse plays are mostly dramatic poetry rather than poetic drama proper, the prose plays are marked by a somewhat single symbolism and tend towards propaganda, though they have their moments of dramatic tension. His Life and Myself (1948) is a delightful, though partial autobiography.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: G.S. Balarama Gupta: The Plays of Harindranath Chattopadhyaya K.R. Srinivasa Iyengar: Indian Writing in English, Bombay, 1972. P.C. Kotoky : Indo-English Poetry (Gauhati, 1969).

M.K.N.

CHATTERJEE, KAMAKSHIPRASAD (Bengali; b. 1917, d. 1976) was a well known writer in modern Bengali prose and poetry as well as juvenile literature. Kamakshiprasad came from a highly educated and established family of Calcutta. Ramananda Chattopadhyaya–the famous editor of the Prabasi and Modern Review, two prestigious journals of early 20th century–belonged to the same family. Kamakshiprasad graduated from Presidency College, Calcutta with English honours in 1937, obtaining the Bankimchandra Gold Medal for having stood first in Bengali. He passed M.A. in English in 1939.

Kamakshiprasad showed literary tendencies since childhood. His first poem was published when he was twelve years of age; and he stood first in a story-writing competition in 1935. He joined the Kavita group of poets, centred round the famous poetry-journal Kavita edited by Buddhadev Basu and was an established writer by 1937. Eminent persons in the fields of art and literature, such as Buddhadev Basu, Amiya Chakrabarty, Abu Sayeed Ayub, Bishnu De, Sudhindranath Dutta, Samar Sen, Subhash Mukhopadhyaya, Jamini Ray and Lindsay Emerson met regularly at his house. Kamakshiprasad joined the Railways in 1940 and left it in 1943 to join the Press Syndicate. He was India's delegate to the P.E.N. Conference in Venice in 1949 and delivered a talk on modern poetry. This gave him an opportunity to visit different European countries. He joined Damodar Valley Corporation as the Public Relations Officer in 1952. He had a keen interest in photography from an early age and made a documentary film on the activities of D.V.C. in 1954. He was then selected by the Government of India and Soviet Union as a translator and went to Moscow in 1956. After returning from the USSR in 1960 he worked for Indian Satistical Institute as a Publication Director for three years and for the rest of his life took only to writing and translating.

Kamakshiprasad's poems reveal a social consciousness and an optimistic view of life. His language is lucid but equally capable of expressing the twists of the complicated modern life. Of his various prose-writings, he is specially known for children's literature. His books of verses are Shabari (The Night, 1937); Mainak (1940); Shibir (The Camp, 1942); Sonar Kapat (The Golden Door, 1942); Rajdhanir Tandra (The Dozing of the Capital, 1943); Eka (Alone, 1948) and Mayalu Sinri (The Magic Stairs, 1966). Chhatubabur Chhata (The Umbrella of Chhatubabu, 1943); Ghanashyamer Ghora (The Horse of Ghanashyam, Chhotader Shreshtha Ga lpa (Best Stories for Children, 1955) and Buri Pinpra (The Aged Ant, posthumously published in 1977) are written for Children. Some of his other books are Shmashane Basanta (The Spring in the Graveyard, 1938), Kanamachhi (The Blind Fly, 1944), Paruldi (The Sister Parul, 1944), Purbaranga. Jaal (The Net), and Shwet Chakra (The White Circle), are detective novels. Mahatma (The Great Man, 1948) is a collection of biographies and Haldi Jharna (The Yellow Fountain, 1964) is an essay-collection. Some of his translated books are Emiler Goyenda Kahini (The Detective Story of Emil, 1969), Alokstambha Rakshi (The Lighthouse-keeper), Amader Samaykar Nayak (The Hero of our Times) and Kennedy (1969). He also edited some periodicals like Kishor (The Teenagers), Rangmashal (The Coloured Torch), Sanket (The Suggestions), etc.

Kamakshiprasad was awarded the Ananda Puraskar by the Anandabazar Group of Publications in 1965 and Sudhirchandra Puraskar for juvenile literature by Mouchak–a periodical for children in 1971.

Su.C.

CHATTERJEE, NRIPENDRAKRISHNA (Bengali; b. 1902, d. 1963) was originally a resident of Joynagar, in the District of 24 Parganas, West Bengal. His father, Atulkrishna Chatterjee, the Headmaster of Santipur Girls' School was a man of literary taste. His influence on his second son was great. Chatterjee had a strong aesthetic sense, at the age of twenty one through Nazrul Islam and Pabitra Gangopadhyay he came in contact with Kallol, a famous literary monthly journal. He was a regular writer of Kallol and within a short time he with other Kallolians proclaimed that a new era had dawned in Bengali literature. He was a widely read man on the different branches of foreign literature and tried to infuse new and refreshing ideas into Bengali literature. 'Kahini', 'Rush Sahitya O Tarun Bangali', 'Vanaspatir Mrityu', Bangla Sahityer Katha', 'Noguchi', 'Thomas Hardy', 'Shelley', 'Jyotirindranath', 'Nritya Kare Nataraj' etc. were some of his articles published in Kallol.

He was an able translator and played an important role in translating into Bengali some of the best books of the world. He wrote articles on religion, history and science. He thought seriously for children and wrote Chhotoder Ramayana, Chhotoder Mahabharata and the encyclopaedic book Viswakosha in 14 volumes for them.

He was the editor of Galpabharati for a few years. He was connected with Akasvani Centre, Calcutta for a long time, and was the founder of its Vidyarthi Mandal and Palli Mangal Asar.

He was also associated with Bengali film-world and was the director of several films and wrote the screen play of many famous stories and novels for this purpose. Garmil, Harano Sur, Chaoa Paoa, Nilachale Mahaprabhu, Rani Rasmoni and almost all of Saratchandra's books were adapted by him for the cinema. His original books are few but translated books are many. Mahiyasi Mahila, San Yat Sen, Satabdir Surya, Natun Yuger Natun Manus, are his original works. Ma (Gorki), Shakespearer Comedy, Shakespearer Tragedy, Mulkraj Anand's Kuli, Duti Pata Ekti Kunri, H.G. Wellser Galpa, Gitagobinda are some of his translations.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Achintya Sengupta, Kallol Yug; Jibendra Sinha Roy, Kalloler Kal.

Du.M.

CHATTERJEE, RAMANANDA (Bengali; b. 1865, d. 1943) was an eminent Bengali journalist. A distinguished student in schools in Bankura and colleges in Calcutta, he graduated with honours in English. Refusing state scholarship for studying abroad, he took up honorary teaching in City College and took M.A. from Calcutta University. He was absorbed on the teaching staff of City College in 1890, became Principal, Kayastha College, Allahabad in 1895. He left the college in 1906 and Allahabad in 1908 and came back to Calcutta and took up journalism in full vigour. Chatterjee got attracted to Brahmoism through his contacts with teachers in schools and colleges and took interest in physical exercises. He was a keen observer of national politics since his college days.

Chatterjee dabbled in journalism in early life. During school days, he got his letters published in weekly Sanjibani magazine. While he was an honorary lecturer in City College, he became an honorary assistant editor of Indian Messenger, the Brahmo weekly mouthpiece, edited by Herambachandra Maitra. At the same time, he contributed editorial notes to Indian Mirror. He began writing also for the weekly Bengali Magazine, Sanjibani, edited by Krishnakumar Mitra (1889-90). He started writing for Dharmabandhu, a monthly edited by Sasibhusan Basu and later became its editor (1890) for one year. He took up the editorship of Dasi (1892-1896), the monthly mouthpiece of Dasasram, a secular institution established that year to help destitutes. At Allahabad Chatterjee took up editing the English monthly, Kayastha Samachar (July 1899–June 1900), later converted into Hindustan Review under the editorship of Sachhidananda.

The first major monthly magazine in Bengali edited by him at Allahabad was Pradip (1897–1901). Prabasi which appeared in April, 1901 was the leading monthly Bengali magazine which he edited till his death. The first issue had to be reprinted immediately after its publication because of its popularity. Modern Review, the English monthly magazine, appeared in January 1907, which also he edited till death. Modern Review and its editor got noticed in Review of Reviews edited by W.T. Stead (January 1909).

The intellectual seriousness, editorial sobriety, literary taste, passionate involvement with national politics were the high watermarks of magazines edited by him. He was the first to print in magazines paintings in colour which was considered to be a major factor to bring Abanindranath Tagore into limelight, with the help of Sister Nivedita. He also earned the distinction of timely publication of his magazines and paying honoraria to writers. Prabasi used to carry the scientific articles with sketches by Jagadishchandra Basu. The first novel published in it was Tagore's masterpiece, Gora (1908). Jogeshchandra Ray Vidyanidhi initiated reforms of Bengali script through Prabasi (1909). Tagore started the English translation of Gitanjali in Modern Review.

He attended Indian National Congress, Calcutta (1886) and continued to be its ardent follower and commentator throughout his life. He initiated educational reforms at Allahabad University. Along with Madanmohan Malaviya, he took part in social reforms at Allahabad, where he conducted orphanage, championed temperance, and served the plague-stricken people. He participated in the Swadesi Movement in Bengal (1905). He viewed with sympathy the terrorist activities and became suspect in the eyes of the Government. Chatterjee contributed to and edited three volumes of Towards Home-Rule (1917-18). He was invited by the League of Nations (1926) to observe its activities, but he travelled on his own all over Europe. He was arrested and convicted (1929) for publishing India in Bondage, Her Right to Freedom, by J.T. Sunderlal. He presided over All-India Hindu Mahasabha session at Surat (1929), and the first Congress Nationalist Conference at Bombay (1934).

Ni.G.

CHATTERJEE, SANJIBCHANDRA (Bengali; b. 1834, d. 1889) was the elder brother of Bankimchandra Chatterjee, the famous Bengali novelist. Sanjibchandra started his education in Midnapur, where his father was a Deputy Collector. Later he took admission in Hooghly College, but could not complete his studies. He then started working as a clerk in the Commissioner's office of Burdwan. It was here that he started his literary career by writing a book in English entitled Bengali Ryots–Their rights and liabilities in 1864. The book was highly appreciated by the public as also by some Englishmen holding government posts. It is said that the Lieutenant Governor was so impressed with it, that he offered Sanjibchandra, the post of Deputy Magistrate which he accepted. In course of his duties Sanjibchandra was posted in Palamou. Polamou, then, was a wild hilly place near Hazaribag, inhabitated only by the kol-tribe. Sanjib Chandra could not stay there for long, but experience thus gained has been recorded in a small travelogue called Palamou (1880-1882). It is divided into six chapters which is written in the style of personal essay, with the element of short story fused into them. This book has been described by many as one of the most delightful books on travels in Bengali. Sanjibchandra today is known only as the writer of this book, though he has many other books to his credit. Sanjibchandra describes the scenic beauty of hills and forests, and narrates the religious and social ceremonies of the kol-tribe in detail, in a lucid and humorous language. In 1874, Sanjibchandra started a Bengali monthly Bhramar; he used to write almost the entire magazine himself. From 1877 to 1882 Sanjibchandra edited the most famous literary magazine of the 19th century Bengal, Bangadarsan. Rameshwarer Adrishta (the destiny of Rameshwar) which was first published in Bharmar and as a book in 1877 could be aptly described as one of the precursors of short story in Bengali. In 1887, by collecting materials from old records kept in the court, he wrote a book Jal Pratap Chand (false Pratap Chand) based on true court proceedings. His interest in science is reflected in his long essay Jaibiktattva which deals with genetics.

FURTHER WORKS: Jatra Samalochana (1875), Kanthamala (1877), Satkar (1881), Balyabibaha (1882), Madhavilata (1885).

Ja.C.

CHATTERJEE, SARATCHANDRA (Bengali; b. 1876, d. 1938) is one of the most eminent Bengali novelists whose popularity continues unabated not only among Bengali readers, but also among those in other parts of India through the numerous translations of his books available in various Indian languages. Born in a poor Brahmin family, he had his initial schooling at the Hooghly Branch School at Debanandapur. His father, Motilal, later moved to Bhagalpur, a district town in Bihar, where Motilal's father-in-law was living. From here, Saratchandra passed the Entrance examination in 1894, and joined the T.N. Jubilee College. But he could not continue his education because of financial difficulties. He then chose the life of a wanderer, drifting from one place to another, moving around with strange people–an experience which shaped the situations and characters in his short stories and novels which he had started writing at an early age.

After a stint as an employee in the Boneliraj Estate, Saratchandra left home at the age of 24 and roamed around as a sannyasin for sometime. During his wanderings, he reached Muzaffarpur in Bihar, where a local zamindar, Mahadev Sahu, took him under his patronage after having heard about his reputation as a musician. Saratchandra left Muzaffarpur on hearing about his father's death. He came to Calcutta to take up a translator's job, which he gave up after six months. In 1903, he sailed for Burma, where he spent thirteen years moving from one odd job to another to finally end up as a clerk in the office of the Accountant General in Rangoon. In the meantime he married Santi Devi. But the wife and their only child died in Burma when a plague swept the country. Saratchandra later came to Calcutta, met a daughter of a poor Brahmin lady called Hiranmoyi Devi, took her back to Burma and she became his second wife.

In the course of all these travels and adventures, Saratchandra kept on writing, drawing relentlessly on the breadth and variety of his experiences of the various segments of society, particularly of those of the 'lower depths'. A short story called 'Mandir' (Temple) was one of his earliest writings to be published. Submitted in the name of Surendranath Gangopadhyaya (his maternal uncle), it received the Kuntalin prize (instituted by an enterprising Bengali businessman Hemendramohan Bose). Later in 1907, the Bengali literary magazine Bharati published his Baradidi (Elder Sister)–an impressively restrained account of a quiet romance between a private tutor and the widowed elder sister of his pupil, the manuscript of which was left behind by Saratchandra in Bhagalpur before his departure for Burma, and was recovered by an old friend of his. Its publication immediately made him famous and gained him plaudits from critics.

From 1912 onwards (when he was still living in Burma), Saratchandra's short stories and novels started coming out in well-known Bengali magazines like Yamuna, Bharatvarsha, Bangabani, Narayan, Basumati and Bichitra. In 1913, he resigned his job in Burma and returned to Calcutta to devote himself entirely to writing. Here, a life-long association was built up with the publishing firm, Gurudas Chatterjee and Sons, which brought out most of his novels and collections of short stories. Of the fifty odd works of fiction that he wrote during his life time, the four volumes of Srikanta could be regarded as an autiobiographical novel that spans a vast period of colourful events beginning from the hero's adventures in the boat journeys across the Ganges and his encounters with out-of-the-way characters during his early youth, through his days in Burma and travels with his old sweetheart Rajlakshmi in different parts of India, and finally to the hero's return to the Bengali countryside. One of his most widely translated (into Indian languages) novels is Devadas (published in June, 1917 which is a tale of the son of a Bengali zamindar in love with a village girl of a poor family. After an unhappy relationship with a prostitute who falls in love with him, the hero reduces himself to an alcoholic and dies on his way to meet his old village sweetheart–a stereotype image of morbid adolescent romanticism which inspired an entire generation of youth at one time. It has seen a number of film versions too. Charitrahin (The Dissolute), published in November 1917, is about socially prohibited romance and the essence of nobility in lives of sinners and saints in the middle class milieu. In Shesh Prashna (The Last Question) published in May 1931, his pet theme of man-woman relationship outside the prevailing constraints of an orthodox society is dealt with in a didactic manner in a story that revolves round two couples who shook the society with their uninhibited living style and arguments. The didactic tone is predominant also in Pather Dabi (Demand of the Road) published in August, 1926, which is a political novel that reveals Saratchandra's sympathies with the armed revolutionary stream of the national movement. His views on socialism, the working class, the role of violence in the struggle against imperialism and such other contemporary problems find expression in this novel which deals with the lives and loves, acts of heroism and intrigues, of a group of Indian revolutionaries in Burma. The book was banned by the British government immediately after its publication, but copies of it were secretly distributed among an avid readership. In his last novel Shesher Parichay (which was left unfinished by him and was completed by a friend) he returned to his fond search for saintliness among 'fallen' women–this time the heroine was a woman who had left her husband and was ostracized by the society.

Portrayal of women was Saratchandra's forte. With an unerring and deep insight he could bring out the nuances in the psychology of the contemporary Bengali woman–whether an educated Brahmo girl of Calcutta, or an unsophisticated rustic housewife, or a prostitute. His sympathy for and understanding of their sufferings, their often unspoken loves, their need for affection, their fight for emancipation, made them stand out as authentic pieces of portrayal.

His distinctiveness of diction, intensity of expression and his unfailing flair for the drama, made Saratchandra one of the best story-tellers in Bengali literature who brought fiction close to everyday life of the people. Although he could never completely break away from certain traditional values and sentimental fads like admiration for enlightened landlords or a wistful longing for virtues in so-called fallen women, one has to admit that Saratchandra brought Bengali fiction nearer to the spirit of modern world literature. Rabindranath Tagore's comments on him are worth quoting: "He has achieved the best reward of a novelist; he has completely won the hearts of Bengali readers". (Preface to The Deliverance, March, 1935).

Saratchandra was the President of the Howrah District Congress from 1921 to 1936. In 1936, Dhaka University (now in Bangladesh) conferred the honorary D. Litt. degree on him. He was also awarded the 'Jagattarini medal' by the Calcutta University in recognition of his literary talents.

FURTHER WORKS: Biraj Bou (May, 1914). Bindur Chhele (contains three short stories–Bindur Chhele, Ramer Sumati and Patha Nirdesh, July 1914); Parinita (August, 1914); Mej Didi (contains three short stories–Mej Didi, Darpachurna and Andhare Alo, December, 1915); Pallisamaj (January, 1916); Arakshaniya (1916); Panditmashai (September, 1917);Nishkriti (July, 1917); Kashinath (contains seven short stories–Kashinath, Alo-o-Chaya, Mandir, Bojha, Anupamer Prem, Balya-Smriti and Haricharan, September, 1917; Datta (serialised, 1917-19); Swami (February, 1918); Chhabi (contains three short stories–Chhabi, Mamlar Phal and Bilasi, January 1920); Grihadaha (March, 1920); Bamuner Meye (October, 1920); Narir Mulya (Essay, April 1923); Dena Paona (August, 1923); Naba Bidhan (October, 1924); Hariiakshmi (contains three short stories–Harilakshmi, Mahesh and Abhagir Swarga, March, 1926); Sodosi (dramatized form of Dena Paona August, 1928); Swadesh O Sahitya (collection of Essays, August, 1932); Anuradha, Sati O Paresh (collection of short stories, March 1934); Vijaya (dramatized form of Datta, December 1934); Bipradas (February 1935); Chhelebelar Galpa (April 1938).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Gopalchandra Roy, Saratchandra (Vol I–IV; Bengali); Niranjan Chakravarty (ed.) Saratchandra O Bharatiya Sahitya; S.C. Sengupta, Saratchandra–Man and Artist.

Sum.B.

CHATTERJEE, SHAKTI (Bengali; b. 1933) is a Bengali poet of the late fifties. He spent his early boyhood days in his village. While in College he came in contact with the promising poets of the fifties, but wrote only stories some of which were published in the Ananda Bazar Patrika. He also wrote a novel entitled Kuotala (1955) which was published later. His first poem was published in Kavita, a quarterly magazine edited by Buddhadev Bose. Though poetry was not his first love in those days, he took to writing poetry as a sort of challenge and became one of the outstanding poets of the fifties. His poetry reflected poignantly all the frustrations and self-indulgence of the younger generation of the fifties. His intimacy with the American Beatniks, some of whom were then in Calcutta, aggravated his somewhat bohemian feeling and he relished a frank description of a mental breakdown or a drug addiction or a sexual orgy. But around mid-sixties that impulse faded out and Shakti turned to confessional poetry and developed a colloquial language with a formal stress, peculiarly his own, repenting his former wrongdoing and submitting himself quietly to woman, nature and God with a smile and perhaps, with a tear. And now Shakti is at his best, a major Bengali poet, writing lyrics which reflect a turning at new directions both in form and content.

His books of verses include: He Prem he Naihsabdya (1957), Hemanter Aranye Ami Postman (1969), Dharmeo Acho Giraffeo Acho, Ananta Nakshatrabithi Tumi Andhakara (1967), Sonar Machhi Khun Korechhi (1967), Chaturdaspadi Kabita (1970). His other books include Patal theke Dekchi, Parer Kantha Matir Bari, Ami Chhire Pheli Chhenda Tantujal, etc. Besides these, a collection of his best poems and a book of his collected verses have been published. He received the Sahitya Akademi award for his collection entitled Jete Pari Kinto keno Jaba in 1983.

A journalist since 1970, Shakti is attached to the Ananda Bazar Patrika. He wrote some features under the pseudonym Rupchand Pakshi a few years back and tried his hand not so successfully at a few novels, one of which besides Kuotala is Abani Bari Achho? He translated Kalidasa, Omar Khaiyam and Ghalib, and edited a poetry magazine entitled Saptahik Bangla Kavita in the late sixties.

U.M.

CHATTERJEE, SUNITIKUMAR (Bengali; b. 1890, d. 1977) was a philologist and Indologist of international repute. Doyen of Indian scholars, Sunitikumar was a legend in his lifetime because of his encyclopaedic knowledge, photographic memory and avid curiosity about human civilisation. Although he was the opposite of a cloistered scholar, his Origin and Development of the Bengali Language (known to the students as ODBL, 1926) is a model of scrupulous and comprehensive scholarship. His academic record had been as impressive as his scholarly achievements. He stood first in first class in English Hons. (1911) and M.A. (English, 1913) examinations of Calcutta University and was awarded Premchand Roychand Scholarship (1919) on the strength of a dissertation while teaching in the department of English, Calcutta University. A government scholarship (1919-1922) took him to London University where he researched on "Indo-European Linguistics–Origin and Development of the Bengali Language" under eminent experts like Daniel Jones and Barnett. He was awarded the degree of D. Litt. of London University (1921) and he spent a year in Paris to study Indo-European, Slav and Austro-Asian linguistics under French scholars. On his return to India he became Professor in the Department of Comparative Philology (1922-1952), Calcutta University. In 1927 he accompanied Rabindranath Tagore to Far Eastern Countries and recorded his experience of the great cultural heritage of the area and its links with the Indian scene in his delightful Dwipamay Bharat (Islands of Greater India, 1947). From 1935 he travelled many times to places inside and outside India to receive degrees conferred on him by the Universities of Rome (1961), Delhi (1965), Visva Bharati (Desikottam, 1966), Rabindra Bharati (1968), Osmania (1968) and Calcutta (1969). He was made a National Professor in 1964. He was President of Bangiya Sahitya Parishad (a highly respected academic society of Calcutta devoted to research in, and publication of, Bengali books and manuscript) 1961, President of Sanskrit Commission appointed by Govt. of India (1956-57) and a member of the Indian Languages Commission (1955-56). He was also elected President of the International Phonetic Association in London for the year 1969 and the President of Sahitya Akademi from 1969 till his death in 1977.

Sunitikumar's study of linguistics made him famous, but he took all human knowledge to be his province: Sanskrit aesthetics and Greek philosophy, Negro Art and Vaishnava cult in Gujarat appealed to him with equal force. His travel books best illustrate his knowledge of world culture and his zest for life. In his Europe 1938 (written in Bengali, 1945) and Paschimer Yatri he has given a brilliant survey of European culture as well as the feel of living human beings. He knew Greek, Latin, French, Italian, German, English, Dutch, Sanskrit, Persian, Avesta (Ancient Persian) and a dozen modern Indian languages. His photographic memory and stupendous knowledge often helped him in his original critical assessment of art and culture, and his historical imagination and flair for life were evident in all his writings. One of the pioneers in introducing modern research methodology in the study of linguistics in our country, he wrote a very large number of articles on various topics, mostly scattered in journals. He wrote fifteen books in Bengali including Bangla Bhashatattwer Bhumika (An introduction to Bengali Linguistics, Calcutta, 1929), Bhashaprakash Bangali Byakaran (A Book of Bengali Grammars, Calcutta, 1939), Jati Sanskriti O Sahitya (Race, Culture and Literature, a collection of essays, Calcutta, Bharat Sanskriti (Indian Culture, Calcutta, 1944) and Sanskritiki (on Culture, Calcutta, 1962 and 1965). He published twenty one books in English including World literature and Tagore (1971). Bharatiya Aryabhasa aur Hindi (Indo–Aryan Languages and Hindi) is one his seven publications in Hindi. He also composed slokas and a number of articles in Sanskrit.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Sukumari Bhattacharya, Sunitikumar Chatterjee, (Calcutta, 1970), Sunitikumar Chatterjee: The Scholar and the Man (Jignasa, Calcutta 1970).

A.D.C.

CHATURANGA (Bengali) is a novel by Rabindranath Tagore. Published as a series of four stories in Sabujpatra, a monthly magazine; it was printed as a novel in 1916. This was Tagore's sixth novel, written after a gap of five years, the last being Gora. This novel is written in a completely different style, terse, light, and dramatic. The earlier novels were elaborate, spanning many characters, attempting to analyse their motivations, and their impact on the society and the impress of society on them. This novel is moulded differently.

All the stories are told by Shribilas, a young man from a village, coming into the intellectual sophistication of Calcutta. He hero-worships Sachish, a low-caste but intellectually brilliant fellow-student from a well-off family. He follows Sachish devotedly in his godlessness. The first story tells the life of Jagamohan, his uncle, his atheist positivism, his utter unconcern for material well-being, his disdain for Hindu rituals, his deliberate flouting of the selfish Hinduism of his relations, his patronage of Sachish, whom he seeks to mould in his own way. Sachish gets away from his father, lives under the tutelage of his uncle and agrees to marry a girl, ravished and wronged by his brother. But the girl commits suicide, because she was too Hindu to remarry. Jagamohan was violently moved, though he had been accustomed not to feel emotions. He died of infection caught while he was working for plague-stricken shoemakers of Calcutta.

In the second story, Shribilas tells the strange transformation of Sachish, after his uncle's death, into a fanatic follower of a Hindu Sanyasi, who spends all the hours of the day and night in singing kirtans. Shribilas, now a Premchand Raychand scholar, a brilliant orator, a westernised sophisticate, is shocked but gradually changes himself into another follower of the Sanyasi–a devotee of Faith instead of Reason. The two friends follow the guru's dictates without demur. However, Damini causes a tremor in this placid life. She is the widow of a wealthy disciple of the guru, left in his care. She looks and acts like a flash of lightning. She falls in love with Sachish, who notices her but strives to ignore her attention and overtures. Damini fails to impress Sachish with her rebellious attitude–her inappropriate dresses, her defiance of the guru, her unconventional activities. She resorts to another strategy–complete subservience to the guru. Even then, Sachish manages to remain cold towards her.

The third story relates to Damini–how she succeeds in breaking the stoicism of Sachish. Shribilas has fallen in love with Damini, who, in order to rouse the envy of Sachish, pays more attention to Shribilas. And that does it. The confrontation between Sachish and Damini turns into a sort of truce.

The fourth story is of Shribilas, who is, of course, just a focal point around whom moves the suppressed but turbulent emotional current between Sachish and Damini. The three of them live in a far-away village on a river bank. Shribilas is intensely aware of the relations of the lovers but is too fond of both of them to feel hurt. He marries Damini, who is all affectionate towards Shribilas but her real love is elsewhere. They come back to Calcutta where Damini falls ill and her heart trouble ultimately causes her death.

The centre of the novel is Sachish who represents the life-long striving of Tagore himself to reach the Infinite from the Finite, to reach abstraction through the concrete. His positivism, his subservience to faith, his struggles to conquer the infatuation for Damini are all expressions of this striving. Shribilas represents his alter-ego–his earthiness, honesty, innate common sense and intense awareness of his own limitations.

It was translated into English in 1925, by the author, jointly with W.W. Pearson and incorporated in Broken Ties and other Stories. Also into French (1925) by Madeline Rolland; and from French into Bulgarian by K.K. Konstantinov (1926) and into Russian by E.S. Khakhlova (1925).

Ni.G.

CHATURBHANI (Sanskrit) is a collection of four Bhanas (one man shows) viz-Shudraka's Padmaprabhritaka, Vararuchi's Ubhayabhisarika, Ishvaradatta's Dhurtavitasamvada and Shyamilaka's Padataditaka. A Sanskrit verse found in the manuscript of these four Bhanas, collectively refers to the four authors and glorifies them as excelling even Kalidasa. On the basis of this statement the four works have been always referred to as a collection and have been assigned to the Gupta period (4th to 6th century A.D.). All these four Bhanas bear influence of ideas and expressions from Kalidasa. References to Katantra school of grammar, Dattaka's Vaishika Sutras and Pataliputra anecdotes point to the early period of their composition.

Bhana is a type of drama in which a single person projects to the audience many other characters through a particular dramatic technique (Natya-dharmi) called akasha-bhashita. The Chaturbhani is the best and earliest specimen of this class. The language has a very smooth and easy flow. It appears that the Bhanas were freely understood during that period. The sarcasm that runs through some of them is unique and inimitable. The four Bhanas throw much light on the contemporary society, especially on the courtesans and their ways, as the single character performer is a Vita or a man of the town who is quite conversant with such topics.

S.S.J.

CHATURDASPADI KABITAVALI (Bengali) is a collection of 102 Bengali sonnets written by Michael Madhusudan Datta during his stay at Versailles in France. The opening sonnet in this volume is a tribute to Petrarch, whom Michael accepts as the master of this form. Most of the sonnets in this collection were written on Petrarchan model though some of them follow the Shakespearean rime-scheme. Michael also learnt from Petrarch the technique of the epigrammatic last line and the device of word or phrase-repetition. The themes of these sonnets are varied and wide in range. Some are on the poets of India–Valmiki, Kalidasa and Krittibas, some are on the poets of Europe–Dante, Hugo and Tennyson, and some on contemporaries like Sanskritist Goldstucker and Vidyasagar. His finest sonnets deal with the river beside his village, rituals and festivals which he loved, trees and birds familiar in Bengal, and the poets of Bengal whose work he had known since his childhood. The sincerity and poise with which he described his deep personal emotion opened new possibilities for modern Bengali lyric poetry. This volume of verse published in 1866 is important in the history of Bengali literature both as an innovation of a new form and a new medium of intimate expression.

S.D.

CHATURSEN SHASTRI, ACHARYA (Hindi; b. 1891; d. 1960). was an eminent Hindi novelist. He was born in an Aryasamajist family, studied in Sikandrabad school and Gurukul, Varam, and Jaipur Sanskrit College until 1909 to obtain the Shastri and Acharya degrees in literature and medicine. He started life as a physician and ended up as a writer. He has over 150 books to his credit. His intimate knowledge of human physique also influenced his literary outlook and the selection of themes. His literary attainments are scattered in different genres of writing. His first effort was a booklet of essays 'Hinduon Ki Chhati par jehrili chhuri' (1911). He composed Hindi's first prose poetry titled Antasthal (The heart of hearts, 1921), Banam Swadesh (1926), 'Jawahar' (1937), 'Taralagni' (1949), Mari khal ki haye (1949) and 'Kalindi ke kul par' (1954) are his other works in prose-poetry-mainly political in nature. His dramas (about 15) are mostly historical and mythological bearing names of central characters, such as Amar Rathor, Ajit Singh, Raj Singh, Chhatrasal, Sitaram, Meghnath, Dharamraj, Gandhari etc. His one-act plays are Radha Krishna (1946), Panch Ekanki (1949). He also wrote many biographies. His autobiography Meri Atmakahani (1963) is important in understanding a life full of afflictions and agony. His analytical faculty is reflected in Hindi Bhasha aur Sahitya Ka Itihas (1946), Sahitya Sampada (1955) and Brajbhasha Par Mughal Prabhav (1955). His only poetical work is the Gandivdah (1953). Though he enriched other genres of literature by his creative writing, he is basically a novelist and a short-story writer. He wrote over 350 short stories and about 30 novels. In some of them he is influenced, to some extent, by the naturalistic tendency. The main characteristic of his fiction is an essentially historical air that envelopes the plot. His artistic short stories are mostly based on the Mughal period, such as 'Dukhwa Mein Kase Kahun', 'Lalrukh', 'Soya Hua Shahar', 'Bawarchin' etc. His outstanding historical novels are–Vaishali Ki Nagarvadhu (1948.) Vayam Rakshamah based on the Ramayana; instead of Rama it revolves around Ravana; (recreation of Ravana's humanity); Somnath (1954); Mahmud Ghaznavi's invasion of the Somnath temple); Alamgir (based on the personality of Mughal emperor, Aurangzeb, 1954); Sahyadri Ki Chattanen (accomplishments of Shivaji), Sona aur Khun (1958); (related to British period of history, he negatives the notion that the revolution of 1857 was national in character). In the first three novels fancy dominates history, in the last three history dominates fancy. His novels relate to almost every period of history and recreate successfully the relevant age in all its diversity and colourfulness. In all, Chatursen Shastri is recognised as a good historical short-story writer and novelist projecting humanistic ideals through his myriad characters and variety of episodes.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Shubkar Kapoor Acharya Chatursen Shastri Ka Katha Sahitya (Lucknow, 1965); Vidya Bhushan Bharadwaj, Chatursen ke Upnyason men Itihas Ka Chitran (Meerut, 1972).

S.P.C.

CHATURVEDI, BANARASIDAS (Hindi. b. 1892, d. 1985). The very name of Banarasidas Chaturvedi conjures up the image of a benign, carefree and tireless old man ever willing to get involved in other's problems, committed to any and every social, cultural, national or literary cause or to any cause that would benefit the Hindi language and literature or would help in the attainment of higher values of life in any field.

Born in a middle class Chaturvedi family of Ferozabad (U.P.), Banarasidas received education only upto the intermediate standard and took up teaching jobs, first in a school at Farrukhabad (1913-1914), then at Daily College, Indore (1914-1920) and later at the Gujarat Vidyapith (1921-25) founded by Mahatma Gandhi. The limited opportunities afforded by a restricted field could not, however, bind down his restless soul. He, therefore, left the teaching job to plunge himself into the wider field of public service, diverse literary activity and journalism to find fulfilment of his inner urge. The urge for literary creativity and public service-with all its risks and hazards-made him turn his back to prosperous, happy and resourceful life and get used to simple life devoid of luxury and physical comforts. He was fortunate to come into contact with Ganeshshanker Vidyarthi a fire brand revolutionary journalist of his times—who initiated and inspired him into journalism for rousing social consciousness and for selfless service to the community. He tried to repay the debt by writing a biography of the great martyr and missionary journalist later in life.

As a journalist, Banarasidas acquired instant fame and stature when he joined the Vishal Bharat, owned by the celebrated journalist Ramanand Chatterjee, in Calcutta as its editor. Ramanand Chatterjee, was highly impressed by Banarasidas Chaturvedi's devotion to his work, his forthrightness and his guts to stick to his guns in the face of opposition, even from Ramanand Chatterjee himself. Banarasidas frustrated all attempts at compromise where principles and values of life were involved. It was here that he had opportunities to come into direct contact with outstanding political leaders of all hues. Because of his deep interest in the problems of Indians settled abroad, he made friends with C.F. Andrews and Srinivasa Sastri and later got an opportunity to be associated with Gandhi in this aspect of his work.

Vishal Bharat emerged as a literary trend-setter and a crusader for healthy literary values during his stewardship of the journal. He fought and won many a battle against those whose literary creativity was restricted to sensuous titillation and portrayals of human degeneration.

After leaving the Vishal Bharat, he edited the Madhukar from Tikamgarh for a number of years. He devoted most of his time to the study of Hindi, Sanskrit and Indian literature as also Western literature available in English.

For over a decade, he was a nominated member of the Rajya Sabha. During this period, he made tremendous efforts to activize voluntary Hindi organisations that had become defunct and founded new ones to infuse life into those who wanted to serve the cause of Hindi. 'Sausadiya Hindi Parishad', 'Hindi Sahitya Sammelan, and Hindi Patrakar Sangh' were beneficiaries of his zest and active co-operation. The credit for founding the 'Hindi Bhavan' in the capital goes to him. He organised the publication of biographies of the martyrs of Independence struggle as a tribute to their sacrifice for the national cause. Banarasidas had a style of his own–simple, forthright, intelligible with an unusual verve and refinement of texture. His contribution is more significant in the fields of journalism, sketches, reminiscences, biography, etc. He was honoured with 'Padma Bhushan by the Government. of India for his tireless and selfless service to the nation.

FURTHER WORKS: Rashtra Bhasha (1919); Kavivar Satyanarayan Kaviratna (biography); Rekhachitra (1952); Sahitya aur Jivan Ganesh Shanker Vidyarthi, Samsamaran (1952); Hamare Aradhya, Prince Kropatkin ka Atmacharitra; C.F. Andrews; Vishva ki Vibhutiyan; Shahid Granthmala (6 vols.); Hriday Tarang and other Poems.

Ma.C.

CHATURVEDI, BARSANELAL (Hindi, b. 1921) is a leading Brajabhasha poet, born in a Chaturvedi family. He studied Commerce and passed his M. Com, later on then switched over to Arts and took his M.A. (Hindi), Ph.D. and D. Litt. degrees (all from the Agra University).

His first collection of humorous poems appeared in 1946 entitled Rang aur Vyangya. His further collections of poems are Chhintey (1950), Hansi ke Capsule (1965), Hansi Ke Injection (1970), Kantedar Kavitayen (1980), and Adhunik Sudama (1981).

Humour and satire have been his forte. His parody of Sudama Charit by Narottam Das has been very popular. In addition to this, he has written many parodies of Surdas, Raskhan, Rahim, Kabir and other poets. The targets of his satire have been black-marketeers, misers, so-called leaders, corruption and other anti-social trends and elements.

He was awarded the 'Girdhari Lal Saraf Thitholi Puraskar' for his excellence as a poet in 1981. He took part in the 'International Poetry Reading' held at Belgrade (Yugoslavia) in 1979. He is also a recipient of the Presidential Award for his meritorious contribution in the field of education.

Vi.S.

CHATURVEDI, MAKHANLAL (Hindi; b. 1889, d. 1967), Son of a Higher Secondary School teacher of religious temperament, Makhanlal was educated in the village Primary School in Hoshangbad and passed the Middle School certificate examination, and then obtained the Normal Training certificate. He started his career as a teacher but gave up the job to join the national movement. In early life, he was deeply influenced by the famous political leader, Bal Gangdadhar Tilak. In 1913, he published a magazine called Prabha and started his political and literary career when he came in contact with Ganeshshankar Vidyarthi. In 1914, his wife expired. This incident deeply affected his health. In 1918, he became editor of Karmavir published from Jabalpur. In 1921, he was arrested for his political activities. Later on, he started the publication of Karmavir from Khandwa (M.P.). His first book, a drama entitled Krishanarjuna Yudh was published in 1918. Then his first collection of poems entitled Hima-kiritini appeared in 1942. Sahitya Devata, a collection of poems with deeply mystic as well as nationalist overtones was published in 1949. Another work under the name of Mata was published in 1951. Samarpan was published in 1956 and in the same year appeared another collection of poems Yugcharan. In 1954, his collection of short stories, entitled Kala ka Anuvada was published. Then for three-four years there was no creative activity due to his ill-health and involvement in political activities. In 1960, his collection of essays under the title, Amir Irade Garib Irade as also his poetic collection, Venu lo Gunje Dhara appeared. He published another poetic collection - Bijuri Kajal Anja Rahi in 1962, yet another entitled Maran Jwar in 1963. His pen name was 'Ek Bharatiya Atma'.

The personality and the poetic writings of Makhanlal Chaturvedi inspired younger generations for free thought and national uplift. His poems are steeped in spiritual and national sentiment. He evolved a new poetic technique and even his prose writings were as effective as his poetry. He had a wonderful command over the language. He is one of the top figures in modern Hindi poetry.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Dhirendra Verma, Hindi Sahitya Kosha; Ramdhar Sharma Makhanlal Chaturvedi—Ek Adhyayana Rishi Jaimini Kaushik Makhanlal Chaturvedi.

Bh.M.

CHATURVEDI, PARASHURAM (Hindi; b. 1879) was a scholar and an authority on Hindi Saint-Poetry. He did his B.A. and LL.B. from Allahabad University and M.A. (Philosophy) from the Benaras Hindu University. He was a lawyer by profession, but was more devoted to scholarly pursuits and research. He was a permanent member of the Nagari Pracharini Sabha, Varanasi and Bharatiya Hindi Parishad, Allahabad and presided over the Raigarh Session of the Parishad in 1956. He got recognition as a scholar after his first publication, viz. Uttari Bharat ki Sant Parampara (1951), a reference book on the mediaeval saints of various sects. His Sufi Kavya Sangrah was also published in 1951. Madhyakalin Prem Sadhana (Devotional love in mediaeval times) and Santakavya were published in 1952. Vaishnav Dharma and Manas ki Ramkatha (1953), Kabir Sahitya ki Parakh (1954), Bharatiya Sahitya ki Sanskritik Rekhayen (1955), Madhyakalin Sringarik Pravrittiyan tatha Nav Nibandha (1955), Bharatiya Premakhyan ki Parampara (1956), Baudha Sahitya ki Sanskritik Jhalak (1958), Sant Sahitya ki Bhumika (1960), Bhakti Sahitya Mein Madhuropasana (1961) and Rahasyavada (1963) are some of his most well known books on Saint Literature on which he was an authority. His last great contribution was Bhakti Margi Bauddha Dharma (Devotional current in Buddhism). His exposition of the mediaeval mystic poetry is lucid and profound. He projects a total view of Bhakti movement and this is his unique achievement. He has successfully tried to transcend sectarian outlook and to go into the essence of the mystic experience of the Saint poets with great profundity. Parashuram Chaturvedi's contribution to the profound and proper understanding of an important current of mediaeval Hindi poetry, viz., Saint poetry, is unique in its own way.

Bh.M.

CHATURVEDI, RAM SWARUP (Hindi. b. 1931) was born at Kanpur. He had his education at Kanpur and Allahabad (M.A. D.Phil.) and has been associated with the Hindi Department of the University of Allahabad in various capacities where he is a Professor in that Department at present. He was also associated with the Parimal and worked as Co-editor in the Naye Patte, Alochana and the celebrated Hindi Sahitya Kosh.

Chaturvedi is essentially a critic interested in theoretical as well as practical criticism. His special study revolves round reflective literature and poetic language. His work Hindi Nav-lekhan is a noteworthy achievement in the field of criticism wherein he has adopted a comprehensive approach for the overall assessment of modern literature. In his Agyeya aur Adhunik Rachana ki Samasya, the articles entitled Agyeya: Gair Romantic Kavita ki Sambhavana and Agyeye ki Kavya. Bhasha reflect the profoundness of his analytical study. According to him Agyeya has given his best when he was free from romance and impulsiveness. In his Gadya ki Satta, he views Hindi prose in a linguistic perspective. His main contentions are as follows: In the absence of a vital force the prose becomes too matter of fact and acquires a cumbersomeness due to its aridity and artificial gracefulness. The main reasons for weaknesses of the prose, according to his analysis are: the isolation of standard Hindi from the various dialects and from colloquial usages and influences, the lack of variety in syntax, neglect of grammatical rules and structural style and the influence of English in word-formation as well as sentence-construction.

Apart from fulfilling the basic conditions of research in his theses,. Chaturvedi lays foremost emphasis on issues that would attract the attention of any contemporary poet, According to him, poetic language represents the only one and the most important basis which could help us to understand the inherent organisation of poetry. His own language represents the idiom of contemporary criticism.

FURTHER WORKS: Sharat ke Nari Patra (1955) Agra Zile ki Boli (1963), Madhyakalin Hindi Kavya Bhasha (1974), Hindi Sahitya ki Adhunatan Pravrittian., Kavita Yatra (1976).

Gov.R.

CHATURVEDI, SRINARAYAN (Hindi; b. 1895 is affectionately called the 'Bhishma Pitamah' of Hindi by many, Srinarayan Chaturvedi is a many-splendoured personality, bubbling with wit and humour and vibrant youthfulness, ever-ready for repartees and telling retorts for those who would like to incite him through any inadvertent or deliberate hasty remark. At ninety, he is very much at the crease, active and productively engaged in his multifarious activities ranging from writing to organizing the Hindi Sahitya Sammelan which he has so fondly nurtured for so many years.

Srinarayan Chaturvedi was born in a Chaturvedi family of Etawah. His father, Chaturvedi Dwarkaprasad Sharma was a profound Sanskrit scholar and has numerous works to his credit. Srinarayan thus was brought up in a scholarly and traditional enviornment and his formal studies culminated in an M.A. degree in History from Allahabad and in Educational Techniques from the University of London. He represented India on the Educational Committee of the League of Nations at Geneva from 1926 to 1930. He presided over the Department of Education in U.P. for many years and his contribution to the propagation of Education in U.P. has been immense. After Independence he was charged with the important assignment of setting the tone of linguistic changes and worked in All India Radio as its Deputy Director-General (Languages) from which post he retired in the early fifties.

Srinarayan Chaturvedi has been a poet, a journalist and a lexicographer and has made significant contributions to the enrichment of the Hindi language and its literature. He adopted the pen name of 'Srivar' in his poetic compositions and published two collections of poems titled Ratnadip and Jivan Kan. His translations from English titled Vishwa Ka Itihas and Shasak are notewrothy. He sprang into prominence as the editor of Viswabharati, the first ever encyclopaedia of significant dimensions published in Hindi. His contribution to the enrichment of journalism came as the editor of the celebrated Hindi monthly Saraswati for a period of over twenty years after his retirement from government service. His editorinal comments during this long period on a variety of topics ranging from personalities to national and international events represent the analytical acumen and deep understanding of an alert mind ready to react and educate his reader. They have grace, poise and an objective approach to the goings-on in the world which could very well be an object lesson to the Hindi Press steeped in partisan politics today. His Pavan Smaran (1976) is a collection of editorial notes he wrote by way of tributes to Indian and foreign scholars, creative writers and outstanding personalities who passed away during his tenure as editor of the Saraswati.

His Vinod Sharma Abhinandan Granth (Vinod Sharma is his Pseudonym) is a pungent satire on the parochiality of Hindi litterateurs who organise, and directly or indirectly edit their own commemoration volumes. His Adhunik Hindi Ka Adikal (1857-1908) is a series of lectures which presents his assessment of the linguistic and literary trends of the age and a deep analysis of the literary activities during the period. These lectures are evidence of his original thinking on various literary issues and his capability to analyse them rationally and disassionately. His Sahityik Chutkule is a class by itself presenting a collection of anecdotes, witty remarks, references, etc., of eminent litterateurs, which help in the understanding of their mental make-up and disposition.

This 'Youthful Old Man' - as he likes to describe himself was honoured with Padma Bhushan in 1982 by the Government of India.

Ma.C.

CHATUVITHALANATHA (Kannada), the Kannada poet of the early 16th century, has been credited with the authorship of the Kannada Bhagavata. The question whether he composed the entire work or only a part of it has remained in doubt. This is because his name appears at the end only of the eleventh and the twelfth skandhas. At the close of the first ten appears the name of Sadanandayogi. The name Nityatma also figures in the earlier sections. This raises questions about the identity of the author. Whether Sadanandayogi and Chatuvithalanatha were one and the same person (and who also used the name Nityatma) or whether the first ten cantos were written by Sadanandayogi and the last two by Chatuvithala, is a question which still remains unsettled. The work and the author, whoever he was, have not been mentioned by any other poet and there is no internal evidence to decide the question. Popularly, however, the Kannada Bhagavata has been associated with Chatuvithalanatha.

The work is extensive and runs into more than twelve thousand smooth moving shatpadis. It closely follows the Sanskrit original in the scheme of construction of the sequence of the stories. Though it follows the original closely, it is not a verse to verse translation. It however retells the Bhagavata story in Kannada as extensively as the original and, therefore, in that sense has to be regarded as a valuable work. The object is devotional; to sing the glory of Hari in the form of Sri Krishna. It claims the pride of place as the first and only Kannada Bhagavata in verse.

V.M.I.

CHATUVU (Telugu) may be described as stray verse inspired by events, episodes, persons and objects. The word literally means a poem which is sweet and simple. There are two anthologies Chatupadya Manimanjari and Chatupadyaratna Karamu which contain many well known poems. We find an amazing variety of theme and treatment; spontaneity is the hallmark of Chatuvus. It may be distinguished from other forms of extempore poetry on the ground that a Chatuvu proceeds from inner impulsion rather than external compulsion. The poet is so impressed by the topic that he spontaneously composes poems for the occasion.

Some of the poems of this category are of unknown or doubtful authorship. But they have come to stay because of the charm of expression or brilliance of thought. There is a quality of novelty and spontaneous vigour which may be found in many of Chatuvus. They are known for their simplicity, directness and naturalness. The entire panorama of human life provides themes for the poets who compose Catuvus on the spur of the moment. Love, hatred, anger, devotion and admiration are the common themes found in chatuvus.

Most famous among the Chatuvus are those attributed to the famous scholarly poet Srinatha. He passed through many vicissitudes of fortune. He also tasted all the pleasures that came his way. Towards the end of his career he was subjected to humiliation and illtreatment. Having enjoyed the heights of glory and prosperity in the heydays of his life, he died in poverty and misery. "Srinatha is going to paradise so that the heart of Brihaspati may quake with fear". He uttered in his farewell to this world in a famous Chatuvu which expresses the self-confidence and pride of the poet who could not be cowed down by the unkind destiny. Srinatha once visited the arid region of Palnadu in Andhra. He felt thirsty but no water was available anywhere around. He composed a memorable Chatuvu which runs as follows; O Lord Parameshwara! who is fabulously rich may marry sixteen hundred wives. But why should a beggar have two? Parvati is enough for you. Why not set free Ganga?" On another occasion Srinatha visited a place full of poetasters. When he came to the outskirts of the village he found an ass braying aloud. In a satirical vein he composed a Chatuvu exclaiming that the ass might also be a poet reciting his latest poems.

There are many Chatuvus whose authorship cannot be established. But like folk poetry they survived the ravages of time and are often quoted by people. Epigramatic quality found in Chatuvus is the reason for their continuing popularity. Axioms of philosophy, maxims of morality, worldly wisdom gleaned from varied experiences of life found expression in Chatuvus which appeal directly to the reader because of the simplicity of style.

Some Chatuvus display sophistication and complexity. References to episodes and personages from epics and legends, play on words, and display of scholarship render some of the Chatuvus limited in their appeal because the layman cannot grasp them. As a form of extempore poetry Chatuvu holds its ground even today since modern life abounds in situations which provoke the poet to compose a poem then and there. Poet Chilakamarti Lakshminarasimham translated into Telugu a fiery patriotic speech of the gifted orator Bipinchandra Pal and at the end he composed a Chatuvu which gave a clinching effect to the speech. It runs as follows:

"Mother India is a milch cow yielding plenty of milk. But the Britisher like a cowherd muzzles the calves and drains all the milk while the little ones languish". This Chatuvu has become famous as it kindled the spirit of patriotism with the help of a simple metaphor taken from life. In another Chatuvu he declared that the prison becames a pleasure resort, coarse uniform is like fine silk and the miserable food tastes like an elixir when the heart of the prisoner confined between the four walls of his cell is fired by love for the motherland.

Though they are not in the traditional verse pattern, some of the witty remarks of the modern poet Sri Sri carry the ring of a Chatuvu. Once he saw a film which showed the hero and heroine, who were quite old in years indulging in youthful sports on the screen. He burst out in a line "What a hot love at this late age!".

C.Su.

CHAUBISAVTAR (Punjabi) is an important composition compiled in the Dasam Granth. Its authorship is attributed to the Tenth Sikh Guru, Guru Gobind Singh, but many scholars have proved it to be the work of his court-poets, who were inspired by the Guru to compose such a poetry which could evoke the spirit of war against tyranny and transform the whole society. This work contains the episodes of twenty-four incarnations of the famous Hindu god Vishnu, such as Mach, Kachh, Nar-Narayan, Maha—Mohini, Varah, Narsingh, Bavan (Vaman), Parasuram, Brahma, Rudra, Jullundhr, Aditiputar, Sheshsai, Arhantdev, Manu, Dhanvantri, Suraj, Chandra, Rama, Krishna, Nar, Budh, Nehkalanki: Out of these Ramavtar and Krishnavtar are the most important. These are lengthy works consisting of 864 & 2492 stanzas respectively. All these episodes are about wars, particularly wars between the gods and demons. The avtars came down to help the gods. According to internal evidence of the Dasam Granth, confrontation between the gods and the demons pertains to the eternal struggle between the good and the evil. This composition is thoroughly charged with a kind of psychological aggressiveness, with a view to injecting an idea of fighting against evil. This work has actually served the educational needs of the members of the Sikh fraternity with typical social background. It is a Sikh text-book on the received tradition to change their psyche according to the need of the hour and it is a well established fact that the pietistic theology was towards the interest of warring spirit and changing saints into sepoys. Though it is written in Braj Bhasa, the vocabulary from Persian and Arabic languages has also been used. Words are arranged in such a way as to suit the atmosphere and the sounds of the battle-field. The imagery is vivid and the scenes of the battles are lucidly presented. About one hundred different metres have been used in this work and these are frequently changed according to the changing atmosphere of the battle-field and mood of the warriors. In brief, this work imparts instructions on how to live without fear of death for the good of the society and freedom.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: R.S. Jaggi, Dasam Granth da Pauranic Adeyan

R.S.J.

CHAUBISI (Rajasthani). The word when it forms the part of a title represents the number of stanzas contained in the text. It is just like 'Baisi,' 'Pachhisi', 'Battisi', and other various forms of this nature. This particular number has found favour with the Jaina poets and prose writers. The main reason behind this might be the fact that the number of 'Jaina Tirthankaras' is also twenty-four. This supposition is well supported by the writings bearing the title, Chaubisi, which are described in the catalogues as Jaina stavanas. Jinarajasuri, Vinay Chandra and Sundara are some of the poets who composed these Chaubisis in the 18th and 19th centuries. Devichandra, Yasovijaya and Anandaghana Maharaja are other such poets of the Swetamber sect of the Jainas who wrote Chaubisi and Chaubisi sutrarthi respectively during the 19th century. Various metres are found used in these works, Sawaiya and 'Dandaka are two of them. Some of the published works of Jaina Chaubisi's are as follows: Chaubisi visi Sangraha (Ahmedabad. 1878) Vrhada Chaubisi visi Sangraha (1911) and 1151 Stavana Manjiesa (1938) reveal over 52 names of poets. While there is no end to such works in the Jaina religious writings, the non-Jainas have also attempted such compositions by writing Chaubisalkadasi Katha, Chaubisa Bola, etc though the word Chaubisi does not appear at the end of their titles. The word has its roots in the Sanskrit literature which contains works under the title 'Chaturvinshati'.

Raw.S.

CHAUDHURI, AKSHAYCHANDRA (Bengali; b. 1850 d. 1898). An attorney-at-law by profession Akshaychandra had developed a close friendship with his class mate Jyotirindranath Tagore and gradually became a close friend of the Tagore family. He was a brilliant actor, a composer of songs and a poet of no mean merit. His deep interest in English literture influenced Rabindranath also, who learnt about Moore's Irish melodies for the first time from Akshaychandra. Jyotirindranath composed tunes to which words were set by Rabindranath and Akshaychandra. Rabindranath has referred to him in his Reminiscences as his initiator in literary activities in early years. He was the first narrative verse writer in modern Bengali poetry. His first book of poems Udasini (1874) bore no name of its author. The poem was written under the influence of Parnel's Hermit and Rabindranath took even some lines from this poem in his early work Banaphool. With the history of India as its theme Akshaychandra wrote another book of poems Bharat Gatha which had its second edition in 1900. He was a regular contributor to the famous literary journal of the day Bharati and translated many English poems that did not carry his name. He never attached much importance to his own writings and allowed many of his scribblings to be lost. It has been mentioned by Rabindranath himself that some of the songs of his Valmiki-Pratibha were composed by Akshaychandra. His wife Saratkumari Choudhurani was also a writer of considerable merit.

So.B.

CHAUDHURI, BAHINABAI (Marathi; b. 1879, d. 1951) was the mother of Sopandev Chaudhuri, a famous Marathi poet. She never went to school nor could she read or write. She composed poems while attending to daily house-hold and farming duties. Her poems were published in 1952 with a highly appreciative introduction by P.K. Atre. The poems are composed in Khandeshi-Varhadi dialect. She presents a clear and powerful philosophy of life. She has the wisdom of a learned philosopher and imagination of an epic-poet. She expressed eternal truths of life. Her view-point is that the mystery of life lies in pure love. She bitterly criticises man's selfish behaviour. She described touching legends. Her poems are coloured by strong emotions, high imagination, and moderate diction. They are marked by beautiful picturisation of nature and appealing expression of pathos. They are rich in images from common experiences of a farming woman. Her poems are also coloured by wit and satire expressed with ease. The satire is sympathetic. Great thoughts are expressed in perfect aesthetic form, effective precision and powerful language. She represents originality and uncultivated freshness of poetic talent.

Nis.M.

CHAUDHURI, KHEIRUDDIN (Manipuri, b. 1939) is a leading young poet in Manipuri. Born in a Manipuri Muslim family he, after getting the M.A. degree in Political Science of Gauhati University in 1965, joined the Singerband High School and then Town High School as an assistant teacher. At present working as an S.I. of Schools of the Government of Assam, he is actively busy with education. In 1974 his first book of poems, Minok Pirangi Mitkup Anidang (Two Moments of Tearful Smile) was published, which was followed by Barak Torbangi Ishei (Song of the Barak), Manipuri Mohammedans in English and Adhunik Manipuri Kavitar Anubad Guchcha (Translations of Modern Manipuri Poetry) in Bengali. Well versed in English, Bengali, and Manipuri, he writes in English and Bengali, besides writing in his mother tongue Manipuri. Many of his poems have been occasionally published in Nongpok Meira (Light of the East), Numitlei (Sunflower) and many other periodicals in Manipuri. His poetry is marked by intense feeling of love of his culture and mother-tongue and a felicity of expression which is endowed with poetic meaning and vision.

Kheiruddin received the Kamini Kumar Award in 1976 for his book of poems, Minok Pirangi Mitkup Anidang, being the first recipient of this award by any Manipuri writer from outside Manipur.

I.R.B.S.

CHAUDHURI, LAKSHYADHAR (Assamese; b. 1915) is an Assamese actor and playwright who has maintained his contact with Assamese drama and theatre since his early days, even in the midst of his long political career. He has written a number of plays of which mention may be made of Rakshkumar (1952) Nimila Anka (1965) and Yavanikar Are Are. The first is a mythological play based on an episode of the Ramayana. The play is lively from the point of view of characterisation although technically it is not well-designed. The character of Ravana in the play has been drawn with depth and insight. Nimila Anka is an appraisal of the economic condition of the lower middle class. Lakshyadhar Chaudhuri is at his best in creating humour and in the performance of comic roles. The seriousness of his plays is sometimes at clash with the light scenes introduced here and there. These light scenes, however, are there in a number of short plays written for the Radio and the stage. His Yavanikar Are Are is a light comedy that shows some influence of Pirandello's Six Characters in Search of An Author. The resemblance however is only superficial.

S.B.

CHAUDHURI, MANINDRANATH RAJKAMAL (Maithili; b. 1929, d. 1967) was a novelist, short story writer and poet. The full name of Manindranath Chaudhuri, Rajkamal is not familiar in literature. He is often referred to simply as Rajkamal or Rajkamal Chaudhuri. He was born in a Maithili Brahmana family and graduated in commerce from the University of Patna and joined the state secretariat as an assistant, but creative urge did not allow him to work long under the monotony of office red tapism. He left the job, and went about working, idling and wandering from place to place throughout the country. Eventually at Calcutta he found himself in an atmosphere of modern conditions of creative life. But this kind of nomadic life ruined his health and he died in the hospital at Patna at the young age of 38 without realizing his full potentials.

Rajkamal first came to limelight as a writer in Hindi. But his interest in mother tongue Maithili soon developed under the inspiration of Lalit, the brilliant young fiction writer of Darbhanga. Soon he rose into eminence as a modernist Maithili writer of great promise and was found in the fifties himself drawing more and more young men to writing in Maithili.

Rajkamal Chaudhuri's first great contribution was a collection of poems called Surargandha (1957). Its preface contained his celebrated declaration that poetry is beyond metre, rhythm, melody, structure and pauses and the central interest is primarily in the words written with a vision and under an inspiration. He further explained the "new" poet as deeply conscious of the changes that were taking place in modern life but he is not bound by any-ism or set doctrine (though it is easy to see that Rajkamal Chaudhuri is echoing here the modern cult of existentialism). Thus, he aims at using a technique that is capable of truly representing human experience in all its shades and nuances. Above all, he asserts that the "new" poet is neither actuated by a desire to rebel for the sake of rebelling or for imitating the themes and techniques of the poets of the West: he merely seeks to express actually and accurately the present day life and give an aesthetic and emotional release to modern man's innermost personality in his actual environment. In this way he hopes to bring about a better world and a better literature.

But Rajkamal took longer strides in the field of fiction. His first novel Andolana, an immature story of Maithili agitation, was published posthumously in 1968, but the second Adikatha (1958) was better and more bold. It has a frankly incestuous and voluptuous character as heroine but there is hardly any attainment of greatness in her portrayal. The third novel Pathar Phool (1967) also did not create as great moments of living as was expected. Eka Anar Eka Rogaha (1970) and Nirmohi Balama Hamara (1970) were translations of his own Hindi works.

It was as a short story writer that Rajkamal's power came into its own. Ramanatha Jha for the first time edited his stories in 1968 as Lalka Pag. One is at once struck by his acute observation and unique power of grasping the "storyness" of a situation in this work. Moreover, he has an outspoken contempt for those who believed in conventional morality and taboos in the face of realities of life. Rajkamal shows himself an independent thinker who is constantly asking himself questions and answering them in his short stories. Thus the greatness of Rajkamal lies in directly reacting to the life around him all the time.

Akhara, a literary journal published from Calcutta has issued special numbers which made public several of Rajkamal's letters and essays hitherto unpublished. Recently however his complete works have been properly edited by Mohan Bhardwaj and Ananda Mishra from Maithili Akademi, Patna.

J.M.

CHAUDHURI, MEDINI (Assamese; b. 1929) passed his B.A. from Cotton College, Gauhati. A government servant by profession, Chaudhuri started his literary career as a short story writer but came over later to the novel. His novels are Ananya Prantar (Unique Field, 1972), Banduka Behar (Two place names, 1976), Aranya Adim (The Forest Primitive, 1977), Tat Nadi Nachil (No River There, 1977), and Ferengadao (Name of a bird, 1982). He has also to his credit a prose-work on the social milieu of Assam, Luit, Barak aru Islam. (The Brahmaputra, the Barak and Islam, 1982). As a novelist and short story writer, Chaudhuri shows a consciousness of the socio-economic forces of history that affect society. His novel Tat Nadi Nachil which won the Publication Board Award of 1979 is a good example of this. His first novel Ananya Prantar reflects the glorious past of Assam through the myths and legends and historical episodes connected with various places of the state. These are knit together in this uncommon work of fiction in an imaginary travel story of an Assamese youth in the company of a Khasi maiden. The second novel, Banduka Behar is a biographical novel based on the life of the medieval Vaishnavite writer and preacher, Madhavadeva. Ferengadao is another biographical novel based on the life of Bishnu Rabha, the artist and political revolutionary. Each novel by Chaudhuri shows an experiment in form.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Homen Borgohain (ed.) Asamiya Galpa Samkalan Vol. II, (Introduction) Publication Board, Gauhati, 1976., Satyendranath Sarma, Asamiya Upanyasar Gatidhara, Bani Prakash, Gauhati, 1976., Trailokyanath Goswami, Adhunik Galpa-Sahitya, Lawyers Book Stall, Gauhati, 1965.

Go.S.

CHAUDHURI, NAGENDRANARAYAN (Assamese; b. 1881, d. 1947), a well known short story writer of Assam in the early part of the century, was born in a Zamindar family of Mechpara in the district of Goalpara. It was more convenient to learn Bengali than Assamese in Goalpara district of those days. For promoting the cause of Assamese literature and language Chaudhuri himself contributed stories to the magazine Awahan started by him and edited by Dinanath Sarma; it created an era in Assamese literature by its distinguished style and contents. While engaging itself in all-round development of Assamese literature, the periodical patronised both the old and the new writers. Assamese short story got a new impetus from the journal. Chaudhuri himself contributed stories to the magazine regularly. Out of a total of thirty one stories composed by him, twenty nine were printed in the pages of Awahon and the rest in Bardaichila, another celebrated journal of the time. All the short stories of Nagendranarayan have been published in a book form posthumously. These are Nagendranarayan Choudhurir Galpa (The stories of Nagendranarayan Choudhury, 1963), a collection of ten stories and Binar Jhankar (The Vibration of the Lyre, 1964) consisting of fifteen stories. Subsequently all his stories were published under the title of Nagendranarayan Choudhurir Galpa (The stories of Nagendra Narayan Choudhury, 1978). The characteristic feature of his writings is the depiction of Assamese village life in its simple form. Apart from them, he composed poems, dramas, travel accounts and essays on various subjects, besides his autobiography. As ill luck would have it, these compositions have not seen the light of the day up till now. Because of his contribution of high order and considerable significance he was given the honour to preside over the Thirteenth Annual Conference of Assom Sahitya Sabha held at Sibsagar in 1931.

Sat.B.

CHAUDHURI, NARAYAN (Bengali; 1912) was a renowned literary critic, essayist and a musicologist. He had schooling and musicial training at Comilla and Calcutta. He did various jobs for a living viz., a music teacher, school teacher, radio artist, cinema journalist (1942-45), an assistant editor of the Bengali daily Swaraj (1946-49), columnist of Ananda Bazar Patrika, Desh, Jugantar, Satyayug, Dainik Basumati, etc., editor in the publication department of Viswa-Bharati (1950-52), associate editor of the onetime leading literary monthly Shanibarer Chithi (1954-60), and Chief-editor of Gandhi Smarak Nidhi Publications, West Bengal (1960-70).

He was known as a fearless critic in the tradition of Mohitlal Majumdar and Sajanikanta Das. Author of thirty books on such varied subjects as literary criticism, musical survey, sociological study, biography, belles-letters, etc., his principal publications are: Sangit Parikrama (Survey of Music, 1955), Banglar Sahitya (Literature of Bengal, 1956), Banglar Samskriti (Culture of Bengal, 1956), Samakaleen Sahitya (Contemporary literature, 1958), Sahitya O Samaj Manas (Literary and Social ethos, 1962), Katha Sahitya (Fictional Literature, 1964), Gandhiji (1969), Amla-Madhur (Sour and Sweet, 1957), Atmadarshan (Seeing Oneself, 1958), Laghupaksha (The Light-winged, 1959), Kathashilpi Saratchandra (Fictional Artist Saratchandra, 1976), Kazi Nazruler Gan (Songs of Kazi Nazrul, 1977), Sahitya Bhavana (Literary Thoughts, 1978), Leo Tolstoy: Jivan O Sahitya (Leo Tolstoy: Life and Literature, 1980), Uttar-Sarat Bangla Upanyas (Post Saratchandra Bengali Novels 1980, Sarat Memorial Lectures, Calcutta University), Ragsangit O Loksangit (Classical and folk Music, 1982), Baraniya Lekhak Smaraniya Srishti (Venerable Writers and their memorable Writings, 1982). In the field of compilation, he has given us books as under: Sandhyamoni (a selection from the poems of Kalidas Roy, 1959), Ajay Geeti Samgraha (a collection from the songs of Ajay Bhattacharya, 1975), Sanskriti O Apa-Samskriti (Culture and anti-culture, 1977), Manik Sahitya Samiksha (Survey of the Literature of Manik Bandyopadhyay, 1981).

Narayan Choudhuri was awarded 'Shishirkumar Prize' of Amrit Bazar Group of papers in 1977 as the best essayist of the year and Nazrul Prize of Nazrul Academy for his book on Nazrul's songs, in 1981. He was appointed a senior fellow of the Department of Culture, Government of India for 1982-84; President, Democratic Writers Artists Association; and President, India-China Friendship Association, West Bengal.

N.C.

CHAUDHURI, NIRAD. C. (English; b. 1897) started his career as a journalist. A former assistant editor of Modern Review, Calcutta, he also contributed to the Times (London), Encounter, New English Review, The Atlantic Monthly, Pacific Affairs among other journals, and was for sometime a commentator in the All India Radio.

A scholar with bold and iconoclastic theories on religion and culture of India, Nirad C. Chaudhuri is one of the most conscious craftsmen among Indian writers of English prose. He came into prominence in 1951 with his The Autobiography of an Unknown Indian, which is a personal as well as a national history of Bengal at the turn of the century. A fascinating account of childhood in a typical East Bengal village and of adolescence and growth in a Calcutta which was passing through exciting moments of cultural, religious and political movements, the book led to a BBC (British Broadcasting Corporation) sponsored invitation for the author to visit England. Taught by his father–a liberal humanist–to "treat Englishmen as English gentlemen, no less, no more", Nirad C. Chaudhuri found the visit a challenging incentive to his intellectual mettle. Inverting E.M. Forster's famous title A Passage to India, he produced A Passage to England (1959), a book which was more than a travelogue and was distinguished by a graceful articulation of insight into the English way of life, although his Anglicism often led him to gloss over (with sympathy and consideration) the faults of the English people.

He received the Duff Cooper Memorial Prize (instituted in memory of Alfred Duff Cooper, Viscount Norwich) for his Continent of Circe in 1966. Here he attempts an epistemology to understand the interaction between the Hindus on the one hand, and the Muslims and the West on the other. Written from the perspectives of history, ethnology, sociology and philosophy, Nirad C. Chaudhuri is at his devastating best when he lashes out in this book at the Hindu attitude towards dirt and filth, sex and culture. "Trying to escape their swinish plight", he says, "the Hindus cling to certain old memories–the veneration of the Veda, the obsessive feeling for a 'fair skin', the sentiment for rivers and the worship of the cow".

If the three above-mentioned books were primarily meant for Western readers (as evident from his frequent meticulous description of the all-too-familiar social customs and behaviour of Indians and examination of elementary facts about Indian history), Nirad C. Chaudhuri's next two important works were aimed at the Indian readers. In his The Intellectual in India (1967), he relates the problem to the historical past and identifies the three main traditions–Hindu, Muslim and modern–the latter influenced by the West. He then suggests how the intellectual can survive in India, the stress mainly being on the utilitarian aspects rather than on the social responsibility of the Indian intellectual. To Live or Not to Live (1970) is a treatise on social and family relations in India, and advances suggestions as to how they can be changed towards better and greater happiness and fulfilment.

Nirad C. Chaudhuri's two other important publications are biographical: Clive of India: A Political and Psychological Essay (1975) and Scholar Extraordinary: The Life of Professor the Rt. Hon. Friedrich Max Muller (1974). Another important work of his, is Hinduism, A Religion to Live By (1979).

Although all his ideas are not sustainable in terms of logic or history, he compels our attention by his fiercely honest and unsparing criticism of men, morals and manners of Indian society. The unpalatable–but quite often accurate–assessment of othodox Hindu tradition and social behaviour, sometimes loses its credibility because of his strident Anglicism, and is regarded with suspicion by those who are critical of his decision to live in England (where he is now) virtually as an expatriate. But his erudite style, his ability to be at home in Western literature, music and painting, as well as his deep understanding of Indian history in general and the Bengali middle class in particular, place him in an enviable position as an interpreter-although heavily biased by his personal predilection–of modern India to the English speaking audience.

Sum.B:

CHAUDHURI, PRAMATHA (Bengali; b. 1868, d. 1948) was the son of Durgadas Choudhury of Pabna district. He took his first class honours degree in philosophy in 1889 and first class M.A. in English in 1890 from the Calcutta University. In 1893, he went to England to study law and joined the Calcutta bar after his return, but he was not serious enough to make a mark in that profession. For sometime he had been a teacher in the Law College, Calcutta. In 1899, he married Indira Devi, daughter of Satyendranath Tagore. Pramatha Chaudhuri's greatest contribution to Bengali literature was his pioneering efforts to introduce colloquial language in literary Bengali prose. He had to face a storm of opposition in his attempt, but convinced of the fact that only colloquial Bengali could open new horizons in the field of Bengali prose, he firmly stuck to his faith and in 1913 published a new journal, Sabujpatra, in the pages of which he carried on the battle, which was finally won with Rabindranath Tagore joining hands with him. He was the editor and a group of powerful writers lent him all the support. In no time Subujpatra became the journal for new thought and new mode of literary appreciation. He took the pen name of Birbal and wrote many highly satiric pieces under that name. He was a staunch nationalist and his biting comments on orthodox, dogmatic ideas rarely missed their mark. But he wrote under his own name also. It has been asserted by critics that it was his deep acquaintance with the French language that has made his Bengali prose so sharp and hard hitting. As a supreme craftsman of new Bengali literary prose his association with and debt to French literature cannot be overestimated.

Pramatha Chaudhuri is synonymous with the Sabujpatra, as Bankimchandra is with the Bangadarshan and Rabindranath with the Sadhana. Rabindranath also contributed to Sabujpatra. The love of life as it is, the summary rejection of stagnant prejudices, brushing aside the verbose and the sentimental were the traits of Sabujpatra of which Rabindranath was the friend and philosopher and Pramatha Chaudhuri the planning engineer. He cared little for journalistic rules and on one occasion published a number with only Rabindranath's Falguni. He had no intention to organise. He did not care very much for the sale of the paper and after a few years of publications, Sabujpatra was discontinued. But it had already served its historical purpose of putting the chalit (popular) Bengali prose in vogue where verb conjugations are used as they are actually spoken in the urban areas of Calcutta. In sadhu (learned) Bengali prose the very conjugation was taken from medieval Bengali. But gradually not only verb conjugation but use of words, idioms, changed and both Pramatha Chaudhuri and Rabindranath had to find a new rhythm in Bengali chalit (popular) prose while doing away with the music that naturally accompanied any compositions full of tatsama and tadbhava words. His Sonnet–Panchashat came out in 1913. His sonnets differ from other sonnets in Bengali because they follow the French model and not, as is usually done, the Italian model. He had himself written that the French sonnets were easier and he had accepted that form. His second book of poems Pada Charan (1919) also includes many sonnets. His short stories were chiefly published in the Sabujpatra, though we know he had been writing since long before its publication. They are very much different from what generally passes as short story. They are full of his piercing comments and sparkling wit and humour. He has a peculiar way of looking at life–not with deep passion but with sober understanding of the reality. It has been said that in short stories also he had been influenced by the French short story writers. His short stories were not popular literature and though Char Yari Katha was published in 1916 one had to wait till 1941 for a collection of his short stories. But it was in his essays, that he reigned supreme. His multidimensional mind reflected itself in varieties of colours in his essays. He wrote on literature, music, sociopolitical problems and on anything which his analytical brain could reflect upon. His mind was thoroughly rational and his expression was straight and direct. While searching for truth he never became emotional. He was so original in his thought and expression that a critic had rightly remarked, "He alone, of Rabindranath's juniors, influenced the poet without being influenced by him". After Rabindranath's death he stayed for sometime in Shantiniketan and edited the Vishva Bharati Patrika.

So.B.

CHAUDHURI, RAGHUVIR (Gujarati; b. 1938), is a fiction writer, dramatist, essayist, poet and critic. He was born in Bapupura in North Gujarat. He had his primary and secondary education in Mansa in North Gujarat. He joined St. Xaviers College Ahmedabad and graduated from Gujarat University with Hindi and Sanskrit. He got his M.A. and Ph.D. degrees also from Gujarat University. At present he is serving as a lecturer in Hindi in the school of languages of the Gujarat University.

Though he has tried his hand in many literary genres, Raghuvir has earned recognition mainly as a novelist. His first collection of poems Tamsa (1966) contains some poems which are of a superior order.

His first novel Purvaraga (1964) was a sort of authobiographical novel. His fifteen novels have been published so far. Amrita (1966) is not a traditional type of love triangle novel, though the heroine Amrita is asked to select one out of her two boy friends, who themselves are good friends, and are so generous that both are willing to retire in favour of the other. It is in fact a reflective existentialist novel. The hero quotes off and on Camus and other existentialist writers. His novel trilogy Uparvas, Sahavas and Antarvas won for him the Sahitya Akademi award (1977) and also Ranjitram Gold Medal in the same year. It is a novel depicting the social, political and cultural changes which have percolated into the lifestyle and thinking of the people of the rural areas. The novel covers the period of 25 years. Uparvas from 1947 to 1952, Sahavas from 1952 to 1960 and Antarvas from 1960 to 1972. The gradual change is depicted in a convincing manner, with a sense of propriety, representing various cross-sections of the society. Aavaran (1972), a lyrical novel; Rudramahal (1978), a historical novel; Shravan Rate (1978), a psychological novel are some of his fictions which have become popular.

Raghuvir's four collections of short stories Akasmik Sparsa (1968), Gersamai (1972), Bahar Koi Chhe (1973), and Nandigher indicate that though the writer adopts modern technique, and depicts modern social trends, he has not turned his back on the tradition. His plays: Ashokvan Ane Zulta Minara (1970), Sikandar Sani (1980) present social and historical themes respectively. His one-act play collection Dimlight (1979) is a laudable effort in the dramatic genre.

In his works on criticism Adhunik Kavita (1976) he elaborately and aptly discusses modernism in poetry.

Saharani Bhavyata (1980) is a collection of pen portraits of various Gujarati writers.

C.M.

CHAUDHURI, RAJ KAMAL (Hindi b. 1929, d. 1969). A controversial author of the new generation, a leading poet and story-writer of the 'Anti-poetry wave', Raj Kamal was editor of the Gyananodaya and Rag-Rang.

Essentially he is a poet of self-aberration. He accepted life as offered by his circumstances and the age without any facade of value-attachments. He underwent all experiences in respect of human relations, religion, family, marriage, politics and the society as a whole in its decadent and ironical transformation and these transitions became one with his own personality. It is because of this that his outbursts, his emotional eruptions do not appear to be reactions of a particular set of circumstances but they readily radiate in many images, symbols and new myths the process of his self-aberration. Raj Kamal is an adept in merging external circumstances with his personal experience and project them into attractive imaginary symbols. His poetry mirrors the disruptive, perversive and prohibitive tendencies of the age with their total absurdities as the representative changes of the poet's own personality. Raj Kamal has written realistically about 'death consciousness' with extreme aloofness.

His early poetic work Swar-Gandha is really 'Swar-Gandha' or 'The Fragrant notes'. In Kankavati, (1966) there are profuse allusions to history, puranas, ancient legends and 'Nijandharis.' It reflects both the power of creation and a sense of discipline. Kankavati is composed in spoken idiom while Mukti-Prasang (1966) adopts the reflective language.

Mukti-Prasang is the combination of profuse quotations, pithy Aaynas, time-honoured symbols, daring sensuality, absolutely personal reflection on the world events making newspaper headlines, exaggerated infatuation nakedness of thought, poetry in the form of diary, poetry on the basis of notes of reference and a sense of haplessness of the modern age.

Raj Kamal's Mukti-Prasang, is very relevant for comprehending the trends of the post-'Nai Kavita' current. In this long poem a death-loving poet's creative outburst separates it from the 'Nai-Kavita', tradition. The extreme agony of human sensitivity in the entirety of real life-situations has found an apt expression in this work of Raj Kamal Chaudhuri.

FURTHER WORKS: Novels—Nadi Bahati Thi', Machhali Mari Hui, Deh-gatha (1960), Tisra Admi, Rakivon ka Biascope (1972), Agnisnan (1978). Collection of Stories—Machhali Jal (1978).

Gov. R.

CHAUDHURI, RAMAKANTA (Assamese; b. 1846 d. 1889) was a noted poet and dramatist. Son of Lakshmikanta Chaudhuri, he passed F.A. from Collegiate School in 1870 and began his service life as a cierk in the Deputy Commissioner's Office in Gauhati. He served in Goalpara and Dhubri also in various capacities. Later he came back to Gauhati and served as a Sirastadar.

His first work was Abhimanyu Badh (1875), a poem written in blank verse. Michael Madhusudan Dutt, the famous poet and dramatist of Bengal was his model. The poem consists of 98 pages divided into three cantos. It covers the episode of the Mahabharata beginning from the war under the generalship of Bhishma and ended in the killing of Abhimanyu. He also wrote two dramas, viz Sitaharan (Abduction of Sita) and Ravan Badh (Ravana killed) in the later part of the 19th century. But none of the books is available today and nothing can be said about these titles. Ramakanta Choudhuri was the first Assamese poet to use blank verse in modern Assamese poetry. He is also the father of modern Assamese mythological drama.

G.G.

CHAUDHURI, RAMAPADA (Bengali; b. 1922) is an eminent author in modern Bengali fiction. He took his M.A. degree in English from Calcutta University. A journalist by profession, the author has been continuing his literary pursuits since early youth. He has more than fifty titles to his credit, of which at least twenty are novels. But short story was his first love. A few collections of stories, Swarna Marich (Golden Marich, 1949), Darbari (Befitting a royal Court, 1953), etc., were published before the publication of his first novel. One of his earliest short stories, namely, 'Udayasta' was a remarkable story of very ordinary men depicted against the background of a railway station in a simple lucid style. But in most of his early stories, an illusory veil of romantic imagination dissociated the creative self of the author from the hard reality of life. This attitude of the author had been reflected also in the ornate and stylized language of those stories. But there came over a change since the days of Darbari. In fact, this collection was acclaimed by critics and general readers alike. Pratham Prahar (Earliest Phase, 1954) was his first experiment in novel-writing. The pleasure, pains and mysteries of adolescence have been portrayed in a reminiscent mood. Another novel, Ban Palashir Padavali (Lyrics of Ban Palashi, 1962) was a more ambitious enterprise– its story evolving on a wide rural perspective. In this novel have been mirrored the inner potentials and tranquillity of the village community of India. In between those two novels there was Lal Bai (1956), a romantic episode of the feudal past. Since the beginning of the seventies, the author has established himself as a powerful exponent of the varied and intricate problems of modern life. In the novel Ekhani, (Just now, 1969) which was awarded Rabindra Memorial prize in 1971 is shown the frustration of the rootless young people, who are almost completely alienated from the tradtional values of the past. Among his later novels, Khariz (Dismissal, 1974) is unique for its excellent admixture of satire and sympathy. Je Jekhane Dariyen (One at one's own place, is admirable for its subtle psychological study in the mysteries and pathos of extra-marital love. The author's deep understanding of life has reached its high-water mark in Beez (Seed, 1978) which represents, through an intriguing episode, the author's quest of a meaningful life in the midst of utter hollowness and irrelevance of our existence in modern times. Several novels of the author have been translated into different languages.

Gop. R.

CHAUDHURI, YOGESHCHANDRA (Bengali; b. 1886 d 1941) was a Bengali dramatist and actor. Born in Gobardanga in the Twenty-four Parganas district of Bengal, he started his career as a school teacher in his village. In 1915 he was for some time an actor in Bengal Theatre. Then he joined Sisirkumar Bhaduri (1889-1959) the famous actor of the Bengali stage who inspired Yogeshchandra to compose his best known play Sita. In collaboration with Sisirkumar he acted in this play which was staged in the newly opened Manomohan Theatre (1924). Yogeshchandra also accompanied Sisirkumar to the United States (1931). Among his plays are Digvijaya (1928), Vishnupriya (1931), Banglar Meye (1934), Pather Sathi (1935), Makadsar Jal (1939) and Mahamayar Char (1940).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Ashutosh Bhattacharya, Bangla Natya Sahityer Itihas (Vol. 2, Calcutta, 1961).

B.D.

CHAUHAN, SHIVDAN SINGH (Hindi. b. 1916) ranks as one of the earliest Hindi critics who, with a systematic and rational approach, laid down the foundation of progressive critical thought in Hindi. His article titled 'Bharat Mein Pragatishil Sahitya ki Avashyakata' published in 1937 in the Vishal Bharat led Hindi criticism into a definitely different channel. His theoretical approach was influenced by Caudwell who viewed Marxist theories as a blend of psycho-analysis and the resultant achievements of modern science. The first collection of his essays is titled Pragativad (1946). Viewing literature as entity inseparable from the society, he applied his Maxist concept for assessing and evaluating literary trends and currents. And for this he considered it imperative to probe into the social causes and influences that moved the literary creativity of the age. According to the dialectical materialistic thought, he attributes individual consciousness in its developed form to social growth. Emerging on the individual plane, this consiousness assumes a social texture and helps in the creation of a social ego relating to the entire community. With the development of the society, art also undergoes change and progresses as well as the 'social ego'.

A major conclusion of Shivdan about poetry is that the emotion is not something invariable or constant, it undergoes changes. Regarding the objective of poetry, his contention is that it creates a sort of human attachment towards social life and social reality. The material ingredient for poetic creativity is represented not by isolated individual experience but by the experience of the community.

His Hindi Sahitya ke Assi Varsh was awarded a prize by the U.P. Government.

FURTHER WORKS: Sahitya ki Parakh (1948), Alochana ke Siddhanta, (1952), Sahityanushilan (1955), Alochana ke Man (1958).

Gov.R.

CHAUHAN, SUBHADRA KUMARI (Hindi. b. 1904, d. 1947) was educated at the Crosthwaite Girl's College, Allahabad. At the age of fifteen, she was married to Thakur Lakshmansingh Chauhan, who was an advocate at Jabalpur and later a freedom fighter. She, however, continued her education even after her marriage. When in 1921, Mahatma Gandhi gave the call for the Non-cooperation movement of India's struggle for freedom, she took an active part in it. Consequently, she was imprisoned in 1923. She was jailed a second time in 1942, and later elected a member of the Legistrative Assembly.

Subhadra Kumari began composing poems in her early childhood. In this, she was inspired by her father Thakur Ramnath Singh, who sang devotional songs. Her early poems appeared in renowned journals like the Saraswati and the Madhuri. Her poems were infused with immense patriotic fervour. She also presents in her poems everyday experiences of family life. Her best known poem titled 'Jhansi ki Rani' (The Queen of Jhansi) has inspired generations with patriotic zeal and another equally well-known poem 'Viron ka Kaisa ho Vasant' (How the brave celebrate Spring') became a powerful source of inspiration to the freedom fighters and countless youths in schools and colleges.

She also wrote short stories, which were idealistic in nature and portrayed middleclass life. She died in a motor-car accident in the year 1947.

Her other major works are Mukul (Bud) (Collection of poems), Allahabad, 1931, Bikhare Moti (Strewn Pearls) (Collection of poems) Unmadini (The Intoxicated) (Collection of Stories).

V.D.S

CHAUPAI (Gujarati) is normally a metre of sixteen matras, but in Gujarati Chaupai, there are only fifteen matras. Another speciality of Gujarati is that the metres which belong to Chaupai class like 'Charnakul' and 'Jakarj' are also known as Chaupais. But in the poets like Samal and Dalapatram we find Chaupais of sixteen matras also.

Chaupai is used for couplets as well as in longer narrative poems like Prabandha and Akhyana. Mostly Chaupais of sixteen matras are found in which at the end there is one long and one short letter (short letter consists of one matra, while long consists of two). It is divided into four lines, and in every line the last word rhymes with the last word of the next line. The metre is easily recitable. Many a time at the end of the line 'Re' or 'Ji' is added and hence we find the dissimilarity in the matra units of the lines, but that does not affect in the least the recitation of the poem. As the metre is very convenient for descriptions, it is very effective in the descriptions of incidents, and also in sermonising.

There is an extensive use of the metre in mediaeval period. The poems like Ushaharan by Virjee (1464); Sitaharan by Karman (1470) and Ramayana by Madan (16th century) solely use this metre for narration. Poets like Bhalan, Premananda and Dayaram have used this metre for their introductory lines. Jain poets were very much fond of this metre. In the 15th century Deval, Rushivardhan and Lavanyasamay in their Chandanbala Charmra Chaupai, Nalraj Chaupai and Sidhhata Chaupai respectively have composed the entire poems in Chaupai metre. In the 16th century Kushallabh in his Madhavanal Chaupai and Marudhola Chaupai has shown the propriety of the metre for longer narrative poems. Chaupai is also a very popular metre in folk poetry. Because of its power of successful depiction of various sentiments it is extensively in vogue in modern period also and besides Dalapatram, Krishnalal Shridharani, Priyakanta Maniar and Nalin Raval have extensively used the metre in their poems.

No.P.

CHAUPAI (Hindi) is a typical and popular Hindi metre consisting of four feet with sixteen syllabic instances (Matras) in each. Though there is no fixed and hard rule in respect of the order of syllabic instances, yet normally an effort is made to place even number of 'matras' after the even numbered one and the odd numbered matras after the odd number ones. The use of 'jagan' and 'tagan' is forbidden at the end. The conjunction of even and even could be exemplified by 'guru pad raj moridu manjul an-jan and that of odd-odd/even-even by the example 'nitya bhajiya taji man kuti-lai'. The use of odd-odd-even, odd-odd-even could be seen in 'Kapahu Ram ki Katha Suha-i-' and the following could be the example of two odds used as even: 'ban-daun Ram nam Raghu-bar Ko'. While Tulsi in his Ramacharitmanas has adhered meticulously to the metric discipline of the 'Chaupai', other poets like Chandbradai, Jayasi, Sundaradas, Surdas Nanddas, etc., have shown a flexibility in its use. In this discipline lies the beauty of Tulsi's metric felicity and flow.

The use of the 'Chaupai' metre commences with Hindi's earliest poet Chandbardai. It is especially suited to the narrative contexts which provide occasions for diverse sentiments. This is precisely the reason for its popularity in narrative and epic poetry. This is why it has been used by not only poets of the heroic sentiment but also by poets of the romantic narratives like Kutban, Jayasi, Usman and Nur Muhammad. To link the narrative pieces together, even Surdas has used it. Lal's Chhatra Prakash relies on this metre and amongst the Saint poets Sundardas, too, used the 'Doha-Chaupai' style. Amongst the modern poets Dwarkaprasad Mishra used the same metric device in his celebrated epic Krishnayan.

Ma.C.

CHAUPAI (Maithili) or Chatushpai is a verse form consisting of lines, each line of usually sixteenth instants, in Maithili. The metre of the 'Charya' poems are 'matravritta' being mostly 'Padakulaka or Chaupai which originated in the late mediaeval period'. A specifically Bengali or East Magadhan metre like the 'payara' of 14 syllables is not found and this is one of the important reasons to suppose that they are mostly Maithili specimens.

The 'Chaupai' is generally the most popular metre in narrative poetry. Manabodha, the author of the Krishnajanma is regarded as one of the best narrative poets who has used this metre in his great poem to near perfection. The metre of the poem (Krishnajanma) is uniform throughout. There is a variety of Chaupai chhanda containing fifteen instants in each half line with a break after the sixth. The last three instants in each half rhyme with each other, and usually take the form of one long syllable and one short, however, they may sometimes take the form of three short syllables thus U U U: but in every case the last syllable must be short. Usually, but not always, the eleventh and twelfth instants also consist of two short syllables.

This metre alone with 'Doha and Chappaya' has been used at length by some of the writers of Kirtaniya drama which constitute an important limb of Mediaeval Maithili literature. The growth of the song metres recorded in Jayadeva (Skt. poet) and Lochana (Maithila) is found illustrated in the Charyas which are mainly in simple Chaupai metres.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Dineshkumar Jha, Maithili Kavya-Sastra (1978)., Jayakanta Mishra, A History of Maithili Literature, Vol. I.; Radhakrishna Chaudhari, A Survey of Maithili Literature, Deoghar, (1976).

U.T.

CHAUPAI (Rajasthani). It was a favourite metre with the early poets, especially the Jainas. Ratnasekhara Suri (14th century) has defined it in his Chandashikosa as a 'matrika' metre of four 'pada' of fifteen 'matra' each, and has preferred to call it 'Lahu Chaupaiya'. He has prescribed that the whole metres contain sixty 'matra' should and every individual 'pad' should end with a five 'matra' unit. Jnansra defines chaupai as a metre having fifteen matra in a pada, made up of eight + seven, with a pause in between. Similar definition has been recorded by Adha Kisana in his Raghuvarajasa prakash; he describes it as a metre having fifteen 'matras' in each of the four 'padas; ending with a long and short matra— 'guru-laghu'. It is strange that older texts of classical Indian metres do not mention 'chaupai' under the 'chatushpadi' or 'dvipadi' metres, despite the fact that it has been in common use with the language-poets down from the 13th century.

The earliest 'chaupai', known as 'aubhadra sati' chatuspadika was composed in the early 13th century. The Bharats wara Bahubali Rasa of Salibhadra Suri, composed in 1184 also contains plenty of description in 'chaupai' metre. It was freely used, mostly by Jaina poets, upto the 19th century, and even to the present time to some extent. Some important works in this metre are— Padmawati chupai by Jinaprabhasuri (14th century), Guravali chaupai (14th century) and Jnanpancami chaupai by Jinavijayasuri (14th century). Among the later books mention may be made of Sadayavatsa prabandha of Bhimakavi (15th century), Kanhadade prabandha of Padmanabha (15th century), Dholamaru chaupai by Kushala Labha (16th-17th century), Gaura Badala chaupai of Hemaratana (17th century), Madhumalati chaupai of Chaturbhujadasa (17th century), Naladawa-danti chaupai' and Sitaraima chaupai of Samayasundara (17th century), etc. It is noteworthy that the Jaina poets have made a profuse use of the metre and quite a few hundred such compositions are mentioned in the catalogues of MSS. libraries.

Raw.S.

CHAUPANNAMAHAPURISHACHARIYAM (Prakrit) (Chatuhpanchashanmaha-purushacharitam), is a great epic work composed by Shilanka in the year 868 A.D., in the Maharashtri Prakrit language, in prose alternating with verse (the Champu type) containing 10800 shlokas. It contains the legendary biographies or life-accounts of 54 excellent persons (uttamapurushas) or later on called Shalakapurushas of the Jaina tradition, i.e., the 'History of the World' or the 'Universal History', which usually admits 63 such persons, like the 24 Jinas, 12 Chakravartins, 9 triads of Baladevas, Vasudevas and Prativasudevas. But the nine Prativasudevas, i.e., the enemies of the Vasudevas or the villains are not considered as excellent or illustrious persons by our author and this is in agreement with the earlier tradition recorded in the Samavayanga, an early Jaina canonical text. In the Kahavali (Kathavali) of Bhadreshvara, a Prakrit prose work this number has been increased to 72 by including the names of nine Naradas. The Chaupannamahapurishachariyam is the earliest Prakrit work of its kind. We find similar works composed by other authors, like Jinasena-Gunabhadra and Hemachandra in the Sanskrit language, Pushpadanta in the Apabhramsha language, Bhadreshvara in the Prakrit language and so on. Shilanka has not divided his work into literary units but the whole work is simply fragmented into the biographies of the individual mahapurushas and triads, totalling 40 in number (24 Jinas, 12 Chakravartins, and 9 triads, i.e. 45 minus 5 (3 Jinas: Shanti, Kunthu and Ara who are also Chakravartins; 1 Chakravartin Bharata who is the son of the first Jina Rishabha; and 1 Vasudeva Krishna who coincides with the 22nd Jina Arishtanemi).

The work begins with salutations to Jina Rishabha and Mahavira and the goddess of learning. Then follow the descriptions of the distinction between the wicked and the virtuous, the universe, the time-cycle and the account of the seven law-makers (Kulakaras). The poet relates the birth of the first Jina Rishabha, his birth ceremony, the origin of the Ikshvaku lineage, Rishabha's marriage and coronation, the foundation of the Vinitanagari, the birth of Rishabha's sons and daughters, the introduction of various arts and sciences, the renunciation ceremony of Rishabha, his omniscience and the sermon. Then follow the battle between Bahubalin and Chakravartin Bharata, the emancipation of Bahubalin, the reference to Marichi, the would-be founder of a heretical faith (Bhagavata darshana), the emancipation of Rishabha and Bharata.

The biographies of other illustrious persons follow the same pattern. The particulars that are given in the beginning of each character are the intervening time, the name, the duration of life and the height. The details of all the characters are not of the same length. There are rather small notes on the biographies of 21 characters whereas the rest have small or large details. Various previous existences of eight Jinas (Rishabha, Sambhava, Sumati, Shanti, Malli, Nemi, Parshva and Mahavira), three Chakravartins, (Bharata, Sanatkumara and Brahmadatta) and one Vasudeva (Triprishtha) are related but only those of four of them, viz., Rishabha, Shanti, Brahmadatta and Parshva are in great details.

The origin of the dynasties like Ikshvaku, Hari as well as Kuru are described in the biographies of Rishabha and Arishtanemi respectively. In the biography of Triprishtha there is the account of Kapila and his pupil Asuri and the foundation of the Shathi-tantra (the Samkhya doctrine).

Therein the origin of the lord of creatures (the Prajapati) is also related. The charioteer of Triprishtha is said to be the previous birth of Gautama, the first head of the assemblage of monks (Ganadhara) under Jina Mahavira. In the account of the Subhuma Chakravartin there is the story of Jamadagni and Parashurama. The Rama-story appearing in a very brief form in the biography of Jina Munisuvrata is said to be based on the Paumachariyam by the author himself. But the story agrees with that of the Valmiki-Ramayana in certain aspects: the name of the sister of Ravana is Shurpanakha, there are references to the episodes of the deer and the killing of Valin, Ravana is said to have ten faces, and Lanka was burnt by Hanumat. One thing peculiar in this work is that Jina Mahavira is said to have married several girls. No other work earlier or later subscribes to this view; Mahavira had only one wife, Yashoda. A special feature of this work is that a Sanskrit-Prakrit one-Act-play Vibudhananda (the happiness of the learned) is introduced with a didactic purpose. It is staged by the Minister Vimalamati to induce his Master Mahabala (4th pre-birth of Rishabha) to renounce the world. The end of the drama is tragic. Prince Lakshmidhara and princess Bandhumati develop mutual love but immediately after their marriage ceremony the prince dies of the snake-bite and the princess also enters his funeral pyre.

Besides the previous birth stories there are five other intervening stories with a didactic tendency. The motifs employed in them are known from other sources. The author of these stories seems to be Shilanka himself. The first story is about a Brahmin Mugdhabhatta which is related by Jina Ajita to the audience to illustrate the favourable and astonishing supernatural results of having firmness in the right faith (samyaktva). The Brahmin throws his son in the fire to show the effect of his firm faith and the child is saved by a deity.

Out of the remaining four stories which seem to have elements of folk-tales and fairy tales three are in the form of autobiographies narrated by individual monks who are asked by some characters to tell them the cause of abandoning the worldly life. In these stories the hero after much suffering and exertion gains a valuable object, generally a woman whom he loses or foresakes because she is unfaithful or he thinks her to be so. He takes a lesson about the futility of the worldly life and renounces the world. The Chaupannamahapurishachariyam is basically a Pauranic work but it provides now and then the flavour of poetry and therefore it becomes a poetical composition. In it occasionally one enjoys descriptions of the sun-rise, the dusk, the moon-rise, the summer, the rainy season, the winter, the spring, the seasonal sports and the festivity, the hill, the forest, the lake, various human settlements, the palace, the royal road, the abodes of the recluses, the monks, the riches, the kings, the Kapalika Bhairavananda, the elephant and sports with him and so on. There are the scenes of the battles, the march of the army, the victory, the relishing water-sports, the charchari-dance, the cock-fight and other sports. There are also charming descriptions of the physical beauty, the love scenes, the movements of the enamoured ladies, the separation of the lovers, and the ladies anxious to meet their husbands or lovers. Along with that there are religious incantations to the Jinas, the description of their birth-ceremony and the Samosarana (assembly hall). As a special trait of the Jaina work it is interspersed with sermons on the tenets of the religion and the Karma-theory. Sometimes the reader delights in some astonishing and supernatural events too.

The figures of speech that are common in this work are: the alliteration, the simile, the metaphor and the pun (anuprasa, yamaka, upama, rupaka, shlesha and shrinkhalayamaka). The literary pastimes in the form of riddles are also found in it.

The Prakrit language is simple and fluent interspersed with easy compounds both in the prose and the versical portion. There are sufficient number of deshya words, sayings and proverbs employed in it. Colloquial forms as well as a few passages in Apabhramsha are also available in it. The play in it is in the Sanskrit language.

It has its own cultural importance as a voluminous work of the medieval period. Enormous data are available in it regarding social customs, ceremonies, entertainments, village and the tribal life, music, dance and the dramatical performances, painting and sculpture as well as religions beliefs. Thus the Chaupannamahapurishachariyam represents a unique book of the biographies of the Jaina Mahapurusha which gives an insight into the socio-religious conditions of the age when this work was composed (9th century).

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Amritlal Mohanlan Bhojak, Chaupannamahapurishachariya of Shrilanka, ed. Prakrit Text Society, Varanasi, 1961.

K.R.C.

CHAUTISHA (Oriya), a type of lyrical ballad, was very popular in ancient and medieval Oriya literature. A Chautisha is composed in thirty four couplets or stanzes in the alphabetical order from Ka to Ksa. Literally it is a term derived from Chautirisha, derogated form of Chaturtrinshati (thirty four) in Sanskrit. Its popularity can be compared with the sonnets of English literature. Some Oriya Chautishas are also named as 'Koili' (Cuckoo) as the poems are addressed to a cuckoo by a mother or a sweet-heart separated from her dear one. Generally the pangs of separation are expressed throughout the poem. The most popular and ancient Chautisha ever discovered, is Kesava Koili of Markanda Das. Mother Yashoda reveals her heart and feelings on the deparature of her darling Krishna to Mathura.

The next is the Kalasa Chutisha of Bacha Das (13th century). It is a panegyric to Shiva composed in thirty four stanzas; the style is satirical throughout. Artha Koili of Jagannath Das (16th century) is a noteworthy piece of Chautisha. The Chautisha style is still followed in the modern period.

Do. S.

CHAVDA KISHANSINH GOVINDASINH (Gujarati; b. 1904, d. 1979) was an essayist and autobiographer. He had his base at Baroda during his writing career, but a tendency to move on was the very essence of the creative urge in him. He was educated at Gujarat Vidyapeeth, and Santiniketan. After service in a native state, he went abroad to learn printing technology. It was in 1947, while he was running a printing press in Baroda, that he came into closer contact with Umashankar Joshi. This enabled him to find his direction as a creative writer and lent a new accuracy of expression and subtlety to his work.

For his source, Kishansinh drew on his own personal experience. He was keenly responsive to the life around him as a writer, and in his career he moved from journalism to the purely literary forms such as the personal essay and the autobiography, from outward incidents to the inner truth. Among his works are: Amasana Tara (Stars of the night of no-moon), a collection of sketches of incidents and characters drawn from personal life, Himalayani Patra-Yatra, letters describing the author's stay in the Himalayas; and Amasathi Punam Bhani (From the day of no-moon to the full-moon day), an autobiographical account bringing the author's wide range of experience together and depicting them in a perspective.

In addition to writing numerous short stories and one novel, Kishansinh did considerable work as a translator. He translated the Jnaneshvari from Marathi and Krishnaprem's The Yoga of the Bhagavadgita from English, into Gujarati. His zest for life, and his openness to newer experiences, remained with him even during his later years, when he had taken to the spiritual path.

Ra.C.

CHAVUNDARAYA (Kannada; b. 901, d. 984), the author of Trisasti-lakshana-Mahapurana, more popularly known as Chavundaraya-purana (978 A.D.) has more than one claim to fame. Besides being the author of the above work which until the discovery of Vaddaradhane was considered the first great Kannada work in prose, he immortalised his name by being responsible for the installation of the monolithic statue of Gomateshwara at Shravanabelagola. A valiant warrior, he was the chief of the army first with Narasimha, the Nolamba ruler of Gangavadi, and then with Rachamalla IV and finally from 977 to 984 a minister and chief of the army of Rakkasaganga Rachamalla. A warrior though he was, he was a man of deep religious faith and an ardent propagator of Jainism, which is borne out by the Mahapurana he wrote as well as the giant statue he got installed.

The Purana he wrote is a religious work devoted to elucidating the teachings of Jainism and describing the lives of the sixty three saints among whom the twenty four Tirthankaras occupy a prominent place. This is the only Jaina Mahapurana in Kannada which includes the lives of all the Tirthankaras. Based on earlier Sanskrit works by Jinasena and Gunabhadra, the work's distinction lies in that it successfully adumbrates extensive material and marshals it in straightforward prose. A master of concise narration, he carefully eschews all conventional descriptions, repetitive details, detailed discussions and all controversies. Conciseness being his cardinal virtue, proceeding straight with his narrative is his primary concern. The stress, therefore, falls on his style which, never ornate or overweighted with Sanskrit, is well-suited to serve the author's avowed purpose which was to elucidate the religious teachings and describe the lives of the saints for the ordinary reader. The special distinction of the work is that it achieves a balance between narrative and exposition with a marked partiality for the original idiom of the language. In addition to being a writer himself, Chavundaraya was a patron of letters.

V.M.I.

CHEITHAROL KUMBABA (Manipuri) is an important book in ancient Meitei script containing accounts of the kings of Manipur. It was rendered into current script and edited by Lairenmayum Ibungohal Singh and N. Khelchandra Singh and first published in 1967 by the Manipuri Sahitya Parishad, Imphal.

Cheitharol Kumbaba is the record of the kings of Manipur who ascended the throne of Manipur from the time of Nongda Lairen Pakhangba (33-154) till date. It records important incidents, exploits, changes, etc. that were brought in during the tenure of a particular king in chronological order. When there was the institution of kingship, a separate branch known as 'Pandit Loishang' (Office of the Pandit) was in existence which took up the responsibility of entering the materials in Cheitharol Kumbaba. The entries were supposed to be made in the book almost daily and the man responsible had the freedom to make his choices in the entries. Different versions are available which are distinguished from each other in respect of entries and the periods of entries in the book. But the most authentic version of the book is considered to be the one preserved in the royal palace of Manipur which Pandits might have copied for their personal use and in the process committed omissions and commissions.

Though the entries are in the nature of a diary, Cheitharol Kumbaba contains important materials, very useful in regard to the the socio-religious, political and cultural history of Manipur. Containing almost everything concerning the life of the people during the reign of a particular king, it is the only comprehensive book of the kind to be found in ancient Meitei script. For instance, the book gives accounts of the arrival of the Muslims, the Brahmins, etc. from different parts of India to Manipur in different waves, the spread of Hinduism in Manipur, the resentment of the local people during the initial stages against the new religion, the contributions of different kings to the development and enrichment of Manipuri culture, etc.

The version in Meitei script, published by the Manipuri Sahitya Parishad, Imphal, according to one of the editors, was available in the present form in about 1925 during the reign of Maharaja Churachand Singh (1891-1941). The two editors read different versions and after editing brought out the present version. The entries are done in Saka era.

A very intriguing problem with Cheitherol Kumbaba is the period of its composition. Three schools are there who hold differnt opinions on the period of composition of the book. One school says that since the book contains entries from the time of Pakhangba, writing must have continued right from his time. The accounts of 37 kings from the days of Pakhangba in 33 A.D. till the reign of Ninghoukhomba (1432-1467) covering a period of almost 15 centuries is limited in 8 pages in the book as it is now and the language also is too modern to be of that period. The second school claims that the writing might have been done during the reign of Maharaja Kiyamba (1467-1508); during this time modifications had been made also in the existing text of the book. The language too lends credentials to the claim and from this time onwards, the entries are more or less systematic. An entry in the book which says that when Maharaja Bhagyachandra (1763-1798) was at Kanchipur in 1780, writing of the lost Cheitharol Kumbaba was taken up in consultation with Anantashai Khwairakpa. This clearly indicates that the book had been there before Maharaja Bhagyachandra. The third school claims that as the entry clearly says that Cheitharol Kumbaba was reconstructed during the reign of Maharaja Bhagyachandra, there should be no two opinions on this point. The editors are of the view that the reconstruction in the days of Maharaja Bhagyachandra must have been done from different copies and versions in the hands of individual scholars and the writing must have been done much earlier than the reconstruction. Another supporting evidence to the claim of the second school is from the book itself. The practice of 'Cheithaba' (literally meaning 'forsaking a pole') in which at the beginning of the year in mid-April a man is named in the presence of the king and other dignitaries who swears to bear on himself the brunt of miseries and suffering, natural or otherwise, for the whole year, started from the reign of Kiyamba and the names of the Cheithabas are invariably entered from this time onwards. Before this no name of Cheithaba is to be found in the book.

I.R.B.S.

CHELLAPPA C.S. (Tamil; b. 1912) also known as 'Si Su' Chellappa, was born in the town of Batlagundu, Madurai District. He left his collegiate studies to take part in the freedom struggle and in the Swadeshi and Non-cooperation movements launched by Mahatma Gandhi and courted arrest and imprisonment. In the first three or four decades of the century, freedom struggle in Tamilnadu and modern Tamil writing flourished side by side because of the poetic spirit of Subrahmanya Bharati. Chellappa and his relative B.S. Ramayya (from Batlagundu) were as much drawn towards the freedom struggle as towards writing. Both were flowering into short story writers when the production and release of Manikkodi considered the best forum for the short story, were initiated. Both Ramayya and Chellappa worked with dedication for Manikkodi, the production and release of each issue of which was a marvel because of the precarious financial resources of the magazine. When Manikkodi folded up finally after a couple of deceptive revivals, Chellappa participated in the production of a few other periodical publications. He launched his own literary monthly review Ezhuthu in 1958 and for over ten years, a new generation of poets and prose-writers and critics converged on the pages of the review, the most notable of them being S. Vaideeswaran, C. Mani, T.S. Venugopalan, Dharmu Sivaramu, Ezhilmudalvan, V. Swaminathan, and others. Another feature of the review was that it established a dialogue between the better class of writers and readers of Tamilnadu and Sri Lanka. In the wake of the enthusiasm generated by the periodical for serious reading, Chellappa also launched on a book publication programme and one of the widely discussed books of his is Pudu Kuralgal (New Voices), an anthology of poetry by the new poets. He set a new trend in book production–simple, elegant and meaningful. He also published his studies on the Tamil short story, his own long poem 'Nee Inru Irundal' (If you were alive today, the words being addressed to Mahatma Gandhi), and individual collections of poems by several poets. Chellappa's own stories are marked by a superior sense of form and moral value. His two novels Vadivasal and Jeevanamsam (the monetary provision made by a man for his divorced wife) are noteworthy for their authentic south Indian cultural and domestic flavour and the way he has used new techniques of narration. Chellappa has also rendered into a play his short story 'Muraimai Penn' (a girl traditionally betrothed to her uncle or cousin). He was instrumental in fixing a memorial plaque at the house in which the pioneer Tamil novelist B.R. Rajam Aiyer was born.

A.

CHELLAPPAN NAIR, N.P. (Malayalam; b. 1903, d. 1972) was popularly known as 'N.P.' He contributed to the fields of drama, short story and humour. All his works continue the comic legacy of E.V. Krishna Pillai. His short stories are collected in sixteen books. Out of his forty works, twenty two are plays. Atom Bomb, Minnal Pranayam, Pranaya Jambavan, Itiyum Minnalum, Khsirabala Sahacharadi Kasayattil and Ibilisukalute Nattil are some of his much appreciated plays. Himself being a good actor and a radio artist, he could casily win the admiration of the audience.

In spite of his high offical positions in Government service, he maintained a close relationship with readers through his amusing works. The Kerala Sahitya Akademy awarded him a prize designed for the best playwright. He wrote many articles which are of research value too. The situations described in his popular essays are contemporaneous; his characters are lively and his diction lucid. His writings contain humour in combination with good narrative style. A clear switch over from situational intrigue and thematic intrigue to character intrigue is visible in plays like the award-winning play Ibilisukalute Nattil in which the selfishness of a communist and a congressman is exposed powerfully and sarcastically. He has taken his subject and characters mainly from social life, though history, mythology etc. have also given him ample source for materials. His writings bear a stamp of his own and he could beautifully picturise the miscellaneous aspects of life, with a fine dramatic sense, a deep moral outlook and a penetrating satirical touch. He was an accredited amateur actor, good speaker and an excellent conversation a list too. He has an imporant place among the modern prose writers of Malayalam.

V.S.S.

CHEMMEEN (Malayalam) is a novel by Thakazhi Sivasankara Pillai. It was published in 1956. It had the double distinction of winning the Sahitya Akademi Award (1957) and the President's Gold Medal when it appeared on the silver screen (1966). In it one sees Thakazhi almost at his best, with all his richness of experience, ripeness of age, power of observation, vividness of imagination and his skill in construction. The novel deals with the life of the fishermen living on the sea-coast of Central Kerala. Their main source of income is prawns, after which the novel is named.

Karuthamma, daughter of a fisherman Chempankutty by name, and Pareekutty, a Muslim boy in the neighbourhood, are constant playmates right from their childhood. With the passage of years their companionship ripens into love. When it leaks out, her parents manage to marry her to Pazhani a hefty youth in their own community. Pazhani takes her to his hut and in due course Karuthamma becomes a mother. Though not unaware of the scandal against his wife all along, Pazhani does not pay heed to it, but when he gets more evidence in support of it he is upset. He interrogates his wife and sets out in the stormy sea. On the same day Pareekutty visits Karuthamma to inform her of her mother's death. The lovers who met for the first time after a long separation forget themselves in their flush of reminiscence and embrace each other. Two days later, their dead bodies, the battered boat of Pazhani and a dead shark are found deposited on the shore. Pazhani too had been swallowed up by the 'Mother-sea'.

Apart from the romance that forms the core of the story, the novel depicts a faithful picture of the fishermen's life with all its activities and adventures, agonies and uncertainties. The main characters are the product of the novelist's insight into human nature and his creative power.

The tragic end of the story is based on the belief among the fishermen that the life of a man on the sea rests in the hands of his woman on the shore, i.e. on her chastity. Karuthamma's affair with Pareekutty when her husband is out in the sea is presented as a prelude to the disastrous climax. The work has therefore been described by some as a legend cast in a novel's mould.

K.S.N.

CHENGNI KHUJAI (Manipuri) is a humorous sociopolitical short play of the most eminent playwright of Manipur, Gitchandra Singh Tongbra better known as G.C. Tongbra. Published in 1969, the play is an attempt to revalue the present democratic system of the government in Manipur.

The entire fund of Mayapur, an imaginary state, comes from the central headquarter. The fund is given to a council consisting of representatives elected properly by different groups of people for whom the fund has been provided. But the representatives, the so called well-wishers of the people misuse the fund allotted. They try to make their present and future out of the money sanctioned. As the fund does not reach the proper place, citizens of the state go from bad to worse. They demand food, cloth and shelter which they never get. At first they suffer with patience and wait for some new development, which never comes. At last some energetic young fellows try to revolt against the authority. Old generation tries to prevent the young from waging a war. The advice to settle the problem in a peaceful manner is not acceptable to those young citizens. They take up arms and revolt. But all the revolting groups are killed in the end.

The author examines the practical side of democracy as practised in Manipur and depicts its possible result which in his opinion, is full of dangerous and injurious consequences, if allowed a free rein. The excellence of the play rests with the suggestion of tempering democratic practice with reason. The humour and satire of the playwright are praiseworthy. The pervading sense of irony in the play is something which cannot be lost sight of. The playwright, however, condemns any kind of violence in thought and in action.

E.D.S.

CHHENRA TAR (Bengali) is a play by Tulsi Lahiri (b. 1897 d. 1959), published in 1953. It is distinguished for its intense realism based on the horrid days of Bengal famine of 1943. The story runs thus:

Rahimaddi, a poor cultivator of a North Bengal village received a dilruba, a musical instrument from his Hindu friend Mahim. The dilruba becomes the symbol of his happy life which he lived with his wife Phuljan and their child Basir. But the happy days did not last long. The great famine came. Rahimaddi had to sell his cows, ploughs and the hoarded seeds–whatever he had for cultivating his little plot of land. Driven by the extreme calamity everybody except Rahimaddi, went to Hakimaddi, the headman for help. Rahimaddi did not have good relation with Hakimaddi. But a moment came when his hungry son and wife had to be sent to him, but only to be refused. Rahimaddi on the spur of the moment wrote 'talak' on a piece of paper making his wife free to go anywhere for food. Phuljan, a devoted wife, had no other way but to serve at Hakimaddi's family. Her son remained with his father.

The dark days were over. Rahimaddi was now eager to get back his wife. According to Muslim law, wife once divorced cannot be taken back. The only way was to get her married to another man and divorced again. Rahimaddi only then could marry her again. A fakir was persuaded to marry Phuljan and then divorce her. Everything was arranged. But Hakimaddi stood in their way. He would not let her go. At this moment of extreme grief Rahimaddi took his dilruba to play on. But unfortunately the instrument could not bear the deep mental agony of the player and the strings were torn. In the meanwhile the village people rose against the cruel headman. When they all came to attack Hakimaddi, they discovered that Rahimaddi had already committed suicide.

Tulsi Lahiri had written other dramas also. But in Chhenra Tar his power of depicting the reality is at its height. In addition to that he displays his deep understanding of human nature. The local dialect used all through has added to its realism.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Ajitkumar Ghosh, Bangla Nataker Itihas, 5th edn. 1970., Ashutosh Bhattacharya, Bangla Natyasahityer Itihas 2).

B.D.

CHERABANDA RAJU (Telugu, b.1944, d.1982) is the psenudonym adopted by Baddam Bhaskara Reddy. He lived and died like a revolutionary poet. He published several collections of poems, three novels and two collections of small plays.

Cherabandaraju was born in Ankusapuram in Nalgonda district, very near to Hyderabad in Andhra Pradesh. His parents were very poor. They thought that he would earn his livelihood by working in the fields. But he wanted to study in high-school and convinced them with great effort.

Cherabandaraju wanted to write poetry when he heard poetry in folk-form from a school teacher named Narasimha Reddy. Charabandaraju wrote his first poem in support of the government. Later he wrote romantic poetry with the name 'Kaapu Kodalu' (The peasant woman). They were not published anywhere.

Cherabandrarju shifted to Hyderabad in 1962. In those days the younger generation of poets was inspired by Beatniks and the 'Hungry poets' of Bengal. Six young men wanted to start a new literary movement. Cherabandaraju was one among them. They wanted to shed their caste, creed and religion, so they relinquished their names because the names revealed their caste and religion. They acquired pseudonyms like 'Jwalamukhi' (K. Veeraraghvachari), 'Nagnamuni' (M.N.Kesava Rao), 'Nikhileswar' (K. Yadava Reddy), 'Mahaswapna' (K.Venkateswara Rao) and, 'Cherabandaraju' (B. Bhaskara Reddy), 'Mahaswapna' suggested the name 'Digambara Kavulu' for their literary movement.

The Andhras were shocked to hear their voices, particularly the obscenity in their works. Cherabandaraju's was a powerful voice in the Digambara movement.

Cherabandaraju questioned the values of present day society in a poem "Let me get into the dock".

My case cannot be finalised in a country or a court by the black gowns and blue bills let me get into the dock..... you destroy faith in man and why insist on an oath on god.... hunger, sex, tears and dream the inner instincts of man aren't they one whatever be the country?
Is not the earth same?
Whoever the mother
all breasts taste the same sweet?
Why stare at me dumb-faced charge me,declare me mad
let me get into the dock"

(Translated by Subrahmanyam, from the collection We are a Nation of Cowards)

Many of the literary critics were also shocked with the views of the Digambara poets and did not recognise them as poets. Sri Sri, the epoch–maker and leader of the progressive school readily agreed with Digambara poets and translated some of their poems into English.

After publishing three volumes of poems, the Digambara poets began to disintegrate. Some of them felt that Marxism was the only answer to the evils of this society and believed that an armed struggle was necessary to bring the equality in society. The revolutionary movement had already started in Naxalbari in West Bengal and in Srikakulam in Andhra Pradesh.

The Digambara poets took the initiative to start the Revolutionary Writers Association under the leadership of the great poet Sri Sri. Cherabandaraju joined the revolutionary movement. It was started in 1970. From then on until his death in 1982, Cherabandaraju stood in the forefront of the movement. He wrote Diksuchi (1970), Muttadi (Attack, 1972), Gamyam (The goal 1973), Kanthi Yuddham (The War against Darkness 1973), Gouramma Kalalu (Dreams of Gouramma-1975), Janmahakku (Birthright 1978), Pallani 1980. He published three novels Ma Palle (Our village), Prasthanam (The Journey), Nippurallu (Stones that make the fire) and two other anthologies of playlets. He was a poet first and foremost. His novels are of secondary importance and his dramas are mediocre.

Cherabandaraju mastered the idiom of folklore and expressed his revolutionary ideas in that genre so that they can be easily understood by the masses. And he became a people's poet soon and people used to flock in thousands wherever he recited his poems and songs.

As a poet Cherabandaraju achieved great heights in poetic technique. He understood the difficulties of the downtrodden. Sri Goddar, Sisagar and others succeeded in his line to the revolutionary path.

K.R.R.

CHERIYAN MAPPILA, KATTAKKAYATHIL (Malayalam; b. 1859, d.1936) was a well known poet. He was a member of the illustrious Syrian Christian family called Kattakkayam in Meenachill Taluk. The knowledge he acquired of Sanskrit by learning under a guru just for four years from his 14th year was so improved by his own application that within a few years it was possible for him to try his hand, with considerable success, at some of the literary genres then in vogue. The two dominant interests all through his life were agriculture and literature-the first for a living and the other for the soul.

Cheriyan began writing and publishing poems at the age of twenty two. His works include Yudajeeveswari (1893), Villal Vettam (1893), Sara Vivaaham (1902), Kalavati (unpublished). His collections of poems include Oliver Vijayam (an'attakatha' 1895), Marthoma Charitam (1903), Vanitamani and Teranjedukkappetta Patram. All these are easily excelled and eclipsed by his Sree Yesu Vijayam (1925), a mahakavya or epic in 24 cantos dealing with the stories in the Old and New Testaments in a lucid, sweet style. The work reflects the poet's erudition, imagination, worldly experience and theological knowledge. It is an enduring contribution to Malayalam literature.

K.S.N.

CHERIYAN O.M. (Malayalam; b. 1874, d. 1944) studied Sanskrit and held various offical positions as teacher, Asstt. Professor of History, school inspector, and the like. He wrote many prose works including a rendering of Gulliver's Travels. Manasinte Manadandam, Vivartana Siddhanta Sangraham and Bhumisastrams show the author's scientific approach while Chraistava Dharma Navaneetam, Atmasamskaranam, and others show his moral perspective. He was considered an academic and was a mature person among the Christian writers of his time.

K.S.N.

CHERUSSERI (Malayalam) was the name of a Nambuthiri Brahmin house in northern Kerala in the 15th century. This word is now used as a synonym for a classical work in Malayalam, the Krishnagatha, otherwise called Krishnappattu. The author of Krishnagatha is also known as Cherusseri, but the author's exact name is not known. It has been guessed that he was a Nambuthiri who belonged to Cherusseri Illam at Kolathunad and that he was a dependent of Udaya Varma who ruled the country during 1446-1475. Historians presume that the Cherusseri Illam later merged into another famous family called Punam Illam where Punam Nambuthiri, the great scholar and writer of Ramayanam Champu lived. By this union of the two families which took place before 1459, the house names of Cherusseri and Punam were used indiscriminately for either of the houses. In some manuscripts of Krishnagatha a colophon informing that the work belongs to 'Ponathil nambidi' is found. And yet, this cannot prove that the author of Krishnagatha was the same Punam Nambuthiri who wrote the Ramayana Champu. On the basis of the colophon Kritayam Krishnagathayam in another manuscript, certain people are of the opinion that this denotes the Kali era, and that the text was written around 1650. But this is also not acceptable as the language of the text proves that Krishnagatha belongs to 16th century. The first historian of Malayalam Literature, P. Govinda Pillai, ascribed the work to the period 1475-1575. Later many scholars like Sahitya Panchananan, P.K. Narayana Pillai and others have also endorsed this view.

Cherrusseri is considered to be the first poet of Malayalam who wrote a comprehensive poem on the story of Krishna. A narrative poem of the Mahakavya type, Krishnagatha is written mainly in the Dravidian meter Manjari which has a purely folk tone. The other work Bharatam gatha written in the same metre is also considered to be the work of the same author, but this view is not accepted by all. Ulloor S. Paramewara Iyer, in his History of Malayalam Literature has rejected this theory and ascribed the work to a later period. There is no conclusive evidence to prove the identity of its author. However, there is no dispute on the authorship of Krishnagatha. Researches done by Chirakkal T. Balakrishnan Nair and many other scholars have brought to light many facts about this poet and this poem. Cherusseri was a scholar and a Vaishnavite to the core. His poem is full of local touches especially in the employment of words, phrases, rhythm, metre etc. He wrote the poem in a light vein and the composition is sweet. His descriptions have freshness, touches of humour, and are spontaneously embellished with figures of speech, the Utpreksha, Rupaka, Upama etc. Bhakti (Devotion) and Vatsalya (love towards children) are the dominant moods in his poetry. His style is natural, the narrative portions are very attractive even to a common reader. Lucidity of diction, aptness of figures of speech and musical charm are the additional attractions of the poem, which is said to have been composed for the sake of the queen of Kolattiri. The story of Krishna depicted in this work is taken from the Bhagavata and the use of the word 'Kannan' instead of Krishna is perhaps found for the first time in a Malayalam literary piece. Cherusseri made use of the metre 'Manjari' almost throughout this classical work and has thus contributed much to the growth of Malayalam poetry. Even the diction, the style and the emotions reflected in the work make the text a landmark in Malayalam literature. In one of the recent studies it is stated: "Unassuming and unostentatious Cherusseri has evolved a style marked by sweetness and clarity which is most suitable for the suggestion of the most appealing rasa, namely shanta". Above all these, Cherusseri's Krishnagatha can be described as the irrefutable evidence for the evolution of modern Malayalam through a close relation with Sanskrit which was then the medium for enlightened poetic communication. Deeply indebted to Sanskrit literature as well as to folk traditions, Cherusseri has made an epoch-making contribution to Malayalam poetry.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: P. Govindan Pillai, Bhasha Sahitya Chatiram., P.K. Narayana Pillai Cherusseri., Ullur., T. Bhaskaran, Malayalam Poetics.

V.S.S.

CHETANAVARTA KAVITVAM (Telugu) is a product of some poets' interpretation of progressive poetry and is a collection of their poems. The best of the exponents of this form of modern poetry are Kovela Suprasanacharyulu, Pervaram Jagannadham, Kovela Sampatkumaracharyulu and V. Narasimha Reddy.

They have handed down to us many compositions of modern prose-poetry. They are very good at the use of proper words and expressions. Keeping in view the widening horizons of science, opening their eyes to the new Freudian techniques of digging deep into the dark corners of human psyche and understanding sympathetically the main reasons behind class wars that have been dividing man from man, and appreciating the importance of individual freedom, these poets started writing poetry with a sense of universal brotherhood.

These four poets mastered the art of prose poetry, an off-shoot of progressive experimentalism. They are educated, and scholarly and have mastery over words and expression. They do not resort to the technique of creating a hybrid between English and Telugu diction. Their language is natural and beautiful, their style natural and graceful. The problem of the modern world is the subject of their writings. They are aware of the drawback in modern critical standards. Critisism is confused today as form is given importance over emotion, scholarship over expression. They firmly believe that the enlightened reader is the ultimate judge of poetic creation.

'Sushka Kshalananiki Pampandi', 'Vyakhyanam', 'Indriyalu Nidra Poyina Vela', 'Amritha Puthrulu" and 'Kalyana Varsha' are the best pieces of Suprasannacharya. Talking of the repetition of history, he likens history to a painting on a silk curtain. He says, 'This silk curtain is reeking with the smell of an aged corpse; send it for washing'. He detested the rot in history. In a poem 'Anavidhi', he writes:

> 'Where the past is a wound, the present is dangerous and the future mean, on a high shamiana of the clouds of the month of Ashadha, a yaksha decorates with floral graces a beautiful picture woven out of sweet pharses.'

Pervaram Jagannadham is adept in satire. Cartoon poetry is his speciality. 'Swayamvaram', 'Daivasura Sampadwubhaga Yogah', 'Yada yadahi', 'The Great Indian Circus' and 'Marana Sasanam' are notable among his poems. In his 'Yada yadahi' he writes like the 'Digambara' poets. In 'The Great Indian Circus', he portrays the feats of parliamentarians in the ring of Parliament. He portrays the lot of the commoner.

'Griha Pravesam', 'Rojuvari', 'Asi Veek-shana', 'Dwaividhyam', 'Manaschitram' are a few good poems by Sampatkumaracharya. In the first he affirms that it is wrong to think of all civilized life as rotten. One can make it blissful. The second poem is spun around political problems. He expresses his wish that the country should become self-sustaining. The third piece does not run smoothly because of the use of long-winding 'samasas'. The fourth is easily the best piece. The last one is rather long, being narrative in nature.

The poetry of Narasimha Reddy has an optimistic note. 'Rough sketch', 'Nishada Vishada Yogam', 'Nidra nerugani manassutho' and 'Ee Thamassu chilchabadu thundi' are his major poems. The first is a wonderful sketch by a modern poet. 'O friend, hereabout we have famine; leaders are eating grass while the cattle are famished to death'. It is a bitter tirade against present day politics. The second poem flows freely. The next reveals the tragic depths of the modern man. 'As it is considered uncivilized to cry in public, I have learnt to smile like a yogi'. The last reveals the optimism of the poet.

Chetanavartha poetry has heralded a new era of prose-poetry.

N.Ra.

CHETTIAR, A.K. (Tamil; b. 1911) is considered one the foremost writers of modern travelogues in Tamil.

Even as a student, A.K. Chettiar cultivated a taste for reading, writing and publishing. He helped the first editor/publisher of Ananda Vikatan, Vikata Kavi Buddalur Vaidhyanatha Iyer in 1930, when he was in his teens. Soon afterwards he brought out on his own Thanavanikan, a monthly, first from his village and later from Rangoon. His Kumari malar was published since 1943. In the late forties, Kumari Malar came out with bumper annual numbers noted for their content and high standards of production. On the Penguin New writing pattern it came as a book of the month. A distinctive feature of Kumari Malar is that unlike most monthlies, its editor writes only once a year.

A turning point in Chettiar's career was his visit to Japan in 1936. His first travelogue received wide attention.

The next and most important event his career was his decision to produce a documentary film on Mahatma Gandhi, the first of its kind. He went to South Africa and UK to collect material on the spot. Later, he covered the U.S. These wide and leisurely travels inspired a series of travel books. One of them was entitled Ulagam Suttum Tamilan (1940), (The Globe-trotter Tamilian) which earned immediate and wide popularity among its readers. His other travelogues are Prayana Ninaivukal (1941), Prayanak Katturaigal (1942), Andai Nadugal, Airoppa Vazhiyaka (1957), Malaya Mudal Canda Varai (1955), America Nattil (1956), Kudagu (on Coorg) and Itta Pani.

Here is a typical excerpt from his writing:

"Italy has given birth to Marconi and Macaroni. Marconi was a great scientist. Macaroni is the delicious national breakfast of all Italians, the high and the low".

Chettiar writes a very simple style and he writes with ease. His writings have punch and they are full of wit and humour. He is known for his frank and forthright opinions on men and matters. He has been a stauch nationalist.

His books have inspired and provided models for many modern writers to write their travelogues. He has encouraged many to write travel articles, offering space in Kumari Malar.

He brought out an anthology of 140 travel articles written in Tamil by culling them from the pages of Swadesamitran and published them as Tamil Nadu Payanak Katturikal which includes the original sketches also. These articles were written by persons who happened to travel on business or pilgrimage.

Besides travelogues, which are his forte, Chettiar has authored Thiraiyum Vaazhvum being his impressions on Hollywood and reactions to the problem he had to face in filming the life of Gandhiji.

He is also a compiler. In his Punniavaan Gandhi he has brought under one cover all the articles and editorials on Gandhiji which were published in the 100 years of Swadesamitran.

Panbu is a collection of anecdotes. Koitha Malargal gives in a handy form, selected quotations which may be useful for reference.

Unavu is a guide to food habits, daily menu, nutrition and dietetics.

S.S.

CHETTIAR, VEERASAMI (Tamil) was a versatile Tamil scholar of the 19th century. He was born and brought up in the city of Madras; reference to him is made briefly by Mayilai Seeni Venkataswamy in his Pathonpatam Nutrandil Tamil Ilakkiya Varalaru. He was a man who could engage himself in eight activities simultaneously (Ashtavadanam). After a brilliant period of studies under Ramanuja Kavirayar, Veerasami Chettiar became the Head Tamil Pandit of the University of Madras. He assisted Winslow in the compilation of the Winslow Dictionary. Veerasami Chettiar wrote, in long and heavy sentences, several articles on a wide range of subjects based on folklore and hearsay in Dinavarthamani from 1856; these were published in 1891 under the name Vinodarasa Manjari.

So.

CHETTUR, GOVINDA KRISHNA (English; b 1900, d. 1936) poet and short-story writer in English, Chettur was born in a talented Kerala family (his younger brother, S.K. Chettur, was also a novelist and short-story writer in English), and was educated at Madras and Oxford, and was for many years Principal, Government College, Mangalore. His Last Enchantment (1933) gives a sensitive account of Chettur's life in Oxford, and of his encounters with celebrities like Yeats, Masefield, Chesterton and Bernard Shaw. His first volume of verse, Sounds and Images (1921) was followed by the far maturer Gumataraya, The Temple Tank and The Triumph of Love which appeared simultaneously in 1932. Chettur is revealed in these volumes as a sound craftsman in verse, particularly with the sonnet form, and the piece on Gomateshwara is finely evocative. Much of the appeal of Chattur's verse flows from the sinuous movement of the lines. A deeper note still is heard in The Shadow of God (1935), written under the shadow of Chettur's mother's death; and his own followed not long after. The elegiac note in these thirty-seven sonnets has an almost haunting quality. After his mother's passing a brooding melancholy settles upon the poet, but in course of time he can look beyond the dark tunnel and into the light. Chettur's mastery of his medium is at its best in The Shadow of God, and it has something of a spiritual dimension lacking in the earlier volumes. Chettur's The Ghost City (1932), a collection of the short stories, is a work of considerable ingenuity and reveals a talent for satire. The stories touch upon themes like astrology, hypnotism and auto-suggestion, and there is, here and there, a W.W. Jacobs touch. Altogether the stories are entertaining and enjoyable. As a writer in English, Chettur was a purist, and his book College Composition was popular in its time and exerted a heatlhy influence on students.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: K.R. Srinivasa Iyengar, The Indian Contribution to English Literature (1945) Chapter VIII, Indian Writing in English (2nd edition, 1973), Chapter XXV)

K.R.S.I.

CHHAMANA ATHAGUNTHA (Oriya) is a novel written by Fakirmohan Senapati. This novel first appeared serially in the leading monthly jounal Utkal Sahitya in 1898. The main character of the novel is Ramachandra Mangaraj, an inhabitant of a village who by his cunning and deceitfulness could become a rich landlord. In all his evil deeds he was assisted by his concubine Champa, equally devilish like him. Out of sheer greed he wanted to acquire a piece of land measuring six acres and eight 'guntha' (about half of an acre) belonging to a weaver named Bhagia who was leading a peaceful domestic life along with his simple and faithful wife Saria. Saria being childless naturally longed for a child. Mangaraj devised a plan and allowed her and Bhagia to erect a temple for the Goddess by whose blessings she would have an issue. For this Bhagia mortgaged his entire landed property to Mangaraj. But he was completely deceived. Mangaraj deceitfully aquired his land, broke his homestead and took away his lovely cow. This made Bhagia a destitute which ultimately turned him mad. Saria seeing the misery of her dear husband and pining for her land and affectionate cow did not take any food and died near the door-step of the house of Mangaraj.

A police case was brought against Mangaraj, accusing him of the death of Saria, and he was sent to jail. His sons were unworthy, addicted to intoxicants; they could not face the situation and during the period of trial his landed property was also cunningly aquired by his pleader. Champa, the concubine stealthily took the golden ornaments of Mangaraj and fled away with a servant who ultimately murdered her and finally met with an accidental death. After the trial Mangaraj was imprisoned. In the prison he was also tortured and after release he found himself penniless; He died a helpless and repentant man.

The excellence of the work lies in portraying the people of different nature belonging to various walks of life. The author is equally capable of drawing characters both men and women of simple, docile nature as well as those who are cunning, treacherous, merciless and devilish. Particularly his devilish characters are more living and boldly sketched. His descriptions are vivid, realistic and are combined with humour and satire. The author with a hope to correct the society has satirised the weaknesses, foibles and frailties of different characters.

The novel is written in a simple, colloquial and powerful style and depicts the vivid picture of the feudal society of the mid-nineteenth century with its vices. The novel is a happy combination of idealism and realism. Thus this novel is regarded as a work which opened up a new path in the genre of novel writing in Oriya in its early phase and is one of the classics of Oriya literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: N. Samant Roy, Vyasakabi Fakirmohan., S. Das, Yugasherstha Fakirmohan., Surendra Mohanty, Fakirmohan Samiksha.

J.B.M.

CHHAND SUGANDH (Sindhi) is a book on prosodic study of Sindhi poetry written by Jhamatmal Khubchand Bhavnani (1905-1984) and published by him in 1953 from Ajmer. The book reveals the author's intensive study of and deep probe into Hindi poetry and its metres and its application to the Sindhi poetry. The author finds many metres like Doha, Soratha, Chaupai, Lalita-chhanda, etc., used by so many medieval Sufi poets of Sindh. Earlier many well known critics of Sindhi literature who did not have the knowledge of Indian prosody were bewildered at finding a large number of verses in medieval Sufi poetry which did not fit into the frame-work of Persian prosody. They came to the conclusion that the poetry of Sufi Sindhi poets was not composed strictly according to the prosodic rules of Persian and that it was based mainly upon music and rhythm. Some critics like Mirza Qalich Beg went to the extent of calling such Sindhi poetry Jhangli Shair (Wild, non-metrical poetry), although its contents earned their appreciation. Jhamatmal is, therefore, the first scholar to point out in Chhand Sugandh (Fragrance of Metre) this misunderstanding in Sindhi literary criticism and to lay stress on the fact that the medieval Sindhi poetry generally follows the Indian metrical rules. The author, then, briefly gives the structural rules of 'matrik' and 'varnik' metres in Hindi. Therefore, he proves with illustration that medieval Sindhi poetry has been composed according to these prosodic rules. The following metres have been discussed with illustrations in the present book: Doha, Soratha, a combination of Doha and Soratha, Lalita Pada or Sarachhand, Chaupai, Shaktichhand, Dikpala-chhand, rola, kundali, lavani, virachhand. Each metre from Hindi and Sindhi poetry has been illustrated. At the end, he has briefly pointed out the principles of figures of speech, rasa in poetry and relationship between metres and music. In the second part of the book, entitled Atur Aruz (An essence of Persian Prosody) he has briefly discussed important metres and forms of Persian poetry. Both the parts of the book present a comparative study of the subject.

A few small pamphlets and essays were produced in Sindhi on the subject of Indian prosody before Independence. However, the credit for introducing the subject matter in detail with its application to Sindhi poetry goes to the author of this work.

M.K.J.

CHHANDA (Rajasthani) is a term which means a metre of prosody in Sanskrit as well as in Rajasthani and other regional languages of India. But in Rajasthani the term is used for the verse or poems composed in praise of gods, goddesses, incarnations, sectarian preachers (Tirthankaras), great personalities, partriots, warriors, martyrs and the patrons of the poets. It seems to be a modern form of the Vedic term 'Chhanda' used for the holy verses of Vedic 'suktas', recited in the praise of god or natural powers. There might have been some difference in their outer forms, but as regards the sentiments there seems to be none. In Prabandha Chintamani (Merutunga, 1304 ed. Muni Jinavijaya); there is a reference to 'Charana' and 'Bhata' poets (the bardic poets), who used to recite their 'Chhandas' in praise of the heroic deeds of their patrons, patriots or warriors, and in the courts of the rulers to eulogise them. In the medieval Rajasthani literature such innumerable short and long poems entitled 'chhandas' are available composed in various metres. Arya, Chaupai, Damilla, Sarasi, Hataki, Bhujanaga prayata, Gaha, Vaitala, Renaki, Kavitta, Naracha, Vriddha Naracha, Rasavala, Duha, Uddhara, Nisani, Paddhari, Arilla, Motidama, Tribhanga, etc. are the metres mainly used in these chhandas . 'Duhas' and 'Gahas' are also used for such laudations. The concluding verse in these 'chhandas' in known as a 'kalasha'.

Chhandas composed in praise of the gods and goddesses or deities are available mainly in the names of Ganesha, Mahadeva (and their synonyms), Bhairava, Ksetrapala, Bhavani, Chamunda, Jagadamba, Hindugulaja, Jvalamukhi, Tripura, Mahisa-mardini, Chotha Mata, Sharada, Surya, Shanishchara, Navagraha, etc. Jaina scholars have composed 'chhandas' in the praise and prayers of their Tirthankaras and saints, such as Parshvanatha, Rasabhadeva.

Bharata-Bahubali, Dada Jina Kushala-suri, and so on, as also about the planet deities like the sun-god, Shanishchara, etc.

Sarvananda (14th cent.), Merunandana (15th cent.) Hirananda (15th-16th cent.), Sahaja Sundara (1515), Lavanya Samaya (1528). S.Y., Kushalalabha (1560-1595), Keshava, Hemaratha (1652), Samaya Sundara, Hema, Chetana Samayasara, Kanha, Jina-natya-ranga Kushala, Labhododoya; Kheta or Khetala, Jnana-sundara, 1727, Shiva-Sundara (1731), Kishoradasa, Vidyasundara, Roda Kavi (1796), Saranga, Khemasayara, Gunasagara, Abhayasoma, etc. are the poets who have compsoed Chhandas .

Chhandas dedicated to the folk-deities are also available. Ramadevaji Ro Chhanda by Jalu, Pashchimadhishaji Ra Chhanda by unknown authors may be classed in this category.

Rava Jayatasi Ro Padhadi Bandha Chhanda by Vithu Suja (1534-1541) composed in 401 verses; Rava Jayatasi Ro Chhanda (by unknown author 1615) compsoed in 45 verses, Ranamalla Chhanda by Sridhara. Maharau Rayaghanaji Chhanda by Vodada Modu have been composed in praise of the heroic deeds of the warriors, whose names are prefixed or suffixed to the above mentioned titles; and who were the patrons of the authors of these Chhandas. The oldest chhanda so far available is Vastupala Tejapala Chhanda, by Sarvananda (14th century) in praise of Vastupala and Tejapala, the then prime ministers of Gujarat, who got constructed the well known Delawada temple at Mt. Abu.

Pabuja Ra Chhanda composed in 45 verses in a narrative poem related to the chivalry shown by Pabu, and his heroic death in the battle field for the rescue of the cows of a Charana lady, leaving his marriage ceremony unfinished. The style of this 'Chhanda' is no less elaborate than any heroic work in the Dingala language. Rava Jayatasi Ro Padhadi-Bandha Chhanda by Vithu Meha Nagarajota is related to the heroic deeds of the ancestors of Rava Jaitasi of Bikaner and narratives of his victory over Prince Kamaran, the brother of King Humayun. It is mainly composed in Padhadi (Paddhari) metre as is clear from its title. In all, there are 401 verses in it. Despite the poetic exaggerations, the facts mentioned there are quite convincing. The work is full of heroic sentiments and vigour having natural flow in the language. One more work having the same title, by an unknown author, is available which resembles the above mentioned work of Vithu Sujo in style, sentiments, diction, description, metres, as also in the similes and metaphors. The main theme of the story is also the same. If there is any difference, it is about the historic facts at certain places. There are 455 verses in all in this work. Saptashati Ra Chhanda by Sridhara is a heroic poem containing 121 verses, composed in the praise of goddess Mahisamardini. The poet seems to be the same who composed Ranamalla Chhanda.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H.L. Maheswari; History of Rajasthani Literature, (New Delhi, 1980)

B.M.J.

CHHANDA (Sanskrit). The Samaveda comprises archika and uttararchika. The 1549 riks, which these books contain, have all been taken from the Rigveda except 75. Most of these are from the eighth and the ninth mandalas. Most of these riks again are in the gayatri Chhandas or pragatha, which is a combination of gayatri pankti and jagati pankti. It is doubtless that all these riks were meant to be sung in a musical tone. The words gayatri and pragatha which are derived from the roots gai and pragai bear ample testimony to the fact.

The word saman in the compound word Samaveda originally means the svara or the 'chhandas'. The Chhandas, were, in those ancient times, taught by words from the mouth or by musical instruments. The modifications were made in the pronunciation of words, like lengthening, repeating and projecting. Such forms are called 'stobhas', e.g. Hovi, hoeva, hoi, etc.

The number of these Chhandas must have been great and every metre had a distinct name. Because of these Chhandas or metres the Aranyakas and the Upanishads have become secret and mystic. Most of the old Chhandas or metres are of the nature of folklore and popular usage and mostly belong to the magicians, and pseudomedicinemen.

The Samaveda is referred to in the oldest Sanskrit literature as 'that which is sung by the Chhandogas'. The word Chhandas connotes three senses, namely (1) a magical mantra, (2) the sacred Vedic hymn, (3) a metre. The primary meaning is 'a melodiously accented speech' (The root Chhand means to please, to gratify, to cause to delight).

V.G.R

CHHANDAHASHASTRA (Maithili). This is the science of prosody in Maithili. Maithili prosody particularly in Early and Middle periods was a systematized and elaborated set of metrical rules and regulations. These were directly evolved from Prakrit prosody but had many new features. The entire topic is discussed elaborately in the 17th century classic, Lochana's Ragatarangini (about 1700) Maithili poets used song metres which were regulated mainly by Ragas and Raginis. Chanda Jha (1831-1907) revived them in his Ramayana but they are now defunct. Later the Matrika and Varnavritta popular all over North India came to be used, such as Chaupai and Doha and several of the Sanskrit metres like Sikharini and Malini. In recent years blank verse and free verse with numerous variations and experiments from folk music have been successfully adopted.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Govinda Jha, Maithili Chhandasastra; Jayakanta Mishra, A History of Maithili Literature, Vol. I.

J.M.

CHHANDOGYOPANISHAD (Sanskrit) belongs to the oldest group of the Upanishads. It comprises the last eight Prapathakas of the Chhandogyabrahmana of the (Talavakara branch of Samaveda and is all in prose. It is true that this Upanishad is quoted and referred to more often by the later author of the Vedantasutras. But still it can be maintained that it does not rise to such high literary or philosophical eminence as the Brihadaranyaka. The Brahmanical liturgy and doctrine seem to predominate in the first two chapters. However, they also contain discussion on the significance of Om, the meaning of the names of saman and the genesis and function of Om. Baka Dalbhya and the Canine story of a white dog, at the end of the first chapter, seems to be a ridicule poured upon the mantra-singers emphasising the assertion of the supremacy of the spiritual over any material end.

The third chapter contains the famous description of the sun as a great bee-hive hanging in space. It also contains a piece of the myth of the emergence of the sun out of a huge egg.

In the fourth chapter we have the philosophy of Raikva, the story of Satyakama and Jabala, his mother, and the story of Upakosala, who obtains wisdom from Satyakama Jabala.

The fifth chapter contains the eschatological teaching of Jaivali and the famous synthesis of thought effected by Ashvapati Kaikeya out of the six cosmological doctrines advanced by the six philosophers, who had gone to acquire wisdom from him.

Chapters six, seven and eight alone are of philosophical importance. Out of these the sixth is evidently the best of all the chapters of the Chhandogya and we have here the highly strung philosophy of Aruni, who establishes the identity of the individual and universal spirits. The philosophy which Aruni advances in this chapter does really entitle him to the position of the renowned sage of antiquity and the most outstanding personality of the Chhandogya. Yajnavalkya of the Brihadaranyaka was his pupil.

The seventh chapter of the Chhandogya contains the famous discourse between Narada and Sanatkumara. Finally the eighth chapter of this Upanishad contains some very excellent hints for the practical realisation of the Atman, as well as the famous myth of Indra and Virochana.

A passage from the Chhandogya (V-II) tells us that out of cosmological philosophers, Uddalaka held that the earth was the substratum of things, Prachinashala that it was the heaven which was so, while Budila, Sharkaraksh-hya and Indradyumna held that water, space and air were respectively the substrata of things, and Satyayajna said that the substratum was the Sun, the celestical fire. Raikva alone is described as having held with Indradyumna that air was the substratum of all things.

The Chhandogya begins with the solemn mantra, Om. The syllable Om is to be meditated upon as the form of the Supreme Soul. The work, which is done with proper knowledge, faith and devotion, becomes the most powerful. The Upanishad speaks of the three skandhas of dharma, yajna, adhyayana and dana are the first pillar, tapas is the second and brahmacharin is the third pillar (11.23.1). The man is what his resolution is (Kratumayah purushah) (111.14.1). Human life is a kind of sacrifice (purusho vava yajnah) (111.16.1). Greatness is happiness (yo vai bhuma tat sukham). Everything is your Atman (atmaivedam sarvam) (VII.25.2). As is your food, so is your heart (aharashuddhau sattvashuddhih) (VII.26.2). The body is mortal, the soul immortal (VIII.12.1).

The Upanishad is the maturest, the most sincere, and full of a number of doctrines.

As the Upanishad belongs to the Samaveda, in the first adhyaya udgitha is explained as a philosophical concept. It is said here that udgitha, akshara, hridaya and omkara are synonyms connoting the one immutable and indestructible principle. All the bhavas are produced from it. Udgitha is the eighth rasa and is the strongest among all the seven rasas.

The udgitha is also identified with the breath which one inhales and exhales. Udgitha is also said to be surya, the vyana which controls prana and apana. The Sauva Udgitha referred to above in the first paragraph appears to be a satire on sacrificers and mantra–singers with selfish ends.

The third adhyaya describes the worship of the sun in the form of devamadhu. It also contains the description of Gayatri and the spiritual advice of Ghora Angirasa to Devakiputra Krishna.

The discourse on Atman is the most important philosophical doctrine in this adhyaya. This Atman is inside the heart and is smaller than a grain of barley, rice, mustard seed, or Shyamaka rice. The same Atman is bigger than the earth, the sky, the space, and all these worlds. This Atman which is in heart is this Brahman.

The sixth adhyaya contains the explanation of the most important doctrine of Aruni, namely Tattvamasi. Aruni explains the subtle and imperceptible nature of Brahman by his nyagrodhaphala-drishtanta to Shvetaketu (VI.12).

The eighth adhyaya contains the famous philosophical discourse between Indra and Virochana. About atmajnana it is said here–"The body is mortal but it is the abode of the bodiless, immortal soul. Agreeability and disagreeability (priyapriye) do not affect the soul when freed from the body.

Whatever is left by the soul dies (Jivapetam khalvidam mriyate, na jivo mriyate) but the soul never dies. Atman is immortal and fearless Brahman."

Of the metaphysical philosophers of the Upanishads, three prominent ones have contributed their philosophy through this Upanishad. The complete philosophy of Shandilya is preserved for us in that small section of the Chhandogya namely 111.14 where he formulates for us the main doctrines of his philosophy. In the first place, he gives us the cosmological proof of the Absolute which he calls Tajjalan that from which things are born, to which they repair and in which they live. Secondly, he teaches the doctrine of karman and says that fate alone betakes a man in the next world for which he has paved the way by his works in this life. In the third place, he gives us a characterisation of Atman in thoroughly positive terms. This stands against the later negative theology of Yajnavalkya. Fourthly he tells us that Atman is both great and small; greater than the great, and smaller than the small; infinite and infinitesimal. Lastly, he tells us that the end of human life consists in being merged in the Atman after death, a consummation, which, he is sure he will reach.

The second philosopher, who invites our attention here, is the sage Sanatkumara, the preceptor of Narada. Only significant points in his philosophy can be noted here. In the first place, Sanatkumara seems to teach spiritual hedonism. Spiritual happiness is the spring of all actions. Action is the cause of faith; faith of belief; when a man believes, he thinks; when he thinks, he knows; and when he knows, he reaches the truth. In this way, happiness, action, faith, belief, thought, knowledge and truth, constitute a moral ladder to realisation (VII.17.22). Bhuman is that infinite happiness which arises from the vision of the divinity all around. When anything else is seen, that is alpa (VII.23-24). Thirdly the realisation of Bhuman occurs when an experience, such as is implied in the expression "Sohamatma" is attained (VII.25). Lastly Sanatkumara teaches that Atman is the source of all things whatsoever. It is the source of all power, all knowledge, all ecstasy (VII-26)

Aruni, the greatest of Upanishadic philosophers, barring of course Yaṇnavalkya (who is reported to be his pupil) is, like his other compeers of the Upanishadic period, a great psychometaphysician. He advances the "Fatigue" theory of sleep (VI.8.2) and tells us that in the state of sleep, the individual soul becomes one with the Atman (VI.8.1). In regard to departing consciousness he teaches that finally the merger is in the deity (VI.15). The same theory is later expanded by Yajnavalkya. Substance alone is real (mrittiketyeva satyam VI.1.4). Aruni is an extreme nominalist who paves the way for the doctrine of illusion (VI.1.4-6). Thirdly, he tells us what thus exists as the primal hypostasis is not "Not-being" but "Being" (VI 2.1-2). This Being produced the energizing principle (tejas), liquid existence (ap) and solid existence (anna). Fourthly all things that exist in this world are made up of these three elements by the process called trivritkarana. Being (sat) is the Self in man "That thou art (Tattvamasi)" is the recurring instruction of Aruni to his son Shvetaketu. Cosmologically this Being is the underlying subtle essence. It can be grasped by faith and from the acharya. Biologically it is the supreme life-principle. Psychologically it annihilates all individualities. So also all souls lose their individuality in the Atman. From the moral point of view, the Atman is truth. Metaphysically the Atman pervades all. Aruni thus boldly postulates an idealistic monism in which there is no difference even from within.

It must, however, be remembered that Krishna, the son of Ghora Angirasa and Devaki can never be identified with Vasudeva Krishna of the Mahabharata.

V.G.R.

CHHANDOLAYA (Gujarati) is a collection of poems of Niranjan Bhagat (1926) published in 1954. In 1974 some more poems were added and larger edition was published under the title Chhandolaya Brihat (metrical rhyme-extensive). Niranjan is a distinguished poet of the post-independance era. As the name of the book suggests, the poems indicate that he is a poet of rhythm. He has written poems in traditional Sanskrit metres, but the music of his songs is enchanting. Niranjan has stated in his poems that his mission is one of love. He has said, "I have come here just for a stroll. Not for business, either yours or mine". Niranjan is a poet of exhuberent love. His untutored and unsophisticated lass with the heart of a gopi exclaims in an ecstacy of joy: "Harivara (Krishna) has kidnapped my heart".

The poet is disillusioned about man. Man's hesitation born of suspicion in grasping a hand extended out of goodwill and friendship and his habitual mask of geniality, sincerity and hail-fellow-well-met spirit concealing his face expressing quite the reverse, frustrate the poet, and he feels quite lonely in the midst of such a crowd.

Niranjan's special contribution to this collection of poems is Pravaldwip (the coral island), a group of poems depicting city civilisation. Bombay whose geographical shape is compared to the neck of a camel seems to the poet to be an alligator minus the tale. It is the all–consuming hunger of machines and the namelessness, cheerlessness, heartlessness, listlessness of the milling crowds, a dull humdrum life disassociated from joys, a life that is dead silence or a shrill cry of agony that is all a civilised city has to offer. Niranjan is a conscious artist. His diction is chiselled and compact.

C.M.

CHHAOMASA (Maithili). Chhaomasa is a variety of Barahamasa, covering love pangs from the month of Jyeshtha to Kartika.

J.M.

CHHAPPA (Gujarati), a book of 756 sestets by Akho is one of the classics of Gujarati. It bears no date. The first 32 quartets of his first work Panchikarana (1641) are found in a manuscripts of Chhappa as a section of 23 stanzas, of which a majority are sestets. This shows that by 1641 Akho has tried the sestet form. The louder and more hard-hitting sestets against hypocrisy could very well be the outbursts of an angry young man, e.g. 'Wherever we look, there is evil, just evil owls squatting in front of owls./As somebody brings tidings of the sun,/They move forward with upraised breaks:/We have been in the dark for a thousand years./From where have you cropped up such wiseacres? ...'. The maturity and sense of repose one finds in many sestets would suggest that some of them were written after Akhegita i.e. the composition of chappa spans the whole writing-period of Akho, beginning before 1641 and terminating after 1649.

Chhappa is the work, in which Akho discovered himself and which grew with him. The poet seems to have found not only the sestet form, six lines of fifteen morae chopai metre making a stanza, ready in Probodhabatrisi–a book of 32 sections collating proverbs–of Mandan of Sirohi (16th century), but also the critical tools to expose the rot in the socio-religious life of his age. The proverbs are so astutely strung together by Mandan, that each chapter, consisting of twenty sestets, sums up a topic like bhakti, maya, heresy, etc. and the compiler, keeping himself aloof, holds to ridicule quite a few unwelcome social features with the help of proverbs–the voice of the people. Akho lit the flame of social and religious sarcasm at Mandan's torch and for some time seems to be repeating or borrowing from him (his 565 is almost the same as latter's 103), but he soon achieved an individual voice which itself speaks in what later became popular adages and aphorisms.

Chhappa consists of 45 angas (sections) of uneven length, the shortest having two sestets and the longest 91. The angas are named in some cases after the topic discussed, or after the opening word or after the key-word occuring later in the section, but in many cases erratically. Rajjab divided the sakhis of his master Dadu Dayal, Akho's immediate predecessor, into angas, and Akho seems to have followed the vogue both in his Chhappa as sakhis and duhas (Gujarati and Hindi). Akho's zest for spiritual quest and jesting spirit, which laughs heartily at incongruities, manage to hold all the sections of Chhappa together.

Chhappa breathes an atmosphere of intimacy. It is, as it were, a heart to heart talk of a man of wisdom to a potential seeker. The very first lines (quoted frequently by Mahatma Gandhi) coax the reader: Conduct yourself as it suits you best, anyhow do attain Hari (the Lord). Akho is for the intuitive grasp of reality. He shows how he who knows, is a devotee, without having to try to be one, how he, who thinks of himself as a non-doer, is not bound by actions. 'Why don't you die before you have to? Thereafter what will remain will be Hari, even as water, undisturbed, is crystal clear'. He wants the individual self not to identify itself with the variegated pattern but with the texture, which is Brahma. Then it is that the bubble called death dies and there remains the sheer ecstatic play of consciousness.

Akho scoffs playfully at superstitions and all pseudo-religious things that divert the seeker from the right path: From where this myth that there are many Supreme Beings? He, who makes one attain God, is guru. All others are like chasing wolves. The high-born ones are not filled with a double measure of godhead. No beast, when dead, becomes a ghost, but a dead man's soul wanders homeless!

Akho is a master of image, metaphor and analogy. Sometimes he just juxtaposes two things without connecting them with 'Like or 'as'. 'Same is the case with the narrator (of sacred legends)–prostitute, they nurse learning-daughter (respectively) . . . to find ample remuneration'. He gives a vivid analogy for bhakti, indulged in, in the absence of knowledge,–'when one dog barks, another joins him. There is a chain reaction and someone utters that he saw a thief (i.e. there is talk of some suprasensual vision).

Akho's prophetic satire is matched by his prophetic rapture. 'I was looking out for a hole in the hedge and I have arrived at a lane'. 'All practise penance to reach Hari, while Akho moves in Hari and makes merry'.

Akho's bitter lashing out at pseudo-spiritual behaviour and his unfailing sense of the ludicrous have earned for him a place as a philosopher-poet of protest. The unique forcefulness of his utterance, use of colloquialisms and apt images have endeared him to the common reader. The wisdom, born not of books ('Ignorant Akho does not chew the chewed'), but of profound personal experience, often reminds the reader of Chhappa of the truth found in the Upanishads and the Gita.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Pujara Kanji Bhimji (ed.), Brahmajnani Akha Bhaktana Chhappa, Sastum Sahitya Vardhak Karyalaya, Pub. Akhani Vani (Ahmedabad, 1914)., Umashankar Joshi (ed.), Akhana Chhappa (Ahmedabad, 1953).

C.M.

CHHAPPAYA (Hindi) consists of six feet: four of rola metre and two of ullala. Rola has 24 matras (syllabic instances) in each foot usually with the pause at 11th and 13th matra, and ullala has 26 or 28 matras in each foot with the pause at 13th and 13th, and 14th and 14th matras respectively. Thus Chhappaya's metre–in all its six feet has (24 x4) (26x2) 148 matras, or (24x4) (28x2) 152 matras. According to 'Prasatara' calculation this metre has 71 possible variations by the name of Ajaya, Vijaya, Bala, Karna, etc. viz. Ajaya variety–in all the six feet–consists of 68 long (guru) and 12 short (laghu) vowels (total 80 letters), 148 matras, or consists of 70 long and 12 short vowels (total 82 letters) $(70 \times 2 + 12)$ 152 matras. The last variety of Chhappaya metre is called Muni, which in all its six feet–consists of nil long and 148 short vowels (total 148 letters) 148 matras, or nil long and 152 short vowels (total 152 letters) 152 matras. This metre is eminently suited for 'Vir-rasa', although it has been used otherwise also. The 'Chhappaya' has been an equally popular metre with Apabhramsha as well as Hindi poets of the earliest and medieval period. In Hindi. out-standing poets like Chandbardai (Prithviraj Raso), Tulsidas (Kavitavali), Keshav (Ramchandrika), Nabhadas (Bhaktamal), Bhushan (Shivraj Bhushan), Mati Ram (Lalit Lalam), Sudan (Sujan Charit) and Padmakar (Pratap Singh Virudavali) have used this metre for effective communication. Whereas most others have used the metre for expression of the heroic sentiment, Nabhadas, Tulsidas and Bharatendu Harishchandra used it for the communication of the devotional sentiment.

Sa.C.

CHHATTISI (Rajasthani). Any composition in verse, containing thirty six stanzas, and intended to form an independent work, may be called a 'Chhattisi'. Authors, while expressing themselves briefly on subjects of their choice, have preferred to devise such titles for their writings, for want of a better alternative. There seems to be no particular theory in adopting this very number, as there are many others like Bisi, Baisi, Chaubisi, Battisi, Bawani, Bahottari, etc. which form part of titles of such works. As for the number thirty six, we may trace it out in the cultural traditions. We find the mention often in connection with the ragas, instruments, arms (weapons), castes (ordinary), castes (kshatriya), dishes and departments, etc. in our ancient classics. This might have prompted some earlier poets who hailed from this tradition in literature.

One should not expect any outstanding work, in this genre, though there might be some unknown exceptions. A study of the catalogues of MSS. reveals the following names Atmaprabodh chattisi and three others by Samaya-sundara (17th century) and Aloyana chattisi and eight others by Jhanasara (19th century). Among the non-Jaina writers special mention may be made of Bankidasa (19th century), who has given us Sujasa chattisi, Sura Chattisi and Simba Chattisi.

Raw.S.

CHHAYAVAD (Hindi) has contributed to modern Hindi literature in the same way as the Bhakti movement to medieval literature. Both have an impact on quantity as well as quality. Hindi literature of the third and the fourth decades of the present century is permeated by 'Chhayavad'. Incidentally, this period is also sandwiched between the two world wars. In the Indian context it is the period of the influence of Swami Vivekananda, Mahatma Gandhi and Rabindranath Tagore. In the Hindi world the beginning of 'Chhayavad' is associated with the retirement of Mahavir Prasad Dwivedi, the greatest literary leader of his times, from active literary leadership.

The word 'Chhayavad' has no traditional or technical authenticity, nor is it a direct translation of any English word representing a particular literary movement. It sprang into usage first inadvertently and later as a matter of fashion. It is alleged that the word 'Chhayavad' has been borrowed from Bengali but researches do not find sufficient evidence to support this view. The fact that Mukutdhar Pandey wrote an article 'Hindi mein Chhayavad' in 1920, indicates that the word 'Chhayavad' had become current by that time and also that the trend must have been well established so as to inspire criticism and appreciation.

In 1903, Mahavirprasad Dwivedi took over as the editor of the monthly literary magazine Saraswati and that medium began guiding the activities of contemporary Hindi literature. He was a reformist and, therefore, he applied the Arya Samajik principle of 'purity' to literature. He condemned the earlier mediaeval trend of amorous sensuousness and tried to bring an idealism which culminated in matter-of-factism. Reactions were quick to follow. Indu, another monthly literary magazine began publication in 1913, and the poem which could not be approved according to the standards of Saraswati appeared in it. This latter trend gained ground and later on assumed the name of 'Chhayavad'. It may be asserted that 'Chhayavad' was a strong reaction to matter-of-factism which itself was a reaction to mediaeval sensual exotic and emotional literature.

The word 'Vad' indicates some philosophy or theory and pre-supposes intellectual exercises, e.g., 'Advaitavada' (Monism) of Shankara. We use words like 'Alamkaravadins' in the sense of 'the group which stands by that theory'. But this use of 'Vad' in the sense of some 'literary movement' is new and recent. We have not called the mediaeval trends as 'Bhaktivad' or 'Acharyavad'. 'Chhayavad', therefore, is a word coined under foreign influence-direct or indirect. It was very natural for the literary critics to suspect this trend of foreign imitation. Ramchandra Shukla, the outstanding figure of Hindi literary critism, charged 'Chhayavad' of both, viz., foreign influence and foreign imitation. Some thought that the foreign element had come through Rabindranath Tagore while others held that it could come directly also.

'Chhayavad' is near to mysticism and romanticism. 'Rahasyavad' or mysticism is not unknown to Indian literature. In the mediaeval period 'Sufis' and 'Sants' (saints) developed a kind of nuptial love for God and craved for union with Him. Ram Chandra Shukla thought that 'Chhayavad' was a modern form of mysticism and it was not inherited from tradition but had been procured through imitation. In fact, some of the modern poems do support this inference. Very often 'Chhayavad' had nothing to do with God or the Supreme Being, though it is saturated with deeper and stronger emotions. It is, therefore, prudent to call 'Chhayavad' the parallel of Romanticism. 'Symbolism' is also associated with this trend, but, again it is not a result of inheritance but an exercise in imitation; the modern poet may not be well-versed in tradition (Rurhi) but he does use natural symbols to express human relations and emotions. The Greek word 'Phantasma' influenced European literature, the poets saw not the form but the shadow or reflection of love (divine or temporal) and emotionally reacted to it. This form of symbolism was not common in our literature at least in those days, but has come from Europe. Ram Chandra Shukla traced the word 'Chhayavad' to this particular tendency also.

If we analyse the poetry which is accepted under the stamp of Chhayavad we can deduce certain common features. Chhayavad is a style and not a philosophy. It is impregnated with emotions often at the cost of common and practical approach. Being a creation of adolescent hearts it sings of beauty and love. Unable to spot the object of his love, the poet takes a big leap and takes the whole universe (not the society) as the form of the beloved; he directs human and temporal love towards extra-human and natural objects, in the language of human beings. As a piece of art this poetry is saturated with rich aesthetic experience. It cannot be said that the poet never touches the spiritual; but wherever he does, it is casual. After Mahavirprasad Dwivedi sealed the borders for sensuousness, sensual vapours spread to kiss the whole universe with all their strength. 'Chhayavad' is the aerial picture of that reaction. When love and beauty embrace each other, they swing in music and paint the whole universe with their sweetness. 'Chhayavad' is the expression of that state of the heart. This poetry springs up in the form of songs without bringing to surface any particular piece of thought. 'Chhayavad' abounds in poetry, more precisely in subjective poetry.

The two decades of 'Chhayavad' may be called the first stage. (publication of Jharana in 1918) and the second stage (publication of Lahar in 1933 and Kamayani in 1935). The trend comes to an end with the death of Jayashankar 'Prasad' (1937) and Rabindranath Tagore (1941). Important events towards its end are the first convention of the Progressive Writer's Association of India (1936) presided over by Prem Chand and the Quit India Movement (1942). In the perspective of world history, the 'Chhayavad' style of Hindi literature spreads between the two world wars, but it has nothing to do with the word tension either directly or indirectly. In the literary field 'Chhayavad' is co-terminus with the literary career of Jayashankar 'Prasad'–publication of Jharana in 1918 and the posthumous publication of Iravati in 1940. Since literature expresses social consciousness, we may say that 'Prasad' symbolises 'Chhayavad' or 'Chhayavad' is the name of the new literary trend which originated and developed with the literature of Jayashankar 'Prasad'.

Out of the many names associated with 'Chhayavad' the quaternary of 'Prasad', Pant, Nirala and Mahadevi stands undisputed. Jayashankar 'Prasad' is the incarnation of 'Chhayavad'. He started this trend with his poem in the his monthly Journal Indu and it culminated with the epic Kamayani. His poems appeared in his collections Jharana and Lahar which are considered to be the leading representatives of the trend. Ansu, a collection of stanzas of love-in-separation is a torch-bearer in his field. In this drama also, 'Prasad' bursts into songs which sprinkle the trends of 'Chhayavad'. 'Prasad' is the only poet who develops this trend upto the level of the epic in Kamayani, which is decidedly the gem of modern Hindi literature. It was Jayashankar 'Prasad', again, who took to defend 'Chhayavad' against the sharp criticism by Ram Chandra Shukla and successfully established his point against that veteran scholar. 'Prasad' maintained that 'Chhayavad' is an art of poetry (Kavya-Kala) and though it is modern, it is in no way foreign. He also explained this new art in the language of traditional Indian poetics. As for the content of poetry 'Prasad' holds that no guidelines can be prescribed (it may differ from one poet to another), but the common factor of 'Chhayavad' is the typical art. A free- rendering of a part of his representative poem (from Lahar is given below:–

"Under the magic of your charm
To loneliness, so soothing and warm
Slowly and slowly from this meet
Take me away, my boatman sweet."
"Where the charming wave of the sea
Blooming and shining in her glee
Whispers, clinging to the sky,
Her maiden message so sweet and shy."

Sumitra Nandan Pant comes next to 'Prasad'. He started his career in 1918 and developed his art for the next five decades. He was exposed to nature so much that he almost lived in nature and was the most tender and soft of the poets in his art and in his emotions. He maintained his art, though he has often changed his thought-content under the influence of Gandhism, socialism and spirtualism of Sri Aurobindo. He was the first to throw away the old mediaeval rules of metre and rhetorics. Scholars have traced many contemporary influences on his poetry–Vivekananda, Rabindranath, Aurobindo, Gandhi, Romanticism and Socialism. It was Veena (collection of poems) which brought him to the fore: Granthi (collection of poems 1920) established him, followed by a score of poetry collections including Pallav Gunjan, etc. Pant became a progressive poet also and ultimately he stood for a synthesis of Gandhism and Socialism. It has been rightly said that the expansion of the poet Pant became a setback for his art; in his late collections he turned prosaic. 'Prasad' and Pant started almost at the same time and under the same circumstances, but 'Prasad' had left a deeper mark on modern literature as compared to Pant who appeals more to the head than to the heart.

Surya Kant Tripathi 'Nirala' was a creation of his personal circumstances. He was the hero amongst the poets. He had the advantage of two mother-tongues–Hindi and Bengali. He was a man of the masses and he loved to accept challenges. During his last days, he lost mental balance may be partly due to the shock of the treatment he got at the hands of contemporary litterateurs. His earlier poem 'Juhi ki Kali' was as much hailed and lauded as his 'Ram ki Shakti Pooja'. A personal controversy between Pant and Nirala is also talked about as an event. Like 'Prasad' this poet was also versatile and has successfully adorned all forms of literature. Parimal (poetry collection) brought him immense popularity. He has about three dozen works to his credit. From the days of youth, 'Nirala' landed up on the hard soil and fought through literature against every form of injustice. From 'Chhayavad' onwards 'Nirala' changed into modernity and his idealism eventually turned realistic. As a strong and forceful writer 'Nirala' succeeded in giving a new dimension to modern Hindi literature.

Born in 1907 and educated up to M.A., Mahadevi Verma is the modern Mira Bai of Hindi literature and as a modern poetess she has no parallel in the country. She combines poetry, music and painting in her art. It is on account of Mahadevi that spiritualism cannot be divorced from 'Chhayavad'. In fact, she is the only artist who breathes mysticism in her poems. Being a disciplined person she is an idealist and has worked continuously for the uplift of the masses which is a part of her spiritual craving. Yama, a collection of her poems, earned her fame and reverence from all quarters. Her poems are full of introspection and reflect Vedantic musings. 'Love', to her is an expansion of personality and calls for service to the needy and the deprived. Very often she touches the Buddhistic concept of 'Karuna' and her sadness becomes totally impersonal. Her attachment to nature is very near to the Rigvedic sentiment. In the poetry of Mahadevi Verma, we find elevation not sublimation, Universal 'Karuna' not personal grief, spiritual music not temporal attachment. For her, poetry is the expression of the developed self which covers the whole universe in its fold. Later poems of Mahadevi Verma breathe out Vedic atmosphere and try to serve as ladder between 'Chhayavad' and the 'Rigvedic' poetry even in the art of expression.

During the two decades scores of poets were attracted towards 'Chhayavad' art–poets who were otherwise influenced by Gandhism or Socialism also. With the advancement of age, spiritualism or socialism took the place of the romantic 'Chhayavad'. Ramkumar Verma, Narendra Sharma, Siyaram Sharan Gupta and Bhagvaticharan Verma are some of the known names of this field. In fact during those decades every young heart throbbed with Chhayavadic art. The 'Gitakars' (song-composers) specialise in this art even after those sunny days. 'Chhayavad' is a trend of art, it cannot survive without depth, it lives on emotions and through emotions enters deep into the spirit. It is the poetry of refinement, it grows on the ground but must rise to higher loftiness.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Nand Dulare Vajpaye, Chhayavad Yug., Adhunik Kavya-dhara., Ramchandra Shukla. Hindi Sahitya ka Itihas, Kavya-Kala tatha Anya Nibandh., Shambhu Nath Singh, Hindi Kavita mein Yugantar.

O.P.

CHHUGANI, PRABHU JOTUMAL 'VAFA', (Sindhi; b. 1915) graduated in History and Economics from D.J. Sindh College, Karachi and joined Govt. Service and migrated to India in 1948. He retired as Administrative Officer in 1973 from the Ministry of Labour, Directorate General Factory Advice Service & Labour, Institutes, Bombay. In the field of poetry, Vafa is close to Dilgir. He also learnt the art of poetry from Navazali Niyaz (d. 1959) and was influenced by Bevas in his formative days. He has so far published three collections of his poems; Jhankar 1958. Parvaz (Flight, 1962.) ghazal, rubai and poems of other forms and Surkh Gulab Suraha Khwab (Red Roses, Fragant Dreams 1980) which received the Sahitya Akademi Award, in 1981 is a collection of 'Panjkiras', a five-lined poem rhymed 'abbaa', line 5 repeating the first and each line consisting of 16 matras. This is his original contribution to the Sindhi prosody. The metre used has an affinity with Hindi metre called 'Prasad' or 'Srinagar Chhanda'. The idea is developed in the first four lines and the repetition of the first line as the fifth lends it depth. It is a beautiful blend of Persian Rubai and French Triolet. Vafa's poems deny existence of God and depict the world as a creation by chance. After reading Vafa, one may ask why should God and Soul be the only pre-occupation for a man? Life is many-faceted; why should not the truth, love, beauty, music, intellect and the virtues etc. attract us. The poems of Vafa are logical, lyrical and sensitive. He is able to see everyday commonplace events with a fresh and discerning eye. His verses are his own experiences. His views may be non-conformist, but the appeal of his poetry is penetrating.

N.G.N.

CHIDAMBARANATHA CHETTIAR, A ((Tamil; b. 1907, d. 1968) popularly known as A.C. Chettiar, was a longtime faculty member of Annamalai University. He was a legend among the students for his masterly teaching of Ilango Adigal and Tamil prosody. He wrote a number of books on the Tamil language and literature. His doctoral dissertation, Advanced Studies in Tamil Prosody, being a history of Tamil prosody upto the 10th century A.D., has been reprinted many times. In 1963, he edited a volume of Tamil short stories for the Sahitya Akademi, Tamil Chirukataik Kalanjiyam. Chettiar jointed the University of Madras and served as the Chief Editor for the English-Tamil dictionary, published in three volumes during 1963-1965. Some of his works were published posthumously: Chenkol vendar (Just kings, 1977); Tamil-il Chirukataiyin Totramum Valarchiyum (The origin and development of the short story in Tamil, 1977).

FURTHER WORKS: Ulaippal uyarnta oruvar (The one who had raised himself, 1937), Tamilocai (articles on Tamil literature and language, 1951); Tamil Kattum ulaku (Worldly life, as portrayed in Tamil literature, 1958); Mannuyirku anvar (The humanitarian, 1959); Ilangovin inkavi (The poetry of Ilango: a criticism of Silappadikaram, 2nd edn., 1969); Vittut tirumagal (The lady adorning the home, 2nd edn. 1969); Othello (translation).

K.Su.

CHIDANANDA MURTHY, M. (Kannada : b. 1931) joined, after a distinguished academic career, the Mysore University as a lecturer and is at present a Professor of Kannada at the Bangalore University. Primarily interested in research, his interests extend to the study of a people's culture as revealed in the inscriptions, folklore and similar sources. He has to his credit a book on the principles of linguistics. His Kannada Shasanangal Samskritika Adhyayana is his major contribution to the study of inscriptions. His research papers dealing with a variety of problems concerning Kannada literature have been collected in three volumes. His critical study of Shunya-Sampadane is his essay in literary criticism and is notable for its insights and careful study of the text.

Chidananda Murthy has been a visiting Professor at the Stanford University and has been the sectional president for historical linguistics at the third international conference organised by that University.

V.M.I.

CHIHALA (Rajasthani; b. 1495, d. 1570) was a Jaina poet and, perhaps, hailed from the Sekhawati region of Jaipur. His published works are–Panchasaheligita, Bawani, Panthigita, Veligita, Vairajnygli called Udaragita and Gita. Atma Prabodha Javamala, written by him, is said to be an Apabhramsha work (1954). He is more known for his Panchasaheligita and Bawani. The first one is an erotic composition containing interesting descriptions of feelings, during separation from and union with their husbands, by the women of five castes, the wives of a gardener, a betel seller, a cloth printer, a wine brewer and a goldsmith. What is remarkable is the use of diction relevant to the profession in the description by each woman of the particular caste. The work was composed in the year 1518. The Bawani is full of impressive descriptions relating to ethics and practical life. The rest of his writings are more spiritual in nature.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: H.L. Maheshwari, Rajasthani Bhasha aur Sahitya., M.L. Menariya, Rajasthani Bhasha aur Sahitya.

Hi.M.

CHIKADEVARAYA VAMSAVALI (Kannada) is an account in prose by Tirumalarya (1645-1706) of the royal ancestry of the Mysore ruler Chikadevarja Wodeyar. A fellow-student and companion of the ruler, Tirumalarya rose to be his court-poet and finally his minister. All his works centre around his ruler whose eulogy and glorification are the main motives. The Vamsavali which professes to describe his master's lineage is not always historically accurate or adequate. While his account of Doddadevaraja is vitiated by excessive description and hyperbole, the life of Kanthirava Narasaraja does not receive the full attention it deserves. But the work as a whole is remarkable for its prose style at a time when prose was not a favoured medium. Well-versed in both Sanskrit and Kannada, Tirumalarya was a learned stylist who drew strength from the best in both the languages. He was essentially a poet, a scholar versed in Srivaishnava lore, who chose to write in prose and the result is a fascinating amalgam of fact, fancy and religious dogma. Though not always dependable as a historical document, the work's importance consists in its vigorous style which helped to revive prose when verse was the order of the day.

V.M.I.

CHIKKAVEERA RAJENDRA (Kannada) by Masti Venkatesa Ayyangar is a historical novel that won the Jnanapith Award for the year 1983. It describes the political developments of the final year of Veerarajendra's rule over the small principality of Coorg culminating in his dethronement and the British Government's take-over in 1835. The dethronement became necessary because of the despotic misrule of the king which cost the ruler his throne, and enslaved a free community and subjugated it to foreign rule. The price which the rulers as well as the ruled have to pay for misrule forms the theme also of the other historical novel that Masti wrote, Chennabasavanayaka, which describes how Hyder intervened and claimed Bidanur just as in the present instance the Britishers intervened and took over Coorg. In either case, the selfish abuse of power by the rulers opened the doors for the opportunist outsiders who came ostensibly to put things in order but in effect had their own different intentions fulfilled. The emphasis thus naturally falls on the character of those who are entrusted with the power and responsibility to administer a state and promote the welfare of its subjects.

Veeraraja succeeded his father who had usurped the throne and fortified his position with the help of Basava, an illegitimate brother (though neither was aware of the relationship) whom he later elevated as his minister. His power as ruler became the instrument of his lust and cruelty. Fourteen years of such misrule had strained the patience of the people to a breaking point when the killing of a cousin whom he feared as a rival claimant to the throne; complaints of having abducted a young woman from a neighbouring place under British rule; his arrogant treatment of the British Resident's delegates who came to intercede; his refusal to return and finally his gruesome killing of his sister's child he held as hostage because she and her husband had sought asylum with the British, all these contribute to providing an opportunity to the British to intervene and decide with the co-operation of the local leaders that the ruler must be deposed. Col. Fraser's proposal that the young princess be installed with the queen mother as the guardian is rejected by the queen herself because she preferred accompanying her husband in his exile. There was none to support the claims of the ruler's elder cousin and half-brother Basava who had been shot by the king himself thinking that his betrayal had caused his arrest when he had tried to escape. So, inevitably as it were, Fraser assumes charge of the state and Veeraraja, accompanied by his queen and daughter, is exiled first to Vellore and finally to Benaras where the queen dies and he with his daughter ends his days in England.

Carnal lust,cruelty and despotic arrogance that made him blind to reason and to the limitations of his own position and power conspired to bring about his fall. It was a tragic fall, not because he deserved any pity but because his fall meant the end of a kingdom and it drew into its vortex of endless suffering other innocent lives like his wife and daughter and countless others who did not deserve their fate. The queen was too good for him; she would part with her jewels for the state's needs and prefer to follow her husband in exile rather than assume administration in the name of her daughter. The princess, in spite of the love she could elicit from her father, was too young and innocent to prevent his headlong rush towards his own ruin. On the contrary, his love for her ruined her life. Bhagawati, Basava's mother, first seduced and then thrown out, who bided her time over the years in exile and found in the end her son shot by the master he had loyally served just when the chance to stake her claim on his behalf had arrived. And Basava himself, though a villain, born to a royal parent nonetheless, lived in total servility and died a tragic death.

It would look like striking too moralist a note to maintain that a ruler's sins are visited upon his subjects or that all those that associate with such a one are swept along with him in the flood of his misdeeds. But the story has its lessons. In a novel based on history the lessons are implied if not underlined by the course of developments devised not by the author's imagination but by the unseen hands of destiny even if we were to understand by that term the inscrutable complex of the actions and reactions of millions of men and women who preforce act and react in terms of their character and make-up, heredity and environment. Chikaveera Rajendra thus unfolds a drama of tragic developments that reveal different dimensions of meaning and significance.

V.M.I.

CHIKUPADHYAYA (Kannada). Chikupadhyaya, a 17th century Kannada poet was, like Tirumalaraya, a court poet and minister of Chikadevaraja Wodeyar, the Mysore ruler (1673-1704). A prolific writer both in verse and prose and a man of deep religious faith dedicated to Vaishnavism, the entire body of his writing is devoted to describing and expatiating upon the greatness and glory of deities, saints and sacred places. His varied and extensive reading in the puranas provided him with legendary lore which enriches his accounts of the gods and their holy abodes. His Satvikabrahmavidyavilasam, which expounds the philosophy of Vaishnavism, is a translation of a Sanskrit original like his ambitious and extensive translation of the Vishnupurana in six parts which begins with the origins of the universe and concludes with the Kaliyuga. It incorporates relevant teachings appropriate to each age and avatar. Just as his philosophical work is a compendious exposition of the philosophy of Vaishnavism, his Vishnupurana is exhaustive in its mythological range. The work comprising more than six thousand verses employs the Champu form which exhibits his Sanskrit learning as well as his versatility in composition whether verse or prose. His Seshadharma retells in prose a part of the Harivamsa story. In Sangatya form he described the erotic legends concerning Krishna. His translation of Sukasuptati and the commentaries he has written on ethical treatises are all in prose. Chikupadhyaya occupies an important place as a writer of prose and his style of writing marks a phase of its development.

V.M.I.

CHILAKALU VALINA CHETTU (Telugu) is the title given to the second edition of the collection of poems by Ismail. Chilakalu Valina Chettu (Parrots on a tree) occupies a very special place in modern Telugu poetry. It belongs to a new type of poetry called 'pure poetry'. This school of thought does not believe in the theory that political philosophies enrich poetry. Poets like Ismail, Seshendra Sarma, Srikantha Sarma and Srimannarayana belong to this school. Ismail published his first anthology of poetry Chettu Na Adarsamu (Tree, my ideal) in 1972. Later he brought out another anthology of poetry Mrityu Vriksham (Tree of Death) in 1976. Chilakalu Valina Chettu (Tree with parrots) is a collection of Chettu Na Adarsam, Mrityu Vriksham and a few other poems.

Ismail is original in his thinking. He has a poignant imagination. He fills his poetry with vital images. He describes nature like a painter and with a humanistic approach. In his poem 'Tree My ideal' he describes–

"The bird, a forgetful arrow flung from the tree–bow
Wanders disconsolate
The worm bent on uncorking the secret earth gets stuck like a cork–screw
The tree, parrot, worm and part bird penetrating the earth and vaulting the sky
Is crowned with flowers"

Ismail can be compared with the masters of painting like Constable and Turner. He has a magic touch. He chooses ordinary subjects like an evening walk; college in the rainy season, feelings under the order of transfer, journey through the night in a motor car and transforms them into lofty poetic images with his magic touch.

Images in Ismail's poetry are images in darkness made visible. The donkey is his favourite object for simile.

K.R.R.

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE (Assamese) The history of Assamese literature begins with oral and folk literature. Assamese children's literature also begins with the oral literature. Nichukanigit or cradle songs are the best specimens of this kind. These songs unfold moods and aspirations of the child and also depict simple episodes dear to childhood imagination. These lyrical songs transport the mind of the child on the wings of melody and fancy to a magic world of dreams. Jon bai beji eta diya (O moon give me a needle), O phul O phul nuphula kia (O flower, why don't you bloom), etc, are the best specimens of the childhood imagination with 'pleasant illogicality.'

Jon bai beji eta diya is a delightful little song and depicts a fanciful dialogue between a mother and the moon. The mother wants an elephant for her child to ride on for which she is asking for a needle from the moon.

In the literature of the Vaishnavite period, Shankardeva depicted the character of child Krishna both for the child and adult. Madhabdeva followed him and gave more emphasis on the character of child Krishna. The Ankiya-Nat (drama) Chordhara and Pimpara Guchuva of Madhavdeva, portray the childhood life of Krishna.

Kankhowa Kavya of Shridhar Kandali is rather a Vaishnavite version of an Assamese lullaby and wonderfully appealing to child sentiment in general and motherly feeling in particular through the characters of Shri Krishna and Yashoda.

Bhim Charit of Ram Saraswati is a mock-heroic narrative, with humour, also appealing to the child sentiment.

A collection of the first Assamese folktale was made by Mrs. Eliza Brown and published by the American Baptist Mission. The other story books compiled and published by the Mission are Afrikar Konwar, Egalar Bah, and Bibelar Sadhu (Stories from the Bibles).

Gunabhiram Barua, a junior contemporary of Ananda Ram Dhekial Phukan, wrote the Laraputhi (1873) for children. Padmabati Devi Phukanani, daughter of Ananda Ram, also wrote Hitasadhika (1885) for children.

The Assamese children's literature also like other branches, became rich from the Jonaki age both in verse and prose.

The folktale has played a vital role in the children's literature, from the earliest period. The tale or folktale is known as Sadhu-Katha in Assamese. Assamese folk-tales in English are found in the collections such as J.D. Anderson's Kachari Folktale and Rhymes (1895), G.A. Grierson's Linguistic Survey of India (Vol. III, 1903), J. Barua's Folktales of Assam (1915), Praphulladatta Goswami's Tales of Assam (1980) and Benudhar Rajkhowa's Assamese Demonology. Tales of a Grandfather from Assam by Aruna Devi Mukherjee is a translation of her father Lakshminath Bezbarua's Kaka Deuta Aru Natilara.

Niti-Katha (1884) of Bishnupriya Devi, wife of Gunabhiram Barua, is a collection of folktales of pre-Jonaki age.

Lakshminath Bezbarua's Buri Air Sadhu (1912), Kaka Deuta Aru Nati Lara (1913) and Junuka (1913) are collections of folktales. Bezbarua collected these folktales from various sources and put them in his lucid style and language. His pioneering efforts have been followed by Asamiya Sadhu of Saratchandra Goswami and Sadhukatha (1934) and Sandhiar Sadhu of Trailokyeswari Devi Baruani. The other important writers are Sriramchandra Das, Arjunchandra Das and Prasannakumar Deka.

Maina, Akpakhya and Birachatiar Desh of Hariprasad Barua, Pakhila (1951) of Banikanta Kakati, Rangpata of Benudhar Sharma, Junjuni (1964) of Mitradev Mahanta, Ghumati Jayore of Dulal Barthakur are some other important books for children.

There are some minor and stray works on the Ramayana and the Mahabharata. These are very popular amongst the children. Mahadev Sarma, Rosheswar Sarma, Mitradev Mahanta, Lalitkumar Barua, Mahendranath Bhattacharjee, Atulchandra Hazarika, Taranath Barpuzari and many other writers published different versions of the Ramayana and the Mahabharata for the children.

Besides, the Puran, the Bhagavata, the Panchatantra, the Hitopadesha, the Jataka, the Koran and the Bible stories enriched the Assamese children's literature. Some important translations from the English and other literatures also enriched the Assamese literature for children.

Dadair Paja (1930) and Venichar Saud of Jnanadabhiram Barua are two Assamese versions of Uncle Tom's Cabin and Merchant of Venice respectively. Robinson Crusoe of Benudhar Sarma, Waganor Sadhu of Harendranath Sarma, Don Quixote of Suprabha Goswami, etc. are some readable Assamese translations. Galivar Sadhu and Don Quixote of Mahendra Bora are two popular Assamese varsions of Gulliver's Travels and Don Quixote respectively.

Kabita Har (1890) of Ratneshwar Mahanta, Uju Kabita (1895) and Lara Kabita (1897) of Durgaprasad Majindar Barua and Ujupath of Baladev Mahanta enriched the children's poetry during the 19th century.

The later works of the poets of the Jonaki age are Sontara of Bisaychandra Biswasi, Kabitarchandrika of Dhanai Bora, Jilikani of Ananda chandra Agarwala, Kabitar Puthi of Soloiman Kha, Kabita Kusum of Pramodchandra Barthakur and Kabitar Har of Singhadatta Dev Adhikary.

Nabinchandra Bardoloi, Raghunath Chaudhary, Jatindranath Duara, Chandradhar Barua, Dandinath Kalita, Binandachandra Barua, Atulchandra Hazarika, Kamaleswar Chaliha, and many other noted poets of the romantic age enriched the poetry of children. They were skilled craftsmen in metrical arrangement.

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE–ASSAMESE

The Lara Bandhu (Friend of Boys) edited by Karunabhiram Barua, son of Gunabhiram, is the first children's magazine in the Assamese literature. The Akan (1915) edited by Hemchandra Goswami, Maina (1923) of Raghunath Chaudhary, Pakhila (1933) of Harendranath Sarma, Akan Arun of Mahadev Sarma, Parijat of Dinanath Sarma, Akan (1933) and Rang-ghar (1948) of Birinchikumar Barua, Amar desh of Tulasinarayan Sarma, and Kachijon of Ibrahim Ali are important children's magazines published in the first half of the 20th century.

The Dipak (1958) of Gaurikanta Talukdar, Jonbai (1960) of Nabakanta Barua and Naren Sarma, Radali of Sureshchandra Rajkhowa, Akash of Preeti Barua, Saphura of Bhaben Saikia, Bihuan, Rang Ahe Pakhimeli of Ratna Oja, Pohar and the Chemaniya are some noted children's journals and periodicals of later days.

Ankiyanatas of Madhavdeva furnish lovely portraits of childhood and adolescene of Krishna. His drama reflects the thoughts and sentiments which animate the childhood and the youth.

Kirtinath Bardoloi and Muktinath Bardoloi have written a few dance dramas in the operatic style for children. Luit Kowar, Vasantir Abhishek, and Sur Bijoy are notable among them.

Anandachandra Barua, Nalinibala Devi, Premnarayan Dutta, Kirtinath Hazrika, Nabakanta Barua, Nirmalprabha Bardoloi, Tafajul Ali and Keshab Mahanta played a vital role in the growth of children's drama and opera.

The biographical literature is most essential for the children. This branch of literature was rich in the Vaishnavite age.

Number of Assemese children's fiction is not very large. Patal Puri of Haragobinda Sarma is the first of this kind of literature. Besides, Jogen Sarma, Shukleshwar Bora, Premnarayan Dutta, Saujanyamayee Bhattacharji and a few others tried to enrich Assamese children's fiction with their writing.

Despite expanding science teaching, Assamese science literature for children is poor. Amongst writers on science subjects the outstanding name and their works are: Bignanar Bishmay Batari of Dwipendranath Sarma, Akashar Katha of Harendranath Kalita, Bignanar Sadhu of Rohinikumar Barua, Patanagar Katha of Jogendranath Saikia, Prakritir Putala Khel of Kalinath Sarma, Mahakash Abhijan of Binoy Tamuli, Adim Jugar Katha of Bhubanmohan Das, Phular Sadhu of Prasanna Goswami, Abhinav Abishkar and Betar of Dinesh Goswami, Junmanir Bijnan of Amrit Phukan, Chandra Abhijan of Bijaykumar Dev Sarma and Prani Jagatar Bishmay of Dimbeswar Chaliha.

Harendranath Sarma came to prominence through his children's literature. Besides his children's magazine, Pakhila, Shibaji, Sabitri, Nal Damayanti etc. are his notable contributions. Besides editing the Akan and the Ranghar, Birinchikumar Barua's contributions to this genre are Swijarland Bhraman, Jatak Mala, Desh Bideshar Sadhu and Jamar Joy.

The contributions of the celebrated dramatist Jyotiprasad Agarwala to the Assamese children's literature are Jyoti Ramayan and Kampur Sapon; those of Devakanta Barua are very limited in number. But his Amair Nati published in the Ranghar (Vol. 1, No. 2, 1948) is one of the best poems of this branch of literature.

Atulchandra Hazarika has contributed a group of stories from the Mahabharata, the Puran, and the Jataka. Grimar Sadhu, Andersonar Sadhu, Ishapar Sadhu, are some of his noted translations. Runuk Junuk, Maniki Madhury, Phehujali are his metrical works. These metrical verses of Hazarika have however achieved more success than his other poems.

Ajalitara Neog has to her credit such story books as Alladdin, Sindabad, Alibaba aru Dukuri Dokait. Anandaram Dhekial bhukan and Gunabhiram Barua are two of her biographies.

Harunar Rashid tried his skill in children's literature. Tamkhurar Jupuri, Banbir Tarjan and Oliver Twist are his noted works.

Premdhar Dutta and Ananta Deva Sarma produced a large number of literary works for children both in prose and in verse. Premature death of these eminent writers is a great loss to the Assamese children's literature. Nakatha, Sialar Sing, Bhako Bhawana are the important works of Datta and Jolongar Mekuri, Orani Talar Goph, and Agashi Bantir Adhani Pohar are the works of Sarma.

Nabakanta Barua tried his skill in the children's literature both in prose and verse. Siali Palegoi Ratanpur, and Akharar Jakhala are his notable works.

Dharmeshwar Kataki published some useful books for children. They are Harishchandra Upakhyan, Akanir Dhruba, and Akanir Prahlad.

Nirmalprabha Bardoloi, the noted poet and essayist, has to her credit books like Chilchil Chila Bagi Chila mila, Man Urania and Saliki Ratautou.

Lila Gogoi contributed some works both in prose and verse for children. Sontara, Lachit Barphukan and Khare Sialar Biya are his useful works.

Gaganchandra Adhikari, the author of Takat Akota Hati, is a young promising writer.

Bilati Hoja of Praphulla Datta Goswami, Daorar Sipare Dhunia Desh of Maheshwar Neog and Pamilir Parial of Rohinikumar Barua are important books for children.

Some other important works for children of which mention may be made are Japani Sadhu and Pakhir Deshat Anjumani of Anu Barua, Uraj and Mauraj of Harinath Sarma Doloi, Bhantir Sadhu of Bhim Sekhar Barua, Krishna Lila, Sishu Lila of Bishnupriya Datta Barua, Bane Bane of Jogesh Das, Olat Palat and Sandhiar Sadhu of Atulchandra Barua, Mukali Manar Sadhu of Syed Abdul Mali, Kekora Kair Bia of Kalinath Sarma, Chin Deshar Sadhu of Jamir Uddin Ahmed, Ramdhenu Kamdhenu of Dabendranath Acharya, Lak pa Kur of Narendranath Sarma, Tahanir Sadhu of Nanda Talukdar, Sishu aru Suna Katha of Nilima Dutta, Ajan Deshat Elish of Prabina Saikia, Himalayar Sadhu of Bishwanarayan Shastri, Adarsha Jiban of Maheshchandra Dev Goswami, Kimbadantir Sadhu of Hemantakumar Sarma, Mauchak of Jatindranath Goswami, Ping Pang Parwar Matar Gari of Jatin Goswami, Naria Rajar Paria of Kailash Sarma, Manar Lagari of Rajendranath Bhuyan, Kazirangat Sat Bihu of Lakshya Hira Das, Karbi Sadhu of Rangbang Teron, Sonowal Sadhu of Gagan Sanowal, Amatar Mat of Birendranath Dutta, Desh Bideshar Akani of Nanda Saikia, Batrish Singhasan of Utchaba Nanda Goswami and Jiba Jantur Sadhu of Anil Kumar Sarma.

N.T.

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE (Bengali). Written literature for children in Bengal dates back to 1818, when Digdarshan, a magazine for young people was printed and published by the British missionaries Carey, Marshman and Ward of Srerampur, with the able cooperation of contributors like Raja Rammohan Ray (1772-1833) and others. The avowed purpose of this and similar publications was to provide reading materials and moral instructions to the pupils of the newly established schools under the patronage of missionaries, rather than fostering the cause of literature. The published pieces were rather dull and didactic and the language was stilted. But these efforts prepared the ground for the growth of juvenile literature by establishing an easy prose which children could understand. For many centuries however there had existed in Bengal a rich store of unwritten juvenile literature in the form of bed-time stories retold by generations of mothers and grandmothers, with added local interpolations which made them a moving record of the lives and thoughts of the common people of Bengal. Unfortunately little effort was made to collect and write them down until the 19th century.

The task before the early writers of juvenile literature in Bengal was not an easy one. The common people were mostly illiterate. Their readers as well as the reading matter had to be built up mostly from scratch. In this respect the role of the magazines and periodicals which soon appeared (and generally disappeared after a few years) is by no means insignificant. Through their efforts a facile and lively language developed. The initial translations were supplemented and largely replaced by original efforts. Educators and writers began to take an interest. Last but not the least, a new generation of eager and inquisitive readers appeared. The books and periodicals now overflowed from class-rooms into homes and playgrounds. The seeds of a true juvenile literature thus germinated.

Four distinct ages may be recognised in the growth of juvenile literature in Bengali: (1) The first of these may be termed the Age of the School Book Society, 1818-1847. (2) The next is the Vidyasagar Age, 1847-1891. (3) Then began the Modern age 1891-1941. (4) Lastly, the age from 1941 onwards.

The School Book Society commenced its activities in cooperation with the Srerampur missionaries, whose purpose was still not the furtherance of literature, but the spread of education along with Christianity, though the latter was not forced upon the pupils in any way. Whatever their purpose, their efforts undoubtedly resulted in the creation of a simple and more practical Bengali than the sanskritised language of the books and manuscripts of those days. The reading matter published at first consisted mostly of translations from English originals, moral lessons, nature study, excerpts from British history and so on. The language was unimaginative and the style didactic. Yet the rich juvenile literature of Bengali today undoubtedly owes its beginning to the good missionaries and the School Book Society.

An accurate assessment of the number of books for children, written and published at this time is not possible, as many have vanished without any trace. Soon after its foundation in 1818 the society published six books. One Captain Stuart who founded several schools in Bengal and his helper Tarachand Datta were among the authors. Stuart's Itihas Katha (Tales from History) and Upadesh Katha (Advice to Readers), of which no copies exist today, were adaptations. Radhakanta Deb, Tarinicharan Mitra and Ramkamal Sen wrote Niti Katha Moral Lessons) in three parts.

The first original composition for children has been attributed to Krishnadhan Mitra for his articles, in the periodical Jnanoday (The Dawn of Knowledge). Hito padesh (Moral Advice) translated by Ramkamal Sen appeared in 1820. It was a collection of 49 stories with morals and also had 49 pages. In 1836 the Christian Tract and Book Society published Sadachardipika (Light of Good Behaviour), pricedl$^{1/2}$ anna, consisting of 16 pages of moral episodes about historical characters. In 1938 appeared Jnan Chandrika (Moonlight of Learning) by Gopallal Mitra. It was a collection of stories from Indian sources with some attempts at literary embellishment. In 1840 was published Jnan Pradip (Lamp of Learning) by Gourishankar Tarkavagish. All the stories aimed at the moral uplift of young people.

Thus the Society did not nurture the cause of literature, but it did yeoman's work in preparing the ground and providing an easier and practical language suitable for children, all to the benefit of future fruitful years. The predominance of the School Book Society ended with the emergence of Ishwarchandra Vidyasagar (1820-1890).

With the publication of Ishwarchandra Vidyasagar's Betal Panchavimshati (25 stories of Betal) in 1847, a new age commenced. The book was adapted from the old Hindi Baital Pachishi, a collection of 25 moral stories centred round Vikramaditya, the ideal traditional king of Ujjain. It was not only the romantic narrative that inspired the new writers and readers, but also the language and style of this writing.

Vidyasagar gave his countrymen a language that was easy and beautiful, backed by a faultless Bengali grammatical structure, which did not need Sanskritic props. For children he wrote mostly text-books: Varna Parichay (Know your Alphabet), Kathamala (Book of Fables), Bodhodaya (Dawn of Knowledge), Akhyanmanjari (Collection of Stories) and so on—text-book for schools, but with a difference. These were endowed with the spirit of Bengal, even if the story was taken from a foreign source.

The language used in the books for children became warm, homely and infinitely more suitable for their daily life. The scope was widened to include more subjects, but still the new books aimed at only imparting information and moral teaching. The purpose of merely giving pleasure and inculcating an awareness of the richness of the life around the young readers had not yet entered the minds of the writers. Moreover the need for educative books was most pressing, although translations from more advanced foreign literatures had helped to colour the children's demands for more interesting reading, such as Daniel Defoe's Robinson Crusoe published by Bangabhashanubad Samaj in 1856.

Among other important writers of this age was Madanmohan Tarkalankar (1817-1858) whose Shishu-Shiksha (Child's Reader, 1880) contained some of the earliest peoms for children. One of these 'Pakhi sab kore rab/rati pohailo' (the birds chirp, signalling the end of the night) is an absolute charmer. There was also Akshaykumar Datta's Charu Patha in 3 parts (1853 '54, '59) which is one of the earliest Bengali books on popular science. The Rev. Lalbehari Dey (1824-94) collected and published in English his famous Folk Tales of Bengal. These were translated into Bengali only in 1978 by Lila Majumdar. Rangalal Bandopadhyay (1828-1887) and Dinabandhu Mitra (1830-1873) published a charming book of verse for children, Surodhuni Kavya. Manomohan Basu (1831-1912) wrote a book of poems for children, Padyamala, which gained much popularity among the youngsters.

The Vidyasagar Age achieved one great purpose. It helped Bengali juvenile literature to recognise its own heritage.

Many writers of the Vidyasagar Age continued to live well into the 20th century and the most powerful writers of the modern age began to publish their early works under the tutelage or inspiration of Vidyasagar. The new age however is conventionally dated from 1891, when Jogindranath Sarkar (1866-1937) published his little collection of poems and stories entitled Hasi o Khela (Laughter and Games). This single book is said to have ushered in a new age in which juvenile literature left its long service in the class-room and was enthroned in the child's heart. This possibility had dawned on educationists earlier, but the ground was not ready. Even the School Book Society founded in 1818, had plans to publish more entertaining books to be awarded as prizes. This had never materialised.

Hasi o Khela therefore was the first to break away from the class-room tradition and was solely for the pleasure it would give to children. What the child would incidentally learn was an extra benefit. Rabindranath (1861-1941) who had been writing for children for some years, had never planned such a book himself. Writing about this book in the periodical Sadhana in 1893 he said, 'The book is for little children. Bengal needed such a book, all our children's books are for the class-room. There is no trace of tenderness or beauty in them.....'

Indeed Jogindranath had filled its pages with pictures, poems, short stories, animal tales, puzzles, letters and other things that delight a child's heart.

Jogindranath's unforgettable folk-tale Sat Bhai Champa inspired new writers to compose original folk tales and fairy-tales. Upendrakishore's Majantali is such an attempt. Trailokyanath Mukhopadhyay's inimitable Kankavati is a tale of romance and unimaginable happenings narrated with the most delicious sense of humour.

However, a spate of new books soon appeared. 1894 saw Upendrakishore's Chheleder Ramayana and Abanindranath's first book for children, Shakuntala, unsurpassed, to this day, in language and narrative.

In 1897 Jogindranath's child's primer, profusely illustrated, exquisite Hasi-Khushi was published and mastering the letters became a jolly game for children, Hasi-Khushi changed the whole face of primary education. It was a pleasure for the children to read and behold the countless rhymes, drawings and sketches of this book.

Jogindranath was always ably supported and later out-distanced by Upendrakishore who was a highly talented poet, prose writer, a trained artist and skilled in the art and science of printing. He improved on the old English methods of half-tone block-printing and earned recognition even in Britain. Before the close of the century he had established his own up-to-date printing press and publishing firm, famous for its high-class art work. But his first two books Ramayana and Mahabharata for children were published by his life-long friend Jogindranath and brought him instant fame.

Upendrakishore's books were all his own work, though some of his stories were based on old Indian classics and legends. All his little playful articles, poems. songs, playlets and a large number of stories were original and covered a wide range. Among his works may also be mentioned Chhotto Ramayana in charming verse, Mahabharater Galpa, Puraner Galpa, and Gupi Gain on which his grandson Satyajit's famous film is based; Tuntunir Boi was published with his own illustrations in 1910 and is still unrivalled. His early work, Sekaler Katha (1903) is about prehistoric animals and reads like a modern book. From 1913 he published his superb children's magazine Sandesh a veritable feast of pictures, stories, travelogues, articles on natural history and science, poems, puzzles, letters and everything a child can dream of. The language was usually the spoken tongue and the presentation precise, concise and smart. The price was three annas. The standard of the magazine has not yet been surpassed. Gradually a number of writers rallied around Sandesh, which soon endowed Bengali juvenile literature with a richness and volume which made it comparable to that of the more advanced countries of the West.

Among these must be mentioned several members of Upendrakishore's own family, whose contributions to children's literature are greater and more varied than those of any single family, save the Tagores of Jorasanko. The contribution of Rabindranath and some of his relatives is however the most important. Among his works for children the following deserve the highest praise: Shishu, first published in 1903 is a collection of exquisite poems not always quite for children which however children enjoy often without grasping the full significance. They are actually a help for the guardians to understand their wards. Shishu Bholanath, the playlet Dak Ghar (Post Ofice), Galpa-Salpa (Chit-Chat) and Shishu-Tirtha (Child's Pilgrimage) and other works are so exquisite as to defy criticism. But they cannot be fully enjoyed by the ordinary child in his playtime. We shall place Rabindranath above our list of normal writers for children.

Among the relatives of Rabindranath, his sister-in-law Jnanadanandini Devi (1852-1941) edited the children's paper Balaka (1899) and composed and published stories and playlets of which Tak-duma-dum-dum and Sat Bhai Champa still delight children. Gaganendranath Tagore (1867-1938) wrote a charming book for children, titled Bhondor Bahadur. Most astounding however was Abanindranath Tagore. His Shakuntala (1895) and Khirer Putul (1896) followed in rapid succession by Nalak, Buro Angla, Rajkahini and others have immortalised the author by their sheer power of narration, beauty of language and most of all the enchantment of word-pictures.

In 1907 appeared Dakshinaranjan Mitra Majumdar's (1877-1957) Thakurmar Jhuli (Grandma's Bag), an unforgettable collection of folk-tales, the first of its kind, barring Lalbehari Dey's Folk Tales of Bengal which was written in English. The success of his first book encouraged Dakshinaranjan to publish other similar collections, Thakurdar Jhuli (Grandpa's Bag), Dada Mashair Jhola, etc., but none of them was as remarakable as the first.

During the closing years of the 18th century literally hundreds of eager inspired writers of children's books appeared with their varied offerings. We may mention only a few of the most outstanding. Upendrakishore's younger brother Kuladaranjan Ray produced a large number of charming books collected from Indian legends, or adapted or translated from European originals. These served to enrich the juvenile literature of Bengal. Among them were Odyssey, Iliad, Robin Hood, many of Conan Doyle's books—The Last World, The Hound of the Baskervilles, The Sherlock Holmes Stories and so on. These and similar attempts by other writers, Ramananda Chatterjee's Arabya Upanyas (Arbian Nights Tales, 1908); Shivanath Shastri's Upakatha (Folk Tales, 1908; collected from foreign originals); Monilal Gangopadhyay's Japani Manush (Man of Japan, 1908) suggested by Japanese stories and many others broadened the field.

Upendrakishore had a houseful of talented children. Sukhalata Rao (1886-1969), Upendrakishore's eldest daughter, wrote exquisite poems for children and published adaptations from European faity-tales. Her Aro Galpa (More Tales), Galper Boi (Story Book), Nije Paro (Read by yourself), Nije Shekho (Learn by yourself), the last two being school primers, are still admired.

Sukumar Ray (1887-1923), Upendrakishore's eldest son, is still the acknowledged leader of Bengali juvenile literature. His Abol-Tabol, poems full of humour and gentle satire, Khai-Khai, Ha-Ja-Ba-Ra-La, a marvellous novel, Pagla Dashu, a book of school-stories, and Jhalapala, a book of hilarious plays,—all mark him out as a rare writer who died at 36 only.

Satyajit Ray, Upendrakishore's grandson, introduced Professor Shanku and wove wonderful science fictions around him. Moreover, his Ek Dajan Gappo, Aro Ek Dajan, etc. are interesting story books for children.

A vigorous young literature was gradually acquiring strength. The spirit of adventure was making itself felt. It had appeared at intervals even in the 18th century but had not made much headway. As one of the effects of the translations of foreign adventure stories, original stories began to appear. Among the first were those by Hemendrakumar Ray (1883-1963), one-time editor of the children's periodical Rang-Mashal. His original adventure stories Jakher Dhan (The Demon's Treasure), Abar Jakher Dhan (The Treasure Again), Dersho Khokar Kanda (The Adventures of 150 Young Boys) and other stories thrilled a whole generation and inspired a spate of adventure stories which continue in a more realistic form with accelerated speed to this day. As early as in 1915 were published Jagadananda Ray's Graha Nakshatra (Stars and Planets), and Machh Bang Sap (Fish, Frogs Snakes). This was not a break-away from the old paths.

Neither Rabindranath nor Abanindranath had attempted adventure stories (except as children's dramas) and real life stories. But Rabindranath wrote of natural science. The seed was there. Jogindranath and Upendrakishore wrote of nature as well as of bold boys, robbers, hunting animals, foreshadowing more deliberate adventures.

The new books were most thrilling, full of hair-raising adventure and heroism. Of these writers the foremost was Hemendrakumar Ray (1888-1963) as has already been said. The great novelist Bibhutibhushan Bandopadhyaya was another. His Chander Pahar (The Mountains of the Moon), Hira Manik Jwaley (The Glitter of Diamons and Rubies), Bone Pahare (In Hill and Jungle), Maraner Danka Baje (the Drums of Death) and others are beautifully written, bold and idealistic stories. Later Premendra Mitra (1904) continued in the same strain. His Dragoner Nishwas (The Dragon's Breath), Kuhaker Deshe (The Land of Magic) and his Mamababu and Ghanada stories are all based on true natural and scientific phenomena with the magic of adventure and imagination. He was the first to realise that science fiction was not the same as science fantasy, but much more difficult, requiring intensive study and the ability to reach logical conclusions. Premendra Mitra is the ideal writer for children, highly intelligent, and full of humour, keenly observant, with a general freiendliness and a sense of the dramatic that appeals to all children. His collections of short stories, Ek Jahaj Galpa (A Shipload of Stories), Galper Mayur Pankhi and many others, all original, are excellent.

Sunirmal Basu (1902-1957) tried his hand fairly sucessfully at stories, poems, playlets, in the manner set by Upendrakishore. His books—Chhanabara, Bare Maja, Ananda Naru and others helped perpetuate the new standards.

Achintyakumar Sengupta (1903-1976) wrote for adults but his Dakater Hate (In the Clutches of Dacoits), Dui Bhai (Two Brothers) and other children's books are thrilling, intelligent and popular. Shivram Chakravarti (1905-1980) after his initial successes in adult literature devoted his talents to writing for children. His deep sense of the absurd, and unbelievable skill in the play of words have made him one of the most popular writers for children. His books Bari Theke Paliye (The Run-away), Montur Master, Hatir Sange Hatahati (At grips with the Elephant), Harshabardhan and other books are priceless gems of fun and absurdity.

Buddhadeb Bose (1908-1974) a remarkable figure in the field of modern Bengali literature, wrote many charming books and poems for children, such as Rangin Kach (Tinted Glass), Elomelo (At Random), Taser Prasade (In the Palace of Cards) and others. These writers have left a lasting impression on or made some significant contributions to Bengali juvenile literature but there are also many excellent translators and other writers as well as those from whose books for adults, children's versions have been prepared. Among these are Saratchandra Chattopadhyaya (1876-1938), Tarashankar Bandopadhyay, Balaichand Mukhopadhyay, whose original books for children are no mean achievement. Saradindu Bandopadhyay (1899-1970), who in addition to superb adult books, wrote three marvellous children's stories about Sadashiva. Shanta Devi (1894 . . .) rewrote foreign fables and Hindustani Folk Tales. Annadashankar Ray (1904...) in addition to his thoughtful essays and adult books has written beautiful poems for children. His Urki Dhaner Murki, Hoi-Re-Balri-Hoi and other books are assets to juvenile literature. Ashapurna Devi has written a large number of popular books for children. She has a delicate imagination and a homely touch.

These and a hundred others are still making contemporary literature a pattern of fact and fiction. The gap between spoken and written language has almost disappeared in juvenile literature. Text-books include poems and stories of today, besides those of the old masters. Bengali juvenile literature has developed a character of its own, intelligent, enquiring, broad-minded and imaginative. Most books are original. There are adaptations from the old classics and the best of foreign juvenile literature.

A number of publishers devote their energies to the publication of children's books. They are: old timers like Orient Longman, Macmillan's City Book Society, Deb Sahitya Kutir and new firms like Ananda Publishers, Asia, Sahitya, Nath Bros., Moushumi, Bimala Ranjan, Signet Press who once set a proper standard for others. And some of the magazines and journals exclusively meant for children have also over the years catered to the needs of children in ample measure. These include Sandesh, Mauchak, Rangmahal, Anandamela, etc.

L.M.

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE (Dogri). The first Dogri books for children were a collection of seven one-act plays entitled As bhag Jagane ale an and a collection of 13 children stories called Rochak Kahaniyan, both by the late Narendra Khajuria and published by Dogri Sanstha, Jammu, in the early 1960's. These plays and stories have children or/and birds and animals as characters and the purpose is didactic. About the same time, Shyamlal Sharma published Bal Bhagavat–collection of stories from the Bhagvata for children. Thereafter a journal Paungar brought out by Vijay Puri sought to give some pages to writing of children's interest but it soon ceased publication after a few issues. A Dogri translation of Hitopadesha appeared in the early 1970s. Thereafter Om Goswami wrote and published a collection of seven plays for children called Bal Ekanki in Dogri. As implied in the title, these are also one-act plays meant for childlren. In 1979, the year of the child, the J & K Academy of Art, Culture & Languages brought out a special issue of Sheerhaja, Bal Visheshanka. Dogri Sanatha, Jammu, also brought out a special issue of Nami Chetana during the year. Of particular interest to children are folk tales of which nearly one and a half dozen volumes have appeared so far–twelve published by the J & K Academy and the rest by individuals.

FURTHER WORKS: Ek ha raja, (9 folk-tales), Dorgi Sansthan, Jammu; Paun (4 folk-tales) Dogri Sahitya Mandal; Bansilal Gupta, Dogri Lok Kathan., (15 tales)

Sh.

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE (Gujarati). Though it did not have a separate nomenclatture, there were plenty of songs and stories for children in Gujarati folk literature.

The traditional stories which a child would hear in Gujarati included tales from the Ramayana, Mahabharata, Bhagavata, Panchatantra and Hitopadesa. He would also have fairy tales, anecdotes of Akbar and Birbal, Vikram and Vetal, Bhoj and Kalidas and so on.

In the year 1826 primary, middle and high schools oriented to Western pattern of education, were established in Gujarat. Prior to this, in 1820, Native Schools and Books Society was constituted at Bombay. It brought out textbooks for the new schools. The textbooks, however, had to be supplemented by books for co-curricular reading. In 1928 Bapu Shastri Pandya wrote Aesop Nitikathao. It was a translation of Aesop's fables and it became very popular. In the next few years, five other translations of Aesop's fables were published. There also appeared translations of Gulliver's Travels, with the title Gulliverni Musafari in Gujarati.

In 1931 was published an interesting book, Balamitra, in two parts. It contained stories, poems. anecdotes, jokes and provided interesting type of reading. In 1840 Bombay Education Society published four books for children Sishusadbodhamala, Balamitra, Balasathi and Panchopakhyan. These books contained short stories, anecdotes, biographical sketches and poems. In 1848 poet Dalapatarama wrote humorous poems for children, taking a clue from tales of Hitopadesa and Panchatantra. His was perhaps the first major work in the area of original writing for children. Amichandra wrote Batrish Putalini Varta, retelling the traditional Indian tales woven round king Vikrama. In 1866, Navalram, the well known poet-critic, published Balagarbavali, employing the poetic form of 'garaba'.

In 1870 Keshavalal Parikh brought out a collection of riddles, Koyada Samgraha. A Parsi author, Marzban's two books should be specially mentioned Kavtuka Samgraha (1885) and Padshah are Leva (1886). The first presents general knowledge in a light manner and the second in the form of puzzles.

In 1887 Haragovindadas Kantavala wrote a full-fledged novel regarding the misrule of a foolish king.

Iccharam Desai wrote Balakono Ananda (1985) in the tradition of Evenings at Home series of English literature

Murkho (1896), edited by Manchharam Ghelabhai, is a collection of popular tales, from different pens with the 'the fool' as their theme.

In the first decade of the twentieth century three interesting publications marked a departure into a fresh area of children's literature. Narayan Hemchandra brought out his Mahabharatani Vartao (1904), presenting several children from the story of Mahabharata as heroes of his own book. Iccharam Desai published Ghashirama Kotavala (1903), telling the story of Ghashiram from Maratha history. Hargovinda Das Kantavale published Kanyavachanamala the first book exclusively meant for girls.

In 1906 Sharadaben Mehta brought out Puranvartasamgraha, a collection of mythological tales. Desadesani Vato (1914) and Vijnanani Vato (1914) by Kalyanarag Joshi take the children to a wider world and the world of science. Balakaya (1915) by Krishnaprasad Bhatt contains some good poems with a natural rhythm. Jayasukhlal Joshipura's Alakano Adbhuta Pravasa is an adaptation of Alice in Wonderland.

In the 1930's Gijubhai Badheka, a pioneer of children's education, established a nursery section in his school Dakshinamurti with the help of Taraben Modak, Nanabhai Bhatt and Harbhai Trivedi. Here, children were encouraged to write and their writing was edited and published. Gijubhai Badheka himself wrote fine literature for children of different age groups. Dakshinamurti published 105 books for children of the age group seven to ten, and 45 for the children of the age group eleven to fourteen. Gijubhai was a keen student of child-psychology and his books captivated the minds of children of his time.

Apart from Gijubhai's brilliant work, some other writers also helped the growth of children's literature in Gujarati in the 30's. All India Radio initiated children's programme. Various periodicals for children began publication. Poets like Nanalal and Jhaverchand Meghani wrote for children. Nanalal's Balakavyo (1931) and Meghani's Halaradan, Veninan Phula (1931) and Killola (1932) marked a departure. Ranga Ranga Vedaliyan by Sundaram marked a point of culmination.

The poet Pinakin Trivedi who studied in Tagore's Shantiniketan, brought back the melody and rhythm of children's poems by Tagore. Two collections of Tribhuvan Vyas' Navam Gito (1929) and Gunjarava (1941) present images of the sea, river, hills and rains. Another landmark in this field is the collection Ilakavyo.

C.M.

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE (Hindi). Bhagwatiprasad Vajpeyi and Zahur Bakhsh were the main story writers for children. The latter was more effective because of his idiomatic and crisp language. Lajjashankar Jha is another name worth mentioning. The characters of his stories are traditional–king, queen, dog, cat, bear, etc. but his stories are based on personal experience and memoirs. A few adventurous stories like 'Jan Jokhim ki Kahaniyan' (1945) were also written in this period and their aim was to make the readers bold and adventurous.

Sohan Lal Dwivedi's collections of poems–Bansuri, Jharna, Bigul were very popular. Makhal Lal Chaturvedi ('Bharatiya Atma') and Mulchand Shrivatri are other notable poets of the same school, Swarna Sahodara is famous for children's songs. Stories in verse was another attraction for children. The subjects were old but Sohan Lal Dwivedi and Padamlal Punnalal Bakshi made new experiments in style and form.

A few biographies of political leaders like Churchill, Stalin, and famous literary figures like Tagore, Alfred Nobel came out. Travelogues like Puri Yatra by Lalli Prasad were also attempted. Translation of English and Bengali stories, poems and songs continued.

This period saw a new consciousness towards children's literature; its importance too was recognised and appreciated.

With the advent of freedom in 1947 the demand for children's literature grew. There ensued a keen competition among the various agencies producing books for children. The National Book Trust of India, New Delhi is producing books for the children in the age-group 10 to 14 years under the 'Nehru Bal Pustakalaya' plan. These books are produced simultaneously in all the fourteen lanugages of India. Magazines exclusively meant for children have also contributed a lot in this direction. Nandan, Parag, Milind. Baljagat, Balbharati, Chanda Mama and Raja Bhaiya, are notable monthlies. For the first time in Hindi a weekly exclusively for children Bachchon ka Akhbar has been recently started; a few weeklies like Dharma Yug, Saptahik Hindustan have regular columns and fixed pages for children's literature. The dailies–Nav Bharat Times, Aaj, Bharat and Hindustan, too, in their Sunday magazine sections have been regularly publishing stories, songs, poems, dramas, riddles, etc. for children. An attempt was made to popularise hand written children's magazine between 1946-49 but it failed. The Government of India and other Hindi speaking states are also encouraging the production of useful and healthy literature for children.

The trend of publishing old historical and mythological stories containing morals continues even today. Saral Panchtantra, edited by Vishnu Prabhakar, Balpanchtantra by Kamlesh, Saralhitopadesha by Dharampal Shastri and Jataka Kathaen by Savitri Devi are examples. Fairy tales are still popular among the children but the writers–Harikrishna Devasare, Shivamurti Sinha and Sharda Misra have made new experiments. Besides entertainment they provide scientific knowledge to the readers.

Children have speical liking for stories in verse. An attempt in this field has been made by Nirankar Dev 'Sevak.' His works Panchatantra, Aesop ki Git Kathaen and Hafiz Ka Sapna Gobar Ganesh by Vidya Bhushan and Ek tha Raja: Ek thi Rani by Chiranjit earned tremendous popularity in the last decade.

Among writers who wrote poems for children Ramdhari Sinha 'Dinkar', Chandrafula Sinha Yadav, Mayanka and Vinodchandra Pandey are notable.

One notable achievement in the field of children's literature is novel for children. Interesting and inspiring novelettes for children have been written by Manahar Chauhan, Harekrishna Devasare, Shatrughan Lal and Umashankar.

In the absence of child-stage it is natural that there is a dearth of good drama for children. Odd efforts have been made in this direction by Kamleshwar, Sri Krishna, Bhanu Mehta, Anil Kumar and Paritosh Gargi but they suffer from one defect or the other. The subject of these dramas–mostly one-act plays–are mythological, adventurous and moral. Some satisfaction can be derived from Pratinidhi Bal Ekanki and Rashtriya Ekanki edited by Yogendrakumar 'Lalla'. Bal Natak Mala by Dashrath Ojha is also noteworthy.

Before independence, biographies were written from the point of view of hero-worship. Their language, too was not simple and lucid. After independence, the scope has widened; educationists, scientists and authors were included in the list. The biographies published by people's Publishing House, New Delhi, Publications Division of Government of India New Delhi and Sasta Sahitya Mandal, New Delhi are related to Sant Tukarama, Rama Krishna Paramhans, Swami Vivekananda, Ishwara Chandra Vidyasagar, Rabindranath Tagore, Jawaharlal Nehru, Rajarshi Tandon,Khudiram Bose and Balgangadhar Tilak. Yeh Kahani Vale of Harekrishna Devasare is a novel experiment in the field of biography-writing.

There has been emphasis on providing scientific knowledge to children at an early age. For this purpose a number of books in the form of stories have been written. In most of them either heaps of facts are poured in a dull style or the facts are distorted, so the very purpose is defeated. However, Khel Khel mein Vigyan by Yogendra kumar Lalla, Sinduri Grah ki Yatra, Chand ki Yatra, Samudra Mein Sau Din, Chandralok ki Sair, Pani Bola, Dharti Mata and Antariksha ki Yatra, are noteworthy books in this field. The Government of India, Rajpal and Sons, Delhi, through its Vishva Kosha (ten volumes) and Jnan Bharati of Lucknow through its books have done a lot in service providing purely scientific literature for children.

Witty and humorous sayings, riddles and proverbs have their own importance in children's literature. Harekrishna Devasare (Chutkula), Sri Krishna (Paheliyan) and Shakun Prakashan (Birbal ke Chutkule) are noteworthy.

Comics is a new genre in Hindi. Comics of popular English stories, published under Indrajal Comics of the Times of India, and stories of Tarzan, Betal and Mandrake in the form of comics have been very popular among the children. Encouraged by this, India Book House have started publishing comics about the old mythological and religious stories. It augurs well that Hindi women writers are taking keen interest in writing stories, songs, poems and nursery rhymes for children. Notable names in this field are those Gopal Devi, Tara Pandey, Subhadrakumari Chauhan, Shanti Agrawala, Shakuntala Mishra, Sushila Kakkar, Vidyavati Kokil, Shanti Mehrotra, Sumitra Kumari Sinha and Shakuntala Sirothia.

Translation of children's books from foreign languages as well as Indian languages is going on steadily. Folk literature of foreign countries has been of special attraction. Atma Ram and Sons, Delhi have published folk stories in the series 'Lok-katha Mala'.

Independent books as well as miscellaneous articles have been published in magazines like Nandan, Bal Bharati and Kishore throwing light on the achievement and short-coming of children's literature. Notable among those who have written independent critical books on children's literature are Harikrishna Devasare (Hindi Bal Sahitya: Ek Adhyayana), Nirankardeva 'sewak' (Bal Git Sahitya), Jyoti Swarup and Mastram Kapur.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: Harekrishna Devasare, A Critical Approach to Children's Literature, A Critical History of Children's Literature Jyotsana, Hindi Bala Sahitya, Hindi Kishore Sahitya.

S.L.G.

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE (Kashmiri). The Kashmiri language has to find its due place in the educationl system of the State, consequently, children's literature remains poor. There is, however, a fecund traditon of folk literature in Kashmiri which is comfortably enjoyed by children. The element of fantasy and imagination in it is highly alluring and children, irrespective of their social class and creed, cherish it. There are. of course various levels of complexity in it. Children of the age group of 3-6 years like simple stories as those of the cock who found a paisa while scratching at a bin and thus set out to marry the king's daughter, purchased a huge merchandise and put everything into his ears. They also enjoy such simple rhymes as

> 'the lover came, entered through the window, made bunches of rays, 'For whom?' O! for whom? 'For Roomi Saheb'

Children of this tender age also enjoy singing those songs in which birds, animals and inanimate objects are endowed with human passions.

> The hoope is cooking under the cherry trees/
> His mother asked him to wear rags.

After the sixth year our children generaly like tales of valour and courage. They also get absorbal in solving versified riddles which are abundant in Kashmiri folk literature. There are also some tales and rhymes which are accompanied by games. The Jammu and Kashmir Cultural Academy has made some serious attempts to collect and edit Kashmiri folk literature. However, the portion meant for children has not been published seperately. Ghulam Nabi Nazir's book Sani gindantrayi (Our Games, 1980) is a happy beginning in this direction. Mention must also be made of three collections of folk tales which serve the purpose of children's literature; these are Desh Videshi Chi Luka Katha (Stories of various countries) Bhartichi Luka Katha (Folk tales of India) and Poshi Thar (A Flower Bush).

The first two books were published by the Publication Division of the Ministry of Information and Broadcasting, New Delhi and the third one, edited by Nur Muhammad Roshan, was published by Lala Rukh Publication, Srinagar. (Jammu & Kashmir).

Soon after 1947, when Kashmiri was introduced at school level of education as a medium of instruction, our poets and writers showed some enthusiasm to compose songs and stories for children. However, only a few songs and stories gained popularity. Some of these successful songs were written by Ghulam Ahmad Mahjoor, Ghulam Hassan Beg 'Aarif', Dinanath 'Nadim' and Fazil Kashmiri. Unfortunately, the Kashmiri language was again withdrawn from the educational system in 1953 and, consequently, children's literature was again ignored, Nadim wrote his opera Niki ta Badi (Good and Evil, 1959) which contained some attractive songs. In 1959, the Education Department decided to award prizes on the best books written for children. This incentive had good results and in 1960 Naji Munawar—and Autar Krishen Rahbar wrote a book of stories–Mukhtalar (The Necklace 1961). It contained some beautiful stories based on folk-tales, but due to its bad get-up and artless illustrations the book could not attract any attention. Naji Munawar continued to write for children and his first collection of lyrical poems, entitled Shuren Hind Bath (Songs for children, 1961) was much admired. Naji has maintained the desired simplicity and lucidity to appeal to the unrestrained imagination of children. Without bullying children's imagination he has achieved the fascinating naivety of folk songs. Shambu Nath Bhat Halim published an illustrated book of beautiful stories Balayar (a Friend of children, 1960) which won him a prize. Some more books published in the sixties are Fazil's Shamai Vatan (a Torch for the Country), Vishambar Nath Kaul's Chhanchhipoot and Ghandijiyun Lokachar (Gandhiji's children-book) and Shankar Nath Kaul's Nartsappipin to sona sund thul (Top and a golden Egg). Fazli's book is a collection of patriotic poems. Kaul's two books contain illustrated stories.

Shankarnath Kaul's book reveals him as an adept story teller but he did not continue writing. Samsar Chand Kaul wrote a booklet Kudratken ajayibetan hiuz Kitab (a book of wonders of Nature, 1971) in which some basic information about birds is given in a simple language.

There are a few translated works meant for children published during the sixties. Kotah nundabon son des (How beautiful is our Country) of Bhola Bhattacharya was translated by Nirmala Devi. The book was beautifully illustrated. Sasta Sahitya Mandal, New Delhi published three translations: Shankar Acharya, Godavari and Jalkari; all the three were edited by Martand Upadhayaya. Sarvodaya Prakash, Delhi published a booklet Rut shehri (a good citizen). All these books have been writen from the educational point of view. Bansi Nirdosh translated a booklet from English which was published under the title Qomuk Shayir (the Poet of the Nation).

Among the Kashmiri writers only one writer, Naji Munawar continued to write for children in spite of all the discouraging conditions and the prevalent sense of futility. In 1972, he published the second volume of his Shuren Hind bath and in 1974 he published his collection of verse entitled Bata Katha (stories in verse). Both these books amply reveal his mastery in writing for children. Naji has developed an insight into the mind of the child and has understood child's inmate liking for rhythm. Without curbing the inquisitive mind of children by didacticism, he writes everything in such a way as to tickle their emotions, and imagination. Naji uses every stylistic device, particularly alliteration and repetition, to produce an enchanting melody. Bata Katha is in fact a versified rendering of some of Aesop's Fables.

In 1978, Naji translated all the famous poems for children of the renowned Urdu poet Iqbal into Kashmiri. These poems have been published in Partavi Iqbal (translation of Iqbal's selected poems) published by the J & K Cultural Academy of Art and Languages. In 1979, Naji translated some tales of fantasy and imagination selected from various languages of the world. The collection of these tales has been published under the title Dun'yihchi Dalila (Tales of the world 1979). Naji has also translated Jawahar Lal Nehru's Letters from a Father to His Daughter which remains still unpublished.

Recently two more books of verse for children have been published, namely, Ghulam Nabi Aatash's Kentshah Mentshah (1980) and Ayub Sabir's Shuril (1981). Two more illustrated books translated from Russian have been published in Moscow, these are Poot drav kidkun Phidkun (the chicken on his way to kidhun phidkun) and Tsraribachi (a young sparrow).

Sh.S

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE (Konkani) was started by Shenoy Gomybab in 1935 with his Bhurgeamlo Ishtt (Children's Friend). Until then, with the exception of some stray primers, no serious attempt was made to produce books for children. Gomybab in fact wrote this book as a text-book for children but it proved to be much more than that. His Jaducho Zumvo (Magic Island, 1968) is also well known.

Ramchandra S. Naik's Bhurgeamcho Ved (1948), Bayabhav's Dekh Dinnyo Kanyo (Moralistic Tales, 1950) and Kamala Bai Rao Deshpande's Baalyo Kanyo (Stories by Grandmother, 1950) became quite popular. Ravindra Kelekar wrote a series on Gandhiji entitled Ashe Ashille Gandhiji (such was Gandhiji, 1960) and Katha Ani Kannyo (Stories and Tales, 1961); while Godubai Kelekar contributed Ujya Fulam (Flowers of Fire, 1962) and Fultyo Kallyo (Flowering Buds, 1963). R.V. Pandit published God God Kannyo (Sweet Tales, 1965) in two parts apart from Bhurgyamlyo Kanyo (Children's Tales, 1967) and Ramayan Mahabharatantlyo Katha (Tales from the Ramayana and the Mahabharata, 1968). Notable contributions were also made by A. Na. Mhambro (Ghumche Katar Ghum Beat, Oh Drum, and Shirish Bhode (Kagdachim Vhoddim, Paper Boats, 1968). Shantaram Hedo's Bapu (1973), Ashok Kamat's Suryapoot Subhash (Subhash, the Son of the Sun, 1975), Olivinho Gomes' Supullo Kannya Panthulo (Small Basketful Tales, Alvaro R. Mendes' God God Kannyo (Sweet tales, 1975) and Mhableshwar Borkar's Ashi Kani Raja Rani (Thus goes the story of the King and the Queen, 1975) and Santanali Pilluk (Santan's Flute, 1976) are also notable. Around this time, veteran poet M.L. Sardesai produced songs and lyrics consistently ; Bebyanchem Kazar (Frog's Marriage), Bhangrachi Kurad (The Golden Axe), Nhaim tya vellar uloum naka (Please don't speak at the wrong time), Babuchem Logn (A child's Wedding), Pishim Padam (Foolish Songs), etc. are some of those which have become legends. Damodar Mauzo wrote Babulyachi Katha (Babu's story, 1975) and Kanni Eka khomsachi (Tale of a Shirt, 1976).

Some of the notable translations of this period (1965-75) were : Suresh Kakodkar's Alex ani Tacho Aproop Sounsar (Alice in Wonderland) and Gulliverachi Bhounvddi (Gulliver's Travels), Chandrakant Keni's Fulancho Hat (From a French story), Suhas Dalal's Kani Kani Kotva (Russian story), Dekh Dinyo Kannyo (Tolstoy's stories) and Felicio Cardoz's Alluddin Ani Jaducho Divo (Allauddin and the Magic Lamp), Tarvotti Sindabad (Sindabad, the Sailor) and Alibaba Ani Chalis Chor (Alibaba and the Forty Thieves) all from the Arabian Nights. Shripad R. Desai wrote Yakshaprasna based on the Mahabharata in 1976. In the field of playlets for children, special mention must be made of Sardesai's Kelem Tuka, Zalem Mhaka (Aimed at one but the effect elsewhere), Rajkumar Ani Char Chor (A Prince and Four Thieves), Aklecho Kando (A Foolish Fellow), Jhansichi Rani (Rani of Jhansi), etc. and Pundalik N. Naik's Ransundari (Forest fairy).

Children's literature in Konkani got a boost in 1979, the International Year of the Child. The contribution of Zag Prakashan of Priol Goa was noteworthy. Out of the stipulated twelve, the publishers did manage to bring out eight lovely books : Ganthlem (Sugar Necklace) by Vijayabai Sarmallkar, Raja Rani (King and the Queen) by Ravindra Kelekar, Baman ani Abhisar (adaptation of Tagore's poem), Papdam kavllyo (Bunch of Papads) and Ramgyali Vaghabhoundi (Ramgo's Tiger–hunt) by Lakshmanrao Sardesai, Madlo Poot (Middle Son) by Shantaram Hedo, and Kundesuskur (Goan folk-tale) by Shyam Verekar.

Rajhans Vitarann is a publishing house in Panjim, Goa which has decided to bring out regular books for children. Bhuk Bhishu (1980) and Chanimama (1983) by Ramesh publisher has brought out the following: Bhaskaracharya, and Aryabhatta (1983) by Arun Heblekar, Bhuk Bhuk Bhishu and Chanimama (1983) by Ramesh Velluskar, Bhatkaracho Kaan (1982) by Vijay Thali, Bomo the Great (1982) by Ulhas Raikar, Dorya Gazoilo by Sudha Amonkar, Bhutachem Gupit (1982) by Sushanta Nesrikar, Birbal–Part I and II (1982-83) respectively, by Purushottam Singbal, Surashri Kesarbai Kerkar (1981) by Amita Phaldesai, Master Deenanath (1982) by Jawant Kapileshwari, Mankulim Gitam (Tiny Songs, 1982) by Mahohar Rai Sardesai,Atlak Petlak (1983) by Pandurang Phaldesai, Footbal (1983) by Ajit Moyo, Amchya Gomcho Itihas (Short history of Goa, 1983) by Nandakumar Kamat, Nana Shankershet (1983) by Shivanand Rivonkar, Ami Saglim Deshannim (We all, Over Smart, 1983), Gopi (1983) by Gajanan Jog, and Choranchi Tolli (Gang of Thieves, 1983) by Gurudas Bambolkar.

Some of the very recently published booklets include: Khellnnim (Toys) and Circus (both songs) by Bhikaji Ghanekar, Makdachi Maja (Monkey tricks) by Abhay Velingkar, Kirmor (Parrot-Peacock) by Vasant B. Sawant, Allshank Vagh Khatlo (Tiger will swallow the lazy, playlet) by Pundalik Nayak, Geeta (poems) and Bodhakatha (Fables, 1983) by Ramkrishna Zuwarkar, Chirmulyo (songs) by Kamala Rao Deshpande.

Konkani periodicals and magazines have been publishing stories, poems, etc. in their sections for children, over the years. A few periodicals like Apurbai edited by Shantarm Valaulikar made short appearances. Maruti is the only magazine exclusively meant for children being edited and published by Gurunath Kelekar consistently for the last one decade. Saptak (1982) by Jaymala Danait is a collection of seven one-act plays for school children. Special mention must be made of Kannyo by Fr. C.C. Pai (Swamy Supriya) released in six 'ghons' (Bunches), the last one appearing in 1982. They are printed in both the Kannada and Devnagari scripts.

S.V.

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE (Malayalam) acquired a separate identity only recently. In Malayalam such a development is a post-independence phenomenon. But this does not mean that there was no literature suitable to children in the pre independence state of the Malayalam speaking people. The former native States of Travancore and Cochin, together with the British–occupied Zamorin's territory of Calicut form the present Kerala State. It has its own history of development and progress regarding children's literature.

More to the credit of Travancore and much to Cochin and to some extent to Calicut, as early as in 1800 or before, child education gained a momentum. The early schooling system in these areas had a speciality. They had a three-language formula. Sanskrit, Tamil and Malayalam were taught in the 'Country Schools'. Among these, Sanskrit dominated. Stories from the Ramayana, the Mahabharata and the Bhagavata were told to children irrespective of caste or community or religion. The children grew up imbibing the spirit of these classics. Stories selected from Kathasaritsagaram and Panchatantram were also told to them by their elders in a manner attractive to children. Similarly, selected pieces of poetry and lullabies were also sung. This enabled the children to grow up with a sense of rhythm and rhyme.

In 1867, when the first Committee for compiling text books was constituted, the adaptation of modern trends in education became an acute necessity. This may be the first stage in the production of children's literature in Malayalam.

In 1881, Raja Raja Varma Valiya Koyil Thampuran became President of the Text Book Committee. He brought about a change in the production of books for children. He himself was a poet of high reputation. So he could do much to realize his vision about literature for children. Along with selections from classics he himself wrote a number of poems and encouraged others to write for children. His main intention was to instil moral values in the growing minds of children.

Malayalam poets of the modern period like Kumaran Asan, Ulloor Parameswara Iyer, Pandalam Kerala Varma and others followed the track trodden by Valiya Koyil Thampuran and wrote for children. Poets like G.Sankara Kurup and Vailoppillil Sridhara Menon took the cue from the earlier poets and wrote poems for children. Meanwhile K. Sukumaran of North Malabar, Moorkkothu Kumaran, C.Anthapai, O.M.Cheriyan, Arch Deacon Koshi and such other prose writers wrote stories for children in the pattern of Panchatantra stories and other works in Indian languages and in English.

More modern writers like Raja Raja Varma, Eswara Pillai, E.V. Krishna Pillai, Kainikkara Kumara Pillai, Karoor Neelakanta Pillai and a host of other story - writers wrote original stories for children maintaining the Kerala atmosphere. Most of these stories almost followed the textbook style of writing.

Matthew M.Kuzhiveli was the first man who deliberately plunged himself into the realm of children's literature with dedication and devotion. He started translating famous books from English written for children.

Then, he wrote many books originally in Malayalam as well as adaptations from English, and graded them to suit children belonging to various age groups and standards. Though various earlier attempts had been made, Matthew M.Kuzhiveli was the first to bring out a full set of Encyclopaedia in Malayalam which is mainly addressed to children. He wrote more than 200 books and he has published over 400 titles in Malayalam through his own publishing house named Balan Publications. All of these were intended for children, graded for the various age groups. He was awarded Padmasri posthumously.

V.Madhavan Nair, popularly known as Mali, has written many works for children, mostly from the Indian classics. K.P. Kesava Menon, Moorkkothu Kunjappa, N. Krishna Pillai, Anandakkuttan, O.N.V. Kurup, Sugata Kumari and Pala Narayanan Nair are some of the prominent modern writers who showed interest in writing for children. Kunjunni Master, author of Kunjunni Kavithakal, has written innumerable, thought-provoking short poems which made him the favourite of children in Kerala. P.Narendranath, T.V. John, Pallikkara V.P. Mohammed, K.G. Sethunath, Sippi Pallyppuram, Tatapuram Sukumaran and others are among the younger writers who contributed to the promotion of children's literature and most of them are recipients of awards and other recognitions for their contributions in this field.

Publications and periodicals in Malayalam intended for children are on the increase. Apart from the children's pages and columns published by some of the prominent dailies every week, the periodicals published exclusively for children have promoted the reading habit in children. Earlier attempts proved failures. Among them Ambili Ammavan, a Malayalam rendering of the famous Chandamama of Tamil alone survived for a long period. Then came Balarama of the Malayala Manorama group of publications which created a record in the history of circulation of Malayalam periodicals published for children. It contained a variety of materials to attract children. This new wave inspired others to follow suit. Balayugam of Janayugam Publications, Kuttikalute Deepika of the Deepika Publications, Poompatta, first published by P.A. Warier, which is now being published by Pai and Co., Balamangalam of Mangalam Publications, Muthassi, Malarvadi, Lalu Leela, Thathamma, etc. are some of them. The Sastra Sahitya Parishat brings out Eureka and Sastrakeralam intended for children of lower and higher age groups with a view to impart scientific knowledge to children. Talir, another solitary periodical edited by Sugatha Kumari and published by the Jawahar Bala Bhavan of Trivandrum, was also popular among the children. With these periodicals and the books produced by Sahitya Pravartaka Co-operative Society, Kairali Book Trust and such other, publishers and the Malayalam versions of books published by N.B.T., C.B.T., N.C.E.R.T. etc., the reading habit of the children in Kerala has increased considerably. All these publications show a lack of understanding of the norms to be followed in the production of children's literature. Perhaps it may be due to the lack of books on children's literature in Malayalam till recently for the reference of these publishers. The first book on children's literature, Balasahityam Enthu, Enthinu, Engane (Children's Literature–What is it? Why is it? and How is it?) focusing on the content and the psychological aspects to be considered was written by Palai K.M. Mathew. The second one, Enthanu Bala Sahityam, is a Malayalam rendering of the English text What is Children's Literature?, a compilation of standard articles presented by various scholars from all over India in the Seminar organised by the State Institute of Children's Literature in 1981. This book covers all the aspects of children's literature.

A.J.

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE (Marathi). The old Marathi literature is rich in variety, but there is little in it for children. The old Marathi poetry abounds in references to children, their games and sports, mother's affection for her off-spring and children's filial love, and the like. A very common theme of songs through the centuries has been the young, naughty Krishna and his playmates, gamboling and frolicking in Gokul. But all this was for the consumption of the adult audiences. Not that children in those old times went without entertainment. As the folklore reveals, children had their songs, lullabies, 'Kahanis' (legends) 'Ukhanas' and 'Bhendis' (word puzzles and charades), and of course and time-honoured grandmother's tales for indoor entertainment. But this again is not literature, if by literature we mean the written word. In fact we have no ancient tradition in children's literature. It has its origin in our cultural contact with the West.

Speaking broadly, children's literature in Marathi began with the publication of the magazine Balbodha by Vinayak Kondadev Oak (1840-1915) in 1881. Before that, some children's books had been published, more notable among them being Sadashiv Kashinath Chhatre's Aesop's Fables and Balmitra, a translation of Barquin's very well–known book Children's Friends.

The Balbodha continued to be published for over thirty years. Oak's was a moralising attitude in a conventional way. The Balbodha remained to the last a one-man affair. As a result, it became stereotyped and lost much of its earlier appeal. Vasudev Govind Apte (1871-1930), a friend of Oak and himself an author, pleaded in vain with Oak to give his magazine a new look. Eventually in 1906, Apte on his own started a new children's magazine Ananda, which opened a whole new era in children's literature. Apte knew well that imagination and fancy were the sine qua non of children's literature and that it should be in the first instance interesting and entertaining. In the following three decades Ananda regaled young readers in Maharashtra with stories, songs, biographical and geographical articles, humorous skits, cartoons, puzzles, etc. Ananda's influence at one time was so overwhelming that Ananda became a name synonymous with children's literature. Following its lead, a number of magazines came up, prominent among them were Shalapatraka and Balodyan (Pune), Khelgadi (Bombay), Balbodhameva (Nasik) and Mulanche Masik (Nagpur). All these were good magazines, which laid the foundation for future generation of writers to build a fine edifice on it.

Apte did not rest with publishing a magazine, he also wrote children's books on a variety of subjects. His Bal Bharata, Bal Ramayana and Bal Bhagavata, abridged and simplified versions of the great Indian classics, found their way almost in every educated home. His other books include Chittaranjan (1949), a collection of fantasies introduced to Marathi children for the first time and Ka wa Kase? (Why and How?) unfolding the mysteries of Nature. By all counts, Apte is the father of children's literature in Marathi.

After his death in 1930, Gopinath Talwalkar took over as editor of Ananda and handled it with equal ability and insight.

Notwithstanding what Apte was doing, children's books were still far and few. A lack of awareness even among the educated people about the part books could play in the development of child's personality, accounted for this apathy. Very few good books were, therefore, published till as late as 1930. Among these, were Aesop's fables in more than one version, including the poet and playwright R.G. Gadkari's (1885-1919) Chimukali Isapaniti (Aesop's Fables for the little ones, 1911), which for generations to come remained a favourite little book for children. The other books worth mentioning, were B.M. Ambekar's Panchatantra and Hitopadesa, D.N. Tilak's Jatak katha (Jatak Tales), S.S. Navare's tales of the Sanskrit plays on the lines of Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare, S.B. Hudlikar's three books of fairy tales: Na Hasanari Rajkanya (The Unlaughing Princess), Butka Pandit (The Dwarf Pandit) and Premala Raksas (The Loving Demon) and Gopinath Talwalkar's Chandrashekhar ani Mohana (Chandrashekhar and Mohana) and Sat Rajahamsa (The Seven Golden Swans).

No one did better than P.K. Atre to make a dent in their general apathy towards children's literature, when in 1933 with the collaboration of the Karnatak Printing Press of Bombay he carried out his ambitious project of publishing a series of language textbooks for primary and middle schools entitled Navayuga Vachanmala. A man of versatile interests, Atre was an eminent educationist with a broad modern outlook, having spent long years in teaching in schools. He took pains in the selection of lessons, many of which he wrote himself, that would elicit creative responses in the child's mind by stimulating its imagination and curiosity. The language had to be simple, direct and evocative at the same time. Atre's aim was that children should develop love for learning and literature; and he succeeded in reorienting the entire concept of children's literature. In fact, so great was his success that the Navayuga textbooks were given a continuous run for nearly thirty years by majority of schools in Maharashtra, like Rabindranath Tagore's Sahaja Patha text books in West Bengal.

A new writer at this time emerged on the horizon, whose contribution to Marathi children's literature remains unsurpassed even to this day. He was P.S. Sane (1899-1950) who wrote under the name Sane Guruji, given to him by his young followers and fans. The thirties saw the tempo of freedom struggle rising to a climax and the entire atmosphere in the country was surcharged with a patriotic and idealistic fervour. Even young boys and girls had a part to play in the nationalist movement led by Mahatma Gandhi. Sane Guruji was the most eloquent spokesman of the spirit of these times. Every word he wrote echoed it.

Sane Guruji was as prolific a writer as he was profound. Besides the books he wrote for the adults, which are many and varied, he has written as many as 50 books for children, which include translations of the Western classics like Victor Hugo's Les Miserables. He is at his best in his two autobiographical novels–Shyamchi Aai (Shyam's Mother-1935) and Shyam (1937). Since it was first published in 1935, Shyamchi Aai has run into over thirty editions, which testifies to its phenomenal popularity. 'A sacred hymn to mother's love'–Atre described it in these words. The two novels together form the story of Shyam from his childhood to the age of adolescence. In Shyam, Sane Guruji created a character of a boy with a kind and benevolent heart, brought up by his fond, loving mother in the best of Indian traditions imbuing in him the great human virtues of love, tolerance, brotherhood and service to the poor and the downtrodden. Shyam was meant to be an ideal for the youths striving to realise Gandhi's dream of free India. This idealism is all pervasive in the writings of Sane Guruji. The literature he wrote for children is like a vast sea, comprising novels, short stories, poems, mythological and folk tales retold, biographies, letters, essays, etc. Of these the most popular are God Goshti (The Sweet Tales, 1941-44), Dhadapadanari Mule (The Struggling Children, 1937), Sundar Patre (The Beautiful Letters, 1950) and Gandhi's biography.

But Sane Guruji is much too subjective and sentimental. There is a surfeit of compassion and tenderness in him. An overbearing sense of didacticism pervades all his writings. He created a sort of illusory ideal world where everything had to be good, virtuous and sublime, and the bad and boisterous were an anathema. This does not quite fit in with the psychology of children whose minds yearn to roam in the world of wonders, adventures and fantasies. It is not surprising, therefore, that Sane Guruji's appeal to young readers dwindled considerably in the changed circumstances after Independence. In an overall perspective, however, Sane Guruji remains the most creative and profound children's writer in Marathi.

Another influential children's writer of this time, is N.D. Tamhankar (1893-1961). Like Sane Guruji, there is an unmistakable strain of didacticism in Tamhankar, but he did not quite ignore the lighter side of the child's mind, its impulsive longing for mirth and fun. Tamhankar wrote some six novels and a couple of playlets for children, but he is best remembered by his novel Gotya. In Gotya, Tamhankar also created a boy character like Sane Guruji's Shyam, but of quite a different bent. A good, well-meaning boy, Gotya takes delight in naughtiness and mischief. He is always itching for an adventure. While Shyam was an ideal to be reached, in Gotya children saw their own self projected, which speaks for his sustained appeal. Tamhankar followed his Gotya by a complimentary girl character Chingi (1945). In fact she is Gotya's little sister. Other child characters to come in this train, were S.S. Khanwelkar's Chandu (1943), V.V. Bokil's Vasant (1950) and Raja Mangalwedhekar's Mukya (1969).

Children's literature, however, came into its own only after Independence. So long it had remained a side activity of the adult writers, and even Sane Guruji and Tamhankar were not exclusively children's writers. The spread of literacy and the widening of the base of education, created a real demand for children's books. A new generation of writers with a sense of commitment now came up and children's literature received a big boost. Nonsense rhymes, songs, poems, stories, novels, fairy tales, mythological and historical legends, biographies of the great men and women of the world, now provide a grand fare to young readers in their different age–groups. The old attitudes of didacticism and condescensional moralising are discounted, and children's literature, now conforms to a much greater degree to the emotional needs of children. The writer today is no longer satisfied in telling children the stories of kings and queens, the prince charming and his beautiful princess and all those things belonging to the dead past. He is eager to unfold before them the fantastic world of animals and plants, unravel for them the mysteries of the universe and acquaint them with all those wonderful things happening in the arena of science.

These new trends were first clearly visible in the writings of B.R. Bhagwat (b. 1910). After Sane Guruji he is the most prolific children's writer with his score of 75 books, chiefly novels and stories. These include his translations of Jules Verne's stories of the moon voyage and Lewis Carroll's Alice in Wonderland. Bhagwat's favourite themes are adventure and fantasy, which he has deftly handled in his novels like Bhutali Jahaj (The Witchcraft Boat), Bramhadeshatil Khajina (The Treasure in Burma) and Khajinyachya Betawar Sanju-Raju (Sanju and Raju on the Treasure Island). His Faster Fene is a saga of bravery of a daredevil boy of that name, who roams about the country carrying out dashing expeditions and queer enterprises in the style of Mark Twain's Tom Sawyer. Faster Fene is like a new Robin Hood, who could easily become the accredited hero of children. But with Bhagwat, the subject of search of buried treasures is some kind of an obsession, and he rather lacks in the comic sense.

The other writers who have a major hand in the enrichment of children's fiction are Mahadevshastri Joshi, Gangadhar Gadgil, Durga Bhagwat, Sumati Paygaonkar, Malati Dandekar, Yadunath Thatte, Leeladhar Hegde, Raja Mangalwedhekar, Sarita Padki and Sudhakar Prabhu. Sumati Paygaonkar's translation of Hans Anderson's fairy tales is a very commendable work in translation.

All great poets have one time or the other written poems for children, and some of these have such an irresistable charm that they became household songs, for instance, Balkavi's 'Phularani' (The Flower Queen) and B.R. Tambe's 'Ata Gatti Fu Dadashi (I won't talk to you, brother). But poems such as these are often isolated creations, as though the poets write them for a change. V.G. Maydev (1894-1969) is the first poet to write full-fledged children's poetry in two collections: Abhinaya Gita (The Acting Songs, 1932) and Shishu Gita (The Children's Songs, 1935) came in the thirties; he continued to write children's poetry for three decades thereafter, adding up to a total of seven books. The child 's sojourn into the land of dreams, as also the funny things that occur in its day-to-day life, are subjects of Maydev's poems, and their speciality is that they are what one may call 'gesticulatory' songs. But Maydev though imaginative lacked craftsmanship. As a result, some of his poems are just humdrum pieces. Although for his pioneering work he has an assured place in the history of children's poetry; not much of what he wrote is now remembered.

The late fifties and early sixties saw a veritable efflorescence in children's poetry, with a host of young poets taking to writing poetry with an enthusiasm not seen before. More notable among them were Vinda Karandikar, Mangesh Padgaonkar, Shanta Shelke, Sadanand Rege, Sarita Padki and Nirmala Deshpande. Nursery rhymes, nonsensical verses, children's songs, poems for the adolescents, etc., came, as it were, in a spate. Children's poetry for the first time discovered its lost link with the folklore. Colourful images and rhythmical rhyming that produces hypnotic effect, are the prime qualities of the new poetry. Vinda Karandikar (b. 1918) is a master in this art. In Ranicha Bag (the local Marathi name for the Victoria Gardens at Bombay which locates a zoo, 1961), Karandikar opens up the amazing world of animals with their quaint anatomies and weird behaviour as children see them. His Etuchya Deshat (In the Land of Etus, 1961) is a fantasy in which Karandikar takes children on a ride to an unknown land where the life is all bizarre and topsyturvyed. Karandikar's poems are a consummate blending of rich imagery and resonant rhymes etched with measured words. Mangesh Padgaonkar, Raja Mangalwedhekar and the younger poet Mahavir Jondhale come close to Karandikar in beauty and excellence. There is a marked tendency among the newcomers in the field to imitate Karandikar. That is a sure sign of the deep impress he has made on the children's poetry in Marathi.

Biographies have a special purpose in children's literature. Besides being a source of inspiration and guidance for individual and social conduct, they provide children a glimpse into the history of the world and how it came to be changed by great men. After Sane Guruji, the major biographer is Raja Mangalwedhekar (b. 1924). In a series of brilliant biographies entitled Bharat Ratna, Mangalwedhekar narrates the life stories of India's great men of the present century. His imposing list includes C.V. Raman, Vishweshwarayya, Jawaharlal Nehru, Rajgopalachari, Radhakrishnan and D.K. Karve. P.L. Deshpande's biography of Mahatma Gandhi is a model in biography writing. P.L. Deshpande brings out the stirring drama of Gandhi's life in a style as simple as it could be but evocative at the same time. The book is profusely illustrated by the renowned artist M.R. Acharekar, who lends a magic touch to Deshpande's vibrant text.

On the score of scienfitic literature, S.B. Ranade (b. 1892) is a pace setter. His book Timbunanacha Radio (Timbunana's Radio) initiates the adolescent reader into the world of animals and modern inventions and discoveries in the form of stories narrated in a refreshingly interesting manner. The other writers who have made significant contribution to the scientific literature are C.G. Karve, Bhalba Kelkar, Yadunath Thatte, P.N. Joshi and N.V. Kogekar. Bhalba Kelkar's biographies of Indian scientists, Yadunath Thatte's life stories of the Western thinkers and men of science and Mahadevshastri Joshi's books on India's ancient culture, are praiseworthy achievements in this field.

The practice of staging children's dramas, especially in schools, is several decades old, perhaps as old as the schools themselves. The first concerted effort to organise children's theatre movement was made by Bal Rangabhoomi, a dramatic association of Bombay. Ratnakar Matkari (b. 1938), an accomplished playwright, is the moving spirit behind this movement. Starting in 1959, Matkari has so far staged nine children's plays under the banner of Bal Rangabhoomi, and written several one-act plays. Of the plays, Ganari Maina (The Singing Myna, 1964), Kal Lavya Kandyachi Kahani (The Tale of the Instigating Onion) and Achat Gavachi Aphat Mavashi (The Terrible Aunt of the Terrific Town, 1966), made grand success on the Bombay stage. Matkari's plays are pure fantasies, animated by fairies and angels, as well as demons and witches. Besides being highly imaginative, Matkari is also endowed with a sense of the macabre and the horrid. The success of his plays chiefly lies in their fantastic and weird quality.

Vijay Tendulkar (b. 1928) is another outstanding figure in the children's theatre, but quite different from Matkari. Tendulkar depicts in his plays children's domestic delights, their little worries and anxieties. The characters in his plays are children and not any superhuman beings.Tendulkar has an unfailing sense of the working of child's mind and his dialogues are short and suave in the manner of the language children speak and they glow with wit. Chimana Bandhato Bangala (The Sparrow builds a Bungalow), which brings out Tendulkar's finer qualities, is acknowledged to be his best. He has written in all eight plays and the last he wrote was in 1972. Sai Paranjape, Madhav Sakhardande and Narendra Ballal are other children's playwrights who have made some distinction. On the whole, however, children's theatre has remained confined to big cities like Bombay and Pune. Beyond these urban centres,it is practically non-existent.

The quality of production of children's books of late shows marked improvement, thanks to the growing awareness in a section of the book trade about the importance of the visual aspect of children's books. The publishers Keshav Bhikaji Dhavale of Bombay, who have been in the forefront in the publication of children's books for over three decades, have all along maintained a certain standard of elegance and neatness. It is a happy augury for children's literature that premier publishing concerns like Mouj Prakashan, Popular Prakashan, Venus Prakashan and the Majestic Bookstall have in recent years enlivened keen interest in children's literature and brought out certain books as their prestigious publications, which can compare favourably with the best books published in the country. Art designing for children's book is an expert's job for artists who can look upon the world with a child's vision. D.G. Godse, Prabhakar Gore, Subhash Avachat, Vasant Saravate, Padma Sahasrabuddhe and V.M Sathe are all highly talented art designers and illustrators, and have worked for the afore mentioned publishers. But such books are not many to come by and might even be considered exceptions. The quality in the case of the vast majority still continues to be sub-standard.

Children's literature in Marathi has very definitely established its identity as a separate genre of literature and is no longer a mere appendage of the adult literature, which once it was. It is true that much of the writing is trite and commonplace and there is a large tendency to borrow ideas from the West. But by and large the children today are more fortunate in having good books to read and dainty and delectable songs to sing, than those of the last two decades.

V.S.

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE (Oriya). The origin of juvenile literature in Oriya has been traced in Nana Baya Gita (Nursey Rhymes), children's oral songs, oral stories, play songs, riddles, proverbs and festival songs. A nursery rhyme is a song sung to the small childern by the mothers. These are prevalent throughout Orissa. Their emotional appeal is common, but there appear some differences in their language and composition. A nursery rhyme prevalent in Kalahandi district may be slightly different from that of Sambalpur and Cuttack. The nursery rhymes in Oriya are full of pleasant variations although they are held together by a common purpose. The theme of these nursery rhymes is usually taken from the natural objects like moon, sparrow, frog, cow, fish, cat, etc.

Through image and metaphor the child is acquainted with so many objects of nature. He associates the moon with his uncle and the cloud with uncle's home. The aspect of music, language and metre is also very vital for its full understanding. Sometimes absurd description also occurs in nursery rhymes. The impact of nursery rhymes on children's literature written in the modern period is immense. They act as the spiritual and emotional link between the child and the mother.

Like oral songs, oral stories for children are also available and very popular in Orissa. These stories are told by grandmothers and grandfathers for their emotional development. These stories are characterised by some peculiar style such as 'Kathani' preceding and succeeding the main body of the story. Festival songs have played an important role in shaping the children's literature in Orissa. These songs and stories are sung and told respectively at the time of observing fast for religious and social purposes.

Further, the influence of Sanskrit classical stories such as those of Panchatantra, Katha Sarit Sagar, Hitopadesha, Briahat Katha, Shuka Saptati, etc. is there. The educational syllabus in ancient Orissa included some literary pieces like, Keshaba Koili (Markanda Das), Kanta Koili (Balaram Das), Artha Koili (Jagannath Das), Baramasi Koili (Shankar Das), Gyanodaya Koili (Nathia), etc. which became the source of juvenile literature. Koili is a type of literary composition in ancient Oriya in which the mother expresses her desires to her child in a tender language. The earliest of such composition, Keshaba Koili is based on the love between Yashoda and her son Shri Krishna. These lines are composed in an alphabetical order and such compositions were memorised by the children of Orissa in those days when printed books were not available. Similarly some literary works like Gopi Bhasha (Danai Das) and Bhagavata (Jagannath Das) were studied by the school-going children in those days. The only purpose of this study was to acquaint the child with the events of the Mahabharata and the Bhagavata. Like Koili, Chautisha was a peculiar type of composition in medieval Oriya literature. Artatran Chautishas are some of the compositions which are very popular with the children. Similarly Boli (Sayings) also formed a part of children's literature in Oriya. It has actually derived its inspiration from devotional songs like, Stuti, Bhajan and Janana, etc.

Against such historical background, a conception of a modern type of literature for children gradually developed and this was mainly due to the arrival of the Christian Missionaries in Orissa in the first quarter of the 19th century. The establishment of an English Charity School at Cuttack in 1822, leading towards the multiplication of school-going children and establishment of printing press in Orissa in 1937 created an environment in which the demand of children for a particular type of literature befitting their psychology and understanding was acknowledged. The translation of the Bible under the guidance of William Carey and subsequent production of text books on grammar, arithmetic, history, science, etc. by erstwhile Missionaries such as Rev. Aromos Sutton, Rev. Lacy, Rev. Edward Marshman attracted the local scholars and educationists to write suitable books for children. The difference between a literary work for children and literary work for elders was felt by all. That is how the foundation of the present day children's literature in Oriya was laid down. In 1869 a committee was appointed for the production of suitable books for children.

Some of the local writers like, Kapileswar Vidyabhushan (Barna Shiksha), Ghanshyam Mishra (Barna Parichaya), Govindachandra Sharma (Barna Bodhak) Pyarimohan Sen (Shishu Patha), Prabhakara Churamani (Padya Mala Upadesh Manjary) took up their pens in the cause of producing suitable books for school-going children. This was the early phase in the modern period of children's literature.

The pioneers in this field are Madhusudan Rao (1853-1912), Fakirmohan Senapati (1843-1919), Gopalchandra Praharaja (1874-1946), Nandakishore Bala (1928-1975) and many others. Rao who was a teacher subsequently promoted to the rank of Inspector of Schools was well-acquainted with the psychology of the school-going children. Though primarily concerned with the object of writing suitable text books to be used in increasing number of schools in Oriya, he was well aware of the moral requirement of the children through literature. The literary creations of Madhusudan Rao for children fall into two phases: (a) text books, prose and poetry with a moral overtone (b) literary composition other than text books.

Madhusudan was responsible for bringing in variety in verse meant for children. He particularly emphasised patriotism, nationalism, moral virtues and a passion for all that is good in life. During his 35 (1873-1908) years of service in the education department, Rao took it upon himself as his sacred duty to revolutionise spiritually the children of his country. Beginning from his primer of learning Oriya, Barna Bodha (1895) the poet is credited with the authorship of a number of important works, such as, Sahitya Kusum, Balbodha Kusum, Sahitya Prasanga, Sahitya Taranga, etc. In depicting the different scenes and objects of nature he reminds the child that God the almighty is present in every object and according to him the child is the symbol of divine purity.

Radhanath Ray's contribution to the children's literature and that of Fakirmohan Senapati too are confined to text books written by them to remove the long-felt need of suitable text books in Oriya. Their works speak of their association with school-going children as teachers and also as educational trustees in those days. In writing text books they sometimes strayed beyond the historical and geographical limits and adequately and imaginatively drew upon such objects of nature as the animals and the birds and their ways and behaviour which are liked by children. The few stories written by Fakirmohan Senapati are interwoven with the amusing and interesting events from the life of such animals as donkey, cuckoo, mouse, parrot, cat, etc. Authors like Mrityunjay Rath and Govind Rath also wrote for children. During the closing years of 19th century a collection of juvenile poems Janha Mamu was published by Sudhala Deva, the then ruling chief of Bamra (2nd edition published in 1903). The number of contributors in this anthology were twelve and they are Sudhala Deva, Tikayat Babu, Satchidananda, Tribhubana Deva, Jalandhara Deva, Pandit Madhusudan Mishra, Kashinath Rajguru, Bishwanath Mahapatra, Bidyabhushana, Somhnath Jyotishalankara, and Duryadhan Naik. The book has exercised an abiding influence on the minds of children and mothers in all subsequent years. Juvenile literature in Oriya is full of references to the moon and its amazing magical beauty. The poems on the moon can be said to be a pattern for poems in Oriya, and when in 1932 Balakrishna Kar (1886-1957) published a monthly magazine for children he named the magazine Jahna Mamu.

Gopalchandra Praharaj (1874–1946), acclaimed in Oriya literature as an outstanding prose writer and the compiler of Oriya Lexicon, felt the need of writing for children. He collected the Oriya folk tales for the reading of the children with the titles Utkal Kahani and Katha Lahari. His contributions to children's literature extends beyond stories and fables and he composed a number of poems for children, viz. the anthology Dho Re Baya Dho. In writing verses for children Praharaj adopted folk litera ture as the basis and inspiration.

The most important author of children's literature in Oriya in the first quarter of the present century is Nandakishore Bala, popularly known as 'Palli Kabi'. Bala sufficiently developed the area of juvenile literature in Oriya. Mostly rooted in the environment, his poems contained in his anthology, Nana Baya Gita, breathe an atmosphere in which the simple and play-loving children are involved more and more with their playmates like the domestic cats, cows, dogs, parrots etc. The world of childhood as imagined by the poet is captured in his poems such as Bilua Bhai, Bilai Nani Benguli Nani, Barsha Gita, Para Jodika, Damara Kau, Ho Re Baya Ho, Nida Mausi.

Subsequent writers in Oriya who took up writing for children seriously and sincerely are Chintamani Mohanty (1876–1943), Nilakantha Das (1884-1967), Kalicharan Patnaik (1898), Godabarish Mahapatra, Ramkrishna Nanda, Upendra Tripathy and others. This phase in the growth and development of children's literature in Oriya belongs to the period after 1930 and during this period writings for children developed along the approved lines of psychology and science. Both in subject and form the verses and stories for children were reconstructed. The task of the writers of children's books demanded great skill both in language and in understanding the psychology of a child. The creative education of child through verses and stories was thought of as eradication of bad habits and gradual acceptance of good habits. Therefore juvenile literature in Oriya during 1930 to 1947, the period of the country's struggle for freedom under the leadership of Mahatma Gandhi, was enlarged, rebuilt and revitalised. The biography of national heroes and the stories of important epics of India were told and retold in a manner easily acceptable to the children and the purpose of such biography was the education of the child. A story, whether local or not, was set in a socially educative context. Chintamani Mohanty who is a noted poet wrote Niti Kusuma Shishudharma, Niti Sahitya, Shishu Prarthana, Dhuli Ghara, Budhuni Khela and so many psychologically appealing poems for children to awaken them to the world of morality and truth in the midst of their play. Pandit Nilakantha Das retold the Ramayana and the Mahabharata (Pilanka Mahabharata; Pilanka Ramayana) for chil dren. Godabarish Mishra with the sole purpose of writing useful text books designed Ramayana Katha, Mahabharata Katha, and Panchavira. Laxmikanta Mahapatra devoted some pages of his magazine Dogara to the juvenile writings. His works like Pilanka Katha, Jiba Jantu, Child Khana, Phulei Benguli, Ah Janha Mamu, were received well by the young readers. He called himself the grandfather of his juvenile readers in his journal. He was to some extent influenced by Madhusudan Rao in some of his verses. Mahapatra wrote text books Patha Mala, and Sahitya Sudhakara. Kalicharan Patnaik who is a distinguished playwright in Orissa, also wrote stories and poems for children and his style and language bear the impress of his individual treatment. His first composition for children begins with an address to Kalahandia Megha (Dark Cloud) which has captured the attention of the children of all ages. His other works are Baidhantti (1921-1922), Baula Beni (1921-1922) and Shishu Khelahi (1941).

Upendra Tripathy (1903) is a very important author of children's literature. Being primarily a teacher he started his writings with a view to provide his students with reading material and he was a regular writer in Pilanka Pashu Pakshi Puran, Jahna Mamu and Mo Desha. His books like Ghanti Ghagudi, Kasi Kakudi, Benga Bahadur, Pilanka Pashu Pakshi Puran and Dindima have earned him the unique distinction of a creative writer for children. The effect of music in his poems makes the verses of Tripathy more appealing.

Godabarisha Mohapatra (1898-1965) is an important writer of stories and verses and text books for children in Oriya. Both in quality and quantity his humorous writings have provided new dimension to children's literature, particularly in creating an atmosphere of patriotism and sacrifice before the children. For some time he edited a children's magazine, Tuan Tuin, which proved to be very popular.

Efforts of Jagannath Mahapatra in this genre is remarkable. He produced model biographies in plain and simple language for children and such a series was called Anikia Sanskarana (One Anna Series) under the auspices of Nandan Shikhyaka Sabha. Ramakrishna Nanda, Balakrishna Kar, Padamachandan Patnaik Satyananda Mohanty are some of the important writers for children during the years following 1940. Ramakrishna Nanda started his literary career with text books only and the popularity of his text books like Sahitya Sopan and Patha Sopan led him to write for children and introduce science in juvenile literature. For some time he edited the magazine Sansar devoted to children's interest. Jhumuka is one of his recent anthologies of poems. One of his prayer songs like that of Madhusudan Rao has proved very popular with the school-going children. Balakrishna Kar, himself a notable writer of stories for children, was responsible for popularising children's literature for more than a decade and his medium was Jahna Mamu. It was started in the year 1932 under his editorship. Janha Mamu gave publicity to hundreds of writers in Oriya particularly those who started writing for children in those days. The magazine carried every month stories, verses, translations and adaptations from foreign languages. His second attempt was Madhu Khosha, a magazine devoted to the cause of popularising science among the children and his Shishu Sankhali is a lasting contribution to the encyclopaedic literature in Oriya. Besides, he himself wrote Shishu Ramayana, Phulla Chandi, Se Deshara Purna Katha, Sapana Puri Nuapatha, Char Patha, etc. After 1940 juvenile literature in Oriya has thus undergone tremendous changes both in form and substance.

